"Roger Temple has asked me to be his wife at last, and I——"

"And you—are going to be married again!" interrupts Belinda cruelly. "For the third time! Then all I can remark is, you are very fond of being married, Rose."

A heartless, unwomanly speech enough; but Belinda, like many other raw girls of her age, is absolutely heartless in matters of love; and at this moment passionate, unreasoning jealousy against the rival of her dead father is sending the blood to her brain too quickly for her to be very nice in the choice of words.

"I'm sure I don't know how you can be so unfeeling," says Rose, almost crying. "But you were always the same. Even when you were little you had no more sensibility than a stone. And Roger always expresses himself so beautifully about you, and the Temples are such a good family, and everything; and then to say that I—I, of all women living, am fond of being married! I do hope, Belinda, whatever your own opinions may be, you will not express yourself in this most heartless and indelicate manner before Captain Temple!"

"Captain Temple?" repeats Belinda, all innocence. "Why, when am I ever likely to see Captain Temple?"

"You will see him in St. Jean de Luz to-day."

"Captain Temple in St. Jean de Luz! You mean to tell me, Rose, that you and a young man are travelling about the world together?"

And Belinda, the first and last time in her life such hypocrisy can be recorded of her, puts on an air of outraged virtue edifying to behold.

"Roger met me in Paris and again in Bordeaux," says poor Rose, blushing through her rouge with vexation. "Roger was the old friend I told you of. And there was always Spencer—and we have taken care never to stop at the same hotel even. He has gone now to look for a lodging in quite another part of the town. If you knew, Belinda, if you only knew what a soul of honor Roger Temple has, you would not talk so lightly!"

"Ah, but you must remember I know nothing at all about him," retorts the girl, "and my education does not dispose me to take any man's honor on trust. Never mind, Rosie," she goes on with an assumption of pitying complaisance: "I am shocked, I own, but I will keep what I know to myself. I will not say a word, even to Burke."

"And will you behave with feeling, with consideration to Roger Temple, for my sake?"

Before the girl can answer a man's step sounds in the corridor, a knock comes at the door.

"Entrez," cries out Belinda, in her clear young voice.

"My things!" sighs the widow all in a tremor, her heart reverting to the possessions which lie nearer to it even than her lover—her bandboxes.

And the door opens.

"Roger! You have found your way already, then?" Rose exclaims, with rather a forced little laugh, and retreating hastily from the light that falls unbecomingly full upon her through the open window. "Belinda, dearest, my very old acquaintance, Captain Temple. Now mind," with infantine candor, "I shall never forgive either of you if you don't fall in love with each other at once. I have been like that always. Miss Ingram used to say I was quite absurd. Whoever I am fond of must be fond of all my friends!"

But, long before Rose had ceased twittering her small falsities, Belinda's eyes and Roger Temple's have met—met and spoken the truth.

"In life as on railways," a master hand was written, "at certain points, whether you know it or not, there is but an inch, this way or that, into what train you are shunted."

Into what train has Belinda's passionate heart been shunted, all unknowing, at this moment!

CHAPTER IV.

WHAT MEN CALL LOVE.

Rose spoke of the romance of two young lives, of love sacrificed to duty, of a heart slowly breaking during a dozen years. This we may set down as the poetic form of the story about herself and Roger. Now let us have it in the prose.

The story, in the prose form, is simply this: Rose married in her girlhood to an elderly London lawyer and launched into a narrow circle of dull, professional respectability, was, at six-and-twenty, as really fresh and ingenuous a young person as ever breathed. Neither perruquier nor Bond street chemist needed then. Her flaxen hair, smoothly braided according to the fashion of the day, adorned her youthful face. Her complexion, innocent of cosmetic, was, in spite of some few freckles, like a just opened dog-rose. So Roger Temple met and loved her.

The Indian mutiny was just over at the time, and Roger, a fair-faced boy of nineteen, had come back, wounded, after his first dark taste of soldier's work, to England. He made Rose Shemadeane's acquaintance at an East London dinner party, and, not knowing, till dessert, at least, that she was the crown and blessing of another man's life already, conceived for her as wild a passion as ever foolish lad conceived for still more foolish woman since the world began.

The London season was at its height, even Rose's humdrum life enlivened by an unwonted share of parties, theatre-going, drives in the park, visits to the Zoological; country cousins who must be amused staying in the house. Roger saw her, dogged her, worshipped her everywhere. One of the country cousins being female and unmarried, it might be assumed that Mr. Temple's attentions were honorably matrimonial. Mr. Temple being well-born, young, handsome, of good expectations, was it not a manifest duty to offer him encouragement?

Thus Rose, with small platitudes, stifled her small conscience for a fortnight or so. Then the end came—the end of the prologue, not the play.

Watching the hippotamus together one July Sunday afternoon at the Zoological, the country cousins, the nonentity of a husband, all but within earshot, young Master Roger made a fool of himself. In stammering, passionate whispers, told Mrs. Shelmadeane a secret which Mrs. Shelmadeane had been calmly aware of for some time past, but which it was shocking, oh, unendurably shocking, even to think of, the moment the confession happened to find its way into words.

She walked away from him, her fair young matron face ablaze, and, with the air of a new Cornelia, laid her hand upon her husband's arm. Three evenings later—Rose twenty-six, remember, Roger nineteen—was waltzing with him at a ball to which duty bade her chaperone her country cousins at the Hanover Square rooms.

Mr. Temple had been wicked—so wicked that it really took one's breath away to think of it—in daring to regard her, an honored wife, save with feelings of iciest respect and esteem. But Rose, gentle soul, felt constrained to pity the poor misguided fellow, to lead him, if it might be, into better ways. And that Bloomsbury Square life and husband of hers, illumined by present experience, were so hideously monotonous, and the homage of a man, handsome, young, distinguished like Roger, was honey sweet to vanity.

A better woman, or a worse one, a woman inspired by imagination or guided by experience, might have been terrified at such a position. Good, passionless, unimaginative, self-saturated Rose, the first little cold shock of the plunge over, felt no terror at all. What she did feel strongest, I think (when one can disinter it sufficiently for analysis from the mass of small vanities, triumphs before partnerless country cousins, etc., in which it was embedded), was—gratified sense of power.

The infatuation lasted out the London season. Then old Shelmadeane carried his wife off to Margate—tardily suspicious, perhaps, as to the kind of sacrifice she was making to duty—and Roger's leave of absence came to an end. He was angry, bitter, sick at heart; his divinity during their last interview having sermonized and sympathized, and altogether tortured him beyond measure; determined to return to India, without seeing her again, determined to despise, to forget her.

Long letters passed between them, with or without Mr. Shelmadeane's knowledge—I refrain from speaking with certainty on this point—but letters certainly that Mr. Shelmadeane or any one else in the world might have read with safety. Rose, indeed, half thought at times that her victim repressed all allusion to his tortures too successfully. Every mail, every second mail at first; then once in three or four months; then twice a year. So the correspondence attending Roger's ill-starred passion was carried on. At last Mr. Shelmadeane died.

And Roger Temple, of course, flew to England to put in first claim for the possession of his beloved one's hand? No, Roger Temple did nothing of the kind. He was away up the country pig-sticking, when the letter containing the news of Rosie's widowhood reached him, after some delay. And he loved sport passionately. And the two or three men who formed the party happened to be his closest friends. And must not weeds be worn a decent time before they are replaced by wedding favors?

Roger neither rushed to England nor wrote any letter designed to compromise his Rosie's newly-gained liberty. It must be remembered that he had now been wasting in despair during a good many years; also that men get into the habit of everything, even of hopeless passion, and against their better reason may feel disturbed by having to abandon a settled mood of thought.

He wrote the widow as exquisitely delicate a letter of condolence as was ever penned; putting himself and his own selfish hopes and fears utterly away in the background; dwelling wholly on her and on her loss. He spoke tenderly, and with vagueness, of the long years of their separation; he spoke with greater vagueness still of the day of their possible reunion. Of marriage, of anything that could by possibility be constructed into a hint of marriage, he spoke not a word

An ordinary, intelligent woman, before she had read such a letter to the end, would have known that her lover's love for her was over. Rose, guided by the irrefragable logic of a fool, deduced from it only a new proof of her slave's devotion to her welfare.

"There is one far distant, who adores me, but who is too high-souled, too generous, to think of anything but my grief!" she would say to Major O'Shea, who got an introduction to the pretty widow, and indeed set steadily to work love-making, before her crape was six weeks old. "Ah, Major O'Shea, if you had only the conscientiousness, the noble, forbearing, unselfish nature of that poor fellow in India!"

And then Cornelius would respond to the effect of his heart being stronger than his reason, of his impetuous feelings hurrying him beyond the cold bond of conventional decorum. And the widow would sigh and blush, and wipe a tear or two, and call him a sad, sad man, as she yielded her hand to be kissed. And the upshot of it all was, that the next news Roger Temple got of Rose Shelmadeane was a flaming announcement in the Times of her infidelity to him; by special license, an archdeacon and three or four of the lesser clergy assisting, at St. George's, Hanover Square.

Singular perversity of men's nature! The news of this marriage cost him not only the most poignant jealousy, but a revival of his love in all its first fresh ardor. The existence of a husband, of any husband, seemed really some necessary, mysterious condition of Roger Temple's passion. You should have seen the letter of good wishes that he wrote the bride; bitterest veiled reproach discernible through every courteous phrase, every pleasant little congratulatory message to Major O'Shea! Rosy cried herself almost plain for the day after receiving it; hid it jealously from Cornelius, to whose philosophic mind the whole matter, you may be sure, would have been one of profoundest indifference; and wrote Roger a pleading, self-extenuating reply by return of mail, with three violets—ah, did Captain Temple remember the bunches of violets he used to bring her during the happy days of their friendship in Bloomsbury Square—enclosed.

And Captain Temple, Rose has had his own word for it since, kissed violets and letter both, and set up the writer on the old pedestal in his imagination—I was very nearly writing his heart—that she had ever held.

Some slight insight into Rose's domestic grievances as Mrs. O'Shea, the reader has had already; we need not farther enlarge upon them. Cornelius spent her money, neglected her, went to America, where his fate awaited him. And Rose, on her Uncle Robert's death, found herself once more free—free and with a handsome little income, villa at Brompton, plate, linen, and accessories, at her disposal.

And then it was that she and her old lover looked again upon each other's faces. Roger had returned to England unexpected by his friends, his long leave having been given him some months earlier than he anticipated; and on a certain May night, Rose at that moment believing him to be thousands of miles away in India, knocked at the door of the Brompton villa and inquired, in a voice whose accents he vainly strove to command, if Mrs. O'Shea was at home.

At last a fluffy-haired, brilliantly complexioned—alas, that I must write it!—middle-aged lady came forward to him and bowed! a lady extremely overdressed or underdressed—as you like to term it. "I am not aware that I have the honor——" she began, looking at him strangely.

And then he knew her voice.

Poor Rose, if she could have seen into her quondam lover's heart just at that moment!

He watched her during the next hour or so with feelings about equally balanced of disappointment and blank surprise. Every woman's good looks must decline after the lapse of the twelve best years of her maturity, and Rose's had really, in the common acceptation of the phrase, "worn well." But it was not any fading due to age, it was not time's natural footprints on cheek or brow that shocked him thus; it was the absolute, startling transformation of her whole personality!

He had not really dined, Mrs. O'Shea discovered; had arrived in London late that afternoon, and, forgetful of bodily sustenance, had rushed away to call on her at once. So a little supper was organized, accompanied by a bottle of Uncle Robert's best champagne. And then this man and woman, who had played at love so long, began looking into each other's eyes, to talk of all that they had suffered (in imagination or reality) since they parted. And the cruel intervening years faded away. They were whispering beside the hippopotamus, they were murmuring farewells upon the Margate beach, again. And by and by Rose's hand, youthful and white still, found its way into Captain Temple's. It trembled; he pressed it to reassure her. Rose, with a sigh, made a feint of moving away. And then, for the first time in their lives, their lips met, and Roger's fate was sealed.

The wax lights had burnt low by now, and Rose kept her face well in shadow, nay, hid it bashfully out of sight, on her lover's breast. And when he kissed her beautiful golden hair it never occurred to him to think from what dead head it might have been sheared; and when at last she lifted up her face to falter out softest promises of life-long truth, he did not even see the rice powder it had left upon his waistcoat!

Who loves, cavils not; and Roger Temple, or Roger Temple's imagination, loved during this hour's intoxication at least.

What he thought and felt next morning, when he had to review his position, and Mrs. O'Shea's complexion by daylight, none but Roger Temple ever knew.

CHAPTER V.

COMPLIMENTS, NOT CARESSES.

Belinda's eyes have met Roger's and, in spite of all her foregone jealous resolves, the girl finds it hard to steal herself against Rose's future husband. Never in her whole vagabond, loveless life has such honest human sunshine shone on her as shines now in Roger Temple's smile.

"I don't know about falling in love, but I am sure Belinda and I mean to be friends, Rosie," he says, advancing. "Do we not, my dear?"

And before she can find time to put herself on guard, Captain Temple's bronzed moustache has touched her cheek. It is the kind of salutation that could scarce, by the very iciest prude, be stigmatized as a kiss, and yet it bears such a significantly marked family resemblance to one to be unpleasant in Rosie's sight.

"I—I, really, Roger—Belinda looks so ridiculously younger than she is!"

"Not a bit," cries Roger, and now he rests his hand kindly on the little girl's shoulder. "Belinda is fifteen years old—you told me, did you not, that she was fifteen? Well, and she looks it. Don't mind Rosie, Belinda. Rosy turns rusty at the thought of having a grown-up daughter."

"I shall be seventeen the week after next," says Belinda, holding up her chin.

"I don't know what people mean by taking me for a child. I have certainly seen enough of the world and its wickedness to make me feel old," she adds, with the accustomed hard, little ring in her voice.

"Belinda will look different—I trust Belinda will look totally different when she is properly dressed," says the widow, glancing down at her own elegantly flowing draperies. "I must really have a serious talk with Miss Burke about these short skirts."

"Ah, but Miss Burke is not here to be talked with, Rosie," cries Belinda. "My natural guide and protector has been away in Spain a week or more, collecting facts for her book, and I am knocking about alone, as you see—me and my dog Costa."

"Alone!" stammers Rose, shocked not so much, perhaps, at the fact itself, as at having the fact exposed before Roger. "You don't mean actually alone, my dear?"

"Well, no; I have my chums, of course, the fellows who were with me in the street when you arrived. Now, Rose," she goes on, pitilessly, "tell the truth! Were you or were you not ashamed when you first saw me?"

"I—I was surprised, Belinda" says Rose, in her sweetest little feminine treble. "It is not usual in England, you know, to see a girl of seventeen wearing her dress above her ankles. And then those fearful—What must I call them, Belinda?—what do they call those fearful door-mat things you have on your feet?"

"They call those fearful things alpargetas in Spanish, espadrilles in French," answers Belinda, coolly holding out a ragged, sandalled foot for inspection. "If you played paume on the hot sand for hours together as I do you would be glad to wear espadrilles, Rose; yes, or to go barefoot altogether, as I do, oftener than not."

A blush of burning shame rises over the widow's face.

"Our dear Belinda wants a year or two of sound English training," she remarks, in a tone that to Roger sounds dove-like, but that Belinda remembers and interprets only too well. "That is the worst of continental education. One has to sacrifice so many good solid English qualities for accomplishments. Still, in these days, a girl must be accomplished. A couple of years in a select English boarding-school will, I have no doubt, render Belinda all that our fondest wishes could desire."

Belinda, on the conclusion of this little tirade, looks hard into her step-mother's eyes for a moment or two; then, shouldering her schistera, she moves across to the door.

"I must be off," turning and bestowing a nod full of caustic meaning on the lovers. "And unless you want me to join some gang of wandering gipsy players, as I have often thought of doing, you had better not talk about boarding-schools any more. My accomplishments, Captain Temple," looking with an air of mock modesty—"Rose talks of my accomplishments, for which the good solid English qualities have been sacrificed! I will tell you what they are," checking off each accomplishment on her dark, slim fingers as she proceeds 'bolero dancing, slang paume'—of each a little. Knowledge, learnt practically, of how to keep myself and dog on twenty sous a day board-wages. And a taste for bull-fights so strong, oh! so strong," this with unaffected enthusiasm, "that I would sooner go without meat for a fortnight and church for a year than miss the chance of going to one. For further particulars apply to Mr. Augustus Jones."

And so exit Belinda, whistling—yes, Rose, whistling; keep from fainting if you can—as she goes.

"A quaint little original, our future daughter," says Roger, whose eyes have certainly opened wider during the conclusion of Belinda's tirade. "But a good-hearted child, I'll be bound. You must not be too hard on her, Rose."

"I hard!" sighs the widow, looking at him reproachfully. "When was I ever hard on any one? If you knew, Roger—but of course men never understand these things—the trial that poor girl has always been! I can assure you I look upon Belinda as a chastisement, sent to me for some wise purpose by Providence."

She seats herself on a sofa, discreetly away in the half light, and with an air of resignation takes out her pocket-handkerchief. "I have made sacrifices no real mother would have made for her—can I ever forget the devoted, blind attachment of her poor, dear papa for me? Sending her away, Heaven knows at what expense, to the continent, and always writing that she should have the best of masters, and everything; and now this is the result. How painfully plain she is."

"Plain? No, Rosie, anything but plain. Belinda is just at that awkward age when one does not know what to make of girls, and her dress is not quite like other people's, is it? But she has magnificent eyes, and a pretty hand."

"A pretty hand! Belinda's hands pretty! Why, they are enormous, six and three-quarters at least, two sizes bigger than mine, and as brown! But you think every one you see lovely, Roger," says Rose, pettishly. "I declare one might just as well be ugly one's self. I have never heard you speak of any woman yet that you could not find something to admire in her."

"And all because of you, my dearest!" cries Captain Temple, with warmth. "When a man admires one woman supremely, can you not imagine that every other woman, yes, even the plainest, must possess something fair in his sight for her sake?"

He comes across to her, stoops, and rests his hand on his betrothed's fair head. It is a favorite action of Roger's and one that Rose would be exceedingly well pleased to see him abandon. Who can tell what horrible trick pastiche or plate may not play one in some unguarded moment or more than common tenderness?

"I shall be quite unhappy about my dresses if they do not arrive soon," Rose goes on presently. "Ten large cases, you remember." Does not Roger remember those awful ten cases well; in Paris, Bordeaux, everywhere? "And a bit of blue ribbon on each. There can be no mistake if the railway people are honest, but abroad one never knows. I'm sure nothing would have been easier than for Belinda to run back to the station; still, she did not offer, and in my delicate position as a step-mother, I have never required the slightest attention from the poor girl. Oh Roger," Rose's hand is in her lover's now, and he is beside her on the sofa. "If I dared, how much I should like to tell you a secret—something we are all concerned in!"

Roger's natural reply is, what should prevent her telling it? Ought there to be any secret, present or to come, between persons whose lives, like theirs, are to be spent in one long, delightful confidence?

"Well, then—I'm a very naughty girl, I know," Rose avows, kittenishly, "and I dare say you will scold me sadly, but I've been match-making! It is not quite by accident that Mr. Augustus Jones is in St. Jean de Luz!"

"Accident or no accident, the fact is a deuced unpleasant one," remarks Captain Temple. "How or why Mr. Jones came here is Mr. Jones's own concern, but the bore of having to encounter him! I really did hope, Rose, that we had seen the last of that atrocious man when we left London."

"You are prejudiced against him, sir. I'm afraid you don't like poor Augustus because he was a little too attentive to me."

"Rose!"

"Oh, come, Roger, I know what your ruling passion is, and always has been. The green-eyed monster, sir——"

"Rosie, I swear——"

"Well, we cannot help these things, my dear; I am ridiculously without jealousy myself. Poor Major O'Shea often said he wished he could see me a little more jealous, but I can make every allowance for it in others. I ought to be able to bear all the jealous suspiciousness of men's natures after the experience that I have had!"

There is silence for a minute, and any one watching Roger Temple's face attentively might discern there a good deal the look of a man who is trying to repress his weariness under the perpetual, exacting babble of a child. "I don't think you judge of me correctly, Rose," he remarks after a time. "Who ever judges another correctly? Who can read but by his own light? We were talking of Mr. Jones, were we not? Ah, yes, and you think me jealous of Jones! So be it, my dear. Poor little Rosie," he bends forward and salutes the widow's cheek—very tenderly, I may almost say fearfully. Roger is better acquainted with feminine weakness, as regards rice powder especially, than he was on that first fatal night at Brompton. "And now what about this grand secret of yours? You have been match-making, have you? I hope you don't mean to marry our little daughter Belinda to Mr. Augustus Jones?"

"He would be an extremely nice husband for her, from a worldly point of view," says Rose, turning over and over the diamond, a gift of Roger's that rests on her plump third finger. "And as to education—old Mr. Jones was sensible of his own deficiencies, and had his son coached up by the most expensive tutors. Any one hearing Augustus talk would say that he was quite well educated enough—for a married man."

"And presentable enough, refined enough? The sort of husband a girl could not only love, but be proud of? Well, Rosie, manage it as you choose. If you like Mr. Jones, and if Belinda likes Mr. Jones, you may be sure that I shall not forbid the banns."

"Ah, there is the difficulty. Belinda does not like Mr. Jones. Belinda and I never liked the same thing or person yet." Poor Rosie, if the mantle of prophecy could but fall upon her shoulders at this moment!

"But you could help me so much, dear, if you would—and you will, I know?" upraising her eyes coaxingly to her lover's. "You will help me in my plans for Belinda's happiness? It was all through me, Roger—don't be cross with me if I confess the truth—it was all through me that Mr. Jones came to St. Jean de Luz."

"Through you that Mr. Jones came to St. Jean de Luz! And why should I be cross with you, you little goose?"

Rosie talks like a girl of sixteen: Roger treats her like a girl of sixteen—yet is sensible, mournfully sensible, ever, of the grotesqueness of so doing.

"You see, I knew that Augustus was anxious to marry. I suspected, feared," says Rose, with modest grace, "that his hopes in some directions might have been just a little blighted, and the thought struck me—as he was going abroad and had asked me to plan his tour for him—the thought struck me to bring him and Belinda together. What he wants is connection, what she wants is money——"

"But Belinda is a child still," interrupts Roger Temple. "You are building all these castles in the air, dear, kind little soul that you are, Rosie, for her good, but the thing is ridiculous. Belinda's home must be with us for the next three or four years. Ample time, then, to begin match-making. How could a child of her age possibly decide," goes on honest Roger—"how could an innocent-hearted child of Belinda's age possibly decide whether she ought or ought not to sell herself for the so many thousands a year of a snob like Jones?"

"Roger, my dear," answers Rose, in her sweetest, most angelic tones—whenever she is annoyed, Mrs. O'Shea's angelic proclivities become more marked—"excuse me if I tell you that all those romantic ideas about selling one's self for money are out of date. Belinda never was a child. Belinda has not one youthful sentiment belonging to her; and as to innocence, poor thing!—you heard what she said about bull-fights, without fainting! Those fine interesting-looking fellows in such danger, and the horrid bulls goring everybody. I'm sure to see a picture, to read a description of one, is sickening enough."

"A matter of custom and nerve, Rosie. I have known some English women capable of worse cruelty than being present at a bull-fight."

"And the very best thing for the girl's safety and our peace of mind will be to get her respectably settled as quick as possible. My own opinion of Belinda—I would say so to no one but you, Roger—is that she is without heart. And a woman without heart——"

But the generalization is opportunely cut short by the arrival of the boxes and blue ribbons. In her joy over her recovered finery, Rosie forgets all other human considerations; and her lover, with orders only to smoke one cigar, and to be back at the post of duty in an hour at latest, recovers a breathing space of liberty.

(To be Continued).

The Boys Are Improving.

An exchange tells of a schoolma'am who has introduced a novel system of spelling in her school. When one of the girls misses a word the boy who spells it correctly is permitted to kiss the girl. The boys are improving, but it is feared that the girls will soon forget how to spell their own names.—Tionesta (Pa.) Democrat.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Eye-Tickling Sights on Rotten Row when the World is Abroad.

VOWS AT THE ALTAR.

Latest Fashion Frolics and Household Ornaments.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.)

Gowns That Act.

There is one thing about these Parisian dresses that has never been noticed, even at the North, where the critics are anxious to discover something new, and that is the remarkable dramatic quality of the gowns which Worth gets up. Put a woman in one of Worth's gowns and place her on the stage, and she is bound to act. The gowns themselves do the most of the work. They pose, they gesture and they speak. They draw tears from the eyes of the highflyers, and cause the gallery to cease eating peanuts. What greater victory could they have? —Atlanta Constitution.

Before the Marriage Altar.

"Doctor, I feel miserable in mind and body—what shall I take?" asked an old bachelor patient of his physician. "Take a wife," answered the doctor gruffly. "Many are thy men who have profited by taking this prescription," says the author of "How to be Happy, though Married" in his new book, "The Five Talents of Woman," just published by the Scribners. "Before marriage they were worth little, after it worth much. Man never appreciates his inferiority to woman so thoroughly as when he stands before the altar in the presence of an audience of friends and hears the clergyman make him husband. Nine out of ten men in such a position tremble as if they were about to be arrested for murder, while nine out of ten women go through the ceremony as gracefully as if it were an every-day occurrence. And it is this timorous creature in a dress suit that promises to protect the calm and placid angel whose orange blossoms are his aureole. What delicious sarcasm there is in the thought! And in after-life, when the husband gets torn up by care, and when a little trouble comes to steal away his peace of mind, how is it then? The woman whom he promised to protect becomes his protector. She sees sunshine through the clouds. She smoothes out the wrinkled brow of care. She props up his flagging spirits. She puts new life into his bosom, new hope into his soul, and he goes forth in the morning with new strength and new zeal to wrestle with life and its responsibilities. Woman may be the weaker vessel, but she isn't broken up and doesn't go to pieces as soon as a man."

Should a Girl Dress Quickly?

Between the brisk young woman who can dawn upon the breakfast table completely dressed in 10 minutes neatly and ... ned to the ... after her ... ght of a new day, and the leisurely damsel who requires 45 minutes or an hour for the same operation, there is a whole gamut of feminine variations. The close observer of these varying types of fair dressers finds each possessed of interest. There is the honest, candid girl, who confesses that it takes her an hour to assume the raiment of the day and to do full justice to the mysteries of the dressing bureau and the bath. She takes her hour and no one expects better things. There is the girl's opposite—yet counterpart—in the equally truthful young woman who says she can make ready for breakfast or the walk in ten minutes, and who does so in nine cases out of ten. Then comes the host of erratic ones. The girl who will be "ready in a minute," only to keep up expectancy on the part of the waiting one twenty times the minute. There is the fair one whose voice cheerily rings out a statement that she has only her bonnet to put on, or a bow to pin, who apparently devotes more time to that simple operation than to the varied operations of appareling. The art of putting into one's daily habiliments with rapidity, and yet with neatness, is possessed by the minority of Eve's daughters only. Let this trait of rapidity in dressing abound be of honest acquisition, and through heredity, for of a surety Eve was not given to spending much time at her toilet, and yet her fair descendants do not inherit their remote ancestor's traits.

Beauty's Home in London.

Here is an extract from a London letter in the Cleveland Leader: London is a great centre, to which much of the female beauty of the world gravitates. A morning on Rotten Row at "beauties' hour," between breakfast and luncheon, when the sun shines brightly and society is sauntering up and down the bridle road which extends from Apsley House to Kensington Gardens, is a sight as well worth seeing before dissolution as the Bay of Naples. At first the eye is almost dazzled by the brilliancy of complexions and the costumes. Here, for instance, trips along a dream of loveliness in a fawn-colored gown, with a profusion of frills of creamy lace, and such cheeks! Another beauty of the purest Saxon type wears one of the prettiest of hats of a yellowish tint like honeysuckle, with bows on either shoulder. Her black, open-worked stockings and low shoes and tight gloves contrast delightfully with the rest of the costume. These dark "fix-me-ups," extending to black silk underwear, I am told, le dernier cri, or the perfection, a bit of Parisian ...

How to Shampoo One's Own Hair.

... sure of having the hair ... ed is to have some one ... w. In England, in the ... a department of hair ... accomplished barber, ... for showering and ... r of ladies for one ... a good shampoo ... h is a large sum ... After combing ... raid it loosely ... all elastic band. ... a and first wash ... castile soap; ... water, soap it ... ward thoroughly ... a towel. Wipe ... id and brush out, beginning at the lower end, when it will not tangle. Let the hair loose in the sun and air and it will dry in less than half an hour. A woman's hair should be washed at least monthly if kept fine and healthy.—New York Evening Sun.

Brilliant Costumes From France.

Here from the New York Herald is a description of some of the costly costumes worn on the stage of that city this week by Mme. Jane Hading. One gown (as Clare) is a bridal dress of white satin, covered entirely with duchesse lace and caught up with pearls and orange blossoms. The pearls are as large as the flowers, and are fastened in garlands. The bodice to this dress is extremely decollete, and some beautiful diamonds are to be worn with it. A second gown is of ceverte, or "faded rose," pink silk, and has a short train. The front from the shoulders to the hem of the garment is covered with cut beads of many colors formed into a diamond-shaped passementerie, and a third is of pearl gray faille silk, trimmed with bands of Honiton lace, with a girdle and collar of black moire.

Plush and Satin This Season.

"Plush," says the New York Sun in its foreign budget, "will be much used this season for tea gowns and robes de chambres, and also for evening reception and dinner dresses. More satin also will be seen than usual."

Secrets of the Family.

Use a warm knife in cutting warm bread and the like.

A paste of whiting and benzine will remove spots from marble.

A salt ham should be soaked over night in plenty of soft water previous to boiling.

After washing a wooden bowl, place where it will dry equally on all sides, away from the stove.

Fruit-stains on white goods can be removed by pouring boiling water directly from the kettle over the spots.

Hive syrup is good for croup or inflammation of the lungs. It must be kept in a cool place, for if it sours it is very poisonous.

If you want poached eggs to look particularly nice cook each egg in a muffin ring placed in the bottom of a saucepan of boiling water.

A creaking hinge can be cured by the use of a black lead pencil of the softest number, the point rubbed into all the crevices of the hinge.

Corks may be made air and water tight by keeping them for five minutes under melted paraffine. They must be kept down with a wire screen.

For cleaning brass use a thin paste of plate powder, two tablespoonfuls of vinegar four tablespoonfuls of alcohol. Rub with a piece of flannel. Polish with chamois.

Suet should be cooked before it is stale. Boil for two or three hours, then strain through a linen cloth. One fourth of this fat and three-fourths lard is a good mixture for frying doughnuts.

Be very particular about disinfecting the kitchen sink. Washing soda, two tablespoonfuls to a gallon of boiling water, makes an excellent wash to pour hot into the sink at night after you have finished using it.

Novelties in Bric-a-Brac.

For fancy tables brass and onyx in plain designs are the fashion.

Flower vases in cut glass of the finest crystal are growing in favor.

The latest table lamps are of oxidized silver in antique design and of gold and silver combined.

A serviceable hand-glass, with bronze frame of rustic work, is ornamented with hand-painted field flowers.

A convenient cologne case has three cut-glass bottles of varying sizes, with gold stoppers and a lizard-skin case.

For decorating Worcester ware, hand-painted floral designs seem to be selected in preference to landscape scenes.

Odd candlesticks of majolica ware, representing Turkish pipes, folded newspapers and clowns' heads, shells, etc., are much admired.

Half Dozen Fashion Notes.

This is a gold and silver braid season.

The bustle is not moribund. It is dead.

Gobelin blue remains a very fashionable color.

Brick red or Venetian red shades are in favor.

The sleeves of all wraps are made looser and more flowing.

Fringes, which for some years have been neglected as trimmings, have again been taken into fashionable favor. So says the New York Sun, which furnishes five more notes, as follows:

Wanted—Well-Trained Mistresses.

They tell me that the great want of the age is well-trained servants. I think that well-trained mistresses are wanted. My experience has been that if a servant be well treated the mistress will be well served. Never let her feel degraded because she waits upon you and does your work. Let her understand that you sympathize with her in all her joys and sorrows.—Women's Journal.

The Leading Lady Bustleless.

The latest novelty in clocks is of onyx. French marble is also made into beautiful, rich designs. Gold finish adds to their ornamental properties.

A fancy wall-pocket in majolica is a folded handkerchief to imitate a cornucopia. Other designs of the same material have been appropriated for holding flowers.

At the new play at the Paris Gymnase the leading lady wears a dress in which the "tournure," "strapotin" or "nuage," as they call it, the bustle in our tongue, is absolutely lacking.

Noah's ark seems to have been drawn upon to supply eccentric designs in paperweights. The latest importation of bronze ware includes designs of every animal known to creation.

A very eccentric receptacle for flowers on the breakfast table is an imitation napkin of majolica carelessly bunched together in the form of a lunch-basket. From between the folds peep the head and tail of a turkey. —Jewellers' Weekly.

Colors That Harmonize.

Red and violet do not accord well.

Orange and yellow accord incomparably better than red and orange.

Black never produces a bad effect when it is associated with two luminous colors.

Green and blue produce an indifferent effect, but better when the colors are deep.

Blue, when placed by the side of orange, increases the latter's intensity, and vice versa.

Green and violet, especially when light, form a combination preferable to green and blue.

Red and blue accord passably, especially if the red incline rather to a scarlet than a crimson.

When two colors accord badly together it is always advantageous to separate them by white.

While grey never exactly produces a bad effect in its association with two luminous colors, yet in most cases its assortments are dull.

Red and yellow accord pretty well, especially if the red be a purple red, rather than scarlet, and the yellow rather greenish than orange.

Yellow and green form an agreeable combination. The arrangement of yellow and blue is more agreeable than that of the yellow and green, but is less lively.

LONDON STREET VIANDS.

The Sensible English Belief that One Sleeps Best on a Full Stomach.

As liquor is abundant and good, so is food, cooked and on sale. For a penny the London beggar may buy a bowl of beef or pea soup and a large piece of bread, enough to keep off starvation for a day. The spoon he eats it with and the bowl he eats out of are chained to the table. Nothing is left lying around loose in that style of restaurant. Two kinds of soup constitute the entire bill-of-fare for the penny soup-house. For a halfpenny there is always a hot roasted potato ready on the sidewalk. These potato-roasting ovens are trundled about on wheels, and are built to resemble a small locomotive. They are known as "Murphy Busters." Another style of street kitchen deals in kidney and eel pies, smoking hot and twopence each. The "ham and beef shops" are ready with their cooked wares at noon—corned-beef at twopence, for the lowest amount weighed out; and for a ha'penny each a paper cone filled with freshly-boiled potatoes or turnips. "Winks," a species of salt-water snail, are boiled in quantities and sold on the streets. The fried-fish kitchens about 10 at night are filled with people, plate in hand, waiting for the well-browned sole from the great frying vats at fourpence the plate, with a generous quantity of fried potatoes added for a ha'penny. Sixpence buys the supper for a small family, and twopence more pays for the inevitable pint of porter. The 10 o'clock supper is the Englishman's most enjoyable meal, and twenty odd millions of people over there eat it and do not suffer so much from indigestion as we do. It looks odd at first, though, when you make a call, to see at 10 o'clock the table spread as if for dinner and the roast beef hot from the oven brought on.—New York Star.

Their Names and Pseudonyms.

Josh Billings—Henry W. Shaw.
Andrew Jack Dowling—Seba R. Smith.
Artemus Ward—Charles Farrar Browne.
Bill Arp—Charles H. Smith.
Gath George Alfred Townsend.
Fat Contributor—A. Miner Griswold.
Hawkeye Man—Robert J. Burdette.
Howadjii—George William Curtis.
Ik Marvel—Donald Grant Mitchell.
James Yellowplush—Wm. M. Thackeray.
John Paul—Charles H. Webb.
John Phœnix Capt. George H. Derby.
Mark Twain—Samuel L. Clemens.
Max Adler—Charles H. Clark.
Eli Perkins—Melville D. Landon.
Petroleum V. Nasby—David R. Locke.
Bill Nye—William E. Nye.
Nym Crinkle—Andrew C. Wheeler.
Old Si—Samuel W. Small.
Orpheus C. Kerr—Robert H. Newell.
Pelig Wales—William A. Croffut.
Peter Plymley—Sydney Smith.
Miles O'Reilly—Charles G. Halpin.
Peter Parley—H. C. Goodrich.
Ned Buntline—Col. Judson.
Brick Pomeroy—M. M. Pomeroy.
Josiah Allen's Wife—Marietta Holley.
Q. K. Philander Doesticks—Mortimer Thompson.
Mrs. Partington—Benj P. Shillabar.
Spoopendyke—Stanley Huntley.
Uncle Remus—Joel Chandler Harris.
Hosea Bigelow—James Russell Lowell.
Fanny Fern—Sarah Payson Willis.
Grandfather Lickshingle — Robert W. Criswell.
M. Quad—Charles B. Lewis.

Rome's Welcome to William.

Here is a literal translation of the song that the Italians sang for His Majesty Emperor William on his entrance into Rome:

"Hurrah! Let our trumpets give forth their most joyous blasts, for the flight of an eagle strikes the air! Hurrah! Let our seven hills repeat the echo of the acclamations!

CHORUS OF MEN.

"To thee, O son of the strong, to thee the strong we give the salute of Rome, of Rome resuscitated in her liberty! One day our two peoples in battle fought against their true destinies. But our two flags shine in the sun, brothers, to-day. The Tiber salutes them and the Elbe responds. The hands that an evil hour divided are clasped in joy!

CHORUS OF CHILDREN.

"We raise toward thee the silvery voice of our concert, toward thee, the friend of our people, the guest of our King! Thy rays of glory which so brilliantly rise from the horizon, we salute in our songs, a messenger of happy days! To thee, Lord, be the glory and the love of nations. May history write one day thy name in her book of gold.

ALL TOGETHER.

"Let hymns burst forth before him who clasps the hand of Humbert! Hurrah! Let the trumpts sound loudly, while civilization caresses with its rays the colors of the two standards! Hurrah!"

It is no wonder that the youthful Kaiser has a pain in his ear.—New York Sun.

The large plaster centre-piece fell in the East End Methodist Church, Kingston, during the service on Sunday evening. In its descent it smashed the circular reflector over the chandelier, and the whole mass fell amongst the worshippers. The largest fragment broke the back of a pew, but singular to relate only one gentleman was slightly cut on the head by a piece of the reflector. There was considerable alarm for some time among the congregation.

HARSH TAILORS.

Their Treatment of Pretty Young Gentlemen Devoid of Cash.

("Observer" in Toronto Globe)

I hear some serious complaints against the tailors. It seems that several of the prettiest young gentlemen of the community actually have been refused credit by paltry, common tailors on Queen and Yonge streets. What are they to do? They must have new suits. Is not the winter almost on us, with balls and parties and operas that cannot go on except these pretty young gentlemen are present? Is society to suffer for the contumacy of these wretched tailors? Are our sweetest young gentlemen to go with threadbare garments for the want of a little vulgar cash? Wasn't it enough that these drawing room lilacs should descend to the indignity of patronizing a tailor off King street, where, to be sure, their credit was exhausted? But that's no concern of these miserable needle-shovers on the second-rate streets. Their business is to clothe the pets and let society go on and whirl. The tailors have to live! Don't we know it? But haven't the darlings to live also and to keep society alive, too; and is the whole social structure to go down in ruin just because a lot of pestilent tailors insult the finest gentlemen in the land by insisting that they must descend to the vulgar practice of paying for their own clothes? The winter won't wait. The tailors must. How could the young gentlemen have money? Hadn't they to take a month's holidays last summer. No, not two weeks! A month! Why, even a tailor takes two weeks' holidays. You couldn't expect the pets to run with the tailors. Then there was ice-cream to be supplied to the colony of fair admirers, and picnics to organize that you couldn't get on without, you know, like you could your clothes, and betting to do on the races and baseball and lacrosse and the other games, and all this that had to be settled for in beastly cash, and still the presumptuous tailors expect the pretty ones to pay for their clothes! It's downright stupid, you know. The vulgar tradesmen ought to be proud to make clothes for the fine young gentlemen and ask no questions. If this sort of things goes on the beastly practice of paying for things may become common, and actually these fine fellows will have to put into clothes, just simple clothes for wearing, the money that belongs to the clubs and opera and balls and parties and the other events that are never complete without the pretty young gentlemen.

Temperance Notes.

No boy will be admitted to the Chambersburg (Pa.) Academy who uses tobacco in any form, on the ground that tobacco produces baneful effects on the minds and health of the students.

The W. C. T. U. of Calcutta has had printed and is circulating two leaflets written by Mrs. Leavitt. Two successful public meetings have been held, and signatures to the pledge and the World's Petition are being secured.

According to the statement of the ex-Mayor of St. Louis, the revenue from saloons was over $2,000 less than the expenses with which they taxed the city. This exclusive of the poverty resulting to homes and individuals.

A Bill appropriating $80,000 for a home for Mormon women has passed the United States Senate. This work has been accomplished through the efforts of Mrs. Angie F. Newman, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent for work among Mormon women.

The fourth week of November is set apart by the Right Worthy Grand Lodge of Good Templars as Missionary Week throughout the Order. Each lodge is urged to hold an open meeting and to do all in its power to advance the interests of the organization.

Miss J. Armenia Ackerman, of California, who has recently been in Alaska on an organizing trip for the National W.C.T.U., has remarkable powers of indurance. During the past year she has been able to work without a week's rest, and on one trip spoke 97 consecutive nights.

As an outgrowth of the W.C.T.U. lately formed in Paris, France, a Loyal Temperance Legion has been organized among the children of the orphanage connected with Miss De Broen's Mission. The temperance work is spreading fast among the poor. At a late meeting of the union thirty-nine signed the pledge.

It is stated on the authority of the Russian physician and publicist, Portugaloff, that strychnine in subcutaneous injections is an immediate and infallible remedy for drunkenness. The craving for drink is said to be changed to positive aversion, and after a treatment of eight or ten days the patient may be discharged. The establishment of inebriate dispensaries in connection with police stations is recommended by Dr. Portugaloff.

"Keep It Tae Yersel,' Jock."

In a school in Aberdeenshire one day a dull boy was making his way to the master for the third time with an arithmetical question.

The teacher a little annoyed exclaimed: "Come, come, John, what's the matter now?"

"I canna get ma question richt," replied the boy.

"What's wrong with it this time?"

"I've gotten auchteenpence ower-muckle."

"Never min," said a smart boy in a loud whisper, with a sly glance at the master; "keep it tae yersel,' Jock."

Making Marriage a Common Affair.

A gentleman who had had the misfortune to lose three wives within a few years showed his continued confidence in the fair sex by taking unto himself the fourth. At the wedding some one having asked his 15 year-old daughter who had performed the ceremony she innocently replied: "Oh, Dr. Moore, I guess; he generally marries papa."—Harper's Bazar.

The man who sang: "The dearest spot on earth to me is home" must have had a very extravagant family.

John Wanamaker, the great Philadelphia merchant, is said to be the most heavily insured man in the country. The policies which he carries on his life aggregate more than $1,000,000.

The Mikado of Japan is said to look upon it when it's red about as often as any ruler on the rolling ball.

AN ENGLISH MAYOR'S IDEA.

A "Battle of Flowers" Makes a Very Lively Carnival Time at Blackpool.

The summer resort town of Blackpool, England, recently had a novel fete, called a "battle of flowers," devised by the Mayor and carried out under his superintendence. A mass of flowers weighing eight or nine tons, including dahlias, chrysanthemums, marigolds, marguerites, sunflowers, asters, gladioli, ferns, laurel and myrtle, were distributed free among the owners of licensed carriages. Owners of private carriages were also invited to take part in the festival, and many did so. There were 150 carriages in the parade when it started. The houses along the principal streets were decorated with flowers and evergreens, many of the devices being unusually large and fine. Great crowds came from all the country round and by special trains from the cities to see the carnival. The Mayor's carriage was first in the line, covered with pink and white asters and ferns. His four daughters, each with a party of friends, occupied the four following carriages, and beamed from among perfect bowers of flowers and ferns. All of the carriages were similarly decorated. The drivers all wore white coats and straw hats, which had been presented to them by the Mayor. Several bands of music accompanied the procession. At a given point the carriages drew up and the occupants began to pelt each other with small bouquets, a large stock of which had been loaded into each vehicle. All the way back over the route this new war of the roses continued, and the people along the streets joined in heartily, pelting those in the carriages with the blossoms and being pelted in turn. The fun was furious for two hours, and generally good humored, although some of the gentlemen in the carriages became indignant at what they thought was undue vigor on the part of those along the street. They were merely laughed at, however, and pelted.—New York Sun.

TALKING 90 MILES.

Successful Test of Telephoning from Buffalo to Boston and New York.

The Buffalo Evening News reports that the new long-distance telephone, which is soon to be put in operation there, was tested by the officers and directors of the Bell Telephone Company on the 14th inst. The connections had been put in at 5 p.m., and communication was at once opened between Boston, Springfield, New York, Troy and Buffalo. The wires worked well, and conversations between the most distant points could be as easily carried on as if both parties were within a block or two of each other in the city. The line belongs to the American Telephone & Telegraph Company, of New York, and is 800 miles in length, going through Troy down to New York, thence to Boston via Springfield, Mass. The test shows that the problem of long-distance telephoning has been solved, and all interested were congratulated on its success.

In this connection the Times learns that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada is now building a line of the same character between Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford, Ingersoll, Woodstock and London, and propose to give those of its subscribers who have a large business between any of these two points, a perfect means of communication, free from all disturbing sounds on other lines. The instruments used in this system are more powerful than those in ordinary use, and each conversation requires the use of two complete copper wires for the whole length of the line. These instruments, and the method of securing the above wonderful result, are of course patented by the Bell Company. It would only be necessary to build a line of the same sort from Hamilton to Buffalo to enable Toronto and London to be put on direct with New York and Boston, and the company would of course undertake this if sufficint business for such a line could be relied on.

Told by the Teeth.

The shape and placing of the teeth are not without significance in the character given by the mouth. When the upper gum shows above the teeth directly the lips are opened it is a sign of cold and phlegmatic nature. Short, small teeth are held by the physiognomists to denote weakness and short life, while rather long teeth, if evenly set in the head denote long life. The more the teeth, in point, size, shape and arrangement, approach to those of the carnivorous animals, the more violent are the animal instincts in the person; while the more human teeth in shape and position approach to those of the graminivorous animals the more placid is the character. White, medium-sized, and evenly set teeth, which are seen as soon as the mouth is open, but which are entirely exposed—that is, do not at any time show the gums—are a sign of good and honest natures. Projecting teeth show rapidity, small, retreating teeth, which are rarely seen unless in laughter, show weakness and want of physical and moral courage. The lower teeth projecting and closing over the upper range are indicative of a harsh nature.

The Laws of Heredity Illustrated.

Grigson (who has tripped up his friend, Prof. Grampoon's, campstool just as the latter was sitting down on it)—"Hi! Don't! It's no good cutting up rough you know—I inherited a tendency to practical joking, and can't help it—you said so yourself!"

Grampoon—"Quite so, my dear fellow; you're not to blame a bit! But I've inherited a tendency to kick practical jokers, and can't help it either." (Kicks him.)—Punch.

After the great fire in Chicago, a firm on Madison street bulletined their removal by means of a signboard erected like a guide board over the remains of their old establishment:

Moore & Goe,
House and Sign Painters.,
Removed to 111 Desplaines Court.
Capital. $000.000.30."

Magistrate (to baseball umpire, charged with being drunk and disorderly)—It is simply outrageous, young man, the condition in which you are brought before me. You are a disgrace to the great national game.

Umpire—Wh-a-at! That'll c-h-ost you twenty-five (hic) dollars, judge. No back t-talk (hic) t-to me, or I'll fine you the limit.

YOUR

Special Attention!

IS CALLED

TO THE

DECIDED BARGAINS

In Dress Goods, Mantlings, etc.,

-AT

J. G. ANDERSON'S.

A beautiful range of plushes in the latest shades, at a surprisingly low figure.

DON'T FAIL TO SEE OUR STOCK OF

BOOTS AND SHOES!

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

Men's and Boys' Long Boots of the best manufacture at rock bottom prices. Button and Lace Boots in great variety at prices sure to suit you.

THE TOP PRICE PAID

For Butter and Eggs

A lot of choice Butter in Tubs or Rolls wanted by 1st November.

At Cash Price for Trade.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

Orangeville is now lighted by electricity.

The Times requests more police protection for Owen Sound.

Jno. McFadden, an old man over 80 years, died in Owen Sound gaol last Thursday, from paralysis.

We take exception to the latter statement. The Red Indians which includes every known tribe of North American Indians (it is not a distinguishing title)—used such receptacles. Read Dr. Dawson's "Pre-historic Man," or Catlin.

The Holland Centre burglar came up for trial at the County Judge's Criminal Court last Friday and elected to be tried by Jury at the next General Session of the Peace. He gives his name as Frank O'Neighl, of New York. The General Sessions will be held in December.—[O. S. Times

Mr. Frederick Hilts left a big turnip at this office Tuesday evening which takes the cake. It is a swede weighing 27½ lbs. Half an hour later Mr. B. Bush, of Liverpool, sent us in a swede weighing 28lbs. easy. The largest yet.—[Pickering News.

Thornbury Standard: Our excellent citizen, Mr. Wm. Fawcett, ex-Deputy Reeve of Euphrasia, has a peculiar goose. She is now and for some time past been laying right along. We expect to have one of the old lady's eggs for dinner, but we can not understand why she is doing business this time of year.

An exchange says: The man who refuses to subscribe to his home paper, and yet borrows it from his neighbor as soon as it leaves the press, would drop a nickel with a hole in it in the contribution box at church, sigh because the hole wasn't bigger, and then go home and do without sugar in his coffee for a week in order to get even.

Grey Review: Mr. Joseph Jacques, of Egremont, the other day picked up a piece of very ancient Indian pottery on his farm, which is now at his office. It is only a portion of what had once been a bowl or cooking pot. These relics of pottery are found at intervals all over Canada and Northern States and are supposed to have belonged to the race previous to the Red Indians.

According to the Journal a new pest has made its appearance in the city of St. Catharines. It is an insect about the size of a pea and is destructive to carpets, clothing, etc. In one house the carpets have been ruined. In another residence a gentleman had a new suit of clothes destroyed. They differ from moths, inasmuch as they eat whole pieces out of the fabric.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Perkins, Pa., writes: "For years I suffered from headache, dreadfully, every Spring, the blood and caused by impurity of for days and biliousness. It seem would split open. weeks that my life till I took Ayer's Nothing relieved me medicine has cured me Sarsaparilla.

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Price $1; six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

BOOTS & SHOES!

I have a large stock on hand, suitable

For Fall Wear.

Men's and Boys' Long Boots,

Also a large variety of LADIES' AND CHILDRENS' WEAR. A lot o

Summer Goods Selling off Cheap.

WM. CLAYTON'S, - - FLESHERTON.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BELMER,

FLES[illegible]

A Positive Cure. ✠ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

CURES the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervousness, debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, fondness for solitude, inattentiveness and inability to fix the attention on any particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—a result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, inanition, constipation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will restore you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise on Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed [illegible] from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Washington [illegible] Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. [illegible] SICK.

A Permanent Cure. ✠ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bo

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invalua plaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulc Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COU(

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for c olnts it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establish

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Stre

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, at cine Vendors throughout the World.

Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spuri

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., No. 384. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, NOV. 8, 1888. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR

L-O-O-K!

—AND—

READ CAREFULLY

And you will find that at

Russell's - Noted - Jewelry - Store,

FLESHERTON.

Is to be found the finest, best and cheapest stock of Watches, Clocks, Jewelry, Spectacles, etc.

In Watches we have the famous Waltham, Elgin, Springfield, Illinois Hampden, Columbus, New Haven, in silver and gold and gold filled cases, in ladies and gents' sizes, from $9.50 to $75, warranted from two to five years. Swiss silver watches, ladies' and gents' sizes, from $7.50 to $50, warranted from three to five years. Also the finest line of

AMERICAN SPRING AND WEIGHT CLOCKS

In prices from $2 to $10, bearing warrants from two to four years.

The finest line of ladies' Barpins, Brooches, Earrings, Necklets, and Chains; gents' Solid Gold and Rolled Gold Chains of the finest quality and pattern; full 18 K plain rings and ladies' gem rings; cuff buttons, collar buttons, scarf pins, charms, etc. A beautiful line of

SILVERWARE

Suitable for birthday and Xmas presents, at very low prices. Also the famous B Laurence Spectacles, Eyeglasses, etc., the finest in the world. Buy no other.

If you have a watch or clock that refuses to go or keep time, take it to

Russell's Noted Jewelry Store,

FLESHERTON,

And it will be made perfect at a reasonable price.

Colts for Sale.

Mr. Arthur Johnston, of the Meaford Road, Vandeleur P.O. has three fine filly colts, rising two years old, which he desires to dispose of. Buyers will do well to inspect these animals.

A. JOHNSTON.

RAM LAMBS for SALE.

Five finely-bred Leicester Ram Lambs for sale. Any person desiring good breeding stock will do well by applying to

JAS. STEWART,
Kimberley P. O.

NOTICE.

SHINGLES constantly on hand and for sale cheap. Just put in first-class new Chopping Mill—now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B SLOAN,
Eugenia.

FLESHERTON Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Binders,
Reapers,
Mowers,
Rakes,
Waggons,
Buggies,
Sleighs,
Cutters,
Fanning Mills,
Spring Tooth Cultivators,
Grain Drills,
Broad-cut Seeders,
Spring Tooth Harrows,
Iron Harrows,
Two-Furrow Gang Plow,
Plows,
Scufflers,
Turnip Drills,
Land Rollers.

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT and PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on

EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

WANTED! At once. Local and traveling agents for our goods. Liberal commissions, or salray and expenses, to competent and reliable men. For terms and full particulars, address.

J. F. LECLANE, Nurseryman,
Brighton, N. Y.

The Advance for $1 till Jan. 1, 1890.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$6 00	to	6 00
Fall Wheat	$1 10	to	1 10
Spring Wheat	1 10		1 10
Barley	0 50		0 60
Oats	0 34		0 34
Peas	0 58		0 60
Butter	0 17		0 18
Eggs, fresh	0 17		0 17
Potatoes bush	0 25		0 25
Pork	6 52		6 25
Hay per ton	10 00		10 00
Hides	4 50		5 50
Wool	18		20
Sheepskins	0 50		1 00
Geese	0 06		0 06
Turkeys	0 7		0 08
Chickens per pair	0 20		0 30
Ducks per pair	0 6		0 [illegible]

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Quarterly services were held in the Methodist Church last Sunday.

Novelties in embroidered dresses at M. Richardson & Co's.

PURSE LOST. In Flesherton, on Monday Oct. 29, a purse containing about $9.75. Finder will kindly leave it at this office.

All persons indebted to the firm of Blakely & McConnell are requested to call and settle before the 15th inst., otherwise the accounts will be placed in other hands for collection.

Hallowe'en passed off in Flesherton last week without any demonstration of a serious nature, which goes to show that our young men are possessed of considerable common sense.

Mr. D. Madill, of Maxwell, brought in two curiosities in the shape of twin apples. He says there were a number of these double apples on the one tree.

Look out for the entertainment under the auspices of the Methodist Ladies' Aid, week after next. Full particulars next week.

Avoid the harsh, irritating, griping compounds so often sold as purgative medicine, and correct the irregularities of the bowels by the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills. They are invaluable as a family medicine.

How to keep your feet warm in winter is something worth knowing. Call at M. Richardson & Co's, they will explain the How to do it.

A single bottle of Ayer's Sarsaparilla will establish the merits of this medicine as a blood purifier. Many thousands of people are yearly cured of chronic diseases by the faithful use of this remedy. It is unequaled for the cure of scrofula.

J. P. Marshall, dentist, visits Markdale professionally the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of every month and will resume regular visits to Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton, which will fall on Nov. 8th, being the day after the first Wednesday. Mr. Marshall is well known in this vicinity, as he visited Flesherton regularly twice a month for nearly five years.

Cattle Fair.

The cattle fair held here on Monday was well attended by buyers, but the quantity of stock offered was very small and of poor quality. A buyer informed us that 500 head of cattle might easily have been sold had they been offered.

Distons, and Shurley & Dietrich's crosscut saws. See the stock and prices at M. Richardson & Co's.

Kind Words.

In a private letter from the head master of Mount Forest high school that gentleman kindly says: "Your report of Dr. McLellan's address is admirable, and if done by your own reporter exceedingly creditable to your enterprise. The 'fine art,' too, was intensely amusing."

New Barber Shop.

Mr. Wm. Nelson, of Orangeville, is opening out a new barber shop in the premises lately occupied by Miss McBride's dressmaking establishment. Mr. Nelson is a tonsorial artist of the first degree. Call and welcome him. He expects to be ready for Saturday's work.

Shooting Match.

The Shooting match at Eugenia, last Monday, was not as well attended as might have been expected. The marksmanship was only moderately good, yet a very pleasant time was enjoyed. Another meeting will take place to-morrow (Friday) at 1 o'clock, p.m., as there yet remain on hand some 36 turkeys, besides geese, ducks and pigeons.

Furs and fur trimming, fine value: knit wool goods, childrens coats and hoods, ladies wool underwear, at M Richardson & Co.

Concert.

The Huber & Atwood concert company gave a three nights' entertainment in the Town Hall last week to very fair houses. The entertainment was not strictly first class, although quite amusing. The club swinging of Miss Atwood was exceedingly good, if not better, than we have ever seen. It downed Toronto's great and only Paul Patillo. The company is worthy of patronage.

Bad Accident.

Mr. Wm. Clark, of Flesherton, met with a bad accident in Markdale on Friday last which will confine him to the house for some time. He was working on a ladder, and in moving the ladder slipped, falling some fifteen feet upon the sidewalk below, and striking upon his head. Dr. Sproule, who witnessed the accident, ran to his aid. He was able to come home on Saturday, but the doctor has given him strict orders to remain in doors for two weeks at least, fearing that the brain has been injured, and that any manual labor might superinduce inflammation or brain fever.

A Sad Coincidence.

News arrived here last week of bereavements in the families of two old Flesherton boys, the two telegrams arriving at the same time. Mr. Geo. Keefer, of Rodney, Ont., lost an infant daughter, aged two months, and Mr. C. E. Vandusen, of Chicago, lost an infant son, aged one year and two months. The latter was interred in Flesherton cemetery. Rev. Mr. Shilton preached the memorial sermon on Sunday evening.

Thanksgiving Day.

Rev. A. Grant, whose thrilling address so much delighted Flesherton audiences on his previous visit, is to be here again on Thanksgiving day. Those who heard him on the former occasion will doubtless be glad of this chance of hearing him again, and those who have not heard him will enjoy a glad experience listening to his inspiring words. A public tea is to be held and the proceeds devoted to wiping out some debt connected with the Chapel, the manse, and other improvements, which will add much to the appearance of that part of the village.

Obituary.

Thomas Atkinson, proprietor of the Commercial Hotel, Priceville, died on Thursday morning, the 25th day of Oct. The deceased had been a resident of our village for fifteen years and was well and favorably known to the public as a hotel keeper. There were but few who took such an interest in the comfort of his guests as he did. During the time he lived here he accumulated a good deal of property and wealth. Was always punctual in his payments, and at the time of his death left the property clear from any incumbrance. In politics he was a Conservative, never backward in speaking in behalf of his party. His remains were buried on Saturday in the New Cemetery, in the town of Durham, and were followed by a large concourse of friends and acquaintances. He leaves a wife and two boys to mourn his loss. They have the sympathy of the whole neighborhood in their sad bereavment.—[Durham Chronicle.

That Ghost Story.

As we intimated in our item about the alleged Innistioge ghost, the brother who is absent from home is, or is about to return, and our prophecy that he would "put a head" on some one is about to be verified. We are sorry to hear that friend Spurr, of the Dundalk Herald, is the individual singled out to be operated upon, and probably the Durham Review, which reprinted his indiscreet item, will come in for a new (sore) head, too. At least one libel suit is on the tapis. Mr. Spurr has gracefully apologised, but whether the apology is accepted remains to be seen. We are in possession of all the facts concerning the "disapperance" of Mr. Jordon. These facts throw no discredit upon any person. His absence was caused simply by financial difficulties, and the individuals who circulated the ghost fad feel very much like sneaking away to some big swamp and losing themselves.

How to See a Show.

A young man with long hair laid the following lines on our table yesterday. He says they have a local significance. Of course we cannot say what he means by that, but suppose the individuals interested will know.

If you wish to see a show
And do not care to go
And sit among the bald heads in the hall,
Just get a little ladder
And place it in the shedder
On the outside of the house against the wall.

You then can gaze inside,
And watch the dancers glide,
Without paying your nickle or your dime,
But take care you are not seen,
For the girls might think you mean
And laugh and giggle at you all the time.

Mr. James McMulkin, representing the Home Knowledge Association, is in this vicinity for the purpose of securing subscribers. The "Home Knowledge Association" have brought the work of standard authors within the reach of all. This can hardly fail to have a very beneficial effect upon our national life, and therefore the Association deserves to succeed.

An important credit sale of farm stock and household furniture will be held in the village of Maxwell on Wednesday, Nov. 21st, being the property of Dr. Kerr, who is removing. Sale to commence at 10 a.m. sharp. John Speers & Co. auctioneers.

Mr. Jas. Speers, Lot 17, Con. 12, Osprey, offers his farm for sale. If not sold before Saturday, Nov. 24, will be put up at auction at R. T. McGirr's hotel, Feversham, and if not then sold will be to rent. See bills.

Chatsworth public school was totally destroyed by fire last week. The building was of brick, two storeys, containing four rooms, built last year. It cost $5,000 and was considered the best public school building in the county of Grey. About 160 children were in the school at the time, and all escaped unhurt. The building was insured in the Sydenham Mutual for $3,000.

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the head. How they may be cured at your home Post free 3d.—Address Dr. NICHOLSON, 30, St John Street, Montreal.

COMPETITION DEFIED!

Fine Gold and Silver Watches for Presentation or Personal use.

DIAMOND CLOCK AND SILVERWARE.

Quality and completeness of stock to select from not equalled in Central Grey.

Sizes Complete in Gem and 18 K. Wedding Rings.

No Catch Prices. Goods as represented

OR "CASH" REFUNDED.

Can do better for Customers—"Cash or "Credit"—than any other jeweler in "Grey Co."

Watches carefully and promptly repaired.

JEWELER BROWN,

MARKDALE, ONT.

The Runaway.

He comes with flying feet
Through the long deserted street,
While the rain
Makes sweet music as it falls
In great drops, on roof and walls,
And each pane.

See, he stops, and on his toes
Rises. 'Tis the toy store's shows
That he spies;
Oh, what rapture swells his heart,
And his pretty lips part
With surprise.

To his head wet locks curl close,
Mud-tipped is his little nose—
Naught cares he—
And one stocking o'er his shoe
Falls, and leaves exposed to view
A black knee.

Ragged is his dirty gown,
And he's drenched from foot to crown,
Happy elf!
In a realm of china pets
And the cars, he quite forgets
His poor self.

Now a reeking horse's neigh
Calls him from the toys away,
Half in fear;
Three grass blades he feeds the beast,
And he thinks this quite a feast—
The sweet dear!

The rain has ceased. Behold
How the sun makes liquid gold
In the road;
Plays about the baby's face,
And on e'en his rags a grace
Has bestowed.

Wet as mermaid, out of breath,
Joins a woman, pale as death;
As she spies
The stray babe, a wild delight
Beautifies her visage white,
And he—with his entire might,
kicks and cries.

MARY M. MCCARTHY.

BELINDA: A BEAUTY

CHAPTER VI.

"MRS. GRUNDY, SIR!"

A pine-wood ballroom, wide open on three sides of the sea, an orchestra composed of harp and piano, a second smaller room for ecarte and tresillio; such is the St. Jean de Luz Casino. Hither evening after evening resorts as motley a crowd as you will anywhere meet in your travels; the bluest blood of Castile side by side with shopkeepers from Burgos, heads crowned and decrowned, wandering artists, respectabilities and other respectabilities, all jostled together in the delightful republicanism of watering-place life. Hither, when the absence of Miss Burke gives her freedom, by night as well as by day, comes Belinda.

Not within the precincts, sacred to payers, of the ballroom. A terrace of sand extends round the whole area of the building; and from this terrace Belinda, with other waifs and estrays like herself, is accustomed to watch the dancers, the dresses, the pretty women, the flirtations inside—I am afraid not without some occasional sharp pangs of envy at her heart.

She haunts the terrace, as is her wont, Costa at her heels, between nine and ten o'clock of the first evening of Rose's arrival. It is an unusually gay little ball at the Casino; some particular connection of ex-Spanish royalty present, and the dancing-room is thronged. Swan like throats and delicate complexions from Madrid, oriental eyes and Titian-like coloring from Seville, marble whiteness and chiseled Grecian features from Cadiz. Oh, what pretty women these Spaniards are, what a jest is life to them! A song, a waltz, a flirtation in their earlier years, and then tresillio and prayers to the end.

"They are not exactly bad looking," says Rose, glancing about her coldly; "not quite such an orange yellow as I expected. But their style is distressingly theatrical, is it not, Mr. Jones?" Rosie has come to the Casino ball well escorted; Mr. Jones, who is also staying at the Hotel Isabella, on one side, her legitimate slave—I mean her future lord and master—on the other "Captain Temple," she runs on to Roger, "you say you think these creatures handsome! How would you like to see any one you cared for, any English woman, dance in public with a bare neck and short skirt, as they do?"

"The short skirts display admirable ankles, Rose," replies Roger. "Are introductions necessary in these parts of the world, I wonder? I should like to tempt my fate with that little blonde in pink satin, if I dared. Or will you waltz with me yourself, Rosie? In a whisper this. "For the sake of old days, my love! We have never waltzed together since that night—you remember?—at the Hanover Square rooms."

But Rosie, a good many years ago, gave up round dancing, finding that exercise, indeed, physically incompatible with the maintenance of a waist of twenty-two inches. She enforces her position now upon the very rigidest moral and æsthetic grounds.

"I never waltz, on principle, Roger. I do not approve of fast dances. I think it the worst possible taste for a woman who has experienced the serious sorrows of life to take part in such frivolties. But dance, pray, if you like. Think of your own amusement, not of mine. I understood that we came here to look on. But it does not matter. Nothing matters. Amuse yourself! I dare say Mr. Jones will not mind having to take care of me while you are away."

Tears are in Mrs. O'Shea's eyes, and Roger, of course, remains. It is no very great sacrifice for him to make. The little blonde in pink satin is distractingly pretty; she is glancing at him above her fan at this moment. But a man who has passed the dozen best years of his life in Madras can scarcely be enthusiastic about waltzing with the thermometer at ninety-eight. And it is better—a dozen times daily Roger tells himself this—better far to get broken thoroughly and at once to the bit which he has voluntarily taken between his teeth. A man choosing a bride of Rosie's age must learn to "look on" at most of life's amusement, and by her side. Poor Rosie! Would the dear little woman be as dear, as lovable, as thoroughly a woman as she is, if she possessed strength of mind sufficient to be devoid of jealousy? Is he not only too lucky a fellow to have won her, charming feminine weaknesses and all, as his own?

The dear little woman, though she will not accord the objectionable pleasure of waltzing to her lover, sees no evil in an occasional mild flirtation or two on her own account. Augustus jones is her devoted attendant. Augustus introduces ere long some other young Britons, much of his own stamp, picked up at the table d'hote of the Hotel Isabella. Rose is "surrounded;" Frenchmen and Spaniards turning to look at the passee pretty English woman as she smiles and chirrups, and casts up her eyes with all the well-considered airs and graces of mature coquetry, at her loud talking young compatriots.

Roger takes himself quietly off among the crowd. Waltz he will not, as Rosie on such high grounds disapproves of waltzing; but though his limbs be fettered, no embargo is laid upon his eyesight. For a short time longer in this mortal life Roger Temple may at least admire. He comes across the blonde in pink satin, whose eyes and fan make play at him as only the eyes of a fan of a Spanish woman can; comes across other blondes, other brunettes. Finally he reaches the end of the room that stands open to the seashore, goes outside for a breath of cooler air, probably not without dreams of a consolatory pipe under the starlight, and finds himself face to face with his future daughter.

"What, Belinda, my dear! Alone in the dark and no partner? Let me take you in to Rosie."

"Not if I know it, sir! I come here to watch the amusement of my betters, not to show myself. Think of Rose's face of horror if I walked across the ballroom to her like this!" holding out a fold of her ragged frock with a gesture in which there is to the full as much pride as humility.

"Rose is much too kind-hearted to take notice of your dress," said Roger. "All Rosie cares for is to see other people made happy."

"H'm. I see you are an excellent judge of character, Captain Temple."

"And then she could introduce you to partners—I take it for granted you like dancing? Rosie has got hold of some young men from the hotel, who would, I am sure, be only too happy——"

"To take pity on my forlorn condition, if my mamma did her best to make them! Captain Temple, do you think seriously I would dance with any of those English snobs Rose is talking to?"

"One of those horrible English snobs is the rich Mr. Jones," says Roger, stroking his moustache, and remembering the lesson in match-making he received before dinner from Rose. "I thought Mr. Jones was an admirer of yours, Belinda?" he adds, looking inquiringly into the girl's upturned face.

"An admirer—I suppose Rose told you that? As if I went in for admirers—I! Do I look as if that kind of rubbish was in my line of life?"

Roger hesitates. His heart goes out toward this poor neglected child, with her tattered clothes and shaky morals, and sweet, imploring woman's eyes; but with the best will in the world he finds it difficult to be kind with her—every look, every tone, every smallest gesture of Belinda O'Shea's so utterly sets patronage or compassion at defiance.

"And Mr. Jones cannot dance round dances," she goes on presently; "they send the blood to his head, Captain Temple," her voice softening in a moment, a wistful, pleading expression coming round her lips, "do round dances send the blood to your head, I wonder?"

Roger had a flower in his button-hole, an oleander bud, abstracted for him by the fair fingers of his betrothed from one of the bouquets upon the dinner table. And as she speaks, Belinda, with all a child's ignorance of shame, removes this flower from its place, raises it an instant to her face, then fastens it in the waist belt of her own dress.

"Do round dances send the blood to your head, Captain Temple? I should so like a waltz if you will have one with me!"

"If—why of course I will, my dear child! You should have asked me sooner. Hark, there is a waltz beginning now. We shall be just in time."

He forgets Rose and Rose's strong opinion as to fast dancing, forgets that Belinda is still in the disgraceful frock and ill-matched stockings, forgets everything but the child's wistful, pleading face! One waltz, poor little girl? Ay, and as many more as she chooses, thinks kind-hearted Roger. And takes her hand and leads her bravely within under the gas lights, and among the silks and satins—yes, close to the owner of the pink satin and the fan, whose blue eyes glance at him no longer.

"I may as well take my hat off, though," cries Belinda, preparing to start without loss of time. "Hi! Costa, boy, guard!"

She flings back her ragged hat to the old dog, who ever since Roger's appearance upon the scene has been watching matters suspiciously, and is now peering with jealous eyes round the corner of one of the doors. Then she puts her slim, sunburnt hand upon Captain Temple's arm.

"I asked you to dance just to try you," she whispers, when they have gone once or twice round the room. "I thought—yes, and I hoped—you would be too ashamed to be seen with me, and then I should have had a good excuse for hating you. But you were not. You are a better fellow at heart than I took you for, although you are——"

"Although I am what, my dear?"

"I wish you would leave off calling me my dear, and—and I can never talk when I am dancing," says Belinda, illogically.

"At all events you have not made up your mind to hate me yet?" whispers Roger in her ear.

Fate lands them, when the waltz is over exactly opposite Rosie and her train of attendants. And Roger Temple, for the first time certainly in his life, feels himself a coward. Something about the lips of the little pink and white woman who owns him makes him tremble; yes, tremble! Let men who are not lovers laugh, in the flippant levity of their souls, if they will!

"What a wax Rosie is in," says Belinda, who possesses to the full the cruel acumen of her age. "I remember that particular smile of hers so well. It always came before my worst whippings."

Roger is silent. That his Rose possesses some few thorns he knows; innocuous feminine prickles of jealousy, vanity, and the like. How if little tempers be added to the list? The little tempers of an exacting woman of for——. But no, not even in imagination will Roger's chivalrous heart go within a hundred miles of that obnoxious numeral!

He shifts the subject, and puts off the lecture that he knows to be in store for him by proposing that they shall go outside again. "Does Belinda mind the smell of a pipe! If not——"

"Mind!" the girl interrupts him. "Now, just once and for all, Captain Temple understand this—Belinda minds nothing! What do you pay for tobacco in England? Sixteen shillings, twenty francs a pound? Well, the next time I go to Truro, if I can only run the custom-house, I shall bring you back some real Spanish in my pocket. Cheating the government? Oh, we don't trouble our heads about governments in this country. We smuggle whatever we can, and are thankful. We save one franc fifty on the pound of tobacco, and get a better weed, sir, into the bargain."

They go outside, where Costa, bearing the hat between his teeth, joins them; he lays it down at the feet of his little mistress, and with a low, half-impatient, half-loving bark, thrusts his nose beneath her hand for a caress.

"This is the best friend I have on earth, Captain Temple. He would pull you down—oh, as soon as look at you, if I held up my finger. Would you not, Costa?"

Costa, at this appeal, moves stealthily round to Roger Temple and criticises his heels dog fashion.

"Here, poor fellow, here, Costa!" says Roger, holding out his hand.

And wonder of wonders to Belinda, Costa crouches, fawns, licks it. Evidently, whether she likes her father's successor or not—and she is doing her best, yes, did her best, throughout every moment of the waltz, to detest him—Costa means to accept Roger Temple as a friend.

She calls the dog off instantly. "I did not think you would fawn on new-comers. Costa—down with you, down! I want none of your hypocritical attentions. You are the first of my step-mamma's favorites I have ever known Costa to speak to, sir. You should see his delicious hatred of Burke and Mr. Jones."

"Ah, dogs understand some matters better than we understand them, Belinda. Costa has seen too much of life to put all men in the same category as you do."

They saunter forth into the night side by side; this southern night which is but a whiter, more voluptuous day, balmy as an English summer noon—air so clearly lustrous that every remotest object on sea and land stands out, as though 'twere chiselled in silver, against the deep purple of the sky.

Roger Temple lights his pipe and begins—a little way Roger has in most feminine society—to feel his heart grow soft. Belinda whistles.

"Will you take my arm, my dear? I beg your pardon, I must try not to disobey orders again, but you see I cannot help forestalling events, somewhat."

"Forestalling—what do you mean by forestalling?" says Belinda, turning on him sharply. "At what time, pray, of my life, or your life, or anybody's life, are Captain Temple and Belinda O'Shea going to be so wonderfully affectionate to each other, so wonderfully familiar?"

"Well, I should hope when they live under the same roof together," answers Roger, kindly. "Before very long, yes, before many more weeks are past, you must know that I look forward to your staying with us for good, Belinda. You have had quite enough, I think, I—I mean Rosie, thinks—of Miss Burke's protection. Surely you will allow me to speak to you as I should to my own little daughter, then?"

"Your daughter I am nobody's daughter!" she cries quickly. "I hate the sound of the word. I hate step-relationships. There was a time once—but now I have no one on the face of the earth I love—I want no one! And as to living with you and Rose I prefer knocking about the world with Burke, by long odds, thank you. We are 'Miss Burke,' and 'Miss O'Shea always. We don't like each other, and we don't pretend we do! We are not any kind of relations, or step-relations, Heaven be thanked!"

The bitterness, the suppressed passion of her childish voice, do but soften Roger's heart toward her more and more. "Allow me to offer you my arm, Miss O'Shea, will you?"

"No, I thank you, Captain Temple. I find it quite hot enough walking alone. We are not used to such fine manners, are we, Costa, in our class of life?"

Belinda races away with Costa along the sandy slopes. When Roger catches her up, a hundred yards or so farther on, all the gravity of her mood has melted into the wildest spirits.

"It was good fun, that waltz we had, down at the Casino, Roger—if you call me 'my dear,' why should I not call you Roger, 'step-papa Roger?' I enjoyed it all the more because I knew how my espargottes and my stockings, and everything about me, riled Rosie! But for real dancing—bah! if you want to see that, you should come with me to the Place Ithurbida and see how the peasant girls dance the bolero. It is not the third of a kilo away; I can hear the tambourines from this and I'll promise to bring you back, safe and sound, Roger, and Rosie is so happy with her young men!"

She pleads to him; the soft night shining on her lips and eyes, and for the first time it occurs to Roger Temple that this wild little Arab child will be a pretty girl some day.

"Take me where you will, Belinda. I do not believe in you overmuch, but I will believe in Costa. I am sure Costa would not stand quietly by and see me murdered."

"Ah, that shows how much you know Costa. Did I not say you were a good judge of character? However, you need not be afraid. If I owed my enemy a grudge—mind, I only say 'if'"—but even as she qualifies her speech thus, malice indescribable lurks in her voice—"if I owed my enemy a grudge, I would sooner let him live his fate out than put an end to his sufferings quickly! However, these are affairs of Spain, Roger, not of yours or mine. How sentimentally you gaze at everything!" He is gazing, if the truth be told at her face. "You think this a most romantic spot, no doubt?"

The spot is romantic in its own rugged way, and seen by this starlight, which flatters old nature as a court portrait-painter flatters women's faces. A broad Salvator-Rosa-looking sierra of arid turf, dotted here and there by a low white cross or stunted cypress, and with the dead unbroken blue of the Atlantic for a background.

"You are standing over one great vault, sir. St. Jean de Luz is healthy to a proverb, the Basque people say—except when we get the pestilence! Unfortunately, we get the pestilence pretty often, and then we have to be buried, not by ones and twos, but dozens, just wherever our friends can find room to dig trenches. I shall bring Rose and Mr. Jones up here some fine evening, make them sit down on one of these little mounds, and go into dear little raptures about the beauties of the climate and the scenery, and then inform them that they are sitting on dead men's bones. Bones?—whole skeletons, by scores. Only yesterday I saw the children playing 'fossette,' I don't know how you say it in English, into a skull."

"And so, naturally, the place is a favorite haunt of yours," remarks Roger. "Just the kind of taste I should have expected from a person of your grave and melancholy character."

"I would sooner keep company with skulls than fools, any day," retorts the girl, with a shrug of her shoulders. "Perhaps in years to come, when you've had as much experience of—of different varieties of intellect as I have, you will come to the same opinion."

She leads the way down a rough bullock-track or gulley, that diverges at this point from the shore, a few minutes' walking brings them out upon the main road; ere railroads were, the world's highway to Spain, but seldom traversed now save by outlying bands of Carlists, or by the baggage mules and ox-drays of the country people. Straight before them are the mountains, transparent, wondrous violet in the shadows, faint alabaster (for the moon will be here anon) along the crests. The river, the lights of the town gleam beneath. From the Place Ithurbida, a thicket of olives and cork-trees close at hand, rise sounds of music; barbaric, blood-stirring, dance music, about as much like the threadbare Parisian tinkle-tinkle of the Casino waltzes as the smell of the moorlands in September is like a barber's shop.

"Now you shall see dancing in earnest," says Belinda, arching her slender arms cachuca fashion above her head, and her whole little figure seeming to become instinct on the moment with life and music. "Tra, la, la, la, la, lira, la, lira, lira!"

The orchestra is composed of a Basque tambourine and bagpipe, both instruments played by one old woman in rags, with castanet accompaniment, ad libitum, from the fingers of the performers. The corps de ballet consists of three couples of men and girls, all of the lowest order of the people, not a shoe or stocking among them, but "artistes," every one, if originality and fire, joined to the most perfect power of expression, the most finished neatness in execution, may be said to constitute art. These Basques dance as they smuggle, drink, gamble, with passion. Money-seeking as the French, pleasure-loving as the Spaniards, every hour of these people's vivid lives they live. Imagine northern peasants, for pleasure, after a summer day's toil, dancing cachucas and fandangos till midnight!

Belinda, at Roger's side, remains a silent spectator throughout one dance. With the first notes of the next her feet began to twinkle.

"This is the Basque bolero, the national dance," she whispers to him; "but there are none of the best dancers here to night. You should see the Gitanas who come down from the hill country at fair-time, or"—little witch, as if she thought had suddenly struck her! as if it were not expressly for this that she had lured him thither!—"or you should see me. Will you see me dance a bolero, Captain Temple?

"Some time or another, my dear child. Some evening at Rosie's hotel, when——"

"Now, this moment, out-of-doors, to real Basque music, or never! What, do you think I would dance a bolero on a floor, with Rose shaking her head and describing how nicely the young ladies used to turn their toes out at Miss Ingram's! I dance for you, sir, now or never! If you are shocked, you know you can easily walk off in another direction and pretend you don't belong to me."

Her slight little form trips away into an open space between the trees, six or eight yards distant from the principal performers, and there, partnerless, unashamed as was ever court duchess during the stately performance of a minuet, the Earl of Liskeard's granddaughter dances her bolero. All the originality of gesture, the supple strength, the staying power of the peasants, Belinda possesses to the full; but she possesses something more, poor child!—the graces born of mind as well as matter, the delicate, exquisite alternations of fire and langour which are the very poetry of true dancing—and of whose seductive charm she is only too profoundly ignorant.

Roger watches her with pleasure as regards the gratification of his artistic sense, and at the same time with curious, poignant pain. He has lived too long in India not to be reminded of Nautch girls and their performances by this kind of exhibition; and Rosie's animadversions on the subject of Belinda's return, with unpleasant clearness, to his mind. The peasants, with the perfect natural breeding that characterizes their race, take no further notice of the child than by a smile or a nod as they pass her in the evolutions of the dance. When it is over they seat themselves on the turf, the girls together, the men a little apart, and all begin chatting in that liquid bastard Sanscrit of theirs, which of itself is music. Belinda trips gayly back to Roger's side.

"I dance tolerably well—I dance better than any of those fine die-away Hermoines and Dolores at the Casino, don't I?" she exclaims, holding up her eager face within about a foot of Roger's in the moonlight.

The bolero has lent new animation to Belinda's expressive features. Her deep Irish eyes are all aglow; her parted lips tremble. Roger Temple discovers that there are materials not only for a pretty, but for a very pretty girl in his future step-daughter, and can by no means bring himself up to the sternly virtuous spirit of admonition that would befit the occasion.

"You dance a vast deal too well, Belinda—too well for the present company, I mean."

"Ah, those are your English prejudices—Mrs. Grundy, sir! I heard the same story from poor Mr. Jones this morning. My 'company,' as you call it, is every bit as good as that mob of Madrid shop-keepers we danced among at the Casino. Don't you know that the Basques are a people of nobles? Why, the very beggars wear their rags with an air that makes you feel the vulgarity of soap and water; and as to the bullock drivers—there is not one of them but has a pedigree—so long! and who feels, yes, and looks noble, every inch of him."

"Then let the Basque nobles dance boleros by themselves," says Roger. "I am of a jealous disposition, child. It does not please me that your pretty dances and your pretty self should be at the mercy of every stranger who may happen to pass along a public roadway."

Up leaps the blood into her brown cheeks. The reproof, if reproof it be, savors of a tenderness to which she has been so long unused, a tenderness that sinks with such dangerous sweetness on her heart.

"Do I dance prettily?" Her eyes for the first time fall beneath his; she trifles, a little abashed, with the pomegranate bud in her waist-belt. "I made you come here because—oh, because I wanted to shock you, as I shock Mr. Jones and Rose. But do I really dance prettily—better than the peasant girls?"

"So much better, Belinda, that I should like to bid you never dance another bolero or cachuca while you live."

She stands a moment irresolute, then turns from him without a word. Vanity, childish triumph, and a burning, perfectly new sense of womanly shame are holding the oddest conflict imaginable in Belinda's heart, and keep her dumb.

"If I had only the right to exact a promise of you," goes on Roger, possessing himself, as he speaks, of her hand, and pressing it with kindly warmth.

"But you have not the right; no, not as much as Augustus Jones has!" she exclaims, snatching her hand away abruptly and bursting into a peal of laughter. "Augustus might have bought me, perhaps, with a franc's worth of maccaroons; but you—you! Reserve your jealousy, Captain Temple, for the time when Rose takes to dancing boleros with the peasants. And as for me:

"—Buvous, chantons,
Et fetons, tour a tour,
Et l'ivresse, l'ivresse,
L'ivresse, et l'amour."

She sings the bacchanal chorus with greater spirit than ever; then, pirouetting the step of the bolero as she goes, disappears among the olives, nor joins Captain Temple again until he is within a dozen paces of the Casino.

Mrs. O'Shea, star-gazing on the terrace with Augustus, receives them with honeyed smiles. Admiration acts upon Rosie's moral faculties like wine; and she has really been a good deal admired this evening—or a good deal stared at, which comes to very much the same thing. When one reaches a certain age, is it not wisest to accept "attention" just as one receives it, without criticising its quality too closely?

"Oh, you naughty, naughty children!" She nestles her hand at once under Roger's arm, nor takes it away again. "We have been looking for you everywhere. What a nice waltz you had! I was so glad to see Captain Temple dancing with you, Belinda! But I am afraid you found those sandal-things dreadfully inconvenient to dance in, dear?

The italics, the plentiful notes of admiration convey venom, trebly distilled, to Belinda's sensitive ear. Roger hears only the soft veiled voice, feels only the plump pressure of his beloved one's hand upon his arm; and he "blesses her unaware."

"This is really not half a bad sort of view," says Augustus, pulling at his wristbands with the self-consciousness of a man who wants to be unconcerned, and addressing the Atlantic. "On the right we have the ruins of St. Barbe, still bearing marks of the English guns of 'thirteen,' on the left the coast of Spain, while closer at hand—"

"Rises the gloomy church-tower of St. Jean de Luz," cries Belinda, imitating the poor wretch's pedantic company-voice to admiration. "That sacred edifice in which Louis XIV. was formally betrothed to Marie Theresa, Infanta of Spain, in the year of our Lord sixteen hundred and sixty. How long will it be, Mr. Jones, before your great book of travels is published? 'Twould be a pity, upon my word, that so much valuable research should be wasted!"

"Belinda—Belinda, my dear, how can you!" says Rose, admonishingly. "Mr. Jones, why do you let her? I am sure it is all most interesting. Poor dear, Louis XIV. and Marie Antoinette—we read the Peninsular War straight through at Miss Ingram's. But Belinda is such a quiz! Really, it seems like something in a novel—doesn't it Roger?—to be so near Spain."

This is literally Rose's conversational style reduced to orthography; style that one may call the absolute, perfected vacuity of human speech; but yet that, lisped by a pretty woman, now making play with her eyes, now suffering giggling eclipses behind her pocket-handkerchief, now pressing her fingers confidentially on your arm, is not without its charm to the superior intellect of man.

Roger replies, "Yes, indeed, Rosie, at safe unmeaning answer that he keeps always ready for the foolish little babble of his beloved one. Augustus, who, like other unhappy young men of his class, regards silence as a lapse of breeding, once more starts a subject. "How many persons would Captain Temple suppose, now, this Casino might be capable of holding?" He suspects that Roger dislikes him; he knows that he detests Roger; and shifts from one leg to another, fidgets at his glove button (Augustus Jones wears yellow gloves at these Casino balls) as he addresses him.

"How many people? Really, Mr. Jones, I have not the very smallest notion." Capital fellow though Roger be to those who know him and whom he likes, I feel that when he is addressing men like Mr. Jones I cannot altogether clear him from the imputation of "shutting his eyes as he talks!" "Kind of thing I never guessed in my life. Belinda, can you tell Mr. Jones how many people the St. Jean de Luz Casino holds?"

"Of course I cannot," answers Belinda, with her crushing brusquerie. "Who in their senses would ask such a question unless they were collecting materials for a guide-book? Now, if you wanted to know about the people themselves, I might enlighten you."

"Enlighten us by all means," says Roger Temple. And he moves, despite a slight unwillingness in Rosie's fingers, nearer to the girl's side. "Begin with the little lady in pink satin. There she is opposite, looking over her fan at the gentleman with the ferocious moustache. Do you know anything about her?"

"Anything? I should just say I did. And about the man with the moustache, too! Why those are the people from Burgos, who——"

And then, such a story as Rosie, straight-laced, over-scrupulous Rosie, is forced to listen to! Such a story—succeeded by such a dozen others! Constantly frequenting the society of gamins younger than herself, Belinda has picked up all the watering-place wickedness afloat, simply as a gamin picks up wickedness, and details it without a blush.

(To be Continued).

Now I See.

"One thing I know: that whereas I was blind, now I see."—St. John ix. 25.

I know not much of law or lore,
I'm but a simple youth,
Master of mystery no more
Than treasurer of truth.
But one thing's plain and clear to me,
I once was blind and now I see.

The Scribes and Pharisees, no doubt,
Are wise and mighty men,
Prepared the Sadducees to rout
With either tongue or pen.
But matters move that even they
Can neither see nor sound to-day.

It hath been written: there are things
From wisest men concealed,
Which by the Sovereign King of Kings
To infants are revealed.
And "Mercy upon whom I will!"
Remains on record still.

So in His everlasting love
He hath revealed to me
What angels round His throne above
Desire and long to see.
"Unto the poor He'll honor pay;
The rich He empty sends away."

I see, and, blessed be His name,
Not only with the eye
That glorifies my mortal frame,
But that which cannot die,
The luminary of the soul
Which through eternity shall roll,

And by that inward light I scan
In Him who placed it there
The Sun of Righteousness, the Man
Who carries all my care—
My Guide and Comforter, with whom
I see no terror in the tomb.

—WILLIAM MURRAY.

Hamilton, Oct. 26th, 1898.

To-day's Church News.

Rev. J. F. B. Tinling, East Finchley, England, devotes ten minutes of each Sunday evening service to missionary news. He covers one portion of the mission field before he proceeds to another. Africa is the subject at present. He is arranging to have a large missionary map of the world hung up close to the pulpit.

Mrs. Taylor, a believer in faith healing at Bristol, fractured her arm about a month since; but she declined to call in medical assistance, declaring that she had been cured of erysipelas and other ailments by faith. Instead of healing, the fractured limb grew worse, and when a doctor was at length summoned it was too late.

The annual report of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church of Canada just issued shows that the total income for the year amounts to $219,480, being an increase of $19,278 06 over the previous year. There has been an aggregate gain of 10,000 in the membership of the Church during the year. In the last fifteen years the income of the society has risen from $108,000 to $220,000.

Rev. Robert W. Rayson, late acting minister at St. Paul's, Kingston, has been appointed to the mission of Lombardy, near Smith's Falls.

The rumor that Dr. Cameron Lees was to ask the Queen to inaugurate the memorial of Montrose in St. Giles' Church, Edinburgh, is contradicted.

Bishop Ryle thinks the Whitechapel murders will do good in the long run, for people need to be roused to see what man is capable of when left alone.

Mr. W. E L Hunter, who was elected President of the Carlton Street (Toronto) Young People's Association a few evenings ago, is the son of Rev. Dr. W. J. Hunter.

The Whyte Brothers are assisting Rev. Dr. Hunter, pastor of Carlton Street Methodist Church, Toronto, in a series of special revival services to be continued for four weeks.

There are nine Presbyterian Churches in Cleveland, Ohio. The First Church is building a large stone church at a cost of $75,000 on Euclid avenue. It has a membership of 1,024

The vegetarians now include Rev. Mr. Spurgeon. He finds himself all the better without supplies from the butcher, but does not think he is any more a saint because of his diet. He finds the new method a pleasure, not a hardship.

Rev. S. G. Bland was about to leave the Kingston Hospital when it was found that the pressure of the artificial limb upon the nerve near the knee caused him pain, and another operation has been performed, which will detain him for a week.

Daniel Hand, an aged and wealthy resident of Guilford, Conn., has given to the American Missionary Association of New York $1,000,000 to be held in trust by the association, the interest to be devoted to the education of colored people in the South.

The parish of Spencerville and Troupetown, Frontenac, to which Father McGrath has been appointed, is the eleventh formed by Bishop Clary. The Diocese of Kingston has now the same number of parishes that it had before the Diocese of Peterboro' was formed from it.

The obsequies of the Right Rev. Bishop Welles, of the Episcopal Diocese of Milwaukee, took place yesterday afternoon in Milwaukee. The services at the cathedral were very impressive and the cortege, preceded by a procession of priests behind a cross-bearer, attracted much attention as it slowly proceeded through the city to Forest Home Cemetery.

At its closing session at Montreal the Evangelical Alliance passed resolutions that the Society of Jesus is at variance with the principles of religious freedom and empowering the Executive Committee to take such steps as to the estates as they think proper. In the evening Senator Macdonald presided. An address was given by Mr. S. McPherson, of Chicago, on "Home Mission Work." Rev. Mr. Burgess, of India, made a very eloquent address on "Foreign Mission Work," after which the Convention adjourned.

Sticking to Facts.

New tenant (in a towering rage)—"See here, sir; before renting that house for a year I asked you if any of the neighbors were musicians, and you said they were not. Sir, that's the noisiest neighborhood I ever got into. Every house on the street has a piano or cabinet organ, to say nothing of fiddles, flutes, cornets and banjos."

Real estate agent (calmly)—"My dear sir, none of your neighbors are musicians. They only think they are."

Rev. A. T. Donald presided at a largely attended flower mission service in the hall of St. Vincent Church, Glasgow, designed to attract the non-churchgoing in the parish. Each person on retiring was presented with a bouquet of flowers with Scripture text-card attached.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

A Variety of Jottings That Will Interest the Fair Sex.

SOMETHING ABOUT WINTER FASHIONS.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.)

Patti is singing at concerts in Wales for the benefit of the poor.

A real, live princess keeps a millinery store on Fifth avenue, New York.

Sealskin jackets, by all accounts, are to have a run greater than last winter.

Lizard skin is the fashionable material for portfolios and other articles of the kind.

Corduroy suits are to be fashionable this season in all the new colors and shades.

Hats are almost universal, but the bonnets will soon come back in great elegance.

The fur muff is to be very large and something like the ones our grandmothers carried.

A black silk underskirt embroidered in red with all the chess figures is a new and startling thing.

Umbrella handles of silver are almost as big as a muskmelon, but dudes do not find them as palatable.

The general opinion seems to be that marriage is a failure because people are not a success—New York Herald

Some advance girls of the period are wearing the real Scotch cap, after the manner of Roys and McGregors.

Mr. Du Maurier uses his two pretty daughters as models for his witty "society sketches" in Punch.—Roseleaf.

Jet and beaded capes are already out again, and in the sun or gaslight just as brilliant a shoulder cover as ever.

Furriers say the boa is to continue in fashion, but this may be because they have, perhaps, a large stock of them on hand.

Women's visiting cards are to continue square in shape and men's very small. This is the edict from those who deal in pasteboard.

Verigris is a new shade of greenish gray which is seen in some of the new imported models. It is very ugly in itself, but combines well with bright colors.

A curious local name for a plant is "John-go-to-bed-at-noon," applied in England to the yellow goat's beard, which opens at 4 and closes just before 12 o'clock.

One of the most desirable plots of land at Bar Harbor is owned by an Irish woman, who lives on it in a small hut. She has had offers of $150,000 for the land, but refuses to sell.

Mrs. Lizzie Hay, who, single-handed, lately gave his quietus to a Texas terror who had been in the habit of holding up stages full of men, is described as under 20, auburn-hair, and as lithe as a panther.

Black is worn in some part of the costume and helps to satisfactorily subdue the brilliancy of color which is everywhere and on every occasion so manifest. A black hat of the startling proportions of the Empire is the chic thing to wear with a bright toilet and renders it more picturesque.

"To keep a baby quiet who has passed the age when everything goes into the mouth," says the pitiless Warwick Valley Dispatch, "touch the tips of the thumbs and forefingers with dissolved gelatine and give him a downy feather to play with. He will spend half an hour picking it from one adherent finger to another, and so back again."

The black satin large cloak or Douillette of Louis XVI. is a very effective garment, which is more effective still when worn with the large, graceful round hat of black. It is shirred on the shoulders and falls to the bottom of the dress, a flounce of lace making the finish or in its stead sometimes a heavy ruching of pinked out satin is set about the edge all around.

The round neck takes the place of the heart shape and is becoming to women with pretty throats. One sees this on the corsages of any house gown, be it a matinee or tea gown. The Empire models have low-necked effects on garments for the street, but these pneumonia coats and wraps will be seen chiefly on the stage, as no climate such as ours can be tampered with in any such dangerous fashion.

The Decorator and Furnisher talks sensibly about taste: Don't put your initials or your name over everything you possess, so that people who pick up a fork or look at a pillow sham will read "John Brown, my property." It's all right to mark things of use in some such a way, but not things of beauty, and if you must so mark them make the letters small and put them on the back of the object, not on the front. The woman who wears her initials in diamonds on a brooch is vulgar. The man who prints his monogram on his china does a useless thing, for nobody is going to run away with his dishes. Don't assert too much at the table. Don't be too showy and complex. Don't make your napkin rings too emphatic and obtrusive. Put flowers on the table, but place them loosely or in glass, for if you put them in china or any other opaque substance you conceal half their beauty—namely, their stems. Don't entirely cover your wall with pictures, and when you have a picture don't let the shopkeeper kill it with a big gold frame. Try bronze or something that will relate to the picture on the wall, and not make it stand out like a big shiny spot of color and gilt gingerbread.

Thinness is Sinful.

Mr. Taplin, a missionary to whom we are indebted for an excellent account of the natives of Australia, tells a curious story against himself. "When," he says, "I asked the word for sin, they gave me one for 'thin,' and so I was led into representing that it was hateful to God for man to be thin; and that they would be condemned for it. So they came to the conclusion that it was pleasing to God for people to be fat. In fact, I had been telling them that all lean people went to hell, and fat people to heaven."

The British Company in Zanzibar has been successfully started and has conciliated all classes of natives. Dr. Meyer and Mr. Baumann have arrived safely from Pangani, where they were chained, stripped and flogged and made to work as slaves till British Indians ransomed them.

"WHAT MY LOVER SAID."

The Old Poem that is Creating a Literary Sensation all Over the Country.

Almost as interesting as the question, "Who wrote 'Beautiful Snow?'" or its predecessor, "Who Struck Billy Patterson?" is the problem just sprung upon the country by the claim of Mrs. O. C. Jones, of Vermillion Parish, La., that she is the author of the beautiful poem once attributed to Horace Greeley—"What My Lover Said." The poem is one of the gems of American literature and if a list of fifty or a dozen perfect poems by American authors were made out, it would be entitled to a place. The lines are given below. Mrs. Jones' claim has set going a controversy which promises to bring out a good deal of interesting reading. The hitherto accepted history of the poem is that it was written some thirty years ago by Homer Green, one of the editors of the New York Evening Post, and published in that paper modestly signed with his initials. The "H. G." was taken by many for Horace Greeley's initials, and brought out a disclaimer from him and the discovery of the real author. The Journal of Commerce, one of the best literary authorities in the country, published this explanation when the question was raised in 1876. Some papers are now attributing the poem to Richard Realf, but on what grounds does not appear. The Boston Globe publishes the verses as the work of Homer Green, whose title has not hitherto been questioned. Following is the text of the poem:

WHAT MY LOVER SAID.

By the merest chance, in the twilight gloom,
In the orchard path he met me—
In the tall, wet grass, with its faint perfume,
And I tried to pass, but he made no room,
Oh! I tried, but he would not let me.
So I stood and blushed till the grass grew red,
With my face bent down above it,
While he took my hand, as he whispering said—
How the clover lifted its pink, sweet head,
To listen to all that my lover said!
Oh! the clover in bloom—I love it!

In the high, wet grass went the path to hide,
And the low, wet leaves hurry over,
But I could not pass on either side,
For I found myself, when I vainly tried,
In the arms of my steadfast lover;
And he held me there and he raised my head
While he closed the path before me,
And he looked down into mine eyes and said—
How the leaves bent down from the boughs o'erhead
To listen to all that my lover said.
Oh! the leaves hanging lowly o'er me

Had he moved aside but a little way
I could surely then have passed him,
And he knew I could never wish to stay,
And would not have heard what he had to say
Could I only aside have cast him.
It was a most dark, and the moments sped,
And the searching night wind found us,
But he drew me nearer and softly said—
How the pure, sweet wind grew still instead,
To listen to all that my lover said.
Oh! the whispering wind around us!

I am sure that he knew when he held me fast
That I must be all unwilling,
For I tried to go, and would have passed,
As the night was come with its dew at last,
And the sky with its stars was filling;
But he clasped me close when I would have fled,
And he made me hear his story,
And his soul came out from his lips and said—
How the stars crept out when the white moon led,
To listen to all that my lover said,
Oh! the moon and stars in glory!

I know that the grass and leaves will not tell,
And I'm sure that the wind, precious rover,
Will carry his secret so safely and well
That no being shall ever discover
One word of the many that rapidly fell
From the eager lips of my lover
And the moon and stars that looked over
Shall never reveal what a fairy-like spell
They wove round about us that night in the chill,
In the path through the dew-laden clover;
Nor echo the whispers that made my heart swell,
As they fell from the lips of my lover.

Why the Dog is No Longer Bathed.

"If I can't feed Jim I won't wash him," was the startling announcement which a parlor-maid hurled at the fair president of a fashionable establishment in this city yesterday. Jim is a white, curly-headed dog, whom the maid in question had hitherto kept in a state of surprising cleanness.

"What's the matter, Mary?" asked her mistress.

"Well, you see, mum, Jim don't like bein' washed, and Eliza she allers wants to feed him. Jim, he's gettin' to hate me, 'cause I wash him, and never get a chance to give him nuthin' to eat. Now, I don't want no dog, no nobody, to hate me and look at me suspicious-like: so if I can't feed him, Jim won't get washed by me no more."

And the latest intelligence from the seat of war indicates that Jim's white coat will shortly be black, for Eliza maintains her monopoly of feeding him and Mary as steadfastly declines to incur canine odium as the reward of a tedious and trying task.

A Curious Funeral Ceremony.

One curious ceremony still survives and has puzzled the learned. When a Parsee dies, a dog (originally a fox-eyed dog was demanded, but now a yellow dog with white ears is orthodox) is brought in and made to look upon the body. What the significance of this is the modern Parsis cannot explain, or rather they offer contradictory explanations. Perhaps it is connected with the Parsee tradition of the dogs of Yima, the lord of death, who has two hounds which go through the earth scenting out those who are marked for the grave, and afterward escort their souls to the place of judgment, guarding them on the way from the evil spirits. Possibly the bringing in of the dog to look at the corpse had its origin in the idea of securing the attention of the dogs of Yima to the just departed spirit and so insuring the due protection of the latter on its last perilous journey.—New York Tribune Book Review.

On Sunday evening Victor Hill took a buggy and drove two miles east to the house of his father-in-law, Z. Moffett, at Winchester, Ind., where his wife was staying. He entered the house, asked his wife to let him see their baby, and when she refused he drew a pistol and shot Zimi Moffett in the back as the latter was leaving the room, inflicting a slight wound. He then shot at Mrs. Warren Harper, his sister-in-law, but her corsets saved her except from a slight contusion. Then he shot his wife through the heart, killing her instantly. Armed men are pursuing him through the woods.

Dried grapes, a cheap substitute for raisins, are making their first effort for a place in the market.

A lady in Atlanta, Ga., lost her only child just one year ago, and not a day has since passed that she has not gone to the cemetery and knelt in prayer beside his grave.

DO DREAMS LAST LONG?

Some Expansive Visions During Sleep Are of But a Minute's Duration.

This interesting question has been recently discussed in Germany, among others by Dr. F. Scholz, who has given some striking examples from his own experience and observation. It is not possible to give a definite answer, and probably dreams vary much in point of duration, just as they vary in force and vividness. At one time the figures of a dream, whether they emerge from the horn or the ivory gate are as real as in life; the sorrow is even more intense, the happiness more realistic. At another time they seem to live only in a pale moonlight, and we watch the scenes rather than participate in them. It is very certain, however, that the majority of dreams are only of momentary duration, though extended occasionally to the length of a minute. In proof of this, Dr. Scholz tells the following story from his experience: "After excessive bodily fatigue and a day of mental strain, of a not disagreeable kind, I betook myself to bed after I had wound up my watch and placed it on the night-table. Then I lay down beside a burning lamp. Soon I found myself on the high sea on board a well known ship. I was again young, and stood on the look-out. I heard the roar of the water, and golden clouds floated around me. How long I so stood I did not know, but it seemed a very long time. Then the scene changed. I was in the country, and my long-dead parents came to greet me; they took me to church, where the loud organ sounded. I was delighted, but at the same time wondered to see my wife and children there. The priest mounted the pulpit and preached, but I could not understand what he said for the sound of the organ, which continued to play. I took my son by the hand, with him ascended the church tower—but again the scene was changed. Instead of being near my son I stood near an early-known but long-dead officer—I ought to explain that I was an army surgeon during the manœuvers. I was wondering why the major should look so young, when quite close in my years an unexpected cannon sounded. Terrified, I was hurrying off, when I woke up and noticed that the supposed cannon shot had its cause in the opening of the bed room door through some one entering. It was as if I had lived through an eternity in my dream, but when I looked at my watch I saw that since I had fallen asleep not more than one minute had elapsed—a much shorter time than it takes to relate the occurrence." Dr. Scholz has collected many other examples of a similar kind.—London Globe.

SHAM RUSTICITY.

Crazy Idea of a Prominent Society Woman at Newport.

A unique cottage entertainment was given on Monday night by a prominent society lady of Newport, R. I., Miss Gertrude Gilbert. It was termed an "autumnal oyster roast." At 11 o'clock the fifty guests were ushered into the servants' hall, which was artistically decorated. Pumpkins made into "jack o' lanterns" hung from the ceiling, and bunches of red berries, together with branches of evergreens, ears of corn, wheat, red peppers, apples and other autumnal products covered the walls and gave a warm and rural appearance. The guests then seated themselves at long tables, at each cover being a tin plate, on which were a coarse napkin, a bottle of beer and a large mug, and underneath the table a wooden pail, in which the oyster shells were to be thrown. For those who did not care for oysters, salads and pates were served. The scene was a novel one, the evening dresses of the ladies being in great contrast to the perfect simplicity of the entertainment. After enjoying the "roast" the guests proceeded to the drawing-room, and several new dances were participated in, known as "Dancing in the Barn," the Highland Schottische and "The Muffin Man," which were danced with vigor until long after midnight.

The Funniest Thing.

Mrs. Sniverly is the wife of the captain of a volunteer company. She attended a review at which her husband was commanding officer. Mrs. Sniverly laughed all the time, and when she was asked what was the cause of her merriment, she replied: "It was the funniest thing in the world to see my husband, who never dared open his mouth at home, ordering all those men about, and they doing just what he told them. Why doesn't he try that game on me?"

A 10-Year-Old Drunk in Montreal.

A very sad case of drunkenness in a minor came up before the Montreal Recorder yesterday. Tommy Nichols, the accused, when called appeared in the dock, that is, the top of a head was seen moving towards the three-feet high gate of the dock. The boy is an orphan, and was found on the street in a beastly state of intoxication. He was sent to the Reformatory for five years.

A despatch from Potenza says that there were 400 passengers on the train which was crushed by a land slide a few days ago. One hundred and fifty dead and wounded have been identified. Many of the victims are unknown. Scores continue to be unearthed. Soldiers are working hard at the wreck. The work is impeded by cold and snow. An entire theatrical company was killed. Several headless and armless corpses have been found in the neighboring river. A mother who had been driven mad by the catastrophe refused to release from her embrace two dead children. A young priest was buried for two hours, and when extricated it was found that his hair had turned white. An entire family, consisting of six persons, was killed.

Capt. R. Powell and a young man named Warfield, while engaged at Cambridge, Md., on Monday, in friendly wrestling on an oyster boat, fell overboard and were drowned.

The other day at Kearney, N. J., a fifty-foot flag-staff on one of the cupolas of the Clark Thread Mill was splintered by lightning and the building set on fire. Fifty yards distant stood the tallest chimney in the country, 335 feet high, and surmounted by a cast-iron cap weighing 16 tons, yet the electric fluid sought the flag-staff rather than the lofty chimney.

A United States guard still keeps guard over General John A. Logan's tomb at Rock Creek Cemetery, Washington.

A STORY OF PATTI.

It Took Two Hundred Pounds to Get Her Shoes On.

Of course, Col. Mapleson's book would be incomplete without some stories of Patti. On one occasion, at Boston, he tells us, when he was only able to offer the famous prima donna £800 instead of £1,000, which he had engaged to pay her beforehand for each performance, she was unwilling to receive the money.

The agent declined the money and formally announced to me that my contract with Mme. Patti was at an end. I accepted the inevitable, consoling myself with the reflection that, besides other good artists in my company, I had now £800 to go on with.

Two hours afterwards Signor Franchi reappeared.

"I cannot understand," he said, "how it is you get on so well with prime donne, and especially with Mme. Patti. You are a marvellous man, and a fortunate one, too, I may add. Mme. Patti does not wish to break her engagement with you, as she certainly would have done with any one else under the circumstances. Give me the £800 and she will make every preparation for going on to the stage. She empowers me to tell you that she will be at the theatre in good time for the beginning of the opera, and that she will be ready dressed in the costume of Violetta, with the exception only of the shoes. You can let her have the balance when the doors open and the money comes in from the outside public, and directly she receives it she will put her shoes on and at the proper moment make her appearance on the stage."

I therefore handed him £800 I had already in hand as the result of subscriptions in advance. "I congratulate you on your good luck," said Sig. Franchi, as he departed with the money in his pocket.

After the opening of the doors I had another visit from Sig. Franchi. By this time an extra sum of £160 had come in. I handed it to my benevolent friend and begged him to carry it without delay to the obliging prima donna, who, having received £960, might, I thought, be induced to complete her toilet pending the arrival of the £40 balance.

Nor was I altogether wrong in my hopeful anticipations. With a beaming face Sig. Franchi came back and communicated the joyful intelligence that Mme. Patti had got one shoe on. "Send her the £40," he added, "and she will put on the other."

Ultimately the other shoe was got on; but not, of course, until the last £40 had been paid. Then Mme. Patti, her face radiant with benignant smiles, went on to the stage, and the opera, already begun, was continued brilliantly until the end.—New York Sun.

TELEGRAPHIC SUMMARY.

During a fight at New York between two colored women, Mary Slater and her sister, Sarah Thompson, Mrs. Slater threw Mrs. Thompson downstairs and killed her. Mrs. Slater was arrested.

In the suit at Lowell, Mass., of Mrs. Myra Beals against Dr. Augustine Thompson, of Moxie nerve tonic fame, for $50,000 for having alienated her husband's affections, the jury awarded the plaintiff $30,000.

The odor of gas on the top floor of the Eagle Hotel, of Hoboken, N. J., at noon yesterday caused the housekeeper to make an investigation. All the rooms were open except No. 14, which had been rented to a couple who registered as Mr. and Mrs. Stone Saturday night. The door was forced open and both were found lying on the bed dead.

Two ladies from Pennsylvania, who were visiting their brother, a Mr. McKinley, near West Liberty, Iowa, were killed on Friday night by a Burlington & Cedar Rapids passenger train. Their death was the result of the stubbornness of a boy, who persisted in driving them across the track when the engine was almost upon them. The lad paid the penalty of his folly with his life.

Jas. Clark, of Ludington, Mich., while crazed with liquor, attacked his mother with a large knife, and cut her throat and head in a horrible manner. The knife nearly severed her windpipe. The doctors say the woman cannot recover. Sheriff Darr was called. Upon his arrival Clark met him in the yard with a club, and a desperate struggle ensued. Clark finally dropped his club and sprang into the house, where he picked up an axe. Sheriff Darr sprang after him and shut the door from the outside. By this time City Marshal Kennedy arrived, and Clark was arrested and placed in jail.

David Sellers and his wife, living near Mount Gilead, Ohio, were murdered on Thursday night, and their farm-house was fired by the perpetrators of the crime. Their daughter and hired man, who slept upstairs, were awakened about 2 o'clock in the morning by smoke before the flames had gained much headway. They escaped, and finally succeeded in getting the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Sellers out. Both were dead. The man's head had been burned off and the woman's skull had been crushed and her jaw broken. Sellers was very wealthy, and was in the habit of keeping money in the house. It is therefore supposed the murder was committed by burglars.

He Resolved to "Foller."

"Say, boy, if you foller me any further I'll black your eye." "Will you?" "You bet!" "Real black?" "Awful black!"

Then I'll foller. If I can get a black eye I won't have to go to school for a week!"—Detroit Free Press.

A Grub Expert.

Mushrooms are nice to eat, unless they are toadstools.—Buffalo Times.

Jay Gould is one of the hardest men in New York to interview. It is almost impossible for a reporter who has no personal acquaintance with him to get in sight of him, either at his office or in his home.

Mrs. John A. Markle, of Fond du Lac, Wis., who has not spoken above a whisper in twelve years, was examining some goods at a bargain counter the other day, and was surprised to find that her voice had returned in full tone.

City Treasurer Harman, of Toronto, tendered his resignation on Saturday to the Executive Committee. It was accepted, and Assistant-Treasurer Coady appointed to the vacancy.

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1 50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,

Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, NOV. 8, 1888.

THE VALLEY ROAD.

It is now ten years since the valley road was first seriously talked of, but only within the past year or so has actual work been commenced upon it. It has now been opened out, and many think that it is, as orignally intended, a suitable outlet for farmers from the north during winter months. This is a mistaken idea. Last week we took occasion to traverse its whole length for the purpose of satisfying ourselves as to the possibility of its meeting the requirements for which it was intended during the coming winter, and must say that we were disagreeably surprised at its condition. On the Euphrasia side it is quite a respectable road either for summer or winter travel. On the Artemesia side of the town line it is the reverse. It is simply impracticable in its present condition. About [illegible] dollars have been spent on this road by the municipality of Artemesia, and it will yet require a large outlay to put it in passable shape. It seems a pity that this large sum of money should remain idle without producing any perceptible return. The road, if completed, would be of the very greatest service to the township, and should be made passable for winter travel as soon as it can be done without straining the township's finances. We would like to have communications from some of our township fathers on the matter, letting the people know what the prospects are for securing easy access to the fertile districts of the Queens Valley. Is the road to be left in its present condition, or is it the intention to complete the work already so far advanced?

No new developments have been made in the Manitoba railway war.

Latest advices indicate that the Republicans have won the day in the United States, but the complete returns are wanting.

The recount in the East Northumberland election case has resulted in Dr. Willoughby's majority being increased to eight. It is folly in nearly every case to demand a recount or enter an appeal in election matters. "To him that hath shall be given; and to him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." Election appeals and recounts are "built that way."

Lord Sackville West, British representative at Washington, has been recalled, which was demanded by the American Government upon the ground that he had written an indiscreet, politically tinted letter to an American elector. If the American Eagle is not afflicted with a bad case of quinsy after this screaming election, it will be lucky for him. The hurricanes which have been blowing through his pin feathers are calculated to make a mighty sick looking bird of him if he don't keep his mouth shut a little more.

A writer in the Markdale Standard of last week indulges in some amusing sneers at our article on Education of two weeks ago. He signs himself "Student." Perhaps the gentleman thinks we do not know who he is. In this he is mightily mistaken. We were looking through the window while he wrote. For the information of the general public we would say that he is a student, but only a "freshman" (that is, one of the first year)—and so fresh is he that he has spoiled before attaining the blessings of a higher education, judging by his composition and the appearance of the gentleman. Below we furnish his photograph, taken while he was in the act of writing:

It is exceedingly true to life, with one exception—the ears are not long enough. For this we offer an apology. The bird which you observe coming to his assistance denotes that he is a-ravin'. This is a class of animal with which we do not argue a great deal. Should he care to discard the mask of an ass, and sign his proper name, we might deign to give him a few pointers as to how he may improve his advantages, and, at least, learn the rudiments of the art of composition.

Manitoba.

To the Editor of The Advance.

SIR,—I promised that I would send you an account of my trip to the great North-West. My journey through Manitoba was chiefly confined to the southern portion of it, which is generally considered to be the garden of that province. After a three days' ride from Toronto our excursion party reached Winnipeg and I did not see one farm of cleared land from the time I left Huntsville till I got within thirty miles of East Selkirk, a distance of 1000 miles, over rivers, past lakes, through tunnels, etc.

With regard to the wheat crop, this year it has been a partial failure all over the province, while in some parts it was utterly destroyed with the frost. All the way from Winnipeg to Deloraine, over 200 miles, there were large fields of wheat standing, which were going to be committed to the flames. The frost seemed to favor some of the settlers more than others even in some of the most frozen districts. I knew three farmers who farmed next to one another; one of them sold his wheat for 93 cents per bushel, the second man realized 55 cents per bushel, and the third man left his uncut. Perhaps the Lord was merciful to the righteous, but if this had been the case my opinion is that ninety per cent, of them would not have been left one stem. The farmers of Manitoba have a different mode of threshing from what we have in Ontario. The thresher hires a full gang of men and thresh the grain for four cents per bushel, the farmers having nothing to provide but the board of the men while working. The removing of the straw from the machine is the most comical part of the threshing business. The straw is allowed to remain at the tail of the machine till a bunch of about six or seven hundred weight has been formed, when there is a stout pole about 16 feet long placed behind it with a horse hitched to each end which slides it out of the way, and as wheat straw is no value there for feed it is left on the prairie to be consumed by the prairie fires. The root and vegetable crop, though greatly impeded by the frost, were immense. Manitoba promises to be a great stock raising country, as cattle do well on the prairie in summer and the native grasses can be stacked at a cost of two dollars per ton for winter feed. The kind of stabling which is used in Manitoba is generally made out of sod, covered over the top with straw, which makes a very warm stable. I believe that if the farmers of Manitoba get two full crops every three years that they would be ahead of Ontario farmers as far as money matters go, to say nothing of the severity of their winters; but frost is a yearly inspector to that country. Manitoba has the soil, but it has not the climate.

JAMES F. HUTCHINSON.

An explosion in a French colliery killed 80 miners.

Inistioge.

Any amount of mud and wet weather.

Mr. J. F. Hutchinson has returned from the North-west.

Hallowenn passed off here rather quietly although some men are reported to have lost ploughs, gates, etc.

The Methodist Quartly meeting in connection with circuit was held in Dundalk last Sabbath.

The Dundalk Herald says that the trustees of the Dundalk public school are advertising for a male head master. "Wonder what is meant." Perhaps we had better keep quiet as a Spurr is sharp.

Mrs. Thos. McQuary is absent visiting friends near Ottawa.

It is rumored around here to the effect that it was the Inistioge correspondent that sent in the information about the ghost story, which is exciting Inistioge so badly. Well, for the information of those who do not know I will say that the Inistioge correspondent had nothing to do with the sending in of the information. When the Inistoge Correspondent sends newsy items she generally sends the trtuh and not guess-work.

Heathcote and Kimberley News.

Correspondence of The Advance.

The people of Heathcote are having a lively time over the selection of a teacher for the ensuing year. The contest appears to be between the preacher and teachers on the one hand, and the ratepayers on the other. Evidently their spiritual adviser imagines that he, and he alone, knows just how to meet the requirements of the case. In accordance with this view he proposes importing an outsider, whom rumor has been busy with. The good people of the village think they have had enough of a certain kind of scandol to serve them for the next decade. Taking this very proper view of the case, they propose engaging the services of Mr. Gaudin, who is a young man of unimpeachable character, an excellent scholar and a very successful teacher. However, he is a home man, while the other is a perfect stranger, save for the short time he was in their midst prospecting last summer. It is to be hoped the trustees will soon learn to go alone, and, that our ministers will also learn to spend their valuable time in preparing better sermons, and to leave school business to those to whom it belongs.

Dr. McBride is overhauling his residence and fitting it up for the winter, and now the matrons of the village have their noses pointed skyward. They imagine they scent a wedding in the near future. Who do you think it will be Mrs. O'Flaharty?

Mr. Fawcett (Ex-dep. Reeve,) is polishing up his armor, and is even now thirsting for Peter's blood. Peter stripes his whiskers, folds his arms, and with the blandest smile imaginable says, "Come on old hon, I am ready for the fray."

A rumor reached the village lately to the effect that Trumen Burritt, of Kimberley, was about to take unto himself a spouse. However, interviewing the youthful candidate for matrimonial honors, we discovered that the said rumor had for its foundation nothing more than the appearance of a young girl in the village carrying a white bundle on her back and walking with a crutch in each hand. Did she enquire for Trumen? Well now, its news you want.

Artemesia Council.

Council met in the Town Hall on Monday last, all the members present. Minutes of last meeting read and confirmed. A communication was received from Jane Hogg, asking refund of statute labor. Certificates of filing of voters' and jurors' lists were received from clerk of the peace. Agreement of ratification of financial arrangements between Markdale and Artemesia was also received. The following accounts were ordered to be paid: John McArthur, inspecting culvert at McPherson's, D.R., $2; W. H. Thurston, printing, $7.60; reeve, Clerk and Assessor, selecting jurors, $4 each; H. Cairns, letting and inspecting four jobs on Town Line, $3; Leonard Betts, repairing bridge, $1.

Moved by Messrs. Sharp and Boland, That the clerk and reeve be instructed to issue trustees' order for school funds if required, as the Council will stand adjourned till Dec. 15, next. Carried.

McArthur — Boland — That the reeve be paid $10 for the plan, letting and inspection of the Boyne bridge, and that Mr. Sharp be paid $2 for his services in connection therewith. Carried.

Boland—Cairns—That the committee appointed to settle matters between Markdale and Artemesia be paid the sum of $4 each; also that J. McArthur be paid the sum of $2 for inspecting culverts. Carried.

Boland—Sharp—That Thos. Manders receive the sum of $1 per month, for six months, as he is in indigent circumstances. Carried.

Boland—Sharp—That the pathmaster of the village of Flesherton be loaned the sum of $13, to be deducted from statute labor levy for village of 1889. Carried.

Boland—Sharp—That report of committee re corporation of Markdale be adopted, and that said corporation be paid the sum of $128, being their apportionment of the assetts of this corporation. Carried.

The Council then adjourned.

Locals.

Our Reviewer.

The Canadian Horticulturist for November is an exceedingly interesting number. $1 per annum. Published at Grimsby, Ont.

The Rural Canadian for November contains a large amount of instructive reading matter for the farmer. C. B. Robinson, publisher, Toronto. $1 per annum.

Worthy of Note!

Mr. Henry Ball, editor of the Creemore Advertiser, had a surprise party the other evening, when a large number of citizens of that burg presented him with a hat and an ebony walking stick, also Mrs. Ball with a valuable lamp. We congratulate our brother pub. on his good fortune. It so very extraordinary that it will probably be heralded far and near.

M. Richardson & Co have been selling boots and shoes for the past twenty-three years and the young men and women of the present had their first baby boots from this old establishment and now go there for their babies' boots. See!

Died.

At Rodney, on the 30th ult, Mary Leota Hazel Keefer, aged 2 mos. 24 days, only daughter of W. C. Keefer.

VANDUSEN—In Chicago, on Tuesday, Oct. 30, David Edgar only son of C. E. VanDusen, aged one year, 2 months and 10 days.

BORN.

LEGATE—On Friday, Nov 2, the wife of R. P. Legate of a daughter.

A superb stock of ladies and childrens mantles at M. Richardson & Co.

A steamer was sunk by collision off Cowes and 22 persons are supposed to have gone down.

Jacksonville's yellow fever record up to Sunday is: Total cases, 4,277; total deaths, 304.

Seventeen miners were killed in a Pennsylvania coal mine on saturday evening by an explosion.

Another break has occurred in the Cornwall Canal bank and there is little prospect of vessels being able to pass through this fall.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Blacksmith Shop for Sale or Rent.

The blacksmith shop, known as Adison's, on the 4th line, Artemesia, about 3½ miles from Flesherton, is offered for sale or to rent. For terms, and particulars apply to

DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Eugenia P. O.

Butcher Business for Sale.

A good paying butcher business is offered for sale in Flesherton, five and six brevos killed each week, besides small animals. To an enterprising man this is a first class opportunity for securing a nice business. For further particulars apply to

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
butchers, Flesherton.

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
PURVEYORS TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Dealers in fresh and cured meats, sausage (our own make), lard, bologna, etc. etc.

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only $4 per hundred.

Call and ascertain prices, whether you buy or not.

Collingwood Collegiate Institute.

RE-OPENS JANUARY 7, 1889

STAFF—W. Williams, B. A., English, French and German; J. H. Brethour, B. A., Classics; E. B. Cox, B. A., Mathematics; W. H. Stevens, B. A., Science; T. H. McGwill, B. A., Commercial. Record of 1887-88: Entrance, 1st class, 2nd class, specials; First Cs, high in Province, two; three seconds, twenty-one thirds, several certificates at minor examinations. Thorough training in specialty of teacher's work. Attending pupils eleven years has passed 86 honors, 75 A, 74 Cs, 130 seconds, 300 thirds, and gained for 1 of 338. Rates and full calendar from Rev. or Mr. Collegiate and Commercial examinations.

Send for illustrated circular.

WM. WILLIAMS, B. A., Principal.

Collingwood, Oct. 22, 1888.

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST,

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.

Flesherton on Thursday on the day following.

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts. 2nd door North of Richardson & Co's

Medical.

DR. CARTER.

M. C. P. & S., ONT.

PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.
FLESHERTON.

Office, Strain's Block. Residence, J. G. Russel's

Partnership.

E. F. HIXON, M.D.C.M. J. G. HUTTON, M.D.C.M.

Physicians, Surgeons, &c., &c.

PRICEVILLE.

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.

SURGEON DENTIST

Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the R.C.D.S.,

Will visit FLESHERTON, Munshaw's Hotel, 1st and 3rd of each month. Teeth extracted, inserted and filled in the highest styles of the art, at reasonable prices.

HEAD OFFICE, 761 YONGE ST., TORONTO.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office.—Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on [illegible]

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER, C.B.R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent for purchase and sale of lands. Appraiser for C.L.C. Co. and F. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. Issuer of MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES.

On Town or Farm Property,

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton

W. J. BELLAMY,

TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT, &C

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance effected in first class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any pary of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavestroughing, and manufacturing all the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Miscellaneous.

Came Astray.

Came to the premises of W. T. McKee, Lot 5, Con. 4, Artemesia, two steers, one brindle and one red, rising two years old. The brindle one was lame on the near fore foot. The owner is requested to prove property and pay charges, else they will be sold to pay expenses.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 c's

HEARD'S
Carriage Works,
FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

THE GLOBE Christmas NUMBER

READY FIRST WEEK IN DECEMBER.

A GREAT HOLIDAY PAPER

New Type, New Press, Fine Paper, Five Handsome Lithographed Plates, First-Class Illustrations, Original Matter and Superior Workmanship.

THE BEST XMAS PAPER EVER ISSUED IN CANADA.

THE LITERARY MATTER in the CHRISTMAS GLOBE will be entirely original and will include stories from the ablest pens in Canada. The subject matter being wholly Canadian.

FIVE HANDSOME LITHOGRAPHED PLATES accompany the paper, the premium one being a scene from Vancouver Park, B.C., from a painting by Mr. L. R. O'Brien, the celebrated Canadian artist.

MECHANICALLY the XMAS GLOBE will be in every way first-class, and no expense will be spared in having it surpass anything of the kind ever before published in this country.

As the DEMAND will be very great, we would advise intending purchasers to leave their orders at their newsdealer's or send direct to this office not later than the end of the present month, as the supply will necessarily be limited and we cannot undertake to print a second edition.

The price has been placed at ONLY 25 CENTS PER COPY

It is intended to have the edition ready the first week in December in order to allow plenty of time for mailing copies long distances so as to reach destination for Christmas.

THE GLOBE PRINTING CO., Toronto.

THE WEEKLY GLOBE, the best family newspaper in Canada and THE RURAL CANADIAN the best agricultural paper in Canada. Both from now to end of 1884 only $1.25.

NEW

FALL GOODS! MEDICAL HALL,

AT

Central Store,

Priceville.

Having received our Fall Stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have only to defer to a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well bought article.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and comprises something good and serviceable for Men and Boys in fact

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

still remain unapproachable. Our motto being Good Goods and Low Prices. Come and see us.

Central Store, Priceville.

A. McCABE.

FLOUR, FLOUR,

STONE

FLOUR!

MR. P. LOUCKS

is prepared to buy or Grist wheat at the highest market price in the old terms of every twelfth bushel. Seven cents per bag of two bushels for

Barter three quarters of the public Satisfaction Guaranteed

P. LOUCKS, Proprietor

To The Front

FOR—

School Books, Writing Paper, Envelopes, Slates, Pencils, Inks.

PAINTS,

Ready mixed, cheapest in Town. Brushes, Oils, Turpentines, White Lead, and Dry Paints.

SPICES.

Whole, ground and mixed for pickling purpose.

COFFEE.

What is Coffee? Cocoa, Chocolate.

Baking Powder.

Absolutely the best in town. A present with each package.

DRUGS

TOILET SOAPS,

And Perfumery.

SALESMEN WANTED

FARM for SALE

FREE $85 solid GOLD WATCH Sold for $100 until lately. Best $85 watch in the world. Perfect time keeper. Warranted. Heavy Solid Gold Hunting Cases. Elegant and magnificent. Both ladies' and gents' sizes with works and cases of equal value. ONE PERSON in each locality can secure one FREE. How is this possible? We answer—we want one person in each locality, to keep in their homes, and show to those who call, a complete line of our valuable and very useful HOUSEHOLD SAMPLES. These samples, as well as the watch, we send free, and after you have kept them in your home for 3 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property; it is possible to make this great offer, sending the SOLID GOLD watch and COSTLY samples free, as the showing of the samples in any locality, always results in a large trade for us, after our samples have been in a locality for a month or two we usually get from $1000 to $5000 in trade from the surrounding country. This, the most wonderful offer ever known, is made in order that our samples may be placed at once where they can be seen, all over America. Write at once, and make sure of the chance. Reader it will be hardly any trouble for you to show the samples to those who may call at your home and your reward will be most satisfactory. A postal card on which to write us costs but 1 cent and after you know all, if you do not care to go further, why no harm is done. But if you do send your address at once, you can secure FREE one of the best solid gold watches in the world and our large line of COSTLY SAMPLES. We pay all express, freight, etc. Address GEO. STINSON & CO., Box 613, PORTLAND, MAINE.

For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON.

The St. Lawrence river is contracted to less than a mile in width between Quebec and Point Levi, but the mouth of the St. Charles river, which joins it just below the city, forms a magnificent basin nearly 4 miles long and 3 miles broad. The beautiful island of Orleans and the shores of Point Levi shut in the basin on the north-east and east. We passed the old French village of Beauport, where Montcalm had his headquarters in 1759, and where he first met in conflict the British forces, Moncton's Grenadiers.

The next object of interest was the falls of Montmorency, about 8 miles below Quebec: the river empties over the northern bank of the St. Lawrence, over a precipice 230 feet in height, being 60 feet higher than Niagara Falls. The waters decend in a bright fleecy sheet twenty-five yards in width, and seemed to hang like a beautiful lace veil over the face of the rock. We heard no sound and saw no motion, but the foam sparkled in the sunbeams and the rising mist from the cauldron below was beautifully tinted with all colors of the rainbow.

The surrounding scenery is tame and not nearly so beautiful as our Eugenia river and falls. Some thirty years ago this was the scene of a sad accident. A suspension bridge was hung from the two shores directly over the waterfall, but unfortunately one of the arches gave way soon after it was opened. A farmer with his horse and wagon, and two foot passengers who happened to be crossing at the time, were precipitated over the fall to the river beneath, and no vestige of the unfortunates was ever seen again.

The day was one of the brightest, and the scenery grand. At long distances we descried the tall church spires glittering through the trees which shaded the dwellings of these French towns. Sometimes we had in sight five or six towns at one time. On our left we traced the long blue line of Laurentian range of mountains, running parallel with the river till it reaches the gulf, and in the evening sunset when the western sky was flecked with brightest warm shades of gold and crimson the mountain range, like a broad blue ribbon with wavy edge, crossed between the gorgeous sunset and its reflection in the waters of the Gulf which we had now entered. Before dark we came in sight of the island of Anticosti on our left, which is some 75 miles long. It was on this barren island that the ship Brooklyn, of the Dominion Line, was run ashore in a snow storm some four years ago and became a total wreck. No lives were lost then, but several of the crew and passengers afterwards died from the effects of the exposure and consequent suffering from cold.

Next morning, Sunday, bright, but cold, giving us intimations of ice in proximity, we saw two whales disporting themselves. One was quite near and showed his huge back up above the surface of the water, all the while sending jets of spray in spurts high up in air. The next objects of interest were icebergs. We came near to one, on the end of which was an upright column some 200 feet high. It presented to us the appearance of an old woman seated in the berg looking at the sunset. We had now the coast of Newfoundland in clear sight, and in the afternoon were near enough to see the windows of the French fishing settlement on the coast. We saw the hulls of two large ships aground, one of them was the Royal, which was crushed and cracked by icebergs a few weeks before. At nightfall we were entering the Straits of Belle Isle, one of the outlets of the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic. From its source west of the great lakes to this point the St. Lawrence is 2,300 miles in length, and viewed in connection with the western lakes, of which it constitutes the outlet, was, before the discovery of the great American lakes, supposed to be the largest river in the world. The [illegible] Spanish coast [illegible] Indian [illegible] The [illegible] me company. A waiter with a half concealed sardonic grin on his face waited my order for breakfast. I gave it desperately and he went for the victuals and I went on deck. I've never seen that breakfast yet. The sounds of distress coming from behind the sleeping apartments begot in my sympathetic nature a kind of fellow feeling, and I vamoosed. We were a sickly, uninteresting company for two days, then as we recovered we found our companionship in distress had made us very sociable.

To be continued.

A Woman's Aim.

OR HOW SHE "SHOOED" THE HENS.

I say Jack, did you ever see
A woman's flower-beds in spring?
She plants the seed, but I declare
It is a very curious thing
That she can't leave it half an hour
Before "those hens" come trooping by
To dance upon her precious beds
And make her flower-seeds fairly fly
I watched my wife one day this spring
She rushed to drive away the troop.
But coldly still those hens schottished—
Then to the ground my wife did droop.
Therefrom she picked some dozen stones
(You may suppose Jack, there was fun)
But first she gave a "shoo, you there!"
Then fired the pebbles one by one.
The first one struck a poplar tree
The hens still waltzed upon those beds
The second came within four yards
Of touching one of those hens' heads.
A third stone rack'd a window pane
My wife now put on "Shoo" once more.
A fourth just missed "those dreadful sons"
By some few yards it struck our door.
"Her patience soon will cease," I thought,
And laughing turned my head away
But rather felt I'd have to rise
To shut those hens up for the day.
I looked again—what saw I?
(Perhaps 'twas longer I forget)
My wife was there, so were the hens)
And Jack,—she had not hit one yet!

BERTH B. VANDUSEN.

Owen Sound

General News.

Toronto has 255 miles of street.

W. A. Foster, Q. C., Toronto, died on Thursday last.

Australian and Indian Catholics have presented the Pope with $1,000,000.

The Manitoba railway case is likely to be taken up by the Supreme Court within a week.

The Ontario Government will pay $1000 for information that will lead to the conviction of the Galt poisoner or poisoners.

The Haytians have captured a British schooner laden with arms and ammunition.

A dispatch also says the rear guard of Stanley's [illegible] a year ago have arrived at Zanzibar. They state that Stanley expected to reach Wadelai in January last, and as it is known that he had not reached that place in April the uncertainty as to his fate remains as complete as ever.

Two old ladies named McLeod were occupying the hind seat of a conveyance, met with a serious mishap Sunday last while returning from a church in Kinloss to their homes. A couple of boys caught on the hind seat, in attempting to get a ride pulled the seat over, capsizing the old ladies on the roadway. One was quite seriously injured, if not fatally, while the other escaped comparatively uninjured.—[Mt. Forest Confederate.

A farmer living on the Durham road between Allan Park and Durham was overcome by a peculiar lapse of memory last Sunday morning. At early dawn he arose and thinking it was Saturday proceeded to haul in his turnips. He had taken several loads in when a neighbor coming along interrogated him. When the farmer was told that it was Sunday he was horrified at his desecration of the seventh day and made tracks for his barn with his team at a double quick pace. He attended church twice that day to make amends for his unwitting transgression and vows he will keep track of the Sabbath in future.—Durham Chronicle.

Stop the tap.

Distillers and brewers make liquors that they may sell them. If there were no buyers, there soon there would be none made. The terrible liquor traffic can be [illegible] the cry can be stopped.

L. B. Heard's [illegible]

Kimberley School Report for November.

Fourth Class.—Ella Carruthers 374, Fred Thurston 295, Priscilla Dynes 250, John Howell 229.

Third Class, sr.—Herby Fawcett 117, Joseph Carruthers 116, Vincent Gilbert 104, Ethel Hurd 99.

Third Class, jr.—Rachel Abercrombie 153, Hattie Dynes 121, May Smith 92, Willie Lawrence 80.

Second Class.—Maud Smith 123, Fannie Battrick 115, Maggie Howell 103, Christina Ellis 89.

Average attendance for the month 46.

F. J. HEWGILL, Principal.

Pupils in order for second department:

2nd Class,—Henry McLean 325, Fred Baker 273, Jessie Gilbert 190, Wesley Dynes 181.

2nd Part, sr.—Mary Abercrombie 200, Millie Hurd 151, Annie Wickens 151, Geo. Stewart 48.

2nd Part, jr.—Willie McLean 114, Minnie Battrick 93, Annie Hill 93, Ida Thompson 84.

1st Part.—Ethel Plewes 50, Clara Hurd 31, Dorthy Mundle 30, Becky Hammond 30.

M. ABERCROMBIE, Ass't Teacher.

Attendance 27

On Friday last while Greenaway threshing machine was working at Mr John Sargent's near Holland Centre, Mr S. was working near the tumbling shaft when the coupling caught on his pants leg throwing him down and tearing the leg of the trowsers off. John was surprised how quickly it did its work, but he escaped injury.—[Markdale Standard.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Price $1; six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

TAKE NOTICE!

THAT

G. H. BLACKBURN'S,

next door to M. Richardson & Co's, is the place to get your Flour, Feed and Provision.

All kinds of confectionaries and delicacies, oysters and pickles [illegible]. Oatmeal, cornmeal, cracked wheat, rolled oats, and everything usually kept in first class [illegible] and you will be [illegible]

BREAD AND CAKE MAKING.

[illegible]

Jennie McBride.

THE PARNELL COMMISSION.

Attorney-General Webster's Prolix Speechifying—League Bank Books Must be Produced.

A last (Wednesday) evening's London cable gives the continuation of the report of the Parnell Commission as follows: The Attorney-General informed the Court that the other side still continue to ignore the order for the production of the League's bank books.

Justice Hannen intimated that if the refusal to produce the books was final, the court would have recourse to its powers to compel their production.

Attorney-General Webster then continued the presentation of the Times' case, making a further review of the articles on "Parnellism and Crime." He quoted from a letter of Patrick Egan, in which the writer sent £50 for the payment of men who had committed outrages, and said that evidence would be adduced to prove that Mr. Parnell knew that Egan had supplied Sheridan and Boyton with funds to enable them to promote outrages. He would not suggest that Mr. Parnell knew the particular individuals who were to be attacked, but he did know that outrages were a part of the League system. Prior to the Phœnix Park murder, Mr. Parnell neither did nor said anything in condemnation of the crimes committed by members of the League. When Mr. Parnell appeared in the witness box he would ask him what he had ever done to put down acts of violence before May 1st, 1882, the month in which the Phœnix Park murders occurred. The issue (after the murders) of the manifesto reprobating them, signed by Parnell, Dillon and Davitt, was only done under necessity. It would be proved by Capt. O'Shea that Mr. Parnell objected to signing the manifesto, and that he signed it finally with reluctance. Capt. O'Shea acted as a medium in the negotiations with Mr. Parnell for the suppression of outrages. When the question arose regarding Mr. Parnell's control of his comrades, Mr. Parnell declared that there were some men who must be let out of prison, and he named Brennan, the late Secretary of the League, as one of those who must either be kept out of Ireland or in prison. The court, said the Attorney-General, could draw its own conclusion as to what Mr. Parnell knew of Brennan's connection with crimes. Mr. Parnell, continued the Attorney-General, also advised that Sheridan and Boyton be allowed to return to Ireland, as they could control those who were engaged in the commission of crime. All this showed that Mr. Parnell had a thorough knowledge of the sources of violence. The Attorney-General further accused Mr. Parnell of having criminal knowledge regarding the use of vast funds by the League for criminal purposes. Accounts published by the Dublin Freeman's Journal gave the receipts of the Land League from October, 1879, to October, 1881, as £144,890. Only £44,877 of this sum was accounted for. How was the remaining £100,000 applied? Did Mr. Parnell know the uses to which this large sum was devoted? Was it so expended that its distributors did not dare to give an open statement? If the League was a constitutional body, why should its books be removed to London, there to disappear? Some items of account could be traced which disclosed Mr. Parnell's relations with murderous associations. For instance, a cheque for £100 sent to Byrne and one for £25 sent to Quinn.

The Attorney-General was then proceeding to expand upon the support received by the Parnellites from the Irish World, when the court adjourned for the day. The Attorney-General's exhaustive method of presenting his case is patiently submitted to by the court, the judges having determined, in accordance with usage, to permit counsel in their opening addresses to follow their own line. Public interest in the case has begun to wane under the influence of the Attorney-General's prolix exposition. A general impression is growing that the Times' case is weaker even than its enemies imagined, and that the task confided to the Attorney-General is beyond his powers. Should he continue at his present speed, another week will not see the end of his speech. To-day he brought his story of the League's misdoings only up to 1882. The lack of concern shown by the public disappoints the newspapers, which had made unusual preparations for reporting the proceedings and for increased circulation. The sale of evening papers is entirely unaffected by the trial.

A good deal of the documentary evidence upon which Webster's brief is based was obtained, it appears, from a certain Land League clerk. If Webster's hints may be trusted this man will be put into the witness box to prove that the Central Executive Committee of the Land League actually paid money for the commission of outrages. A more important promise made, however, in somewhat vague terms, was that the Times would name the persons who supplied the forged Parnell letters and specify the sums paid for them.

Labouchere says: There is a good deal of discussion as to the reason for the appearance of Sir Richard Webster and Sir Henry James as counsel for the Times, after the persistent statements that they had withdrawn from the case. Some hold that they have been induced against their own wishes to appear because the Times' case is so weak that they could not be spared. Others hold that they had themselves insisted on appearing, notwithstanding the advice of the Government, feeling that they were not at liberty to sacrifice their client

Give Us a Woman Who Laughs.

For a good, every-day household angel give us a woman who laughs. Her biscuits may not always be just right and she may occasionally burn her bread and forget to replace dislocated buttons, but for solid comfort all day and every day she is a very paragon. Home is not a battlefield nor life one unending row. The trick of always seeing the bright side, of shining up the dark one, is a very important faculty, one of the things no one woman should be without.

In Ottawa there are numerous cases of typhoid fever, but none of them are of a malignant type, though several are serious. Dr. Robillard, as medical health officer, does not see any grounds for alarm, nor anticipate any epidemic.

Rev. D. Savage is holding evangelistic services in Portage la Prairie.

A BAD WIDOWER.

He Burns Barns, Maims Horses, Fires at People and Gets Arrested.

A Quebec despatch says: Full details have come to hand of the arrest made by the Provincial police in St. George's, Beauce, Que. The name of the prisoner is Jean Rodrique, a widower of some 40 years, who has two children and a very bad reputation. He is said to have burned several barns, and in order to revenge himself upon the cure of the parish cut the tail and mane of his horse. He harbored an ill-feeling against a farmer named Joseph Bolduc and fired his revolver at him, fortunately without injuring him. A warrant of arrest was issued, but when the officers went to execute it they found that Rodrique was a second Bartley or Morrison. The High Constable Groleau approached to arrest him, but was driven away by his man at the point of his revolver. A bailiff named Morin then made a similar attempt while Rodrique was mowing in his field, but the latter threatened to cut him in two with his scythe and he prudently withdrew. Then application was made to Quebec for the Provincial police, and Constables Buteau and Mercier arrested their man, as reported yesterday, after having spent three or four days in the county. He is now safely in jail at St. Joseph, but it is strange how fearful the people in the country are of so daring an offender. The police could find nobody to drive them for fear of incurring the hostility of the outlaw.

Latest Scottish News.

Dundee has thirteen swimming clubs.

Rev. William Hamilton, late parochial schoolmaster, Tranent, died lately, aged 81 years.

Rev. J. Adams, Aberdeen, has been elected minister of Inverkeilor Free Church, Forfarshire.

It has been arranged that Councillor Colston is to be the next Lord Provost of Edinburgh.

There died at the manse of Logie-Buchan, Ellon, two weeks ago, the Rev. Andrew Gordon, minister of the parish.

Mr. Robert Air, for 50 years precentor in Queen Anne Street U. P. Church, Dunfermline, died a few days ago, aged 75 years.

At the Unitarian Conference in Glasgow, Rev. H. Williamson, Dundee, said that the Unitarians made very few converts in Scotland now-a-days.

The county ball came off at Hamilton on the 4th October. It was brought to an abrupt close through Colonel Aikman dropping dead between the dances.

There died at No. 13 Grosvenor Crescent, Edinburgh, Scotland, on 11th October, Lady Margaret P. Maconochie Welwood, of Meadow Bank and Garvock, and youngest daughter of the 9th Earl of Stair.

There died recently at West Kilbride, a lady who was the granddaughter of Tam o' Shanter's "ancient trusty drouthy crony" "Souter Johnnie." She was the widow of David McDowall, and her maiden name was Janet Davidson. Mrs. McDowall had attained the age of 80 years, and was a shrewd and intelligent lady.

There died recently at Peebles an old Scotswoman who had attained the age of 95 years, the last 60 of which were spent in that quiet town. Mrs. Walker was born during the siege of Dunkirk by the Duke of York in 1793, during which her father was killed. Her maiden name was Katherine Maclauchlan, and she married first of all James Cowan, of the Scots Greys, and latterly of the 42nd, and along with him was present at Waterloo after the battle. Upon his death she married James Walker, of the 21st Foot, who died in 1868. For the last few years she stayed with her granddaughter, Mrs. Brunton, in Cross street, Peebles, where she was carefully attended to in her old age, and passed away peacefully to her final rest.

The city of Edinburgh having obtained the sanction of the Dean of Guild Court for the removal of the Canongate Cross from its present site at the southeast corner of the Tolbooth to the one in front of the Churchyard, operations are to be commenced at once. The base on which the Mercat Cross of Edinburgh stood within the precincts of St. Giles' Cathedral from 1869 to 1885, when it was restored by Mr. Gladstone, is to form the pedestal of the column. It is to be placed in the recess at the entrance to the Canongate Parish Church, occupying a position on the west side similar to that filled by the Home Fountain on the east. When mounted on the pedestal the cross will reach a height of over eighteen feet. The cross will thus be rescued from the decay to which it was fast hurrying, and will be preserved within a short distance of its original site as a monument of the bygone glories of the Canongate.

Latest from Ireland.

Sir Edward Guinness has contributed £500 to the Royal Irish Constabulary Jubilee Pension Fund.

Blaney Balfour, of Townley Hall, has been appointed a Deputy Lieutenant of Louth, vice John Foster, deceased.

Lord Lurgan has sold his entire estate in Ireland to his tenantry, merely retaining in his own possession the castle domesne.

The only daughter of Sir Michael Morris, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, has entered the novitiate of the Sisters of Charity at Miltown.

The shareholders of the Ulster Bank have good reason to be satisfied with their property, which has this year paid a dividend of 18 per cent.

The Duke of Leinster has refused the use of the Naas Town Hall for a banquet to be given after the National demonstration which is to be held there.

Oh, Ask Some Married Man!

Did Walter Scott believe that marriage is a failure? He sang:

> O woman, in our hours of ease
> Uncertain, coy and hard to please,
> And variable as the shade
> By the light, quivering aspen made;
> When pain and anguish wring the brow
> A ministering angel thou!

Is woman a ministering angel only when a witness of the pain and anguish produced by her capricious and variable temper?—Chicago Herald.

Deserves a Bonus.

The wife of a farmer named Dufort, of Mascouche, Que., has given birth to her thirtieth child. She has been married twenty-one years.

THE NEXT POPE.

A Forecast Regarding the Successor of Leo XIII.

Signor di Cesare has prepared a revised edition of his well-known work, "Il Conclave di Leone XIII.," comprising a new second part, in which, according to an article in the current number of Italia, this able and well-informed writer discusses very freely the delicate question of the probable choice of the future conclave.

If a new Pope had to be elected now, it is considered certain that he would be an Italian. The nation which next in order would have the best chance is France, where Cardinals Pitra and Lavigerie have conspicuous pretensions; but a French Pope would arouse the most determined opposition, not only from Italy and Germany, but also, in present circumstances, from Austria and Hungary, and very likely from the English cardinals. As regards the latter, the objections are purely personal. "Newman," it is observed, "is 87 years old; Manning, who has lost of late some of the harsh dogmatism of the neophyte, and who would be inclined to reconcile the independence of the Papal See with the necessity for Italy of having Rome, is 80, and Howard is very ill."

None of the Spanish, Portuguese and American cardinals will, it is considered, be able to exercise any considerable influence. Moreover, the Italian cardinals exceed in number all those of other nations in the proportion of 35 to 29, and it is expected that the next cardinal will also be an Italian. It is believed that the very dissension now existing between the Roman Curia and the Italian Government will help the election of some one of these, as this is a guarantee that the one chosen will not be a subservient ally or a partisan of his national Government.

The question remains, which of the Italian cardinals has the best prospects? This, we are told, will depend upon the political situation of Europe. If no war takes place the Roman Curia will go on "feeding and folding" its hope of restoration of temporal power. If war comes and the Italians are defeated, these hopes will be strengthened and emboldened, and in either case the Sacred College will probably choose one of its most uncompromising members. In these conditions Cardinal Monaco, "the ideal Pope of the majority of the Sacred College," would probably be chosen. Should very severe national disasters, however, bring the extreme wing of the Intransigeants to the fore Cardinal Porocchi, who is described as "a sort of living puzzle" and "the leader of all that are most immoderate among the followers of the Vatican," would stand some chance. But if in consequence of a great victory or some other circumstance the Sacred College should feel inclined to desist from the struggle for the temporal power, the choice would lie between three men, "saintly, pious, learned, and charitable," namely, Cardinal Sanfelice, Archbishop of Naples; Cardinal Alimonda, Archbishop of Turin, and Cardinal Battaglini, Archbishop of Bologna. Among these the gentle, benevolent, and widely popular Battaglini stands conspicuous; but notwithstanding his great erudition, ability and virtue, it is admited that the Archbishop of Bologna does not enjoy the sympathies of the higher hierarchy who are said to dislike him on account of his moderation and liberal-mindedness.

Such are the views of the best informed of outsiders in Italy regarding the future history of the Papal power. It will have been seen that they involve a good many contingencies.—London Standard.

RAISED BY DEAD CATTLE.

A Remarkable Occurrence in Ohio River Steamboat Annals.

An Evansville (Ind.) despatch says: A somewhat remarkable thing took place in the river just below this city this morning. A few days since the steamer Robert B. Carson collapsed and sank in 40 feet of water, together with 30 head of cattle confined on the lower deck. For two or three days a number of hands did all in their power to raise the sunken boat, but without avail, and the project was abandoned. Early this morning, however, to the surprise of one of the harbor boats, the pilot house and hurricane deck of the Carson suddenly appeared above the water. When a crew was sent down the steamer was floating along, sustained and upheld by some mysterious agency. This was subsequently traced to the cattle themselves, which had become inflated to almost bursting proportions by gas generated in the carcases, and the combined buoyancy of these dead bodies had actually lifted the steamer to the surface, as the boat sank when they were cut loose. Old steamboat men declare it the strangest occurrence in all their nautical experience.

A Curious Theory.

Rider Haggard has a curious theory regarding the fate of Henry M. Stanley. He thinks that the explorer is alive, but that he has been seized, taken into the interior of Africa, and deified by some of the tribes. He is inclined to think that Stanley will be treated with the greatest kindness and veneration, but that he will not be permitted to escape. When the interior tribes find a real live idol who seems to them to be godlike in appearance and power they are not likely to give him up. All of which is about as probable as Haggard's story "She."

A Mighty Mean Man.

"Smith is a mighty mean man, I say," exclaimed Jenkins warmly. "Why, what has Smith ever done to you?" asked Blenkinsop, surprised. "Bet me $10 I couldn't hit a barn door with a revolver at five paces," said Jenkins, angrily. "Taunted me into taking him up. Got me to put up the money. Measured off the five paces in presence of a lot of witnesses. Gave me a revolver loaded, and then set the barn door up edgewise."

Just the Other Way.

He—I never met any one who could talk and play at the same time with so much ease as you. I don't suppose you use your brain at all in playing.

She—Oh, yes, indeed, altogether; but I don't use it in my conversation.

D. P. Thompson, a Portland (Ore.) bank president and millionaire, landed in Portland thirty-five years ago and began life as a woodchopper. At the end of five months' labor he had a fortune of $40.

NOT NEXT OF KIN.

An Important Decision on the Subject of Bequests to Sweethearts.

W. D. Welch, a travelling man, insured his life in the Royal Arcanum for $3,000, and made the money payable to his affianced bride, Miss Hettie Parke, now Mrs. Palmer. The Arcanum wrote Miss Parke as the beneficiary, although its by-laws specially limited beneficiaries to next of kin, blood relations or actual dependents, to neither of which class did Miss Parke belong. A year ago Welch was frozen to death in Minnesota, and Miss Parke and his two brothers, Seymour C. Welch and L. C. Welch, claimed the insurance. It was argued for the Welch brothers when suit was brought that the Royal Arcanum, having no power under its by-laws to make Miss Parke the beneficiary, the policy was void, and that they took the insurance money as heirs. For Miss Parke, Miller Case, Judson & Hogan argued that in insuring Welch with the understanding that the money should be paid on his death to his sweetheart the institution contracted a liability, and despite its prohibitory by-laws it was estopped from refusing to carry out its obligation. Judge Shepard decided that under the by-laws and a decision of a court of Massachusetts, Miss Parke was not entitled to the insurance money, and it should go to Welch's brothers. Miss Parke will appeal the case. —Chicago Herald.

PREFERRED DEATH TO MARRIAGE.

Shocking Suicide of a Girl While the Bridal Party Waited.

A Richmond (Va.) despatch says: A gay wedding party had assembled at Powhatan Court House to witness the nuptials of Miss Nannie Gordon and Mr. Henry Flippen, both of whom moved in the highest social circles. One o'clock p. m. was the hour appointed for the ceremony, but at the last moment it was announced that the bride had disappeared. Miss Gordon could nowhere be found. The groom and the friends and relatives of the bride were naturally much alarmed. A search was at once instituted, and, the earth being wet and soft, Miss Gordon was tracked from her residence to the bank of the Appomattox River, a distance of two miles and a half. Here all traces of her were lost, and the awful suspicion that she had committed suicide flashed upon the minds of the searching party. The river was then dragged and the body of the young lady was found just fifty yards from the point where her footprints ceased. The groom and the family of the unfortunate girl are overwhelmed with grief. No cause is assigned for the act of self-destruction, which yet remains a profound mystery.

A MISER'S DEATH.

A Woman Living in Squalor Who Owned Thirty-five Thousand Dollars.

A Sioux Falls, Dak., despatch says: Mary Ann Irvine, one of the most noted characters of this section, died on Friday night of heart trouble. During her residence of thirteen years in this vicinity she has lived in the utmost filth and squalor. She was vindictive to an extraordinary degree, and has figured prominently at nearly every term of court as defendant on various charges. No one ever darkened her door, and it was only a very short time before she died that even her own children dared to enter her room. When it was discovered she was dying she was asked if a physician should be sent for, but she objected to incurring so great an expense, and not until she had struck a bargain with the doctor as to the fee would she allow any medicine to be administered. After her death a search among her effects revealed deeds, mortgages, notes and bonds, and cash to the amount in the aggregate of $35,000. The woman was 63 years old, and has three children, to whom the property reverts.

The Carlyle Family Bequests.

Probate of the will of the late Thomas Christopher Burrows of Warton, Lancashire, was granted on the 11th inst. to the surviving executor, Thomas Carlyle, of Waterbeck, Dumfries, to whom is bequeathed £500. Among other legatees are Mary Ann Wishart, Elizabeth Martha Wishart, Ann Moses Isabelle Carlyle, Dr. Wm. Johnson Carlyle and Mary Brooks, each £1,000; Isabelle Margaret Armstrong, of Ecclefechan, gets an annuity of £60, and and on her death an annuity of £30 is to be paid to her sister Mary. Subject to the life interest of his sister, Mr. Burrows has left his personal estate in trust for distribution in equal shares amongst Dr. W. J. Carlyle, Isabelle Carlyle, the Rev. W. Chasel de Boinville, Mary Johnson Carlyle Wishart, and five others, the value of the personalty being £46,042.

Confirmation has been granted in Scotland of the trust disposition and settlement, dated 9th July, 1883, of Mrs. Jane Carlyle Aitken, who died on the 27th July last, and who was the widow of James Aitken, of The Hill, Dumfries. The value of her personal estate has been declared at £5,069 by the executors, her son-in-law Alexander Carlyle, of Rudall Crescent, Hamstead, and John Houston, James Houston, James Barbour, William Maxwell and John Grierson, of Dumfries.

Religious Obligations of Mohammedans.

Formerly every pious Mussulman was required to pray fifty times a day. Afterward forty-five prayers were struck off.

Another of the daily duties of a Mussulman is to bathe. The right side had to be washed first.

Followers of Mohammed are required to give in alms daily one-tenth of all they possess.

Mohammedans endeavor yearly to make pilgrimage to the four sacred spots of Islam. The pilgrim is counted a very holy man.

Ramadan is the terrible month of weary fasting and nightly feasting. The month is a lunar one, and this year begins May 25th.

A Permanent Fence.

Little Dick had been listening to the recitation in geography of an older brother. "I know what an island is," said he to mamma.

"Well, what is it?" asked mamma.

"It's a little piece of land all fenced round with water," proudly answered Dick.

Coal is up to $10.50 a ton in Winnipeg, and is likely to go higher.

SHYING HORSES.

How to Cure Fractious Equines of Their Disposition to Shy.

A horse that after shying reassures himself, making no effort to get away, but calming down as soon as he perceives that he was falsely alarmed, is pretty certain to make a safe beast. Horses can be cured of shying only by the experience which they gain when carefully driven. The practice of flogging after the event, besides being cruel, is an extremely unwise one. But if the animal cannot be induced by coaxing to pass a particular object, the whip must be used. When your steed stops from fright and refuses to go on, it is a good plan, I think, to speak reassuringly to him and at the same time to tap him gently with the whip as a reminder that there is a power behind him which he must obey. I believe that some Houyhnhnms never shy, but such a one is rare indeed. It was only the other day, however, that I was told, and on good authority, of a 4-year-old colt that showed no fear of a train of cars in motion the first time that he saw them, and I have myself, on at least two occasions, driven green horses past a pile-driver in action without their being frightened in the slightest degree. These same horses would jump a little when a dog rushed at them suddenly and unexpectedly. Practically, then, it is possible to find a horse which won't shy—that is, an animal so sensible and discreet that he can be relied upon never to shy dangerously. I can tell another story which will illustrate my meaning. I was once driving a very gamey and intelligent but rather snappish chestnut mare. At one point in the journey it was necessary to cross a long covered bridge. For some reason the mare paused at the entrance and was evidently in great alarm, but after a word or two from me she made up her mind to venture across. She laid her ears flat back upon her head and rushed over the bridge at the fastest trot of which she was capable. Once across, her fear subsided, but so great had it been that she broke out in a profuse sweat. In thus acting the mare showed the very highest courage, and the manner in which she comported herself on this one occasion was a sufficient guaranty of her safety as a driving horse.—Boston Post.

A TORONTO ROMANCE.

The Farmer's Daughter Elopes a Second Time With Her Pedler—An Angry Father in Pursuit.

Last Thursday night an elopement was nipped in the bud at the Union Station, Toronto, by the sudden appearance of the girl's father and her big brother, who severely chastized the man, by name Morton Sinclair, a pedler of small wares, and took the girl home. She was Maria Hennilstone, the daughter of a York township farmer. Maria promised to forget all about her lover, but she didn't. Yesterday afternoon she received permission to spend the evening with a neighboring family, but as she did not return late at night her father went to her bed-room, and there found a letter. The address bore the single word, "Father," and it was in Maria's handwriting. It was written by Sinclair to his daughter, and she appended a short postscript to it asking forgiveness. The letter was as follows:

DARLING MARIA,—Fate was against me and you last week, and I have hardly got over the effects of the meeting at the Union Station, but Maria darling, I am well enough to make another attempt to secure you, precious one, for my own. Darling, I cannot tell you what agony I have suffered for your sake. Those reporters of the papers are infernal liars. My eyes ain't black, and there isn't a scratch on me. I could have licked the stuffing out of the old man, but he was your father, darling. Do you love me enough to fly with me again? I cannot live without you. If you will come, meet me at the holler tree, our post-office, and I will be waiting with a rig and a friend to-morrow night at 7 o'clock. Dearest Maria, do not disappoint me and I will make you happy forever.

From your anxious and loving friend,
MORTON SINCLAIR.

P. S.—God bless you, my darling. Never mind your clothes; you can buy lots when we are married. M. S.

Love and kisses. * * * * * *

MARIA'S PARTING WORDS.

FATHER,—I cannot live without him. Good bye. Please forgive us. We cannot help it, we love each other so much.

Your loving daughter,
MARIA.

P. S.—Tell mamma I will write.

Mr. Hennilstone, accompanied by his son, immediately started in pursuit, but he did not reach Toronto till after midnight, and found that Sinclair and his daughter had left with the 11.30 train for Detroit. Private Detective Reid telegraphed to a detective in Detroit to head them off. Farmer Hennilstone left for Detroit yesterday.

Besieged by Bears.

A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette reports that civilization is apparently a failure in the district of Oloncz, in Russia, where the bears have obtained complete mastery over the peasants. After conscientiously eating all the horses, cattle, sheep, dogs and poultry in the neighborhood the bears arranged themselves into besieging parties and quietly settled down to watch every village for miles around. Not a peasant dares to leave his hut; starvation is threatened over a large tract of country, and according to latest advices the unfortunate moujiks were eagerly looking for a relief expedition from the nearest garrison.

The Hangman Goes to Jail.

On Thursday Wm. Armstrong, alias Macdonald, the man who officiated as hangman at the execution last February of Robert Neil for the murder of Central Prison Guard Rutledge, was before the Toronto Magistrate on a charge of drunkenness. He promised to reform and was allowed to go. But he took the train to Little York and there got full, told the passengers of his proud profession, announced he was on his way to Peterboro to hang Farley, raised a row generally and was arrested. Yesterday Mr. Wingfield, J.P., sent him to jail for ten days.

Drain the Pond or Burn the Town.

J. T. Wilson, of Birmingham, will present a remarkable petition to the next Alabama Legislature. He will ask the Legislature to drain a large pond which now exists about one mile from Decatur Ala., and if the pond cannot be drained he prays that the town shall be destroyed. He says all Decatur's yellow fever troubles have come from that pond.

—"I came to see you, ma'am," said the tramp, "because they told me you were a friend of the human race."

ROCHESTER RAPPINGS.

The Story of the Extraordinary Fraud Practiced by the Fox Sisters.

An ordinary and feeble exposure of Spiritualism in the Academy of Music of New York Sunday evening was invested with peculiar interest by the presence and speech of a pitiful woman of middle age, in whose childish tricks, as she now avers, the whole amazing movement of modern Spiritualism began. These tricks were the celebrated Rochester rappings, or knockings; sounds which first were made by Margaret and Catharine Fox, children of 8 and 7 years of age, in a little house in Hydesville, N. Y., in 1848. The children were roguish creatures, and wanted to tease their mother, who was "a good woman and easily frightened," says Margaret now. They slept in a little chamber under the roof, above their parent's room, and at night would make noises which the mother could not understand, by simply bumping on the floor an apple tied to a string. Then they found they could snap their great-toe joints, and made much better raps in that way. The mother told the neighbors, the neighbors came in to hear the raps, and presently an elder sister, 23 years older than Margaret, suggested spirits. This sister, then Mrs. Leah Fish, now Mrs. Underbill, made the children keep up as a serious deception what was begun in mere mischief, and the neighbors helped by insisting on talking with the "spirits." The children, instigated by their grown sister, answered these questions; at first they made one rap for "yes," instead of three, as later, and as has become the fixed habit of the original taps or of the animated tables. The neighbors made up their sapient minds that murder had been committed in the house, and by and by drew out quite a history of the murder, and even fastened the crime on an unfortunate man of the neighborhood, who was looked askance at accordingly. The cellar of the house at Hydesville was dug in and bones found, and thus the excitement augmented. The children went to Rochester, and then all over the country, and were exhibited, wondered at, investigated, slandered, mobbed and made the sensation of the next four or five years. Thus, according to Margaret Fox (the widow, as she says, of Dr. Kane, the Arctic explorer), what has grown to be the religious sect of Spiritualists, numbering some millions in this country and England, originated. The elder sister, Mrs. Leah Underhill, who figures in Margaret's story as the temptress, gives a widely different history in a book of 500 pages lately published by T. R. Knox & Co., of New York, entitled "The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism." Here we have the whole supernatural theory set forth, finding that the Fox family and their forbears were full of superstitions and gifts, a great-grandmother with the second sight, an aunt who saw her own tombstone in a vision nine years before her death, with the full date of that event inscribed upon it; and so on. Mrs. Underhill's story is exceedingly interesting, and it is reliable so far as we can see in its account of the experiences of the girls in their remarkable career. Several investigations are described in it, and the knee-joint theory and toe-joint theory are both described—for Mrs. Kane's confession confirms an old explanation of the raps, instead of bursting on the world as a novelty. The Fox girls won many friends of distinction—Judge Edmonds and Robert Dale Owen of course prominent among these, but also Horace Greeley, the Cary Sisters and others, who never were ranked in the public estimation with Spiritualists. Yet, notwithstanding all the astonishing progress of the faith in these forty years, Margaret Fox-Kane declares it began in deception and that nothing genuine has ever been done in connection with it, and that all mediums are deceivers and all manifestations can be reduced to sleight of hand or other trickery. Twelve or fourteen years ago there was a remarkable access of interest in the Spiritualistic phenomena. It was the time when "materialization" was the new sensation; when the bewitching Katie King, daughter of a pirate, appeared nightly in a Philadelphia house to reveal the secrets of the spirit world; when a Vermont village became famous as Spirit Vale, and through the mediumship of the Eddy Brothers M'me Blavatsky conversed with her Russian ancestors and with Hindoo brothers, and had a decoration from the grave of her dead husband, in the Caucasus, dropped into her lap. The country was more excited than it had been since the Rochester rappings themselves. The "Atlantic Monthly" opened its dignified pages to Robert Dale Owen's careful and conscientious account of the Katie King marvels. But, alas for the credulous! before the magazine sheets were fairly dry from the press Katie had materialized, indeed, into a pretty widow who played the part for a living, and who might have played it longer had she not one evening eaten onions for supper. A spirit that smelled of so mundane a scent was enough to shake anybody's faith. With this exposure fell all the rest, and since then it has been a continuous record of exposed mediums all over the country; and there is no more popular interest, outside of Spritualists themselves, in any part of the subject, except so much as belongs to researches of psychical societies.

Mrs. Margaret Fox-Kane and her sister, Mrs. Kate Fox-Jencken, have both resolved to expose the fraud which they created. Mrs. Kane is a devout Roman Catholic now. All the money she may have gained in her career of imposition, as she now terms it, is gone; she is a poor woman, older than her 48 years should have made her, very much afraid of what her sister Leah, who must now be over 70 years old, may do to her, and so timid that it fairly overset her to face 2,000 people in the Academy of Music Sunday night. She read a statement full of penitence and contrition, and then showed how she made the raps. She stood on a raised platform on the stage, and the raps were audible all over the theatre. She went down among the audience and placed her foot on another person's showing how the motion was produced. Half a dozen doctors, whom she made to exhibit proofs that they were really doctors, went upon the stage, and each in succession held her stockinged feet while she made the raps. There seemed no doubt about it. This is the severest blow the Spiritualistic alphabet has received. Whatever has been exposed, it yet seemed possible to believe in the raps; they are so peculiar in their sound and so distributed in their apparent locality all over the room—as it was in the great New York theatre. No one who has heard them can be imposed upon by any of the counterfeits which the exposers of Spiritualism give. And it still is pretty hard to give up the notion that the real raps have some uncanny source, for those who have heard them where it does not seem possible there was any trickster present with a gifted toe-joint.—Springfield Republican.

A Prize Poem.

Last February a native of the town of Dumfries, Scotland, offered a gold medal as a prize for the best poem written on the subject of M. Louis Kossuth at the grave of Robert Burns. When, thirty years ago, the ex-Governor of Hungary lectured at Dumfries in advocacy of the liberation of Hungary from the thraldom of the Hapsburgs he visited St. Michael's Churchyard. "He gazed long," we are told, "in pensive sadness at the figure of the ploughman poet and of Coila, and then earnestly conversed with his Hungarian companion in their own Magyar tongue, that possibly being the language in which he could best give vent to his pent-up feelings. Kossuth at the grave of Burns—the patriot-chief dropping a tear at the grave of the bard! What a theme for a poet! Will no lyre awake under the influence of such a theme?" The question was answered by the donor of the gold medal. In the six months allowed for the reception of the pieces, forty-nine in all were received—many worthy of the grand theme—and the one which carried off the gold a truly noble poem. The judges were Mr. Wm. McDowall, editor of the Dumfries Standard; Mr. Thos. McKie, advocate, Edinburgh, and Mr. Francis Bennoch, Tavistock Square, London. Mr. Alexander G. Murdoch, a Glasgow poet, whose efforts the TIMES has before now had occasion to praise, was the winner, and he has sent a finely-printed copy of the piece to Mr. Alex. H. Wingfield, of Hamilton. Mr. Wingfield regards Mr. Murdoch as the foremost Scottish poet of the time, and this his latest effort goes a long way to establish that estimate. Below will be found a few of the more striking passages of the poem:

KOSSUTH AT THE GRAVE OF BURNS.

Immortal picture, fixed in memory's light,
To which proud Freedom's stretch'd forefinger turns,
Kossuth, the champion of Truth and Right,
Beside the grave of Burns!

A nation's hero, flush'd with fight and fame,
Standing apart, and with uncover'd head,
By his grand dust who worshipp'd Bruce's name—
The patriot-poet, dead!

Dead? nay, not dead; the poet never dies;
He lives, as lives the hero of a land;
Proud-set in mausoleum'd memories,
Truth's torchlight in his hand.

Death gives the bard but longer lease of life;
The spirit of his song is never dumb;
Whole peoples march to it, in peace and strife,
As armies to the drum.

Kossuth and Burns' names deathless as the stars!
Twin-record of a battle waged for man;
A red light, threatening, like the soul of Mars,
Oppression's power and ban.

Soldier of God! had Burns been of thy day
He would have grasped thy hand with fervent pride,
Thou later Wallace! lighting Hungary's way
Up Freedom's steep hillside.

Like Burns, thy passion was the good of man,
The breaking down of Wrong, and false degree,
Defying, to the death, each curse and ban
Would hold men's souls in fee.

Unhappy Burns, thine was the martyr's part,
In that thy life was dash'd with wreck and gloom;
And meet it is that Kossuth's lion heart
Should beat so near thy tomb.

That tomb to which, though grander tombs there be,
The Scottish heart in fond remembrance turns,
For, holds it not our noblest legacy—
The dust of Robert Burns?

Oh, had Kossuth fit words as he stands there,
His noble heart by strong emotion thrill'd
How would he pour forth, like a prophet's pray'r,
His soul, with worship fill'd.

Too oft, alas! high worth, and genius both,
Have trod life's path with bruis'd and bleeding feet,
Making of Conscience an inviolate oath—
The God-voiced paraclete.

Pale Hungary bled; but with a firm right hand
Kossuth redeemed her banner from the fight,
And waved it, exiled from his native land,
In the world's open sight.

And glorious was the aftermath that came,
As come it will to all who nobly strive;
The torch he lit burn'd with consuming flame,
That no wrong could survive.

And now, his country stands unshack'd, free;
The chains that bound her once are cut in twain;
Kossuth's life-work is her proud legacy
Brave Hungary lives again!

The sun goes down; but high above the night,
In far-set isolation, spaced alone,
For ever and for ever, orb'd in light,
The stars of God burn on!

Immortal picture, rescued from the years,
To which the eye of fancy oft returns;
Kossuth, a century's hero, shedding tears
Beside the grave of Burns!

An Irresistible Demand.

My dog was held for ransom, and Pat was sent to rescue him.

"Pat," said I, "did you tell the man that if he did not give up the dog at once, I would have him arrested?"

"Oi did that same, sorr."

"What did you say to him?"

"Oi tould him jist what yez tould me to tell him. Oi wint there where he had the dorg, and oi sez to him, oi sez, 'The boss sez,' sez oi, 'av yez don't disgorge that dorg,' sez oi, 'he sez he'll have the law on yez, sez he, that's what he sez,' sez oi."

"And did he disgorge the dog, Pat?"

"To wanst, sorr."—C. S., in Editor's Drawer in Harper's Magazine for October.

Miss Minnie, Who Carries the Mail.

Oregon has a woman mail-carrier. Her name is Miss Minnie Westman, and she carries Uncle Sam's mail from the head of navigation on Siusaw River over the Coast Range Mountains, following up the river to Hale's Post Office station, within fifteen miles of Eugene City. Her route is twenty miles long, and is situated right in the heart of the mountains, where all the dangers and adventures incident to such an occupation abound. She carries the mail night and day and fears nothing. She rides horse-back and carries a trusty revolver. Miss Westman is 20 years old.

Trouble with Servants.

First housekeeper—Oh, I'm in such misery with my servants!

Second housekeeper—So am I. I have a jewel of a girl and she refuses to stay. What's your trouble?

"Nine refuses to go."

An Englishman has invented an electric gun. There is a small storage battery fixed in the stock from which a current strong enough to explode the cartridge is communicated. It is said that one charging of the cell will explode 5,000 cartridges.

ASTRONOMY'S FUTURE.

Those Startling Revelations Which Are Expected From the Lick Telescope.

It is announced that the astronomers in charge of the Lick observatory in California have made some discoveries in regard to matters and things on the moon's surface of such a startling and incredible nature that they do not dare to make them public. The promise of a full disclosure of these remarkable discoveries at some future time is tantalizingly held out, but at present nothing definite can be learned from the astronomers. These able scientists answer all anxious inquiries with portentous shake of their wise heads, and the little they have to say on the subject is so vague and mysterious that it merely seems to give a keener edge to the curiosity of the millions who have not had an opportunity of looking through the biggest and most powerful telescope in the world. It is to be hoped that the promised revelations will not be long delayed. Anything will be better than this suspense. As matters stand even the wildest guesswork is in order. The wonderful stories told in Locke's "Moon Hoax," and in the similar tales of Poe and Verne, may turn out to be tame and commonplace by the side of the facts which are soon to be made public. Perhaps the investigation of the Lick astronomers will show that the moon is inhabited, and that its dwellers have a civilization of their own. We are also prepared to hear that the moon people have reached an advanced stage in the industrial arts. All this in a general way has been surmised by bold speculators, but we have never had any light thrown upon the details. The stature of the moon people, their mode of life and their occupations, the size of their cities, the architecture of their buildings, the scale of their engineering works, their modern conveniences—all these matters have therefore been beyond our knowledge. Will the Lick scientists raise the curtain and bring these things before us? It may be suggested that according to the generally accepted theory the moon is uninhabited and without vegetable life, or even an atmosphere. The statement, however, that the discoveries made through the big telescope are too startling to be told to the common herd until after a consultation with the most eminent astronomers of the world as to the most judicious way of presenting the facts of the case will lead most people to the conclusion that old theories have very little to do with the matter in hand. The only thing that the public can do under the circumstances is to brace up and get ready for the shock that will come with the expected deluge of information. What the moon is able to endure we ought at least be able to hear without losing our equilibrium.—Atlanta Constitution.

How They Came to Fix It.

A well known lawyer told me a few days ago a story of late experience.

I've had a funny case lately. It was a divorce case, and I was counsel for the lady. I never heard two people abuse each other so. I never knew two people to make such a bitter, hard fight as those two. The property was considerable, and I had it tied up with an injunction. All efforts to compromise were no good. At last I thought the man was trying to cheat the woman, so I stopped negotiations for a compromise and prepared to put the case into court. The lady came to see me.

"It's no use, madam. I am going to put the case straight through the court."

"I wish you would; it's what I want. I never will compromise with that man—never, never, never!"

"All right. You will call here at 10 o'clock to-morrow, and we will see about the witnesses."

Next morning at 10 o'clock she was there. She was neatly dressed in great style, and she sat down with a pleased assurance.

"Well, madam, let us proceed."

"I want the case dismissed."

"Dismissed! How is that?"

'Well, we've fixed it."

"You have?"

"Yes. It's all settled."

"May I ask how you settled it?"

"Well, last night he came up to my room. The door was locked, and when he knocked I said, 'Who's that?' 'It's me. 'You can't come in.' He kept knocking. I told him he couldn't come in, and he knocked harder, and I told him louder he couldn't come in, and he kicked the door down and came in, and we sat down and fixed it all up."—San Francisco Chronicle.

A Mother's Love and Courage.

The heroism of a mother when her children are in peril has been the theme of many an orator and poet. Illustrations are almost "as thick as leaves in Vallombrosa." The last one was furnished by Michigan City, Ind. The father was in town at work and the mother was in the field, also at work, perhaps; for they seem to be humble folk. Suddenly a cloud of smoke went up from the roof. Then the woman saw some angry flames. In a few minutes she was in front of the blazing dwelling. Her two children, a boy and a girl, were in a chamber and couldn't get out. Without a thought of herself she rushed defiantly through the fire, caught the girl in her arms, protected her as best she could by holding her close to her breast, and made her way to a place of safety. The child was badly burned, nevertheless, and the clothes of the frantic mother were all ablaze. She made a second attempt, but was driven back by the blinding, suffocating smoke and the solid wall of fire. The boy could not be saved, but his agony was short and his cries were soon stifled in death. It is a pathetic story, but it shows that a mother's love is the divinest and most intrepid thing on earth.

The housekeeper of Warwick Castle, in England, who died recently, left a fortune of $350,000, all of which had come to her in the shape of fees from visitors.

The woman with a patent button fastener to sell easily gets away with the people of Seattle, W. T., according to the Intelligencer. Walking quickly up to a staid old gent on the street she will dexterously clip a button from his coat before he lets loose of the idea that she is going to hug him, and when he expostulates she produces her button fastener and instantly replaces the button, tight and solid. Of course he buys a box of the fasteners, and the lady seeks another victim to practice her arts upon.

HE WANTED TO GET OUT.

A Voice that Startled an Expressman Who Was Resting on a Coffin.

He was an express messenger on the Santa Fe a few days ago. It was a night run, and there were two passengers in the car. Just as it began to grow dusk the train stopped at a small station and a dead body was taken aboard. Nothing in particular was thought of this, however, and as there was nothing to do, and the train would not stop again for a long distance, both messengers prepared to go to sleep. One of them decided that the box containing the body would be a good place to rest on, and so he arranged himself comfortably thereon and went to sleep.

How long he slept he has no idea, but suddenly, as if in a dream, he heard a voice say:

"Let me out."

The messenger, startled, lay half awake for a moment, when in no uncertain tones came the words, apparently from within the head of the box on which he slept:

"Confound you, let me out!"

It was quite a distance from where the box lay to the other end of the car, but the messenger is positive he cleared it in two jumps. Trembling with fear he shouted to his companions, but before he had a chance to tell his story, the self-same voice exclaimed:

"I want to get out of here."

Neither of the men spoke for a moment, and then the man who had first heard the voice said:

"Jim, that corpse wants to get out."

Jim thought for a moment and then said:

"Well, I reckon it wouldn't be right to keep him in there if he wants to get out."

So the two cautiously made their way to the head of the box and debated what to do, when the same muffled voice was heard to remark:

"Polly wants a cracker!"

Then the mystery was explained. Some one in Denver had expressed a parrot to a friend in Kansas City. Its cage had been set away and forgotten, and the bird had naturally become hungry and thirsty. So it waited as long as it could and then made itself heard in the manner that so horrified the express messenger.—Kansas City Journal.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

Hon. Jas. G. Blaine passed through St. Thomas via the Michigan Central yesterday, en route to Buffalo. He travels in the private car of Gen. Alger, of Detroit.

"Taken In."

"I used often to read the newspaper aloud to my wife," said Bert Robinson, "and once I was fairly taken in by a patent medicine advertisement. The seductive paragraph began with a modest account of a sea-serpent, but ended with setting forth the virtues of a certain Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery which, it was alleged, was a sure cure for all throat and lung troubles and would even cure consumption, if taken in time. The way I was taken in was this; I had a lung trouble and I bought a bottle of the remedy. I was a stranger to it and it took me in—and cured me.

Adolphus Cousins, a Michigan Central Railway switchman, residing at 99 Kains street, St. Thomas, had his left arm badly bruised and torn while engaged in coupling cars yesterday morning.

Nothing in the World Like It.

Nothing can equal Polson's Nerviline as a remedy for internal, local, or external pains. It is the strongest, therefore the best. Nerviline penetrates at once to the source of disease, and affords immediate relief. C. B. Allison & Co., druggists, Picton, speaking of Nerviline, state: "Our customers speak of it in the highest terms." Nerviline nerve pain cure will always command the praise of all who use it. Nerviline is an honest remedy. Always sure, and prompt to relieve, and therefore is the best remedy to keep in the house. Buy a sample bottle, which costs but ten cents, and be convinced that Nerviline is the best pain remedy in the world. Sold by all druggists and country dealers.

It is understood that Rev. Mr. Walsh, pastor of Emmanuel Reformed Episcopal Church, Ottawa, will enter the Anglican communion on the cessation of his pastorate at Emmanuel Church next week.

$500, or a Cure.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are thoroughly responsible financially, as any one can easily ascertain by inquiry, have offered, through nearly every newspaper in the land, a standing reward of $500 for a case of chronic nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy is mild, soothing, cleansing, antiseptic and healing. Sold by all druggists at 50 cents.

Two Pictures.

IN COURTSHIP.

"What makes the stars so dim to-night?" she asked.

"Your eyes are so bright they outshine them," he said as he tenderly pressed her hand.

AFTER MARRIAGE.

"I wonder how many telegraph poles it would take to reach from here to the moon?" she said, musingly.

"One, if it was long enough," he snapped; "why can't you talk sense?"

—The good apples never hide their light under a bushel. They are always in plain sight in the top of the measure.

London circles are very suspicious over another big withdrawal on Saturday of gold on account of the Russian Government. About $10,000,000 have now been sent from there to St. Petersburg, and Russians are weak on the theory that this means that Russia is hoarding gold in preparation for war next spring.

POINTS ABOUT PNEUMONIA.

How to Tell the Approach of the Malady

Dr. J. B. Johnston writes in the Medical Summary as follows:

The approach of pneumonia is not always without warning. There are usually certain feelings or sensations of the body which tell, with greater or less certainty, that an attack is beginning. An individual, for a day or two previous to the actual invasion of the disease, feels badly in a general way. These bad feelings consist in a chilliness of the whole body, and if his clothes be at all damp with perspiration he feels cold and uncomfortable. He is feverish, and yet it seems impossible for him to get warm. This feverishness is attended with great chilliness, which increases when he is exposed to a draught of cold air. As evening approaches all these bad feelings are increased, and when night comes on he has pains in his back and limbs, accompanied by a slight cough and unnatural frequency of breathing, with unusual quickness of the pulse and a feeling of uneasiness or oppression about the chest. His sleep is disturbed by chilliness, restlessness and unpleasant dreams. The warmth of his bed and bed-chamber may cause a slight cessation of his bad feelings, and in the morning, feeling better, he goes out attending to his business, only to have all his bad feelings return with increased force at the approach of the ensuing night. Should he heed the warning implied by the return of his bad feelings, and confine himself to an equal temperature of about 65°, and partake of copious drinks of hot tea, coffee or milk, he may possibly avert an attack of the disease. But, unfortunately, he is apt to neglect to do this, and his going about is only arrested by an actual invasion of pneumonia, which usually comes on in from one to three days.

Rev. Dr. Wardrope acknowledges with thanks the receipt of $100 for Presbyterian Home Missions from the same friend "Unknown" who, a little while ago, sent him $200 for Foreign Missions.

Instinct in Brutes.

Few things are more wonderful than the instinct that guides the brute in the choice of its food and medicine. In India the mungoose, when bitten by the deadly cobra, is said to seek among the grass for some unknown herb or substance which it swallows and is thereby enabled to counteract the effect of the poison. Man, when his system is deranged by the accumulated poisons engendered by constipation or a sluggish habit of body, should seek relief in Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, which will at once establish a permanently healthy action of the liver, stomach and bowels.

Dr. Watson, of Queen's University, looks for the time when Protestants will be all united in this country, and cathedrals, religious art and music will rival the best productions of the Old World.

HISTORY OF COLORADO.
By counties and sections. Complete statistics in regard to its mineral, agricultural, pastoral, timber land and water interests. All you want to know. Large book, well bound, mailed to any address on receipt of $1. $9 per doz. JOHN L. BISHOP & SON, Pueblo, Colorado.

MERCHANTS, BUTCHERS AND TRADERS generally
We want a good MAN in your locality to pick up
CALF SKINS
for us. Cash Furnished on satisfactory guaranty Address, C. S. PAGE, Hyde Park, Vermont, U. S

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement
"We believe that to extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that its present stock is the largest held by any house in the country."
And the Review says:
"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in its specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."
QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.
Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.
Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore 1,005 at Detroit 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington 1,216 at Boston, large classes of Columbia Law students, at Yale, Wellesley Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Pres. N.Y. State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

FOR SALE,
A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,
WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR,
All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the
TIMES PRINTING CO.
HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

YOUR

Special Attention!

IS CALLED

TO THE

DECIDED BARGAINS

In Dress Goods, Mantlings, etc.,

—AT—

J. G. ANDERSON'S.

A beautiful range of plushes in the latest shades, at a surprisingly low figure.

DON'T FAIL TO SEE OUR STOCK OF

BOOTS AND SHOES!

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

Men's and Boys' Long Boots of the best manufacture at rock bottom prices. Button and Lace Boots in great variety at prices sure to suit you.

THE TOP PRICE PAID

For Butte and Eggs

A lot of choice Butter in Tubs or Rolls wanted by 1st November.

At Cash Price for Trade.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

Euphrasia township tax rate is 4 mills on the dollar.

Meaford fishermen have had fine sport this fall trolling on the bay for salmon.

The Collingwood Bulletin says they have no use for street lamps, as there are very few pedestrians on the streets at night.

The Mt. Forest Confederate says the Methodist Church there intend holding a grand patent palatable puff paste pumpkin pie pic-nic.

Mr. Stubbs, the defeated candidate, has entered a protest against the election of Mr. White, member of Cardwell. Mr. Elgin, of Orangeville, is solicitor for Mr. Stubbs.—[Shelburne Free Press.

An accident occured at Mr. Russell's threshing about three miles from the village last Friday when Mr. H. Lonsway fell through the mow on to the floor breaking his breast bone. The accident is a serious one.—[Dundalk Herald.

When old Mr. John Cooke was digging his potatoes he turned up one very big one. Picking it up to get the 'helt of it" he was astonished at its light weight. Examination proved it to be hollow and a mouse had a nest with six of a family in its interior.—[Beeton World.

There is not much sentiment in the average hen. He will eagerly scoop the last morsel from an egg with a silver spoon, without giving a thought to the lame hen out in the pouring rain seeking material for her next effort.—[Pickering News.

A boy threw a stone at a dog last week, the dog dodged, and the missile went through R. A. Bunting's window. It was a $2.50 shot for the boy, and the dog now laughs till the tears ooze through its whiskers.—[Pickering News.

Bruce Telescope: On Tuesday 30th inst. Thomas Thompson, son of James Thompson of Carrick, came in to Walkerton for a load of shingles, he started for home between 11 and 12 o'clock a.m. Just beyond the Sheriff's gate the horses are supposed to have become frightened at something and became unmanageable and ran against a shade tree one horse taking one side of the tree and the other horse the other. Thompson evidently fell before reaching the tree, as he was crushed between the wagon and the tree. Mr. Budd was the first to arrive at the scene of the accident, Dr. Stalker being immediately sent for. The Dr. superintended the taking of Thompson home and found the leg broken at the thigh bone and also five or six ribs broken, crushing the liver and lungs which undoubtedly was the immediate cause of death. There was really nothing that could be done for him as he was dying, and beyond medical aid. He lived about half an hour after reaching home. The deceased was a young man of about 25 years of age, and his awful death we trust may have a salutary effect on his companions.

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,

Late U. S. Consul to Italy, author of "The Glory and Shame of England," "America's Advancement," etc., etc., etc., writes as follows:—

New York, August 1, 1886.
122 E. 27th st.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

A Priceless Blessing

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine.

BOOTS & SHOES!

I have a large stock on hand, suitable

For Fall Wear.

Men's and Boys' Long Boots,

Also a large variety of LADIES' AND CHILDRENS' WEAR. A lot o

Summer Goods Selling off Cheap.

WM. CLAYTON'S, - - FLESHERTON.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,

FLESHERTON.

A Positive Cure. ✠ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Nobleness of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

A Permanent Cure. ✠ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equa

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London,

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☞ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII, NO. 384. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, NOV. 15, 1888. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR

L-O-O-K!

—AND—

READ CAREFULLY

And you will find that at

Russell's - Noted - Jewelry - Store,

FLESHERTON.

Is to be found the finest, best and cheapest stock of Watches, Clocks, Jewelry, Spectacles, etc.

In Watches we have the famous Waltham, Elgin, Springfield, Illinois Hampden, Columbus, New Haven, in silver and gold and gold filled cases, in ladies and gents' sizes, from $9.50 to $75, warranted from two to five years. Swiss silver watches, ladies' and gents' sizes, from $7.50 to $50, warranted from three to five years. Also the finest line of

AMERICAN SPRING AND WEIGHT CLOCKS

In prices from $2 to $10, bearing warrants from two to four years.

The finest line of ladies' Barpins, Brooches, Earrings, Necklets, and Chains; gents' Solid Gold and Rolled Gold Chains of the finest quality and pattern; full 18 K plain rings and ladies' gem rings; cuff buttons, collar buttons, scarf pins, charms, etc. A beautiful line of

SILVERWARE

Suitable for birthday and Xmas presents, at very low prices. Also the famous B Laurence Spectacles, Eyeglasses, etc., the finest in the world. Buy no other.

If you have a watch or clock that refuses to go or keep time, take it to

Russell's Noted Jewelry Store,

FLESHERTON,

And it will be made perfect at a reasonable price.

THE GLOBE Christmas NUMBER

READY FIRST WEEK IN DECEMBER,

A GREAT HOLIDAY PAPER

New Type, New Press, Fine Paper, Five Handsome Lithographed Plates, First-Class Illustrations, Original Matter and Superior Workmanship.

THE BEST XMAS PAPER EVER ISSUED IN CANADA.

THE LITERARY MATTER in the CHRISTMAS GLOBE will be entirely original and will include stories from the ablest pens in Canada. The subjects treated being wholly Canadian.

FIVE HANDSOME LITHOGRAPHED PLATES accompany the paper, the principal one being a scene from Vancouver Park, B.C., from a painting by Mr. L. R. O'Brien, the celebrated Canadian artist.

MECHANICALLY the XMAS GLOBE will be in every way first-class and no expense will be spared in having it surpass anything of the kind heretofore published in this country.

AS THE DEMAND will be very great, we would advise intending purchasers to leave their orders at their newsdealer's or send direct to this office, not later than the end of the present month, as the supply will necessarily be limited and we cannot undertake to print a second edition.

The price has been placed at ONLY 25 CENTS PER COPY.

It is intended to have the edition ready the first week in December in order to allow plenty of time for mailing copies long distances so as to reach destination before Christmas.

THE GLOBE PRINTING CO., Toronto.

THE WEEKLY GLOBE, the best family newspaper in Canada, and THE RURAL CANADIAN, the best agricultural paper in Canada. Both from now to end of 1889 only $1.25.

HEARD'S

Carriage Works,

FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Thanksgiving day.

Indian somewhere.

Hurry up, girls, only two more months of leap year.

Ladies' or Gentlemen's fur coats. Grand value at J. G. Anderson's

The question which is agitating a certain Fleshertonian is, who borrowed my horse?

The building of the station is progressing slowly. The filling has been completed and framing is being proceeded with.

We were exceedingly sorry to learn that brother Fawcett, of Streetsville, has been ill with gastric fever. He is now improving.

If you want to get anything in furs be sure to see J. G. Anderson's stock.

We had a pleasant call on Tuesday from Mr. T. Hall, one time proprietor of the Dundalk Herald. He is now in the insurance business.

Fleshertonians can now boast one of the neatest postoffices in Grey. Last week saw its occupation. Mr. Sproule deserves much praise for his enterpaise.

M. Richardson, Esq., occupied the pulpit of the Methodist Church on Sunday morning, and delivered a very interesting sermon.

Stewart Bros. ship this week their last make of cheese, for which they have been given the highest price paid to any cheese manufacturer in Canada, viz., 10 cts. per lb. This last shipment is worth $3,500.

All persons indebted to the firm of Blakely & McConnell are requested to call and settle before the 15 inst., otherwise the accounts will be placed in other hands for collection.

Mr. E. G. Lucas, manager of the Lucas banking institution, Dundalk, was united in marriage on Oct. 31 to Miss Hattie Dean, of Toronto. It is in order now for Flesherton's handsome bank manager to go and do likewise.

10 tons of Fowl wanted by 1st of Dec. at J. G. Anderson's.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla acts directly and promptly, purifying and enriching the blood, improving the appetite, strengthening the nerves, and invigorating the system. It is, in the truest sense, an alterative medicine. Every invalid should give it a trial.

Rev. Mr. Drum.

For the past two Sundays Rev. A. H. Drum, a graduate of Knox College, occupied the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church in Flesherton. We listened with considerable interest to his discourse on Sunday last, knowing that he is one of the few whom the Presbyterian people of this field have in view as a possible resident minister when the time comes to make a "call." Mr. Drum is a comparatively young man, with a rather prepossessing pulpit presence. He is an interesting talker, and has evidently been, and is, a student of deep penetration and quick perception. His declamation is good, his mind is original, and he impresses one as being earnest in his labors. His articulation is not remarkably clear, but we are almost undecided as to whether we should class this as a failing or not. He will no doubt improve in this in future years. His discourse was from Romans 1, 16: "For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." This subject he treated in an original manner and with an easy flow of attractive diction that secured for him a deeply attentive audience. If the securing of Mr. Drum's ministerial services depended on our vote it should unhesitatingly be given.

FOR SALE.—A top-buggy in good condition. Will take part pay in wood. Apply to W. J. Bellamy, Flesherton.

The best value in Persian lamb, beaver, astrachan or neutra fur caps, is at J. G. Anderson's.

W. J. BELLAMY is still lending money for North of Scotland Mortgage Co,, interest 6½ per cent. Mortgages maturing can be renewed at 6½ per cent. at a cost of $3.50.

Farmers, be sure you read every word in J. G. Andersons new advertisment this week.

The Messrs. Hawk Bros. have shipped an immense quantity of eggs to New York and elsewhere this fall. Saturday last they shipped a car load to New York. The other day, when we visited their establishment, over 60,000 dozen eggs were on hand.

From a private letter we learn that Thos. I. Fawcett, son of Mr. W. Fawcett, of Euphrasia, has secured a lucrative and important situation as manager of the Empire Tea Company, Woodstock. Mr. Fawcett is a nephew of our esteemed fellow townsman, Robt. Fawcett, Esq. We tender congratulations.

Improving.

We are pleased to learn that Mrs. Sproule, of Maxwell, mother of R. J. and Dr. Sproule, M. P., who, it will be remembered, fell some time ago and sustained severe injuries of limb, is now able to be around. Considering that she is an old lady of eighty, the cure is quite remarkable.

To Our Readers.

We do not propose to fill The Advance with long announcements of what we can do in the line of clubbing with city papers, as our space is limited and they would crowd out more interesting matters; but should you desire a city daily or weekly in connection with our paper we can give it you at an astonishing reduction. Therefore call in and ascertain our terms before clubbing with any other paper.

Borrowing a Horse.

Some enterprising young or old individual entered a stable in Flesherton the other evening, harnessed Mr. Karstedt's horse and drove off to see his girl. It was returned before the owner awoke next morning, but was found covered with mud from mane to hoof. This is a somewhat dangerous way of borrowing a horse, and one which we would advise the perpetrator to discard for the future.

Busy Death.

Grim death has been busy in our midst during the past week. Two have been taken away. The first was Mrs. Wyeville, wife of Thomas Wyeville, who was taken severely ill while visiting at her sister's, Mrs. Lever, who lives about a mile from Flesherton. After two days of suffering she passed away on Friday morning last, and was burried on Sunday, Rev Mr. Shilton preaching the funeral sermon to a large audience in the evening. The R. T. of T. turned out in a body in token of respect to the dead, who, along with her husband, was a respected member of that society. She left a family of one child, and was aged only 22.

The second death was that of Miss Ella Stewart, daughter of Alexander Stewart of the back line, near the station. Miss Stewart came home from Toronto a few weeks ago suffering from lung trouble, but nothing serious was apprehended. Dr. Ross, of Toronto, waited upon her, but notwithstanding she passed quietly away to her rest on Saturday morning. Much sympathy is expressed for the bereaved family. The funeral on Monday was a very large one. To make the affliction still harder, Mr. Stewart is unable to walk owing to a cut which he received on the knee with a drawing knife. He had to be assisted from his bed and into the outer room to view the remains of his beloved daughter ere they were laid away.

If people, troubled with colds, will takes Ayer's Cherry Pectoral before going to church, they will avoid coughing. The Pectoral soothes and heals the irritated tissues, and controls all disposition to cough.

J. P. Marshall, dentist, visits Markdale professionally the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of every month and will resume regular visits to Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton, which will fall on Nov. 8th, being the day after the first Wednesday. Mr. Marshall is well known in this vicinity, as he visited Flesherton regularly twice a month for nearly five years.

One of the grandest socials of the season will be given under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid in the basement of the Methodist Church on the evening of Wednesday, the 21st of Nov., doors open at 7.30; refreshments served about 8 o'clock. A choice programme has been provided, consisting of music, readings, recitations, etc. The Glee Club, Miss Christoe, Miss Armstrong, the Misses Richardson, Miss Leitch, and Mrs. W. Trimble will discourse sweetest music. Mr Thurston, Mr. M. Richardson, Mr. Shilton, and others will give readings, recitations, and addresses as they deem best.

R. J. Sproule, Chairman.

Admission for adults 15 cts., children under 12 years 10 cts.

Come and spend a sociable evening.

Look out for the Oddfellow's concert on Thursday, Dec. 11.

Mr. M. Richardson's letters to the Flesherton Advance anent his recent trip to "Merrie England" are charmingly delightful, if we may be permitted to use the term. One could hope they would last forever.—Streetsville Review.

Died.

WYEVILLE.—In Flesherton on Friday, Nov. 9, after a short illness, Mrs. Sarah Ann Wyeville, beloved wife of Thomas Wyeville, aged 22 years

STEWART.—In Artemesia back line on Saturday, Nov. 10, 1888, Ella, daughter of Alexander Stewart, aged 19 years, 9 months.

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the head, How they may be cured at your home. Post free 3d. Address Dr. NICHOLSON, 30, St John Street, Montreal.

COMPETITION DEFIED!

Fine Gold and Silver Watches for Presentation or Personal use.

AND SILVERWARE.

Quality and completeness of stock to select from not equalled in Central Grey.

Sizes Complete in Gem and 18 K. Wedding Rings.

No Catch Prices. Goods as represented

OR "CASH" REFUNDED.

Can do better for Customers—"Cash or "Credit"—than any other jeweler in "Grey Co.

Watches carefully and promptly repaired.

JEWELER BROWN,

MARKDALE, ONT.

O'SHEA ON THE STAND.

His Revelations Create Quite a Sensation.

HE IDENTIFIES PARNELL'S SIGNATURE

The Kilmainham Treaty—Parnell and the Fenians.

A last (Wednesday) night's London despatch says: The Parnell Commission resumed its sitting this morning. Attorney-General Webster called Captain O'Shea to the witness stand. Capt. O'Shea stated that at Mr. Parnell's request he conferred with Mr. Gladstone in June of 1881. The interview was accomplished without the knowledge of Mr. Parnell's colleagues. After Mr. Gladstone's speech, made in the House of Commons, May 16th, 1882, Mr. Parnell spoke of the awkwardness of the speech and how it annoyed Egan and others. Negotiations were discontinued until 1883, when Messrs. Parnell and Dillon were in Kilmainham jail. The proposals which the witness made to the Government in 1882 were made without the authority of Mr. Parnell. Certain members had replied to them in Parliament about the time that Mr. Parnell was released. After the latter's return from Paris he conferred with the witness at the latter's house, and at these conferences they were always alone. Captain O'Shea stated that Mr. Parnell desired to release Michael Davitt from imprisonment, but not Brennan. The Irish leader also authorized the witness to confer with the Government, and said that if the question regarding the arrears in rent was settled satisfactorily he would advise the tenants to pay their rents, and would himself denounce as outrages all resistance to law. Mr. Parnell said that he had power to carry out this guarantee.

The witness continued—Mr. Parnell said that Sheridan would be a most useful man in the work of putting down boycotting if he could only see and converse with him. Boyton and Egan would also be useful, he said, if they could be convinced of the wisdom of the proposed new policy. When Mr. Parnell was in Kilmainham jail a letter was written and signed by him, which witness took the next morning to Mr. Forster, then Chief Secretary for Ireland. The letter was afterwards presented to the Cabinet.

Attorney-General Webster here read the letter. It expressed Mr. Parnell's opinion that if the arrears question were settled he and his colleagues would be able to suppress outrages. It urged the importance of agrarian legislation, and concluded by saying that "if the programme sketched was carried out, it would enable us to co-operate cordially in the future with the Liberal party in forwarding Liberal principles."

"After the letter had been written," continued Capt. O'Shea, "Mr. Parnell said he would tell Dillon and O'Kelly, letting them know as much as was good for them." The day after the Phœnix Park murders, Mr. Parnell showed witness which it had been decided to issue. "It was a mistake," said the witness, "to say that Mr. Parnell was not in favor of the manifesto. He only disliked the amount of bombast in the document, but he said that that was necessary in order to satisfy Davitt's vanity." (Laughter, in which Mr. Parnell and Mr. Davitt joined.) "About this time," went on the witness, "Mr. Parnell told him that he had been obliged to ask for police protection, as his life was in danger. Witness, in a subsequent interview with Mr. Parnell, warned him that Sheridan was a murderer and a concoctor of murders and the police could not allow him to remain in the country. Mr. Parnell replied that he did not communicate with Sheridan personally, but knew some one who did. He asked that a month be given him to communicate with Sheridan. Seven letters were here shown the witness, who declared with certainty that the singature attached to them was that of Mr. Parnell

THE ANTI MURDER MANIFESTO

THE CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Sir Charles Russell here asked the court to permit him to postpone the cross-examination of the witness. He said the latter part of O'Shea's evidence came upon him as a surprise, and it was impossible to do justice to his clients in the cross-examination without preparation. Justice Hannen said he could not perceive any good reason for postponing the cross-examination.

Sir Charles Russell thereupon decided to proceed, and Capt. O'Shea, in reply to his questions, said that Mr. Buckle, editor of the Times, had asked Joseph Chamberlain to get him to give evidence. Mr. Chamberlain showed witness Mr. Buckle's letter in July last. Witness did not agree to give evidence, however, until he had been subpœned by Mr. Parnell. Mr. Houston, Secretary of the Irish Loyal Union, saw him take down in shorthand his statement for the Times. Mr. Houston told him it how the Times got the letters it had published. Mr. Chamberlain told him that Mr. Parnell accused him of procuring facsimile letters and of dining with Mr. Buckle. Witness had heard Piggott and Callan mentioned as the men who had given the letters to the Times. Witness knew Patrick Casey, but did not know him as a dynamiter. He had heard through a Nationalist named Mulqueeny that the police had found a letter in the League's rooms in London, in which Frank Byrne acknowledged the receipt of a cheque from Mr. Parnell, which had been sent to him to enable him to escape from the country, but the authorities had assured him that no such letter had been seized. He did not know that Mulqueeny was a member of a secret society. He knew him as an advanced Nationalist—that is an old Fenian, whose views were different from both the dynamiters and Invincibles. Mulqueeny had been threatened with death by Gen. Carroll Davis and Hayes, the civil engineer, who was supposed to have conceived the London bridge outrages. Mulqueeny had given offence by joining other advanced Nationalists in signing a protest against witness' exclusion from Parliament by Mr. Parnell.

WAS A STATE SECRET

Sir Charles Russell—Did you ever threaten Mr. Parnell?

The witness—Threaten him? How do you mean? I have been angry with him, and once I turned him out of my rooms in Dublin.

Sir Charles Russell—Why did you turn him out?

Witness—I told him to get out, as I did not want to see him again.

Sir Charles Russell—Have you ever said you would be revenged on Mr. Parnell?

The witness—I never remember saying so.

Sir Charles Russell—Have you ever said that you had a shell charged with dynamite to blow him up?

Witness answered "No."

To further questions the witness replied that he saw the original of the fac simile of one of the Times' letters last week. He believed the writing was Mr. Parnell's. He had not heard before that the Times had published the fac simile. There were in existence compromising letters and documents, and it had been said that he was engaged in a conspiracy to get these letters, but he had never stabbed a man behind his back. He had been anxious to give evidence in order to clear himself and to refute the slanders which had been circulated by Mr. Parnell and his colleagues. Mulqueeny had told him that Mr. Parnell had paid for the escape of Byrne. He did not know Mulqueeny's address. He saw him last Saturday. He could not recollect paying Mulqueeny's expenses to Paris in order to get signatures to the protest against witness' exclusion from the Parnellite party. Returning to the Kilmainham jail treaty negotiations, witness said the chief conditions of the negotiations were that the League should be broken up if the Irish landlords would reduce their rents and receive compensation from the exchequer. Many of the memoranda which he had made were destroyed in 1883, when there was danger of a Select Committee of Parliament being appointed to inquire into the Kilmainham treaty, and it was intimated to him that the utmost reticence ought to be observed on the subject.

Sir Charles Russell—Intimated by whom?

Witness—By Sir William Vernon Harcourt, who said it was the opinion of another person, namely, Mr. Gladstone.

This statement caused

A SENSATION IN THE COURT, and Justice Hannen asked that everybody abstain from manifesting their feelings during the proceedings.

Sir Charles Russell—Was it then you destroyed the memoranda?

Witness—Yes. Certain memoranda which were in another box and which included some of Mr. Chamberlain's letters escaped destruction. It was Mr. Gladstone's wish that I should be as reticent as possible, from motives of political expediency.

The fac-simile of the Times' letter was again handed to witness, and he said that he was decidedly of the opinion that it was Mr. Parnell's writing. He had never discussed the question as to how the Times became possessed of it, because he did not know. When he first saw the letter in the Times he did not think it was genuine. This was not because of any peculiarity in the writing, but because he could not understand why Mr. Parnell should say, "You may show him this, but do not tell him my address." Witness said he never had any doubt about the signature. He had had numerous letters from Mr. Parnell of about the same date as the letter referred to, and could not mistake the writing.

Under cross-examination by Mr. Healy, witness stated that when he contested Galway for Parliament the Parnellites attacked and denounced him in every way in their power.

The court then adjourned till to-morrow.

The Liberal Radical Union has formed a London committee on the Parnell fund, and has issued a special appeal for subscriptions to the fund.

SOMETHING LIVELY.

The proceedings were enlivened by Mr. O'Shea's examination. The court was crowded, the Parnellites being present in full force. Messrs. Parnell, T. Harrington, Davitt, Arthur O'Connor, T. M. Healy and Biggar kept close watch on the proceedings. O'Shea proved a good witness, giving his evidence in a calm, matter-of-fact way. He was clear on the smallest detail and equally cool and precise during the cross-examination. His narrative of the Kilmainham negotiations, though largely a matter of history, was listened to with rapt attention. Expectation was at its height on the production of the alleged forged letters. Would the witness show any hesitation regarding the signature? He must know it well. Taking up a letter he scanned it with careful deliberation for a few moments and then said in a distinct tone, without over emphasis: "It is Mr. Parnell's signature." Several other letters were scrutinized in the same way and evoked the same unqualified statement: "It is Mr. Parnell's signature."

The most striking point elicited by the cross-examination was his charging Sir Wm. Harcourt with coming as an emissary from Mr. Gladstone to warn him to preserve the utmost reticence in regard to the "Kilmainham Treaty." Although the witness did not allege that Sir Wm. Harcourt advised the destruction of the memoranda, he explicitly stated that it was on the hearing of Mr. Gladstone's wish that he destroyed the documents.

THEY BOTH FOUGHT SHY.

Sir Charles Russell's cross-examination was expected to elicit the reason for the rupture between O'Shea and Parnell, but both sides chose to leave this unravelled. The witness stated that up to June, 1886, he believed in Parnell's honor and knew that he was opposed to outrages. Neither Sir Charles Russell nor Sir Richard Webster proceeded to inquire as to what caused him to disbelieve in Parnell's honor. Whatever was the cause of the rupture, the animus of the witness was apparent. The Parnellites probably felt the quiet malignity of the evidence more keenly than the best-informed outsider.

A cablegram was received to-day from Principal Grant, dated Hong Kong. It bore only one word—"Homeward."

The King of Holland is better to-day. He is in no immediate danger, but his recovery is considered hopeless.

By-laws granting $75,000 to the Napanee and Tamworth Railway and $225,000 to the Kingston, Smith's Falls & Ottawa Railway will be submitted in Kingston on the 29th inst.

THE STANLEY EXPEDITION

Seen by Arab Traders in November—Experiences of the Expedition.

A Zanzibar cable says: Couriers from Tabora bring direct news from the Stanley expedition, a portion of which was met at the end of November, 1887, by Arabs trading between Lakes Victoria Nyanza, Nzige and Tabora. These Arabs met Stanley's rear guard at a point west of Albert Nyanza, southeast of Sanga, just as the expedition was preparing to cross swamps caused by the radiation of the streams that abound in that country. The Arabs did not see Stanley. The detachment seen consisted of thirty men. They stated that Stanley was two days ahead. The expedition had suffered greatly on the march through a thick forest, where it was impossible to advance more than a mile and a quarter daily. They had also suffered in the marshes, where many had disappeared or died. Forty were drowned in crossing a great river flowing from east to west. One white man had died. Stanley was obliged to fight some tribes that refused to supply him with provisions. The expedition had often halted in the expectation of receiving reinforcements from the Congo. The rear guard at the time met had only been on the march five days after a halt of three weeks due to the illness of Stanley and a great part of the escort, who had been attacked with fever. The Arabs estimate the total strength of the expedition after all losses at 250 men. The health of Stanley was then good. The rear guard, which consisted of natives of Zanzibar, stated that Stanley had decided that he would no longer advance in a northeasterly direction, but would strike toward the north, hoping to avoid the swamps. After getting a certain distance north he intended to take an oblique line to the eastward and go straight to Wadelai, where, it was thought, he would arrive fifty days later, or about the middle of January, 1888. The Arabs were of the opinion that the expedition was still strong enough to reach Wadelai.

A London cable says: It will be remembered that on August 1st information was received from Zanzibar that two messengers had arrived there who had left the interior about the beginning of April, and who reported that Stanley had not arrived at Wadelai up to that time. The messengers stated that in the month of March Emim Pasha did receive some vague and indecisive news of the explorer, which had filtered through from tribe to tribe, but that the reports were very conflicting. Some declared that Stanley after losing a number of men and a large portion of his supplies was hemmed in by hostile tribes between the Maboda country and the Albert Nyanza, while other rumors were to the effect that he had been attacked by the tribes in the Matongora Mino district, and after several conflicts had diverted his course in an unknown direction.

KIDD'S GOLD UNEARTHED.

An Old Pirate's Kettle of Spanish Doubloons Found.

A Fall River, Mass., despatch says: For generations the large farm on Horse Neck, Westport, has been in the hands of the Eddy family. Three generations back was Amasa Eddy, who was a pirate under Capt. Kidd. When Kidd came to his untimely end Eddy returned to his farm and gained a good reputation. He placed 1,550 Spanish silver coins in a kettle and buried it on his farm. Eddy died at the age of 94 and left a document, drawn up in the traditional style, leaving the buried treasure for the use of his descendants when they desired a little ready cash. Amasa Eddy, his son, was Lieutenant-Governor of Rhode Island, a conservative man, who put no faith in the tales of buried gold. His son, James M. Eddy, runs a hotel just outside of Providence. He owns the family farm at Westport and the document came into his possession. Following its directions he dug at odd times, but without success until yesterday, when he unearthed an old iron kettle and 1,550 big doubloons. Eddy is not through searching and is confident still that there are more hard Spanish doubloons buried on the farm. There is little doubt that the treasure is the long lost store of Capt. Kidd.

A Lost Limb From a Street Car Accident

On Saturday night as a woman named Mrs. E. Falconer was stepping on a south bound car on Yonge street, Toronto, she was knocked down by a car going north, the wheels of which passed over her thigh. She had a 7 months' old child in her arms, which miraculously escaped injury. Mrs. Falconer was removed to the hospital, where it was found necessary to amputate the injured limb.

Criminally Careless.

Miss Maude (meeting her cousin, young Mr. Sissy)—Why, you are not looking well, Charley.

Mr. Sissy (feebly)—No, Maude. I'm suffawing from shock. I was wun down lahst week by a cawwidge in Central Park.

Miss Maude (indignantly)—I think it is a perfect outrage, Charley. These nurses seem to think they own the centre walk entirely.—New York Sun.

An Unfortunate Suggestion.

Elderly Maiden (to druggist boy)—Well, I do declare, if I ain't forgot what I came for! Boy (full of business)—Hair dye? rouge? lotion to remove freckles? wrinkle eradicator? bottle Bloom of Youth? Elderly Maiden hails a passing street car.

A banquet was given at Paris on Saturday night to General Boulanger. Eight hundred guests were present. In a speech General Boulanger derided the Government Revision Bill, and declared it an insult and a defiance to public opinion. He was convinced of the ultimate success of his own scheme. The speech was much applauded. After the banquet a procession was formed of Boulanger sympathizers, and the general was escorted to his hotel. One hundred carriages were in the line.

—A dweller in the country has observed that a good file is now a part of the outfit of the professional tramp. He finds it useful when there is a barbed-wire fence between him and something desirable.

—Live within your income, says the practical adviser; but if he would tell how one may live without it he would have the merit and the glory of instructing a large constituency.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Wonderful Dresses Now Being Worn in Upper Tendom.

COSTUMES FOR QUEENS AND PRINCESSES.

An Odd Courtship and a Queer Way of Bleaching the Hair.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.)

Latest Parisian Conceits in Costumes.

A Paris correspondent writing last week says: Being admitted to the inner sanctuary of an establishment near the Rue de la Paix, I had a glimpse of a series of gowns for various crowned heads, as well as queens of fashion in Europe and America.

One of the prettiest of this firm's creations was for the Duchess of Morny, the South American beauty, and daughter of General Guzman-Blanco, Brazilian Ambassador to Paris. The costume was a dinner gown of cream and white brocade, with a corsage cut in form of a directoire casaque, decollete, and fastened with large ivory buttons. The petticoat was of yellow satin, draped with yellow gauze and cream lace, and at the belt a long green sash.

A Queen's Gala Gown.

The Queen of Greece had ordered a gorgeous dress to be worn at the Greek jubilee which will soon take place. The foundation of the costume was of pink velountine, but it was completely draped with white gauze, magnificently embroidered with silk of ancient colors and gold threads, and finished with a fringe of gold, blue, pink and yellow. The decollete bodice was finished with the same regal embroidery.

Another gown for the Greek Queen was a little dinner dress of flame colored crepe de chine. The plain train was finished with delicate fringes of black jet and the decollete bodice of fire hued crepe was tied with narrow black ribbons. A garden party costume of the same order was of pale blue crepe de chine, made with the selvage edges showing and draped with blue gauze.

For Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt was finished a superb dinner dress of white satin trimmed with castor fur and gold and silver embroidery. The long princess train is finished with fur and embroidery around the full length. A scarf of rose colored crepe, embroidered, comes from the sides to tie in front.

A house dress for Mrs. Vanderbilt had the entire back made of plain rose silk and the front draped with pink crepe de chine, embroidered with garlands of roses and leaves in colors. A wide sash of green moire ribbon was tied in front, catching up the gauze in a festoon. Another visiting toilet for the same lady was a brocaded black velvet, with straight skirt, trimmed with black jet. The manteau was of the same material, closely fitted in front, but open sufficiently to display the vest of black jet.

A Lovely Tea Gown.

For Lady Randolph Churchill was a handsome tea gown of dark, prune-colored cashmere, with front of same colored velvet embroidered with oriental colors, with puffings of striped yellow gauze, and tied at the waist with pale blue ribbons.

A visiting dress in directoire style, of serpent green velvet, had panels inserted in the skirt of black, embroidered with large roses in dull tones of pink and blue, with green leaves. The bodice of green velvet was finished with revers and waistcoat of brocade.

A magnificent court dress for the Duchess of Edinburgh dazzled one's eyes. The long court train of rose-colored satin was brocaded bunches of feathers in gold and moss green. The front petticoat was of cloth of gold. The corsage was a long pointed bodice of the brocaded rose satin, with soft drapings of rose gauze and finished at the right shoulder with a bouquet of yellow and moss green feathers tied with a knot of velvet.

Another toilet for the Court of England was a little dinner dress of old rose stamped velvet with the decollete corsage trimmed with puffings of gold tulle.

Bleaching Hair by Sunshine.

"A shapely little Philadelphia blonde who is stopping at a Second avenue hotel," says the New York Journal, "has been the object of much admiration and envy on account of her magnificent golden hair, which has all the sparkle of champagne and glitters like diamond dust. The wonderful color she attributes to the daily sun baths she gives her tresses. She has had an enormous straw hat made from which the crown has been cut, and she sits with this on her head for at least an hour every day in the sun on the roof of her house. Her hair is spread out on top of the brim, which also shades her face, and the result of this treatment is a mass of shimmering tresses that a poetic minded admirer has compared to 'distilled sunshine.' These sun baths for the hair are said to be of Venetian origin, and American blondes will find that no chemical process will give them equal results."

A Very Odd Courtship.

Here is a curious courtship story from Washington: George Sieman wooed Miss Mali, daughter of Rabbi Bernstein. When asked for his daughter the worldly, as well as godly, father replied: "If you mean business, as you say you do, you place in her hands $500 as a guarantee that you will be on hand at the appointed time. If you appear the money belongs to you and your wife, and if you fail to appear she keeps the money." "Very good," answered Sieman, who subsequently produced the $500, which he placed in the hands of Miss Mali. Subsequently Sieman explained to his prospective father-in-law that he was suffering from heart disease and rheumatism. He told the rabbi how his daughter might become a widow at any moment should they get married. He finally decided that he had better not get married, and agreed to forfeit the $500. Thus the matter was settled, and Sieman still remains a friend of the family.

The Snipped-off Sealskin.

The day of the long sealskin cloak is about over. Short sealskin jackets are coming into fashion. The Louis XV. jacket is also looming up again.

No Bustle for Theo.

Theo, the great actress, has come out courageously in favor of flat jupes and no bustles. * * * Her stage hair is now flaxen blonde and put up much a la diable.

Fresh From Vanity Fair.

Birds' wings and tails and quill feathers are much used in millinery, but whole birds are no longer seen on hats or bonnets.

The very latest fancy in waists of gowns for grown woman is the guimpe bodice, very much like the guimpe waists of little girls.

The variety in styles of wraps, bonnets, hats, gowns and materials this fall makes it a dress-as-you-please season and no mistake.

The wide English sash, passed twice around the waist and knotted low on one side, is seen on numbers of imported fall costumes.

Green is an extremely fashionable color, and in its various shades of emerald, lapis lazuli and beryl is fashionably combined with blues, olives, browns and dull reds.

The ends of ribbon bows and the fringes of cut cloth are given the finish of passementerie spikes or balls on many of the dressiest garments for big and little people.

The favorite style for the cloth gown is the Directoire, but dressy toilets of silk, broche, moire and plush demand the dressier lines and fulness of the Empire styles.

At nearly all the fasionable church weddings now, says the Philadelphia Times, little chalk marks are made on the carpet in front of the chancel to tell each member of the bridal party where to stand. This is in order to have them at regular distances and make a good appearance.

Striped white lawn, woven to imitate drawn-work, is used for underwear.

Silver and coral is the latest combination of which fancy articles of jewellery are made.

Plain tulle, in colors to match the silk it is draped over, is used on light-colored evening dresses.

The latest advices from Paris report that flowers made of velvet and silk, with foliage in autumn tints, will be used to trim velvet bonnets.

Seaweed has been dyed by a special process in most delicate tints, and used for ball gowns, falling in a shower from small pearl-enameled shells.

A new headdress for those who do not care to wear positive capes is made entirely of ribbon, which forms the crown, sinking into a wreath of fine blooms, such as heather.

The new veilings have triple spots arranged like a pyramid either in chenille, crocheted silk or embroidery, and tulle of this kind can be had in white, green, yellow, pink, gray and blue.

The Tobacco Business in Turkey.

The tobacco factories of Cavalla are sorry places on a warm day. As many as three hundred men and women may be seen huddled together in a stifling atmosphere engaged in sorting the leaves, which the country people bring in bundles from the tobacco farms on the plains of Philippi. In the different factories as many as four thousand are thus employed—four thousand of the dirtiest and most unwashed vagabonds of creation. I think the ignorance of those who indulge in tobacco concerning the process it has gone through is only to be compared to the bliss of those who enjoy a good dish of macaroni and who have never seen it manufactured at Naples.—The Cornhill Magazine.

Peace Must Prevail.

Husband (impatiently)—Is it possible, my dear, that you cannot keep those children quiet for a moment?

Wife (soothingly)—Now, John, don't be harsh with the poor little innocent things; it is natural for them to be full of spirit, and they're doing the best they can.

Husband—Well, if I could have a moment's peace I would sit down and write that cheque for $50 that you've been bothering me for.

Wife sternly) —Children, go upstairs at once! and if I hear another word from you to-night I'll punish you severely.

"Sabbath Breakers" in Scotland.

Breaking the "Sawbath" is still liable to severe criticism by the Scotch. Lord Fitzhardinge and friends, who have been shooting in the neighborhood of Lairg, have occasionally taken a quiet drive or sail on a Sunday afternoon. In public meeting, under the chairmanship of Rev. Mr. Noble, the local Free Kirk minister, it was resolved that "pleasure sailing" and "driving about in vehicles" were "a profanation of the Sabbath, and offence and grief of the religious population, an annoyance and distraction of church-going people on their way to and from the sanctuary, and a general lowering of the moral tone of the community." These resolutions were forwarded to the parties concerned.

Taking the Bull by the Horns.

Tommy (anticipating things)—I wasn't at school, yesterday, Miss Bangs.

His Teacher (severely)—No; you were not.

Tommy (decisively)—Miss Bangs, I've got to turn over a new leaf or get into trouble.

Putting it Delicately.

"I hope you appreciate the fact, sir, that in marrying my daughter you marry a large-hearted, generous girl."

"I do, sir (with emotion); and I hope she inherits those qualities from her father."

The so-called smallpox epidemic in Buffalo is practically at an end. No new cases are reported, and the only case outside the quarantine hospital is that of a boy on Clinton street, who has a mild attack of varioloid. There have been in all 92 cases, and 23 persons have died.

President Carnot has issued a decree extending the time for the registration of foreigners to January 1st, 1889.

The appeal of James O'Kelly, Nationalist member of Parliament, against the sentence of four months' imprisonment imposed upon him for violation of the Crimes Act, has been dismissed, but the sentence has been reduced to two months without hard labor.

—Basket patterns are the correct thing in silver waist belts. Thick coils of silver rope are also worn as belts.

LORD ROSEBERY ON IRELAND.

Manly Statement of the Liberal Position Regarding the Island.

Lord Rosebery, addressing a great gathering of electors at Leeds the other day, said: If our policy is simple, the principle that underlies the policy is simpler still. We believe, to put it as shortly as I can, that Governments are made for the people, and not the people for Governments. (Cheers.) The people are not even made for treaties of union. Treaties of union are made for the people. All Governments and all treaties are only arrangements for the popular good, and when they fail to satisfy that requirement they are doomed. (Cheers.) If you view the Government of Ireland according to that standard it stands condemned. (Cheers.) It has never existed, it has never even pretended to exist, for the good of the people. It has been conducted on behalf of a class, of a party and a sect. It works, and has worked, continual misery and shame. (Hear, hear.) No one has denounced the situation of affairs with more vigor and with more eloquence than those two members for Birmingham who now employ so much vigorous rhetoric in denouncing their old friends who have attempted to redress that wrong. (Hear, hear.) I believe that that truth is so patent and so obvious that Her Majesty's present advisers see it themselves. I firmly believe that the Parliament of 1886 will not pass to a natural death without Her Majesty's Government endeavoring to offer the Irish people that measure of local government which they denounce us for offering. (Hear, hear.) But whether their hearts be turned to the good of the people or not, sure I am of this—that the democracy of England and of Scotland have embraced the cause of the people of Ireland—(hear, hear)—that they are determined that this iniquitous farce of administration shall cease—(hear, hear)—that they have determined that a Local Legislature shall be set up in Ireland for the determination of distinctly Irish affairs so long as the Imperial supremacy is safeguarded. (Hear, hear.) They have determined that Irish government shall no longer be a happy hunting ground for Tory principles—(cheers)—or the mere machinery for keeping the discordant army of the Unionists in order, but that it shall be administered for the benefit, and for the whole benefit, of the Irish people. (Cheers.) To that compact Yorkshire has set her hand—(cheers)—to that compact Leeds, the constituency of the Gladstones—(loud cheers)—who chose the son and who chose the father—(cheers, and "And will do again")—and who would fain have kept the father only we held tight on to him—(laughter)—I say that Leeds, the constituency of the Gladstones, and Yorkshire have set their hands to that solemn attempt. I do not doubt their success, because, more than Leeds or even Yorkshire, the Liberal party has taken up with determination—and the Liberal party has known adversity, has known reverses, has known calamity, but when it has once set its face to an object it has never known permanent defeat. (Loud cheers, amid which the noble Earl resumed his seat.)

A Totally Blind Prospective Lawyer.

At Osgoode Hall yesterday morning the articled students were formally admitted under-graduates of the Law Society by a Committee of the Benchers. Amongst the students was Mr. William Stewart, B.A., of Queen's University, and his admission was unique in the history of the Law Society of Upper Canada. He is permanently blind, having met with that terrible affliction in Montreal in 1878, through smallpox, which he contracted in the summer of that year. He had just graduated, and was making preparations to move to Toronto to pursue his legal studies, when he was overcome by the blight in his career. He is now determined, notwithstanding his blindness, to become a barrister-at-law, in the study for which he will be assisted by a large number of his fellow-students of old Queen's. The Law Society will be asked to examine Mr. Stewart orally at the various examinations, and if they accede his friends are quite confident that three years from hence he will be enrolled amongst the gentlemen of the long robe in Ontario.

He Got Her and a Blessing.

Banker—So you want to marry my daughter?

Youth—If you please, sir.

B.—What are your means?

Y.—Well, sir, to be frank, I haven't got any.

B.—Haven't got any means and want to marry my daughter. Confound your impudence!

Y.—I beg your pardon, sir, but I hope my means will shortly be ample.

B.—Have you any business?

Y.—I am the confidential clerk of a millionaire, sir, and——

B.—Confidential clerk of a millionaire! Take her, my boy, take her, and my blessings with her.

No Assets.

"Grindstone, I am sorry to learn that you have been compelled to make an assignment. Will you be able to save anything out of the wreck?" "All I can save, Kiljordan, will be my own self-respect and incorruptible name." "Grindstone, you shock me. I had heard it was a bad break-up, but didn't know it was a total smash."

An Editor's Warning.

A Western editor has this bulletin on his door: "You can tell all you know in five minutes. This is Presidential year. The editor does not know who will be elected. The editor has a loaded pistol. He has shown signs of insanity within the past few days. Don't camp on his shoulder."

—Some men will persist in sleeping in church. It's a nod caper, too.

—The man who keeps his own counsel does not often have to hire a lawyer.

—This old-fashioned china, for practical purposes, is not what it is cracked up to be.

—Rev. Dr. Archibald, formerly of Knox Church, St. Thomas, has gone with his family to reside in Denver, Col.

—Sneer not at the boy who patiently remains tied to his mother's apron strings. The boy who submits to such loving fetters will never, later in life, find himself tied to the end of a rope.

BILL NYE.

He Hears from the Young Author of "The Quick or the Dead" School.

The following letter, written in a nervous, cramped hand, on an empty stomach, with red ink, was received some months ago, but politics and other matters of greater importance, yielding more money than literature, have crowded out an earlier reply. I do not use the full name, which is that of a young woman, I judge. At least, her first name is Jennie, and, as nearly as one may be able to approximate one's age by simply knowing one's name, I would say that she was no doubt 16 years of age on the 1st day of last April.

HUMBOLDT, Minn., Aug. 12, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Will you pleas to tell me what would be the price for a good sised book not to large nor not verry small now this is Just one that I have commenced to write myself and i think it is going to be a verry good one Please to tell me where I could get it printed and also all you know about it as I am verry proud of this one pleas be so kind as to not menshion this inclosed find a stamp for an answer please to obledge me I am Yours truly Pleas to address it to me at St. Vincent in care of Mr. Tho's Brown as I am here now Yours Should I write it on both sides of the paper it being so you can tear it out and turn it over P. S. The name of it is

The Folly of Blarkeyed Nell—
The Second Daughter ore
The Brenett Flirt

Replying to this long-neglected letter, I would say briefly, yet succinctly and even tersely, that much would depend upon the size of the book. There is a tremendous call this season for an eight-ounce book, with small flecks of foam on it.

Can you write such a book? Can you write a book full of implied and expressed passion? Can you churn up the great depths of human nature and shorten the longing which one may have for another heart against which to throb? Can you do this and still go on with your primary studies at Humboldt? Can you prepare such a work and still get your spelling lessons every day?

I do not know why you should have referred the matter to me, however. I would rather refrain from giving advice in matters of literature as a general thing, for I am not a regular literateur. I could not write a book about "The Brennett Flirt" to save my life. Writing passionate things in red ink, on both sides, I regard as a gift. I cannot do it.

Latest Scottish News.

The Faculty of Advocates, Edinburgh, Scotland, have appointed a committee to draw up a letter to Lord Moncreiff expressing the regret of the faculty at his retirement.

The Glasgow Town Council have adopted a minute of the Gas Committee containing proposals for the city acquiring the works of the Partick, Hillhead and Maryhill Gas Companies.

The Glasgow Volunteers neither desired nor applied for payment of any expenses incurred by them in connection with the royal visit. The Renfrewshire Volunteers did and got snubbed.

Messrs. Clark, the thread manufacturers, Paisley, Renfrewshire, Scotland, have bought the Linside Nursery Grounds, which lie to the east of their present works, at a cost of £14,000. They will build a big extension.

At a recent meeting of the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce Mr. McEwen described the proposed intelligence department of the London Jubilee Institute as "the greatest burlesque of business of which he had ever heard."

Not a little sensation was caused in St. Ninian's Free Church, Leith, on the 7th of October, by a middle-aged man, just as the minister had uttered the words, "Let us pray," suddenly rising in his seat and exclaiming aloud, "Prince Albert Victor is my lord, god and king. Amen."

The Scotch Established Church receives from the teinds £250,000 a year, largely augmented since the last Parliamentary return on the subject; manses and glebes are valued at £50,000; direct vote from Consolidated Fund, £25,000; church and manse rates on feuars, £42,000.

Why She Was a Heroine.

We were running down from Charleston to Savannah, and the train was humming along at a high speed when the danger signal blew and the air brakes were put on hard. As the train stopped all the passengers piled out to see what was the trouble, and we soon discovered that a culvert around the short curve had been washed out. A negro woman had flagged the train with a white apron, and of course we looked upon her as a heroine.

"When did you discover that the culvert had gone?" I asked.

"Just about half an hour ago."

"And your first thought was to stop the train?"

"Yes, sah."

"Well, you are a brave woman. We owe our lives to you."

"Does ye? I nebber thought of that."

"But you stopped the train."

"Yes, sah, but I didn't want dat bullgine to git off de track an' go plowin' frew my cotton patch an' frowin' hot water all ober the place. Dat's why I stopped the train, sah."

Cruel Nell and the Lovesick Parson.

Young Clergyman—The great hope of my life is to marry you one of these days! Miss Nelly—Certainly you shall, my dear Mr. Primrose, just as soon as Charley proposes.

While a circus train was standing on the track at Chestertown, Md., a locomotive halted opposite the car in which the elephants were confined. Six of the elephants thereupon thrust their trunks into the water tank on the locomotive's tender, and in a few minutes had drained it dry.

—Young lady (badly frightened)—Oh, George, there comes papa. George (ditto)—Where? where? Young lady—Hear him slipping along the hall in his stocking feet? George (greatly relieved)—Be calm, darling, be calm. George is not afraid of looking feet.

Near Hopewell, Pa., yesterday, several miners, when riding on a hand car on the Sandy Run branch of the Huntington & Broad Top Mountain Railroad, were thrown from the car by a train. Sam Hastings was killed, Martin Maher had his skull crushed and seven others were seriously injured.

A GIRL BLACKSMITH.

First-Class Horseshoes Made by Fifteen-Year-Old Annie Bole.

Among the exhibits at the Mechanics' Institute Fair, few have more interest than the dozen horseshoes to the right of the main entrance. These horseshoes, perfectly shaped, handsomely polished and withal scientifically correct, are the work of Miss Annie Bole, aged 15 years. Miss Bole is the daughter of a teamster, and lives in the rear of a blacksmith shop at 911 Battery street, kept by a man named Walsh. It was in this shop that an Examiner reporter found her yesterday. Walsh said that the young lady had been taught by him, and he was very proud of his pupil. "I've seen dozens that tried it," he said, "but none of 'em had the natural talent for making horseshoes that the young leddy's got. Mis' Huntington, that's worth her forty millions, made a good offer at it, but couldn't quite do it. There ain't a man this side of Lunnon that could make horseshoes like that young leddy." At the blacksmith's request, Miss Bole made a horseshoe then and there. A piece of round iron was cut off by Mr. Walsh and Miss Bole rolled up her sleeves, thereby revealing a rather small arm, tied on a leather apron and plugged the iron into the fire. The young lady is about five feet three inches high and rather fragile than strong. She brushed the hair back from a laughing face and soon the hammer was ringing on the red iron with a true sound. She made the crease in the shoe, turned it into shape like a veteran, regardless of the flying sparks, drove the nail holes, and finally turned out as fine a shoe as ever graced the foot of a race-horse, for Miss Bole will have nothing to do with shoes for ordinary dray horses, but confines herself exclusively to the finer shoes of composition or polished iron. Miss Bole said that she first became animated with the idea of making horseshoes by watching the blacksmith. Finally she asked him to let her try it, and he was so much pleased with her first effort that he showed her all that he knew, and the result was the exhibit at the Mechanics' Institute. She says that she will not make any practical use of her accomplishment, though she seemed anxious about her exhibit, and several times asked: "Will I have to go out to the fair and make a shoe there before I get anything?" Her instructor confidently expects that she will take a premium. The horseshoes were filed, polished and finished in her own little vise, which she keeps in her own room. Mr. Walsh declares that he is going to send one of the horseshoes to the Queen of England. —San Francisco Examiner.

Peculiar Fatal and Other Accidents.

While a 7-year-old son of P. D. Henry, of Whitefield, Ont., was playing with an open penknife, he ran against a door frame, the blade penetrating his body to a considerable depth. The lad is likely to recover.

Gavin Wallbridge, a student at Upper Canada College, dislocated his shoulder while playing football on Wednesday. John Bertram, another student, fell off a ladder in the grounds yesterday, breaking his arm.

A few days ago Mr. Wm. Jones, of Altercliffe, with his brother, went to Pelham with some cattle, both being on horseback. When returning William had just crossed the Chippawa bridge when his horse bolted and threw him. The unfortunate man broke his neck and died instantly.

A Haysville, Waterloo, despatch says: A cow belonging to R. C. Tye, of this place, got an apple stuck in its throat. Mr. Tye thought that he could push it down with a whipstock, but the cow did not like to be treated in such a way, and gave a jerk and broke off about a foot of the whip in her throat. The animal had to be killed.

On Wednesday afternoon, while Thomas Foley, sen., was operating the barking machine in Davy's pulp mill, Thorold, the knives came in contact with some hard substance, breaking the machine in pieces, one of which struck Mr. Foley in the face, severing his nose and producing a fracture of the frontal bone. As Mr. Foley is advanced in years, the doctors consider his injuries very serious. Some of the pieces of machinery passed through the roof and crossed the canal a hundred yards away.

Not an English Name.

"George," asked a brilliant young K street girl of her best man, "isn't the British Minister that everybody is talking about an Englishman?"

"Of course he is," replied George.

"Well, I don't understand how that can be," continued the charming creature, "for I heard papa say his name was Dennis. Dennis isn't English, is it, George?"

And John put on the mantle of charity and went out into the chilly night.—Washington Post.

A Compromise Suggested.

"Thomas," sternly said the small boy's father at the breakfast table, "don't throw away that piece of bread. Flour is growing so dear that I can hardly keep you supplied with bread enough to eat, so you mustn't waste any of it." "Tell you what, popper," said Thomas, "I'll agree to stop eating bread, if it's so dear, and eat nothing but pie."

Forced Virtue.

"What is Sniggins running for?"

"I didn't know he was running for anything."

"Oh, but he is, then. I saw him going to church last Sunday."

—Chicago Globe: "It doesn't take a goose or goosebone, a weather prophet or a ground hog, a corn husk or the burrs in a steer's tail to tell that this is going to be a hard winter. So prepare."

Ticket Agent Moffett, of Knoxville, Tenn., found among his father's effects recently a gourd over 100 years old, which contained, among other old papers, a note from Davy Crockett, payable to William Moffett, for one shilling and threepence for a barrel of whiskey and a keg of cider.

Millionaire Flood was once worth $40,000,000, it is said, but his present fortune is estimated at $15,000,000. The difference is due to the great shrinkage in the values of Comstock mining stocks and to his loss of $5,000,000 in the Nevada Bank wheat deal.

PHOSPHORESCENT EYES.

How They Light Up When Their Owner is in Love.

Take, says Shirley Dare, in a recent letter on beauty of the eyes, a young sensitive person of consumptive habit, in ordinary health and in love. Watch the eyes of such a one, and you will see as pretty a specimen of phosphoric light as that which plays about certain flowers in full bloom. The state of nervous excitement uses up the phosphorus of the body pretty fast, and it will flash behind the eyelids like the fire on summer waves. Botanists and other people have seen the mimic flashes a white lily three days blown will send from its petals on a warm electric summer night. I have seen as literal a flash leap between the eyelids of a lad of 25, dead in love as he could be with an absent woman. He was nervous, a trifle poetic and overstrung, his eyes dilated, changeful after glittering like a cat's. In short a human battery, overcharged with nervous electricity. In one case beside, that of an Italian actor, Rossi, I have noticed the same flash which appeared to leap from the eye, not play-like sheet lightning within it. But then Rossi was a highly electric as human beings are, in normal condition. Love and genius both are literally a combustion of nervous force, and the eye is the peep hole at the fire in the brain.

Steam-Heated Passenger Trains on the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad.

The stove as a means of heating cars on the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad will be entirely abolished.

During the past year the officials of the New York Central in charge of its passenger equipment have been actively employed in testing various devices for heating cars by means of steam obtained direct from the locomotive, and have decided on a system combining simplicity of construction and management with the most satisfactory results. A two-inch iron steam pipe runs under each of the cars, connection between the cars being made with a metallic joint and a sleeve. This main pipe connects with a system of pipes inside each car, one running lengthwise of the car, with branch pipes extending under the seats. At the centre of each of the interior pipes is a key by which the steam from the main pipes can be cut off, thus reducing the temperature of a single car without interfering with that of cars more distant from the locomotive, which is the source of the steam supply. Since the advent of cold weather all the cars composing the trains known as the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Vestibule Limited, and the New York, Chicago, Cincinnati & St. Louis fast express, besides a large number of the local trains running on the various parts of the road have been successfully heated by this means. All the drawing-room, sleeping and dining cars, passenger coaches, and the baggage, mail, express and postal cars in service on the line will be fully equipped with the steam-heating appliance.

A Ten Years' Mystery Yet Unravelled.

The death is announced of the wife of Mr. John McVey, Yarmouth, near St. Thomas. Deceased had been speechless for nine years; the death of her son, John, through an accident, and the disappearing of her daughter, Maggie McVey, in November, 1878, since which time no trace of her has been discovered, having worried her so much that she was stricken with paralysis. She was aged 71 years, 7 months and leaves a husband, two sons and four daughters, all of whom reside at home.

The Health of the Province.

On Thursday afternoon Dr. Bryce, Secretary of the Provincial Board of Health, visited Cooksville to ascertain the cause of the outbreak of typhoid fever there. The probable cause he found to be impure well water. Some of the wells were too close to the houses or were otherwise badly situated. In all, five cases have occurred there and one of them has proved fatal. No new cases of smallpox were reported yesterday.

Resenting an Insult.

Robinson-Jackson, I hear that Brown called you a liar last night.

Jackson (bitterly)—Yes, he called me a liar.

Robinson—And didn't you resent it?

Jackson (warmly)—Resent it? You bet I did! I told him that was simply a matter of opinion and not of fact. No man can call me a liar and get away with it.

Extenuating Circumstances.

Wife—I was so annoyed, my dear, today to find one of my pictures displayed in a photographer's shop window.

Husband—Why didn't you go upstairs and tell him to take it out?

Wife—I declare I didn't think of that and, besides, the picture is a very good one!

Rattlesnakes as Food.

It was said of a strong political partizan that he would swallow rattlesnakes if party interests demanded it. It is only men of this sort who, without protest, swallow the large, old-fashioned pills. Sensible people, requiring medicine to cleanse their systems, invariably use Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They are unrivalled in all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels.

How Far it Went.

Miss Westend—Oh, Miss Tiptop, is it true that while abroad you became engaged to the Duke of Oldcastle?

Miss Tiptop (reluctantly)—N—o, but my waiting-maid got acquainted with his valet.

In a missionary sermon in Chicago last Sunday the Rev. J. H. Barrows said that "along the Congo River a population equal to that of the United States is living amid a tropical luxuriance of vegetation on a soil that produces three crops of corn a year. The Rhenish mission in Herreroland has 2,500 baptised converts among a giant race of black herdsmen seven feet high, the tallest Christians on the globe."

John Guy Vassar's will bequeaths about $600,000 to various educational, charitable and religious institutions.

—If a man wants to get a good idea of the way his personal interests appear to the world in general he wants to go out of doors some still, calm night and look at the waning moon through the small end of the opera glasses.

IS MARRIAGE A FAILURE?

One View.

"Do you consider marriage a failure, madam?" was asked of a Chicago lady.

"No," she replied. "No, I do not, although I have been divorced five times. My little book here will show you why I do not regard marriage as a failure."

The reporter scanned its pages and found therein the following account:

Alimony payable, George W. Barrowly, of Indiana, $4,000; Henry F. Smithers, of Michigan, $1,500; Thomas C. Carleton, of California, $3,600; James H. Dawkers, of Tennessee, $1,900; Charles H. Wilkie, of Flordia, $5,000. Total, $16,000.—New York Sun.

Look Here.

Do you feel blue and despondent? Do pains rack and tear away at nerve and muscle, and have you been disappointed in finding a remedy that will afford certain and speedy relief? If so, go at once to any drug store and buy a sample bottle of Polson's Nerviline. Polson's Nerviline never fails to relieve neuralgia, cramps, headache, rheumatism, and all internal or external pains. J. B. Carman, druggist, Morrisburgh, writes: "All the parties I supply speak very favorably of Nerviline, and always purchase a second lot." Polson's Nerviline is sold in sample bottles at 10 cents; large size 25 cents—by all druggists and country dealers everywhere. Try a ten cent bottle.

An Honorary Member.

Tommy—My father is a church member.

Johnny—So's mine.

Tommy—But my father says your papa ain't, 'cos he don't never come to church, nor put nothin' in the collection box.

Johnny (bravely)—Well, my papa is an honorary member, and honorary members don't chip in.

"A Word to the Wise is Sufficient."

Catarrh is not simply an inconvenience unpleasant to sufferer and disgusting to others—it is an advanced outpost of approaching disease of worse type. Do not neglect its warning; it brings deadly evils in its train. Before it is too late, use Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It reaches the seat of the ailment, and it is the only thing that will. You may dose yourself with quack medicines 'til it is too late—'til the streamlet becomes a resistless torrent. It is the matured invention of a scientific physician. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

The Near Future.

Elderly Bride (to her husband)—Darling, when I begin to grow old and plain will you worship me as passionately as you do now?

Young Husband—Ah! dear, can you doubt me? Do you imagine for a moment that my love for you is so short-lived.

Style.

The most fashionable color at present, is the hue of health, and it will never go out of style. Its shades and tints are various, but all of them are exceedingly becoming. It is perfectly astonishing what a change is being daily wrought by Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription in the looks of sickly women. Sufferers from any sort of "female weakness" or irregularity, backache or nervous prostration, should give it trial. All druggists.

The corner-stone of the big Spreckle Sugar Refinery at Philadelphia was laid with appropriate ceremonies yesterdad afternoon.

The White House at Washington derives its name from the fact that the Virginia freestone, of which it is built, was painted white to conceal the discolorations caused by smoke and water.

There is only a distinction without a difference between an auburn haired sweetheart and a red headed wife.

HISTORY OF COLORADO.
By counties and sections. Complete statistics in regard to its mineral, agricultural, pastoral, timber land and water interests. All you want to know. Large book, well bound, mailed to any address on receipt of $1. $9 per doz. JOHN L. BISHOP & SON, Pueblo, Colorado.

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.
Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.
Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detroit, 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington, 1,216 at Boston, large classes of Columbia Law students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Prin. N.Y. State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

DON'T, 45 '8

FOR SALE,
A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,
WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR
All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the
TIMES PRINTING CO.
HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

DUNN'S BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1 50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,

Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, NOV. 51, 1888.

Complete returns of the late elections in the United States give Harrison (Republican) a large majority in the electoral council. Next March will see him occupying the presidential residence at Washington and a general scattering of Democratic office holders throughout that country. We have gone to a great deal of pains to secure a photograph of the President elect, a copyof whose picture we present herewith to our readers. It is a true likeness, and we leave it to students of physiognomy to study and speculate therefrom as to as to the ability of General Harrison to occupy with honor the high position in which he is about to be placed. For our part we would judge from his picture that he is a man of remarkably keen perception, studious, of a somewhat stubborn tendency, and a forceful character. The features remind one somewhat of the late General Grant. If his executive ability is as high as the latter's the Republicans may in all probability feel themselves safe for another 25 years.

And still the London horrors continue to be perpetrated right under the nose of the London police force, and they are powerless to discover the fiend in his ghoulish work. The body of "Jack the Ripper's" ninth victim was discovered on Friday morning last in a bedroom in Dorset street, Spitalfields, showing the same marvelous handiwork exhibited by the operator upon his former victims. London's chief of police, Sir Charles Warren, is enjoying holidays in Russia, while the murderer proceeds with his devilish work of murder, unchecked by what was formerly supposed to be the finest police force in the world. This is one of the strangest cases experienced in history, and places a deep stain of disgrace upon Scotland yard and the whole detective force which it will be no easy matter to eradicate. The mythical story of Dr. "Jekyl and Mr. Hyde" has even now been far eclipsed by this later homicidal monomaniac, as Dr. Warren designates him.

Locals.

The Globe Christmas Number.

Among the souvenirs of the coming Christmas season none will rank with the forthcoming Christmas Globe, a publication upon which will be lavished the resources of the artistic, literary and mechanical skill of the Dominion. There will be thirty-six pages, of the size of the Illustrated London News, printed from new type, on the very finest paper, and bound in handsome illuminated cover. All the literary matter has been prepared expressly for this number, and includes contributions from the ablest pens in the country. There will be a profusion of pictures, illustrating the stories, and sketches, and also three very fine colored pictures, the principal one a copy of Mr. L. R. O'Brien's picture of Vancouver Park, British Columbia. Orders for this paper should be placed early, as there is certain to be an enormous demand. Orders may be given through any newsdealer, or by sending to this office direct.

The Northern Business College.

Owen Sound is the proud possessor of a business training college which has, during the seven years it has been operating, secured a large and increasing patronage, and a most enviable reputation. We are personally acquainted with the principal, and know him to be a man of sterling integrity, deep knowledge, energy and ability. We can heartily recommend young men and women to Mr. Fleming's care, and guarantee that his painstaking tuition will be just what they require to fit them for the battle of life. See advertisement.

We have received from the Northern Business College, Owen Sound, a copy of their annual announcement, bound in cloth, a copy of their "Family Record," and a photo engraving from one of the prize specimens. The penmanship is wonderful, and Mr. Fleming will please accept our thanks.

Auction Sales.

An auction sale of farm stock and implements will be held on Lot 3, Con. 13, township of Osprey, on Friday, Nov. 23, 1888, sale to commence at 1 o'clock. John Speers & Co., auctioneers.

A credit sale of farm stock will be held on Thursday, Nov. 29, on lot 25, con. 8, township of Osprey, when a large number of cattle, horses, pigs, sheep, etc., will be disposed of. John Speers & Co., auctioneers.

A credit sale of farm stock, implements and household furniture will be held on Tuesday, Nov. 27th, on lot 20, con. 4, Osprey. Wm. Milne, proprietor; John Speers & Co., auctioneers.

The Huber & Atwood Company of specialists give an entertainment in Priceville on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 16 and 17. We commend the company to the Pricevilleites. They are worthy of patronage. They show in Markdale to-night (Thursday.)

Highest cash price paid for lard at Blakely & McConnell's.

Priceville Items.

We are all well in and around town, no diptheria, malaria, or typhoid fever among us. Of course this is due in a large measure to the clean, tidy state of our village.

It is often said by visitors from foreign countries, that the "Indian summer" is the most pleasant season of the year in Canada, and it is no except to the rule this year.

A large amount of ploughing is being done by the farmers in this vicinity, more than the avarage quantity.

Mr. R. B. Reily, late engineer in McGowan's flouring mill, who accompanied Mr. Geo. Louck and family to Algoma a couple of weeks ago, is back again. He does not speak very encouragingly of the Thessalon neighborhood.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

Kimberley is a matchless place for matches, taking in wedding matches and shooting matches, for the past few weeks. Monday, 5th inst., was the date of a very hot battle between captains J. Smith and E. Rear, the latter being victorious by eighty points.

Mr. T. Sherwood has moved into Kimberley, having purchased, and is going into the brick-making next season. Success Tom.

Miss E. A. Ellis has gone to Meaford, where she will remain for some time. Miss E. will be much missed here, especially in the choir, and as a worker in the Sunday School.

Miss M. E. Smith, of Flesherton, is visiting friends here.

Master Ed. Howe, who has been away in New Hampshire for about two and a half years, is visiting friends here.

Feversham.

From our own Correspondent.

Monday morning, November the 5th. The air is mild, but cool and pleasant. The loyalists of Feversham standing in the business houses seem to be meditating in profound contemplation over the "Gunpowder Plot," of which to-day is the 283rd anniversary, and also the 200th anniversary of the landing of William III., an event not less unimportant, because it marks the commencement of the extirpation of Popish domination in England.

Mr Bluiser, who was reproved for his bad behavior at the S. A. barracks on the past two Sundays, seems to have considered the reproofs of maternal source, and as a means of advancing his spiritual welfare, as he joined, body and soul, in their religious devotions, purchased a War Cry, and on his return home made the valleys of the beaver re-echo with laudable howlings of "Te Deum."

Mr. A. Houron has rented the Feversham mills, and is doing grand work. He solicits patronage.

There has been, during the past two weeks, as great a rage for chipmonk tails as there was for rats during the French Revolution.

We are pleased to see the smiling countenance of Mr. John Paul around again. He is speedily recovering from his long illness.

There was a raffle at Mr. W. Moffat's Wednesday of last week, which was successfully carried out by the Feversham boys, and a few others who slung up their chink deliberately and were very successful in capturing a large number of the feathered race, but through the shrewdness of some of the eighth liners they were left greatly in the minority of what they had gained, which is a distinguishing feature of theirs.

There seems to be a blissful attraction in matrimony, for one of our widowers who has been the possessor of two comely spouses, both of whom have passed from time into eternity, is striving almost incessantly to arrest a third virgin. We envy him not; we wish him success.

JIM.

[Unavoidably crowded out last week. Ed.

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

Messrs. Thomas Hawkins and Wm. Saigeon have gone to Sault St. Marie, with the intention of joining a camp of lumbermen and spending the winter in the pine woods of Northern Michigan.

Mr Akitt has put a new roof on his mill and made other needed repairs, in preparation for the winter's work.

Mrs. Woodburn, who has been away to Bloomfield, U. S., for a short time past, returned on Saturday looking somewhat improved in health. Her many friends will be glad to welcome her back.

Among other improvements in our thriving town we notice that Messrs. Fenwick and Akitt are having their houses weather-boarded. None too soon, as we were treated to quite a fall of the beautiful this morning as a warning that bleak winter is not far off.

I said some time ago we were going to have one of the finest churches in this part of the country, and my anticipations have been full verified so far. The work is now almost complete on the outside, with the exception of the vestibule. It is clad with white brick, and the building now presents quite an imposing appearance on top of the hill overlooking the town. Mr. Elijah Paul is the contractor, and he has accomplished his work with a masterly hand.

General News.

Mr. W. R. Meredith, Q. C., leader of the Ontario Opposition, is removing to Toronto.

James Scott, of the Township of Dawn, was murdered by his insane wife Thursday morning last.

Mayor Roche has refused to allow the Anarchists to parade in Chicago to commemorate the dead Anarchists.

Mr. W. A. Werratt, a Toronto barrister, narrowly escaped death from a dose of poison taken in mistake for medicine.

An attempt was made to wreck a train on the Stratford and Goderich branch of the Grand Trunk on Saturday night.

Railway Commissioner Martin, of Manitoba, is trying a new plan with the crossing of the Manitoba Southwestern branch of the C. P. R. by the Portage extension, simply notifying the company that the Government would make the crossing and submitting plans for the same. The plans are objected by the C. P. R.

Streetsville nimrods are very successful. The Review says that several who went to Muskoka returned with fourteen deer, and several bears. The Review is going to commence next week the publication of "Reminiscences of the hunt club."

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$6 00	to	6 00
Fall Wheat	$1 10	to	1 10
Spring Wheat	1 10		1 10
Barley	0 50		0 45
Oats	0 33		0 33
Peas	0 58		0 58
Butter	0 17		0 18
Eggs, fresh	0 17		0 17
Potatoes bush	0 25		0 25
Pork	600		6 00
Hay per ton	10 00		10 00
Hides	4 50		5 50
Wool	18		20
Sheepskins	0 50		1 00
Geese	0 05		0 05
Turkeys	0 7		0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25		0 30
Ducks per pair	0 50		0 60

NOTICE.

SHINGLES constantly on hand and for sale cheap. Just put in first-class new Chopping Mill—now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B SLOAN,
Eugenia.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

SALE Of Valuable Farm Property.

Under and by virtue of the power of sale contained in a mortgage made by Andrew C. McRae, default having been made in payment thereof, will be sold by PUBLIC AUCTION,

At Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton,

—ON—

Monday, Nov. 26th, 1888,

at 12 o'clock, noon, the following property, viz.

Lot No. 7 in the 2nd Concession, Township of Euphrasia in the County of Grey, containing by admeasurement 100 acres more or less. This is a fine hardwood bush lot, and is about nine miles from Flesherton. The sale will be subject to a reserve bid.

TERMS—one-half cash, balance secured by mortgage payable in from one to five years at option of purchaser.

A deposit of $100 to be paid at time of sale.

For further particulars apply to

STAUNTON & OHEER,
Vendors Solicitors,
Or to R. J. SPROULE, ESQ.,
Auctioneer, Flesherton.

Nov. 7, 1888

It Pays To

Go to THE BEST

AND THAT IS THE

Northern Business College, OF OWEN SOUND

The best and most practical course of study.
The best teaching staff.
The best accommodation for students.
The best methods of instruction.
The best results to our students.
Unsurpassed facilities.
Each student's graduate.
For circular and full information regarding the course of study to pursue, address
C. A. FLEMING, Principal.

Owen Sound, Nov. 1st, 1888

Farm for Sale

The subscriber offers for sale that valuable property on the 4th line, Osprey, better known as lot 1 containing 125 acres, 90 cleared and 60 under cultivation, the remainder pasture and meadow. New frame barn, stone foundation, stables, etc., new frame house, cellar, and stone foundation. This is a magnificent property. Possession immediately. For terms, etc., apply to

A. McKENZIE, Maxwell P. O.

Blacksmith Shop for Sale or Rent.

The blacksmith shop, known as Adison's, on the 4th line, Artemesia, about 3½ miles from Flesherton, is offered for sale or to rent. For terms and particulars apply to

DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Eugenia P. O.

Butcher Business for Sale.

A good paying butcher business is offered for sale in Flesherton, five and six beeves killed each week, besides small animals. To an enterprising man this is a first-class opportunity for securing a nice business. For further particulars apply to

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
butchers, Flesherton.

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
PURVEYORS TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Dealers in fresh and cured meats, sausage (our own make), lard, bologna, etc. etc

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only $4 per hundred.

Call and ascertain prices, whether you buy or not.

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT and PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on

EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

SALESMEN WANTED for the New England Nurseries, established over 30 years. The old reliable nursery. Men with push, energy, good habits and clean character always succeed. We can give you good pay and steady work. Write for terms to CHASE BROTHERS' COMPANY, Nurserymen, Colborne, Ont.

FARM for SALE

Being part of Lot No. 10 Con. 5, Euphras containing fifty acres. The above property situated about one-and-a-half miles from the village of Kimberley, all under cultivation an magnificent land.

Apply to
A. ALDOUS
Kimberley P.

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAFTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts, and those North of Durham Road a Specialty.

Medical.

DR. CARTER.

L.C.P.S., ONT.

PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.

FLESHERTON.

Office, Strain's new Residence, Main St.

Partnership.

E. F. HIXON, M.D.C.M. J. G. HUTTON, M.D.C.M.

Physicians, Surgeons, &c., &c.

PRICEVILLE.

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.

Graduate of the Royal College of Dental Surgeons.

Will visit FLESHERTON Monday in each month, commencing the First Monday in March, and remain the following week. Those desiring artificial teeth inserted will find it to their advantage to call at this time. Charges moderate.

Head Office, 262 Yonge St., Toronto.

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST.

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.

Flesherton each trip on the day following

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office, Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER in B. R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent for purchase and sale of lands. Appraiser for C. L. C. Com and P. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. Issuer of MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Town or Farm Property,

S. JAMIESON,
Flesherton.

W. J. BELLAMY,

TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT, &C

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance effected in first-class companies. Money to lend on lowest rates

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any pary of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavetroughing, and in fact every thing in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts

—NEW—

FALL GOODS!

—AT THE—

Central Store,

Pricеville.

Having received our Fall stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have confidence in a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well bought article.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and comprises something good and serviceable for Men and Boys in fact

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

still continue unapproachable. Our motto being: Good Goods and Low Prices. Come and see us.

General Store, Pricеville.

A. McCABE.

FLESHERTON

Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Binders,	Grain Drills,
Reapers,	Broad-cut Seeders,
Mowers,	Spring Tooth Harrows,
Rakes,	Iron Harrows,
Waggons,	Two-Furrow Gang Plow,
Buggies,	Plows,
Sleighs,	Scufflers,
Cutters,	Turnip Drills,
Fanning Mills,	Land Rollers.
Spring Tooth Cultivators.

FLOUR, FLOUR, STONE FLOUR!

MR. P LOUCKS

Is prepared to do your Gristing on short notice and grinds on the old terms of every twelfth bushel. Seven cents per bag of two bushels for Chopping, done every day. The Little Mill is big in the estimation of the public.

Satisfaction Guaranteed.

P. LOUCKS, Proprietor.

Good stabling for horses.

Collingwood Collegiate Institute.

RE-OPENS JANUARY 7, 1889

STAFF—W. Williams, B. A., English, French and German, J. H. Brethour, B.A. Classics; L. Cox, B. A., Mathematics; W. H. Stevens, B.A. Science; T. H. McGwil, B. A. Commercial. Record of 1887, Six matriculants, two first B's, nine first C's, (highest in the Province), twenty-three seconds, twenty-one thirds, besides others at minor examinations. The school makes a specialty of teacher's work, and during the past eleven years has passed 86 firsts (9 A's, 6 B's, 71 C's,) 439 seconds, 305 thirds; or a grand total of 883. It is also fully equipped for Junior Matriculation and the professional examinations.

Send for announcement to

WM. WILLIAMS, Principal

Collingwood, Oct. 22, 1888.

WANTED! At once. Local and traveling agents for our goods. Liberal commissions, or salary and expenses, to competent and reliable men. For terms and full particulars, address.

J. F. LECLARE, Nurseryman,
Brighton, N. Y.

FREE $85 solid GOLD WATCH Sold for $100 until lately. Best $85 watch in the world. Perfect timekeeper. Warranted. Heavy Solid Gold Hunting Cases. Elegant and magnificent. Both ladies' and gents' sizes with works and cases of equal value. ONE PERSON in each locality can secure one FREE. How is this possible? We answer—we want one person in each locality, to keep in their homes, and show to those who call, a complete line of our valuable and very useful HOUSEHOLD SAMPLES. These samples, as well as the watch, we send free, and after you have kept them in your home for 6 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property. It is possible to make this great offer, sending the SOLID GOLD watch and COSTLY samples free, as the showing of the samples in any locality, always results in a large trade for us; after our samples have been in a locality for a month or two we usually get from $1000 to $5000 in trade from the surrounding country. This, the most wonderful offer ever known, is made in order that our samples may be placed at once where they can be seen, all over America. Write at once, and make sure of the chance. Reader it will be hardly any trouble for you to show the samples to those who may call at your house and your reward will be most satisfactory. A postal card on which to write us costs but 1 cent and after you know all, if you do not care to go further, why no harm is done. But if you do send your address at once, you can secure FREE one of the finest solid gold watches in the world and our large line of COSTLY SAMPLES. We pay all express, freight, etc. Address GEO. STINSON & CO., Box 488, PORTLAND, MAINE.

Buy a new

HARNESS

PURCHASE A

SLEIGH ROBE

INVEST IN

A new Whip

BIG DISCOUNT

—FOR—

C-A-S-H

D. Clayton

HARNESSMAKER,

FLESHERTON.

is prepared to give you large DSCOUNTS for CASH on all kinds of harness, whips, blankets, etc.

A

Huge Stock!

—OF—

SINGLE, TEAM, AND DRIVING HARNESS, on hand.

Sleigh Bells, Robes, Whips, Hoof Ointment, Axle Grease, Curry Combs, Brushes, and everything required in the line of harness makers' supplies.

WE ALSO DEAL IN A SUPERIOR QUALITY

—OF—

TRUNKS

CALL and EXAMINE our extra large stock before buying anything in these lines elsewhere.

D. CLAYTON.

N. B.—My accounts are now ready and waiting for settlement. As I am in great need of money, all persons who are indebted to me are requested to call and settle, ON OR BEFORE DEC. 1st, otherwise their accounts will be placed in other hands for collection.

D. Clayton.

For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON.

We talked of English homes, and lanes, and fields, and gardens, and our Scotch lady friend grew poetic in her description of the bonnie hills and braes, the daisies and the heather, which she loved and left in childhood's days, and while we anti-dated our joys our Irish friend who had left the Green Isle forty years ago, a raw Irish lad, came and sang to us in sweetly plaintive strains :

If England was my place of birth
I'd love her tranquil shore;
If bonnie Scotland was my home
Her mountains I'd adore;
For happy days in both I've spent,
And hope for days to come,
Then steer my bark for Erin's Isle
For Erin is my home.

The following Sunday morning we sighted the north coast of Ireland and before noon were opposite the signal station from whence our arrival would be telegraphed to Liverpool and New York.

Passing the entrance to Loch Foyle, with its stirring memories of the old city of Derry, we next came in sight of the Giant's Causeway, that remarkable formation of rocks which used to rank as one of the seven wonders of the world. For eight miles along the coast the cliffs rise from 400 to 550 feet high, and have the appearance of immense architectural structures, being composed of basalt rock regularly arranged, supporting platforms upon which other columns rise tier on tier, with wonderful order and uniformity in size and shape. This appearance suggested the idea of structural design, but of such magnitude that the human races now were but pigmies compared to the builders of these rocks, hence the name Giant's Causeway.

Next morning we were waiting for the tide outside the bar of Mersey river, and walking early on deck we noticed the body of a man floating past us in the water, seen a few moments then gone forever. What a host of queries it suggested! Every human being has a history. What was his, and how came he there? Perhaps some loved ones in some cottage home wait in vain for his return; may be the door is left on the latch and through long nights wakeful ears listen for his footsteps, or as the village postman winds his horn, hearts beat quickly in faint hopes for the letter that is to tell where the long lost one is.

Steaming up the river we enter the busiest shipping harbor in the world. On our right, New Brighton and Birkenhead; on our left, the city of Liverpool, with her seven miles of magnificent docks, with ships from all parts of the world. A tender came alongside and passengers and baggage were transferred to it and soon we were on the landing stage, but could not say we were on terra firma, as it is a huge floating structure rising and falling with the tides, but is of such magnitude as to accomodate a number of extensive buildings for railway and steamboat offices, custom offices, freight houses, etc.

It was the middle of August, and a little band of voyageurs from that horrible cold and snow-bound country called Canada, we were surprised to see more ladies wearing furs, and men with overcoats, than we had seen for months before leaving Canada.

"This looks solid and is like the English Character," remarked a young American who, on his first visit to England, walked up into the city with us and noted the massive stone buildings, warehouses, shipping offices, etc., adjacent to the docks. We parted with our fellow voyageurs with some regrets and were left with one only, a gentleman from Toronto, and having the day before us strolled through some of the principal business streets and noted in the crowds of pedestrians the wonderful variety of nationalities and races represented here sailors and merchants from almost every part in the world.

Liverpool is the largest cotton market in the world, and may perhaps claim an equal pre-eminence as a wool market. The trade in grain and all other breadstuffs is enormous; more than half the exports of the entire kingdom are from this port.

We entered a large market called St. John's, covering about two acres. The immense roof supported by 116 pillars. The busiest part of the day was over, and a walk through showed us one of the important advantages of living in a large seaport, the distributing centre of the world's products. The large variety of fruits, not only of English growth, but of every clime, were spread in tempting abundance and offered at very low prices. the large quantities of cut flowers for sale in bunches, bouquets and wreaths, evidenced a very large demand, and the general taste and love for this "myrtle." In the quadrangle formed by the exchange buildings and the city hall there is a very remarkable monument erected in honor of Lord Nelson. At the four angles of the base are seated large statues of half nude men, manacled, and each in attitude of sorrow. Above them are representations in medallion relief scenes of four memorable naval battles. This is surmounted by figures in bronze about ten or twelve feet in height, the central one of which is the one armed hero, Nelson, who in the act of cheering his men has just received his death wound. Above and behind him a tall angelic figure of Victory holds a laurel wreath above his head as if in the act of placing it on his brow. Below and peeping from the folds of the drapery is a grim death's head and skeleton arm is stretched upwards, and with clutching bony fingers spread over Nelson's left breast. This is only one of the many costly monuments we saw in England erected to Nelson's memory.

We next visited St. George's Hall, the most celebrated public building in Liverpool. It is on an elevation and in a fine open space surrounded with elegant and costly public buildings. It is in pure Corinthian style, with massive columns on every side, each one like a solid block of turned stone 45 feet high; on the north side there are two fine equestrian figures of the Queen and Prince Albert, and it seems marvellous that such masses of stone could be supported on the three slender legs of the horses, the fourth being raised in the act of stepping. Two stone lions by the celebrated sculptor Flax, larger than elephants in bulk, are placed on pedestals facing Lime Street.

To be continued.

Mr. A. M. Tyson shot a deer on Tuesday of last week about two miles from Wiarton, that weighed three hundred pounds. This is the largest deer that has ever been killed on the Peninsula. [Wiraton Echo.

You Carry

A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."

Here is an instance of

A Physician

who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:

"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."

John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

Ayer's Pills,

PREPARED BY

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Sold by all Druggists.

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

is where can they get their flour, feed, and provisions cheapest in town.

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S.

All kinds of meal always on hand.

TO THE FARMERS AND PUBLIC GENERALLY:

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH!

at all hours of the day, ONLY 15 cts. All other lines in stock as usual.

The peoples faithful servant,

G. H. BLACKBURN.

Remember the place—Next door to M. Richardson's

J. E. MOORE,

Maker and dealer in

ALL KINDS OF

HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE

Durham Street,

Flesherton,

Special attention is called to our

FALL STOCK!

Which is now complete. For variety, quality and prices we are able to eclipse all former efforts. We are selling

BEDSTEADS

At from $2 each.

A really handsome Bedstead at $3.

WASHSTANDS

At from $1.50, and

B-U-R-E-A-U-S-!

At $6.

Making the whole furniture for a bedroom, including a chair, less than $10.

CHILDREN'S CRADLES,
COTS,
CRIBS,

In a number of styles and at equally low prices. In

BEDDING

We are making a specialty just now, by offering a good Spring Mattress at $1.50. Woven wire Mattresses at $2.50. Good quality of sea grass Mattress at $3.

Tables. Tables. Tables.

Kitchen and Dining Tables, Parlor and Sewing Tables, Music and Fancy Tables, in fact tables to suit every taste and for every conceivable purpose.

One New Karn Organ for Sale.

Very cheap. Agent for the celebrated

New Raymond

Sewing Machine, a number of which are to be seen at our showrooms. Remember the place,

J. E. Moore,

Flesherton Furniture Warerooms, Durham Street, Flesherton.

Our Undertaking Department is A 1. Good hearse and good horses in connection. Charges moderate.

The Tired Wife.

All day I had the wife been toiling,
From an early hour in the morn
And her hands and feet were weary
With the burdens that they had borne,
But she said to herself, "The trouble
That weighs on my heart is this—
That Tom never thinks to give me
A comforting hug or a kiss.

"I am willing to do my duty
And use all my strength and my skill
In making the home attractive,
In striving my place to fill.
But though the approval of conscience
Is sweet, I am free to say,
That if Tom would give me a hug and a kiss
I would take all the time away.

And I counted over and over
The years she had been Tom's wife,
And thought of the joys and sorrows
She had known in her married life.
To be sure there was money plenty,
And never a lack of food,
But a kiss now and then and a word of praise,
Would have done her a world of good.

All unwary a one is longing
For words that are never said
And many a heart goes hungry
For more than bread.
But Tom had an inspiration,
And when he went home that day,
He petted his wife and kissed her
In the old time lover like way.

And she—such enigmas are women—
Who had held herself up with pride
At her husband's display of fondness,
Just hung on his neck and cried
And he, by her grief reminded
Of troubles he might have shared,
Said: "Bless my heart what a fool I've been,
And I didn't suppose you cared."

BELINDA: A BEAUTY

All she tells her stories well; dramatizing a scene in Spanish here, throwing in some caustic bit of mimicry there, keeping her characters vivid and living before her audience, always.

"We have had enough, more than enough scandal," cried Rose at last. "You have quite taken my breath away, Belinda. These may be the moralities of foreign watering-places, the subjects of foreign conversation, but they are not English. I declare, when we were girls we did not know the meaning of evil!"

"How hard of comprehension you must have been, my dear," observes Belinda, cheerfully. "I suppose that was in the innocent days when you first met Captain Temple?"

The taunt makes Roger himself wince. The innocent days when he first whispered his passion to old Shelmadeane's young wife beside the hippopotamus!

"You are severe this evening, Belinda," he remarks coldly. "You make no distinction between friend and foe. Rose, my dear," bending over the widow and whispering—yet not so low but that Belinda's ear can catch every lover-like syllable—"is it not late for you to be out, after all the fatigues of your journey? Let me take you back to the hotel, dearest. You look pale."

"Oh, but Belinda," says Rose generously, and making a feint of quitting her lover's arm. "Don't anybody think of me! See Belinda home first."

"Thanks, very much, Rose," cried the girl. "As Belinda has been seeing herself home (only she never had a home) during the last four years, she will probably be quite capable of doing the same to-night."

"If—if I may be allowed?" And Mr. Jones puts himself forward in obedience to a glance he received from Rose. "It is too late for Miss O'Shea to pass through the town without an escort."

"Miss O'Shea has got Costa for her escort," begins Belinda, with her usual sturdy independence, then abruptly she discovers that Roger Temple is watching her face, and a new freak of perversity takes possession of her. "Miss O'Shea has got Costa, but she will be only too glad of your protection, now and at all times, Mr. Jones!"—smiling affectionately at Jones with her lips, and mocking him, ridiculing him, despising him with her eyes.

"You will see if that is not a match," remarks Rose, as the two figures walk away together in the moonlight

CHAPTER VII.

MAMMON WINS HIS WAY.

They walk for a considerable time in silence, Belinda and Mr. Jones. At last, "I hope you have forgiven me for not feeding Costa on maccaroons?" whispers the young man, pressing her unresponsive hand ever so little to his side.

"Do you, Mr. Jones—why?" She accepts his arm out of sheerest perversity, and because she guessed that certain eyes were watching her; but her heart feels wicked against poor Augustus, wicked against the whole bright world which forms a background for Roger Temple and for Rose. "When I know people detest me, I would much rather be without their forgiveness than with it."

Not an encouraging answer for a man on the eve of proposing. But Mrs. O'Shea's wary arts during that starlight conversation on the terrace have brought up Mr. Jones' resolution to the sticking point. So much familiar talk of Lady Althea and Lord Lionel "Belinda's nearest relations, Mr. Jones—the people, whenever our dear Belinda does settle in London, with whom she and her husband must be constantly and intimately thrown"—so much familiar talk, I say, about possible cousins in the peerage, not unmingled with suggestions that, in our dear Belinda's position, a happy early union, rather than large settlements is what Rosie's step-maternal heart yearns after, has made Mr. Jones resolute to win or give up all to-night.

He does not love, he sees no remotest chance of bringing himself to love this meagre, dark-skinned, bitter-tongued mite of an earl's granddaughter. But Jones is not a man to be turned from any project, commercial or matrimonial, by obstacles so paltry as personal likes or dislikes. The earliest sacred truth instilled into his childish soul, his highest mature conception of moral law, is that Christians and Englishmen should buy in the cheapest market whatever article they require. He, Jones, requires the article birth; has hunted it up and down many English watering-places, as men of the Cornelius O'Shea genus hunt money; and now has it under his hand, to be bought for a song (did not Rosie wisely throw in the hint about modest settlements?) the only difficulty being as to the article's consent. But after sunning himself in the widow's smile, and listening to the widow's silky flatteries during the past hour and a half, Mr. Jones cannot but feel that he is a very captivating fellow, indeed, in women's eyes, and entertain but little fears as to that.

"I have never been fortunate enough to find you at home yet, Miss O'Shea." He makes this next attempt at tender talk just as they reach the Maison Lohobiague, on the third floor of which Miss Burke and Belinda lodge. "I should like," sentimentally, "to see the apartment where you spend your time, if I might?"

It seems to him that the task of bringing her to terms will be easier of accomplishment indoors than out. Never yet has he seen Belinda between four walls, and the idea strikes him that she may prove more manageable within a restricted space; like a squirrel in a cage, a colt within a pound, or any other inferior animal whom it is man's supreme pleasure to tame and subjugate.

"The apartment where I spend my time. Burke's den! Well, if you want to see it, you had better use your legs and walk up now. Miss Burke, as you know, is away; our servant—actually we have a servant, Mr. Jones, just to set our soup going of a morning—went off to the bull fight at Fontarabia yesterday and has not appeared since. So you must not expect to see things in apple-pie order."

She quits his arm, bestows a series of hugs and farewells on Costa—the poor old dog, well-trained, stopping discreetly three or four paces away from Miss Burke's threshold—then vanishes out of sight beneath an overhanging stone portecochere or archway, whither Mr. Jones, his dapper feet tortured by the stones, his yellow-kidded hands extended to save his nose from collision with the wall, follows her.

The dark, winding staircase seems trebly dark after the intense moonlight of the streets; and Mr. Jones, a careful man not only as regards moral but bodily risks, pauses at the bottom.

"Come along, if you are coming," rings out Belinda's voice from airy heights overhead. There is plenty of light when once you get up here, only look out after your shins meanwhile."

The "plenty of light" proceeds from a solitary oil lamp, which sheds its dim, religious rays before the figure of a saint on the landing of the second floor.

"We live one story higher still," says Belinda, Mr. Jones stopping to turn up his British nose at this work of sacerdotal art.

"And unless Juanita happens to have left a candle, I shall have to entertain you in the dark. However, there is the moon."

"And and the brightness of your eyes, Belinda!" says Jones, groping his way up the steep staircase after her.

"And what?" shouts the girl sharply, through the darkness. "There is such an echo, Mr. Jones—no hearing a word unless you speak more distinctly. What did you say would light us?"

But something, either in the tone of her voice or in the distance that separates them, restrains Mr. Jones from again launching into the hazardous region of compliment.

Half ajar stands a huge oaken door blackened with time, crusted with dirt, a door as old, probably, as the solid masonry of the house. On a vigorous push from the girl's hand, it creaks slowly back upon its hinges and Mr. Jones is introduced to "Burke's den," a room bigger than Isle of Wight church, the roof joisted and innocent of all modern refinement of lath and plaster, the walls of the indescribable smokey grey of ages. Vast pictures of saints and martyrs in different stages of burning or mutilation, French studies, probably after Ribera, exaggerations, nightmares of that master's most expulsive realism, hang around. Saints and cobwebs may, indeed, be said to furnish the room. Of furniture proper there is—a table that was once carved and gilt, now in the last stage of rickety decay, and of which one leg is propped up by a pile of battered books; a lofty pier glass, overdim with antiquity for purposes of reflection; three crippled chairs, piled pell-mell at the present moment in a corner; and a shelf containing in all about twelve pieces of crockery, of different sizes and patterns

Mr. Jones looks around him, open-mouthed, Belinda having been fortunate enough to find a candle whose solitary light barely pierces from end to end of the sombre shadowy room

"And you—you live here!" he exclaims, with unaffected amazement. "What a place—what pictures! It gives one the horrors to look at them."

"Well, yes—the Maison Lohobaigue is not furnished according to Clapham taste," retorts Belinda, with her frank impertinence. "But it suits me better. I like the old, shabby room, Mr. Jones, and the 'orrid pictures and the cobwebs; yes, and I should be very sorry to exchange them for any stuccoed cockney gentility. I have lived here two years off and on; Miss Burke has made it a sort of headquarters in all her comings and goings, and I have grown to the place. If Burke would only get killed on a railway or made a professoress, or anything, I should be quite content to stop in the Lohobaigue with Costa always!"

And now Augustus feels is the time for him to crush down on this poor pauper child with the magnificence of his offer. "Miss O'Shea—Belinda," he cries, coming up beside her very close, "there is no necessity for you to spend your days in these miserable foreign places any longer. Since I saw you this afternoon I—ahem—I have been talking to your mamma."

"Step-mamma. If you are not accurate you are nothing."

"And I have made my mind up! I have made my mind up, fully," says Jones, with magnanimity, "as to my line of conduct. There may seem, there are disparities." He glances with an air of condescension at the girl's dress, at the appointments of the meagre room. "Still, as Mrs. O'Shea says, six months of the first educational advantages in England would work wonders, and, at our age, we can afford to wait, can we not?"

"I should answer better if I had a glimmering notion of what you mean by 'we.' Are you going to school again, Mr. Jones? Mind your 'h's,' you know, if you do."

"Belinda," his voice shakes, his color rises. (How hideous he is, communes Belinda with herself! How the mosquito-bites glow and radiate from out that purple blush!) "Do you think you ever—I mean, I know I never——" confound it all, why will the girl fix those hard eyes of hers upon his face!—"never saw any one so likely to make me happy. Oh, come, you mustn't take your hand away——" which she does, with unmistakable energy, the moment she feels his touch. "I will not let you go till you answer me. Belinda, could you ever care for me enough to be my wife?"

"You are a more complete fool than I took you for, Mr. Jones. If you really want me, me to marry you, why not say so like a rational being, instead of stammering and hesitating and blushing like a schoolboy ashamed to tell the truth?"

Mr. Jones stands silently recovering his nerve after the plunge. "It will, I know, meet the wishes of Mrs. O'Shea and of Captain Temple," he remarks at last, almost humbly.

"What will?"

"Our marriage, Belinda."

"Did they tell you so?"

"Mrs. O'Shea led me to believe——"

"Rose leads everybody to believe everything. And he—Captain Temple?"

"It can be no interest of Captain Temple's to put himself in the way of your settlement, I should say."

She turns from him, she walks quickly to the further end of the room; a certain dignity, a child though she be, in every movement of her poor little ragged figure. Then she comes back to the young man's side and looks steadily with her honest eyes into his.

"A thing like this cannot be decided in a moment, Mr. Jones. If you want really and truly to marry me, you must, I suppose, have some good reasons for doing so. That is not my business, however. Every one is free to have his own crotchets about happiness! But what I do want to know, and what I dare say you can tell me, is—why should I marry you?

"I should hope, a little because you like me," suggests Augustus, trying with imperfect success to throw a lover-like warmth into his voice. "That is the reason, generally, I believe, for which young ladies accept men."

"Is it, indeed? I thought liking had nothing whatever to do with such things. I thought the lover said, 'I can afford such a house, a carriage, servants, diamonds, on condition that you take me for a husband!' And then that the young lady reckoned up the sweets and the sour together, and answered yes or no, according to whether she found the bargain good."

"Is that the kind of a way you wish me to address you, Miss O'Shea?"

"It is the best way for you to address me if you want to get a sensible answer, Mr. Jones."

She perches herself on a corner of the rickety table, tilts her hat back on her head, and swinging her sandalled feet to and fro in the air, begins—as coolly as though she was scoring up the points at paume—to reckon the items of the projected "bargain."

"Carriage, so much; diamonds, so much; house, so much. We will begin with the house. How large a house, exactly, should you and I have to live at Clapham?"

"I am not joking, and you are," replied Jones, sullenly. "Of course if you do not choose to take the thing seriously, I have nothing more to say."

"Well, would you mind my having my supper first? I am as hungry as a wolf, sir! Burke leaves me on a kind of board wages when she goes off literaturing, and I have not eaten a mouthful since your maccaroons. You will not mind? Thanks. And while I eat, you know, you can make yourself agreeable, tell me all the delightful projects you and Rosie have been laying out for my future welfare."

Belinda's supper consists of a big slice of household bread, and another rather bigger one of melon, washed down by cold water. Having produced these refreshments from the shelf, which at once answers as dresser, larder and pantry, she resumes her former place on the corner of the table, and unincumbered by knife, fork, or plate, sups.

"I cannot imagine what put it into your head to think of me, Mr. Jones. Oh, I know why you came to St. Jean de Luz; of course Rosie planned your tour for you! But what first put it into your head to think of me in that sort of light?" For a moment her long eyelashes shade her cheek, the cheek that neither pales nor reddens under his gaze. "I have not made myself over-and-above civil to you, have I?"

"Well, no, not anything very particular," Mr. Jones asserts.

"And I am sure I am not what you, with your fastidious tastes, would think lady-like"—oh! the curl, imperceptible perhaps to Augustus, of her upper lip!—"nor what any one," with a thoroughly sincere sigh this, "would think pretty. Now what in the name of Heaven, can make you wish to marry me?"

"I—I because I love you," begins Jones, stammering.

"Tell that blague to some one else," interrupts the girl with sudden passion, "not to me! If you loved me, I should feel it here!" clasping her graceful brown hands to her breast, "just as I feel that Costa loves me, and I would marry you—yes, even you—to-morrow out of gratitude, and if you had only a hundred a year instead of all the thousands you talk of. But you do not. You care no more for me than I for you, and so——"

"And so I suppose you will not marry me," says Jones, with mortification that he would fain hide under an air of banter.

Belinda hesitates—looks away from him. She is a child, with all a child's instinctive craving for the sweets of liberty; but she is a Bohemian as well, with all a Bohemian's keen appreciation of money, and what money will bring. It would—it would be sweet, she feels, to wear finer dresses, richer jewels than Rosie's, to invite Rosie and Captain Temple condescendingly to dinner, lend them one's opera box, take them for a drive occasionally in one's carriage. And then to bid good-bye forever to Miss Burke! The thought of Augustus Jones as a life-companion may be hideous, but half its hideousness vanishes, surely, if one remembers this—he would replace Miss Burke.

"I am certain I shall make you wretched, Mr. Jones; but as you seem, you and Rosie, to have set your minds on this engagement—stop, though, I must ask one thing first: is your name on the door-plate, I mean of the Clapham villa? That I could not stand."

"My name—on a door-plate?" says Jones, as indignantly as though the blood of all the Howards ran in his veins. "Why, what do you take me for? No one but professional men, apothecaries, or that sort of thing, ever ticket their names outside on a door-plate."

"Well, then, I could never suit you nor you me, the whole thing is preposterous; still, if you would like to try it, just as an experiment——"

He rushes forward rapturously.

"Oh, I thank you—very much obliged, indeed!" Belinda springs upon her feet and puts herself in a not altogether unscientific attitude of self-defence. "We may be engaged if you like, but I will have no fooleries of that kind. Do you hear me—I will not! Mr. Jones, you shall never kiss me."

And then, quick as thought itself, flashes on her the remembrance of the moment when her eyes first met Roger's this afternoon, of the hour spent with Roger alone under the stars, of the moment when he praised her—ah, with praise how unlike the fulsome compliments of this legitimate lover!—and when vanity, shame, and minglement of feelings such as her life had never known before, held her dumb.

"Never kiss you! Not even when we are married, I suppose?" remarks Mr. Jones, unwisely jocular.

"Married—who talks of being married?" cries Belinda; such mutiny against her own weakness, such disdain, such mockery of her captor in her eyes!

"You talked a moment ago about trying the experiment, did you not?"

"I said that we might try being lovers—no, not lovers either—that we might try being engaged; and I keep to it. You are going away to visit the Pas de Roland, you know, to-morrow—"

"Not now. I shall have no spare time for sight-seeing now," interrupts Augustus, amatively.

"Why not? Because Rose is here? Oh, Rose has quite enough on her hands without you. You will go to the mountains to-morrow, and you will stay away four days, as you intended, and admire every waterfall and rock and ruin Murray bids you. By that time I shall be used to the thought of—of Clapham, perhaps. Miss Burke will be back for one thing, and I shall have had a good deal," with a sigh, this, "of Rose. I shall feel better disposed toward any change. Mr. Jones, if you will promise never, as long as you live, to kiss me, I dare say I shall not be very sorry to see you come back."

And not one other warmer word or promise can Augustus wring from her. She will try being engaged, minus love-making, as an experiment; and if he will promise never as long as he lives to kiss her, perhaps after four days' absence she may not be very sorry to see him return.

So much for his present chance of an alliance with the noble family of Vansittart

CHAPTER VIII.

VANITY VERSUS CONSCIENCE.

Mrs. Augustus Jones. Belinda Jones. Mr. and Mrs. Jones, Clapham.

So Belinda, when she is alone, rings every possible change upon her future titles as a matron, and finds each tuneless. But then the diamonds! reflection that ere this has governed the conduct of so many a wiser, older, better woman.

Wistfully gazing through the open window at the sky, Belinda thinks of the remote Belgravian days when her papa was in the first delightful flush of Rose's money the days of dinner parties and balls, when even she, Belinda, wore pretty frocks, and occasionally tasted the society of lovely, bare-necked beings, with flowers in their hair, silken trains, fans, lovers, instead of watching them forlornly from without, as she did to-night. How would she look bare-necked, with flowers in her hair, with a train, a fan, lovers? How if she should attempt a rehearsal of the effect (lovers excepted) with such rough materials as she may have at hand!

Miss Burke, as it chances, has left the key of her travelling-case in the lock alas, the frame of mind for wrong-doing given, and when does the demon opportunity fail any of us?—and in Miss Burke's travelling-case lies, neatly folded, that lady's black silk dress. In shorter time than it has taken me to write, Belinda, candle in hand, glides into the adjoining room, the sanctuary of Miss Burke's maiden charms, opens the case, gazes, vacillates—handles!

The skirt is too long, for Miss Burke is of loftier stature than herself. So much the grander will be her train. And the sleeves must be tucked up, and the bodice pinned down, and white lace, also of Miss Burke's, added here and there, for lightness. She collects together such dislocated sewing implements as the household can boast, with absorbed interest stitches down a fold here, puckers up a plait there; finally skips lightly out of her own dingy, Cinderella frock, and a minute later stands radiant in the majesty of rustling silk, short sleeves, bare throat, and train—a young lady.

She is not an ugly girl, after all. So much the tarnished glass upon Miss Burke's dressing-table assures her promptly. Her neck and shoulders look lily fair, compared to the sun-tan of her face; her arms are delicately fashioned and tolerably plump for seventeen. But the pig-tails! She snatches off the hideous frayed out green ribbons, unplaits them, and behold! the ill kempt, neglected hair falls round her slender figure in waves of silky chestnut. A pair of gloves of Miss Burke's supplies an impromptu cushion, over which she coifs it high above her forehead, as the little Spanish blonde in pink (the blonde Roger Temple admired) was coifed to-night. A scarlet passion-flower wet with dew, from the balcony, finishes the picture.

Not ugly! Why, she is pretty already—a year or two hence will be admirably so, prettier than was even Rose in her prime thinks Belinda, gazing at her own transfigured self in a kind of rapture. The only thing she lacks now is jewelry—ear-rings, bracelets, a necklace for her throat; the Jones diamonds, in short. Pending the possession of these, could no substitute be found to give one some imperfect foreshadowing of their splendor?

On the landing of the second floor stands, as we know, the life-sized figure of a saint; martyred, satin-slippered, glittering with gorgeous paste adornments. If the good old Beata would only lend that necklace of hers for half an hour, ten minutes, long enough to yield some one faint foretaste of the sweets of brilliants! If—assuming her permission—one were to borrow it, say! The glass case can be opened by a cunning hand from the back. And no living soul is about; and it could not surely be much of a sin, considering that the saint is but a big wax doll with bead eyes.

She creeps down the echoing stone stairs, her heart beating, her unaccustomed feet entangling themselves at every movement in her trailing skirts; she reaches the landing of the second floor. There stands the Beata, her livid hands crossed on her breast, her bead eyes awfully wide open. There are the paste brilliants.

The cranky fastening of the glass door gives a groan as she opens it, causing Belinda's guilty conscience to quake again; but no ear save her own hears the sound. She unclasps the necklace, shivering as her fingers come in contact with the clammy wax throat; then bears away her booty, her legs trembling under her at every step upstairs. She takes it to the light of her solitary candle; admires its mock effulgence; clasps it, trembling, around her little warm soft neck; surveys herself on tiptoe in the tarnished mirror above the chimney-piece; and where is conscience now, where remorse?

She surveys herself, well nigh awe-stricken by her own fairness. She feels that to be the possessor of real diamonds she would cheerfully become Mrs. Augustus Jones, and start for Clapham to-morrow. Now, nothing is wanting but a fan and lovers. The fan can be had—a huge gilt and black structure, of the date of thirty years ago, which lies for ornament on the mantel-shelf—and of this Belinda possesses herself. But the lovers? Bah, some unimportant details are sure to be wanting at every rehersal.

She struts up and down the room, her train outstretched, her fan in motion, her eyes glancing complacently at the mignon little figure the glass gives her duskily back. "If Captain Temple could see me—if Captain Temple could see me now!" thinks vanity. "If he knew I could be anything but ragged, and hideous, and a gamin. And if he did know this, what would Captain Temple care?" says another sterner voice than that of vanity. "Of what account is the whole world to him by the side of Rose, and Rose's beauty?"

A sudden leaden weight sinks dead on Belinda's heart. She is nothing to Roger Temple; holds no more place in his present than in his future. She seems to stifle. The saint's paste diamonds must surely be too heavy, so painful is the choking feeling in her throat. Turning abruptly away from the sight of her finery and of herself, she extinguishes the candle; then goes out bare-armed, bare-necked, in her diamond necklace and train, upon the balcony.

It is now past midnight, and something like cooler air begins to stir across the sleeping country. Balmy sweet is the air; every floor of the vast old house has its balcony, every balcony its flowers; the sky is all a-quiver with stars; mountains, river, plains, are lying in one great hush of purple sleep. Belinda rests her arm against the iron balustrade, and, gazing away westward toward the rugged line of Spanish coast, muses.

Click, click! goes the sharp sound of a vesuvian, close, as it seems, beside Belinda's ear. She turns with a start, and there on the adjoining balcony, en robe de chambre, and placidly lighting his midnight pipe of peace, stands Roger Temple. Roger may breakfast with Rose, dine with Rose, walk with Rose, spend any number of hours during the day that he chooses alone with Rose; but it would be the acme of indiscretion for him to lodge under the same roof with her. Thus the widow well versed in the minutiæ of surface morals decides. And so—from Scylla to Charybdis—fate, and the landlord of the Hotel Isabella together, have contrived to lodge him under the same roof with Belinda.

Belinda sees him, grasps the whole dramatic capabilities of the situation in a moment, but gives no sign. Now, she feels, is a magnificent opportunity for her to act, and with a purpose! A glance at Roger Temple's face convinces her that he does not recognize Rose's vagrant, out-at-elbows step-daughter under the disguise of civilization. Now she will have a rare opportunity of arriving at a truth or two; now may she even test the practical worth of a "life-long fidelity," see if this devoted lover cannot be led into a passing flirtation—moonlight, loneliness, the certainty of the crime remaining undetected, favoring.

With an unconsciousness the most perfect she resumes her former attitude, and after a minute or two of silence sings, in that undertone for which we have no word in English, the whisper of singing, a stanza of the Mendicant Student serenade, familiar from one end of the Peninsula to the other.

Desde que soy estudiante,
Desde que llevo manteo,
No he comido manjar sopas
Con suelas de zapatero.

She has a sweet, a sympathetic voice in posse, like the beauty of her face; and melody and voice alike harmonize deliciously with every external accessory of the scene.

"Brava, brava!" exclaims Roger, when she has finished. "That first verse was so excellently sung that it makes me eager for the second."

"Senor!" she exclaims, holding her head up with dignity, and in such a position that the moon shines upon its soft young outline full.

"I beg a thousand pardons," says Roger, putting his pipe hastily out of sight. "But the senora's song was so charming that I forgot that we had no master of the ceremonies to introduce us. Has it not a second verse?"

"My song has a second and a third verse," replies Belinda in English, strongly flavored with Castilian gutturals. "I must acquaint his lordship, however, that I believed myself to be alone. I never sing for the pleasure of strangers except when I am on the stage."

"The stage!" repeats Roger Temple, scrutinizing the girlish face and figure critically. "Why, is it possible?"

"I have acted as long as I can remember," says Belinda, with all the effrontery conceivable. "If his English excellency has travelled through any of the principal Spanish towns he must have heard of me."

"When the senora favors me with her name I shall be able to question my memory more accurately," answers Roger.

Belinda pauses for a minute or two; then, "My name on the stage is Lagrimas," she tells him, "or as you would say it in English, 'Tears.' Doleful, is it not? but I do not wish it changed. Who would not sooner be called tears than laughter?"

She sighs, and, half turning from him, rests her cheek down upon the graceful bare arms that lie folded on the balcony. Seen thus in the moonlight, her bright hair falling around her shoulders, her childish face grown pensive, she seems to Roger as fair a little creature as ever blessed man's vision in this prosaic world; and his pulse quickens. The balconies are distant about four or five feet from each other. Leaning across the giddy intervening space, two persons of steady nerves might easily clasp hands, or at least touch fingers, if they so minded. They are alone together, he and this girl, absolutely alone, as were the first pair of lovers in Eden; and yet impassably divided, as their lives are destined in very fact to be forevermore. And Roger's pulse quickens.

(To be Continued).

Gin a Body.

Gin a body meet a body
  Gaein' through the town,
Gin a body cheat a body,
  Need a body frown?
Ilka thing maun hae its tariff;
  Some are fearfu' high,
Yet a' the folk they pay the tariff;
  Nane it passes by.

Gin a body meet a body
  Comin' in to buy,
Gin a body chouse a body,
  Need a body cry?
Gin a body strip his neighbor,
  Leavin' him a' bare,
Gin a body rob a body,
  Need a body swear?

Amang the train there is a swain
  Fu' dear I know, mysel';
And what's his name of gruesome fame
  I deftly choose to tell.
And well I'm lief to name the thief—
  I winna tell a lie;
And gin ye ax, I name him Tax
  On ilka thing ye buy.

Gin a body tax a body,
  Gin he steals his purse,
Gin a body fule a body,
  Need a body curse?
Gin the mon wha maks my coatie
  Robs me of my ain,
I'm the fule that maks the robber—
  Why should I complain?

Wha's the faut, thou craiket loonie—
  Wha's the faut but thine?
Wha's the dupe, and wha's the duper,
  Wha's the goose, in fine?
Gin a body meet a body
  Comin' through the town,
Gin the body wears but shoddy,
  Need a body frown?

—New York Commercial Advertiser.

FLOWERS RAISED IN POTS.

Houses Should be a "Bower of Beauty" During the Winter—Best Varieties.

At this season the gardener and housekeeper will be actively forecasting for the winter display of flowers and plants. Skilful hands will already have brought forward to a good state of development most of the plants that are to make the decoration of the greenhouse and window for the next six months. A good stock of chrysanthemums will unfold their beauties some weeks later, and by proper management, if suitable varieties have been selected, will continue in bloom until the close of the year. Chinese primroses should now be stock little plants and making a vigorous growth, and so, also, geraniums of all kinds, and begonias, bouvardias, carnations and callas; and these constitute a large bulk of the plants most relied upon for winter flowers. Heliotropes, winter-blooming fuchsias, abutilons, azaleas, roses, jasmines and others are raised in smaller numbers by the amateur, and play a minor part.

But all these, though in great variety, fail to satisfy us, since so many other blooming plants can be made to contribute their brightness to the dull months. Those who have the best collections of the kind named will not fail to supplement them with a liberal stock of the bulbous plants, which flower freely in the winter months; and those who, by circumstances, have been prevented up to this time from having a collection of plants can now take advantage of the opportunity of the present season to lay in a stock of bulbs in such variety that they may have abundance of bright, sweet flowers nearly all winter. Reference is now made specially to the Holland bulbs, which can be so cheaply procured and so easily raised. In regard to the methods of treating these bulbs our readers are all well informed, but we would impress upon them the importance of laying in a sufficient supply of flowers from January to May, as may be done. What can be brighter or more delightfully fragrant than the hyacinths? What gayer than the tulips? What sweeter than the narcissus? And then we need only to mention the names of crocus and snowdrops and scillas and ixias, and anemones to bring to the mental vision a most delightful sight. These plants represent the greatest amount of winter bloom for the least expenditure of time, care and labor.

But let us look about for what more there may be in the way of bulbous plants of easy culture suited to the same purposes. First, let us notice the freesia. Here is a plant admirably adapted to the greenhouse and the window garden. Its graceful, white flowers are pleasingly fragrant. The bulbs can be potted for several weeks in succession during autumn, and thus a supply of them be provided to bloom continuously from midwinter to the latter part of spring.

The chionodoxa, or glory of the snow, a bulb of comparatively recent introduction, is as easy to raise as any of those already noticed. It has flowers that are porcelain blue with white centres, and are produced abundantly. The one peculiar treatment that is essential to the welfare of all potted bulbs is that they may be set away in a dark, cool place, but one free from frost, where they can develop their roots before the growth of leaves commences. When the roots have filled the soil and are running around the sides of the pots, the bulbs can be brought into a light place, and then the leaves and flower stems will be produced, but the blooming will be abortive if attempted sooner.

Beside the bulbs already named we might still mention oxalis, a number of which are excellent, free-flowering plants of the simplest culture. The lily, in its many varieties, kindly responds to pot culture. Some of the best varieties are the auratum, or gold-banded Japan lily; the common white, or candidum; L. Japonicum longiflorum; L. Harrisii or Easter lily of Bermuda; L. speciosum, or as it is better known in the trade as L. lancifolium, both rubrum and album, and the variety known as L. Precox. The value of the lily of the valley for winter blooming is well known.

Another excellent bulbous plant for winter flowers is the cyclamen. The species most in use, and the best is Cyclamen Perisicum in its cultivated varieties. —Vick's Magazine.

Mr. Balfour addressed a Liberal-Unionist Conference at Wolverhampton yesterday. He was jubilant over the Conservative victories in the municipal elections, and said they proved that Unionism was progressing. The Unionists were defeating the Gladstonians, even in strongholds of that party like Leeds. He said the policy of the Government was winning all along the line. Crime in Ireland, Mr. Balfour said, had been reduced almost to the level of 881. He thought the outcry over evictions was absurd. One hundred thousand persons were evicted in New York yearly without comment.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The statue of General Gordon, which has been erected in the very centre of Trafalgar square, London, midway between the two fountains, and was unveiled the other day, is the work of Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, R. A. The pedestal is relieved on either side by bronze panels, in which an effort has been successfully made to allegorically depict the virtues of the late general.

Cincinnati Enquirer: "It is a wrong adjustment for a husband to kill his wife first and himself afterwards. He should commence with himself."

The relative merits of Mohammedanism and Christianity in Africa are being discussed. Canon Taylor contends that Mohammedanism should not be interfered with in Africa. Professor Drummond says the question is whether the Arab or the European is to reign in Africa. "Africa," he says, "belongs to nobody, yet it is claimed by everybody. The Arabs pour into it from north and east, with the deliberate purpose of making a paradise a hell."

A civil engineer the other day claimed there is a difference between an error and a mistake, and he illustrated it in this way: "If a surveyor's instrument is at fault and he records what it registers, as it is registered by the instrument, that is an error: but if he records it differently from what the instrument registers it, that is a mistake." This means that if the instrument makes a mistake that is an error, but if the man makes an error that is a mistake. Here is food for reflection for dictionary makers.

The Emperor of Austria and the King of Saxony were enjoying themselves in Mufti after the style of good Haroun Alraschid while in Styria not long ago. They fell in with a sturdy peasant, of whom they begged a lift, and were politely accommodated in his cart. On parting from him they revealed their real State dignity, by way of making him happy and contented for life, but found him equal to the strain. "Well, my friends," he replied, "if you be the Emperor of Austria and you the King of Saxony, I had better tell you who I am. My good fellows, I am His Holiness the Pope." Fancy the feelings of the potentates on being thus taken for a brace of bluffers!

The Funeral Directors' Association, whose members are among the undertakers of the United States and Canada, in their recent annual convention at Baltimore, received a report from a committee on burials of those who die at sea, and Undertaker Laube, on the committee, in the discussion that followed, said: "I want to call special attention of the press to this. Steamship companies refuse to bring corpses to home ports for proper burial, alleging superstition of sailors as an objection. Against tearful protests of poor people their dead have been cast into the sea, but who ever heard of this disposition of the rich and prominent? At Baltimore, New York and Philadelphia steamship companies have refused to listen to us, and we want the common people to know bodies can be safely brought home."

Maybe some one would like to know the titles of the Czar of Russia. Here are a few of them: Alexander Alexandrovitch, Emperor and Autocrat of All the Russias of Moscow, of Kiev, of Vladimir, of Novgorod; Czar of Kazan, Czar of Astrakhan, Czar of Poland, Czar of Siberia, Czar of Khersoness-Tanrida, Czar of Grusia; Gosudor (sovereign) of Pskov and Grand Duke of Smolenski, Lithuania, Volynia, Padolia and Finland; Prince of Estland, Livland, Kurland, Semigalia, Samagitia, Belostok, Kurelia, Tyer, Yougor, Perm, Viatka, Bulgaria and others; Gosudor (sovereign) and Grand Duke of Novgorod, Belozersk, Udor, Abdor, Knodia, Vitebsk, Matizlav, and ruler of the entire northern land; Gosudor (sovereign) of the lands of Iversk, Kartalinski and Karbardinski, and of the regions of Armenia; Heir-Gosudor (sovereign) and Possessor of the Princedoms of Tcherkassia, Mountain and others; Heir-Apparent of Norway, Duke of Shleswig-Holstein, Stormalenski, Ditmarsen and Oldenburg; Gosudor of Turkestan, etc., etc.—London Star.

An ingenious contributor to the Berlin Neue Musikzeitung elaborates the theory that the character of a man is to be predicated from the special vowel which predominates in his laughter. For instance, persons in whose laughter the letter A (sound ah) is dominant are open, jovial, honest folk, who delight in noise and movement. "Laughter in E" is an indication of the phlegmatic and melancholy. Children almost invariably "laugh in I," and this is also observable in persons of a naive, docile, modest or undecided character. "Laughter in O," which the writer regards as the most dignified of all the laughing tones, is the mark of noble and bold tempers. The worst of all the laughters is that in U, which is the characteristic of the misanthropical.

A correspondent of the Northwestern Railroader advances a curious theory for the increasing prevalence of floods and rainstorms. He says that there are over 30,000 locomotives in use in North America, and estimates that from them alone over 53,000,000,000 cubic yards of vapor are sent into the atmosphere every week, to be returned in the form of rain, or over 7,000,000,000 cubic yards a day—"quite enough," he says, to "produce a good rainfall every twenty-four hours." Estimating the number of other non-condensing engines in use as eight times the number of locomotives, the total vapor thus projected into the air every week in this country amounts to more than 470,000,000,000 cubic yards. "Is this not?" he asks, "sufficient for the floods of terror? Is there any reason to wonder why our storms are so damaging?" Why is it, if this theorist is correct, that the greatest rainfalls and floods are generally found where the railways are the fewest?

The long looked-for report of the scientific commission which investigated the great volcanic eruption of Krakatoa in 1883 has at last made its appearance, and it seems strongly to confirm the theory that the famous "red sunsets" of that time were caused by the canopy of dust and steam thrown up by that tremendous convulsion of nature. So great was the explosion of the burning mountain that the noise was heard over one-thirteenth of the total surface of the earth. At Batavia, thirty miles away, buildings were wrecked by the concussion. In Ceylon, two thousand miles away, a sound as of heavy guns was heard. At Rodrignez, nearly three thousand miles away, it was distinctly heard, like the roar of distant artillery. The sea wave caused by the upheaval was perceived as far away as the English Channel, while a great atmospheric wave swept three times from Krakatoa to the antipodes and back again. Fully one and one-eighth cubic miles of rock were hurled into the air, some fragments reaching a height of thirty-one miles, while an incalculably vast cloud of dust and vapor filled the air at a height of from seventeen to twenty-three miles. It is not difficult to believe that enough of this dust and vapor was wafted to this side of the world to produce the beautiful phenomena that were the wonder and delight of every observer of the sunsets.

No Unalloyed Happiness.

Fannie—So you are married, Hattie, and have wealth and all its possibilities?

Hattie—Yes, my husband is very rich.

Fannie—And you enjoy it all very much?

Hattie—Very much, indeed.

Fannie—And your husband?

Hattie—Oh, well, you know in this world, dear, we have to take the bitter with the sweet."

Our Village Industrial Competition.

Husband (just home from the city)—My angel!—crying—whatever's the matter?

Wife—'I hey've—awarded me prize medal (sobbing) f' my sponge cake!

Husband (soothingly)—And I'm quite sure it deserv—

Wife (hysterically)—Oh—but—'t said—'t was for the best specimen—o' concrete!

Popularity.

Mr. Small—That man over there makes half a dozen trips down town every day, and scores of women he dosen't know nod to him and try to stop him. The Victim—Is he an actor? Mr. Small—No, a street car driver.

The Czar's Will.

Miss Dumps (reading)—The Czar has his will in every phase of life in Russia.

Mrs. Dumps—Well! Well! I thought he was married.

England next month will be deeply agitated by the question of the secularization of public schools. Sectarian schools now receive fully $10,000,000 annually from the Treasury. The report of the Royal Commission on Education, a body which contained, besides Cardinal Manning, a preponderant number of Church of England dignitaries and sympathisers, now proposes to levy on the taxes as well for the support of these sectarian schools up to the amount of $2.50 for every scholar in average attendance. The whole Noncomformist body is up in arms against this proposal, and a big education conference is called for November 20th to fight it tooth and nail.

A riot occurred at Middletown, Lancashire, on Thursday evening. It arose from an attempt to rescue a prisoner. The police who had charge of the prisoner took refuge in a shop. A crowd besieged the place and threw stones at the doors and windows. Several persons were injured. One civilian is dying from injuries received.

J. D. Sheehan, member of Parliament for East Kerry, was arrested at a meeting of Lord Kenmare's tenants on Saturday for advocating the Plan of Campaign. Mr. Sheehan has been taken to Tralee jail. The police offered to release him on bail if he would promise to keep silent until his trial, but he refused to do so.

G. W. Standish, of Flagstaff Plantation, Me., is a direct descendant of Miles Standish, of Puritan times. He is a stalwart man 52 years old, and is eight in line from the famous captain. His farm occupies the ground on which Arnold camped on his Quebec expedition.

The Russian Minister of the Interior yesterday received a telegram from the Minister of the Imperial Court stating that five minutes before the Czar's train arrived at Kutais, en route from Tiflis to the Black Sea, a Kouban Cossack, disguised as an officer, was arrested at the station for having on his person several handy explosives and some poison in gelatine capsules. When arrested the man attempted to poison himself. Years ago he was expelled from a university for an imaginary political offence and his career ruined. He was one of the founders of the South Russian Revolutionary Society. Other members of the society have been arrested at Simferopol.

Some days ago a German named Weiland, in Raglan township, was loading his gun in the house to shoot a porcupine. As he was placing the cap on the gun he turned around, and in some way the weapon was accidentally discharged, the contents going into the stomach of his 13-year old daughter, who was standing at the table washing dishes. The child vomited, and then sat down and ate heartily. About five hours afterwards she expired. The father is nearly distracted.

In numbering the rooms in the great new Drexel building in New York, the Philadelphia street system of numbers has been adopted, the hundreds indicating the floors. No. 1036 indicates room 36 on the tenth floor, and No. 815 indicates room 15 on the eighth floor. The Philadelphia and St. Louis plan of street numbering, by which a new hundred is begun at each street corner, is a great convenience in large cities.

—Empire gowns for misses are made of fine woollen, with a striped selvege or gay Persian bordered edge for trimming.

Neapolitan red is a new reddish brown, similar to the old Bismarck brown. As yet it is seen only in expensive fabrics.

—Many of the bodices of the new overdresses fasten diagonally, and they accord perfectly with the fashion of raising the drapery high on the left side.

—The following assignments are reported to-day: Clavering, R. Parkinson, general store; London, J. B. Glass, stationer; Tilsonburg, Hogan Bros., bakers.

—At a meeting of the Directors of the Huron & Erie Loan and Savings Society, of London, on Saturday, Mr. R. W. Smylie tendered his resignation as manager, which was accepted.

TELEGRAPHIC SUMMRAY.

The Quebec Local Legislature is likely to meet on January 10th.

The Mormons in the Northwest have decided not to practice polygamy.

Sheriff Iler, of Windsor, has recovered from his recent serious indisposition.

A lodge of the Order of Odd-fellows, Manchester Unity, was organized at Kingston on Friday. Grand Master Emo, Montreal, was present.

The valuable gold watch and chain stolen from Mr. Chapleau's bed-room at the St. Louis Hotel, Quebec, a few weeks ago, has been recovered in New York.

It appears that Mr. Mackenzie Bowell was favored with a Murchison letter asking him for advice on the Presidential election, but he did not reply.

About 6 o'clock on Saturday morning the nightwatchman of the new drainage works in St. Andrew street, Quebec, was found dead in the excavation.

A Hungarian gentleman is at present in Ottawa conferring with the Department of Agriculture concerning the emigration of Hungarians to the Canadian Northwest.

William Preeper, the condemned murderer in the Halifax jail, has become the object of female sympathy. He is supplied abundantly with cooked food, fruit and tracts.

The body of James Quinn, jun., who was drowned near Waubausnene on the 26th ult., was recovered yesterday and taken to Orillia, where the funeral will take place to-day.

At the morning session of the Court of Queen's Bench at Montreal on Saturday the grand jury returned a true bill against Alfred Belarger for the murder of Emma Genereux, who died some days ago under suspicious circumstances.

Mary, the 7-year-old daughter of Wm. May, of May Bros., millers, St. Thomas, was caught while playing in the mill on Saturday in the shafting and whirled round several times. When the machinery was stopped she was picked up apparently lifeless, but with medical assistance her breathing was restored and it is hoped she will recover, though her head and body are badly bruised and battered.

Bridget Clopper, of Belleville, on Friday concluded to die. She dressed her 6-year-old daughter in her best apparel, tidied herself up as best she could, and started for the bay. She waded into the water and finally lay down on her back. A young man named De Marsh passing at the time saw her position and went to the rescue, but seeing the neck of a black bottle protruding from her pocket, took possession of it. Mrs. Clopper followed his action, and, after a spirited engagement, recovered her property and went home.

Germany will resume the building of ironclads.

The new Austrian army Bills maintain the war strength of the army at 800,000.

The Catholics of Australia and India have presented the Pope with $1,000,000.

M Goblet, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, has received a note from the Vatican, in which the papal claims to temporal power are again asserted.

Advices from Saigon say pirates attacked a post consisting of forty men of the Foreign Legion and seven pagodas in Tonquin and killed all but one man.

Cardinal Newman is very low and cannot live long. The English Catholics are profoundly stirred. Prayers were offered for him throughout the country yesterday.

A terrific explosion occurred yesterday in the Campagnac coal pit in the department of Aveyron, France. Eighty miners were killed. Forty-two bodies have been recovered.

Mr. Phelps, the United States Minister, will deliver an address before the Glasgow Juridical Society on the 15th inst. The municipal authorities of Glasgow will afterwards give a banquet in honor of Mr. Phelps.

Lord Dangan, who is the defendant in a breach of promise suit brought by the charming Phyllis Broughton, has submitted an answer to the claim of the actress. It is not likely that the trial will come off before January.

The demonstration of University students in Berlin on Friday to Drs. Bergmann and Gerhardt was a dismal failure. The medical students absented themselves, and only 200 of the others, out of a total of 5,000, took part in the procession.

The Norwegian barque Nor, from New York, October 2nd, for Stettin, collided with and sank the steamer Sarmundham, off Cowes. Twenty-two persons are missing and are supposed to have been drowned. Eight survivors have landed at Weymouth. The Nor was abandoned. Her crew have landed at Portland.

It is proposed to turn Lister's Manningham Cotton Mills, at Bradford, over to a limited liability company. The Manningham mills employ 9,000 persons, and are the largest of the kind in the world. They represent a capital of £4,000,000. Mr. Lister is a member of Parliament, and is a Fair Trader in his views.

A despatch from Zanzibar says: The Germans have burned all the dhows and boats in Whidi harbor. Lieut. Fitzherbert, of the Algerine, in the face of a heavy Arab fire, chased a dhow with two hundred slaves off the north coast of Madagascar until the dhow grounded. Sa Kalavas carried off all the slaves except twenty-seven, which Lieut. Fitzherbert captured with the dhow. The reports regarding Stanley are discredited here.

Mr. Gladstone will open the Liberal Conference at Birmingham to-day, thus carrying war into the enemy's camp. The Liberal leader will speak daily until Thursday, and the crush to hear him is so great that tickets of admission to the hall in which he speaks are selling at fancy prices. Despite the scheming of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain the reception which will be accorded to the Grand Old Man promises to be the biggest one on record. It is, however, uncertain whether the hot bloods of the Chamberlain faction will be openly hostile or not.

A singular crime is reported from the neighborhood of Cahors, in the south of France. A 17-year-old nurse girl had been whipped severely by her mistress for neglecting a girl, 7 years of age, left in her charge. After the punishment the young nurse took the child out for a walk, and when they had reached the high banks of the River Lot she fastened herself and the child together with a horse-chain which she padlocked round their waists, and then leaped into the water. She was seen by several persons, but before they could get down the steep river banks the two girls were drowned.

Jacksonville's yellow fever record up to yesterday is: Total cases, 4,277. total deaths, 364.

David Boody, of Brookfield, Mich., aged 60, attempted to commit suicide by cutting his throat on Friday evening. He cannot recover.

The political excitement between whites and blacks in the vicinity of Charlotte, N. C., is so intense that the militia will probably have to be called out.

An earthquake shock was felt in Memphis, Tenn., on Saturday morning at 3.50 o'clock. People asleep in the upper stories of buildings were considerably alarmed. Its duration was only a few seconds.

The leaders in the Children of Zion Church at Grand Rapids, Mich., have signed an address declaring certain rumors reflecting upon the character of the late Bishop Paterson to have been investigated and found untrue. But find the scandal based on facts. Briefly, the story is that Mary Hawley, daughter of one of the Bishop's constituents and a favorite with him, had been accompanying him on his travels in Europe and the Holy Land, and by her he had a child. He had a wife and several children in Grand Rapids.

The United States express messenger on the train of the Northeastern Railway which arrived in New Orleans on Saturday morning at 7 o'clock was robbed at 5 a. m. between Lacey and Derby stations, 50 miles from the city. The express officials decline to state the amount of the robbery, but it is understood to be between $40,000 and $50,000. The robbers entered the express car, surprised Henry McElroy, baggage-master, and Charles Lowrey with a cocked revolver and threw sacks over their heads. After securing the contents of the safe the robbers pulled the bell-rope.

Another shooting affair occurred near Wilkesbarre, Pa., on Saturday night. Henry Berlew and George Llewelyn, two citizens of Pittston, were returning in a carriage from Pleasant Valley, when their horse was stopped in a lonely spot in the woods by two hunters who carried rifles. The hunters said they wanted to ride. The men in the carriage whipped up their horse and drove away. They had gone but a short distance when the hunters fired upon them, fatally wounding Berlew and seriously injuring his companion. The horse ran away and was not stopped until Pittston was reached. The men were taken from the carriage unconscious. There is great excitement over the affair and lynch law is threatened.

Hon. Edward Blake passed through Winnipeg to the east on Thursday night. He made a short call on Gov. Schultz, accompanied by his two sons.

The resignation is announced of Mr. E. H. King, formerly General Manager of the Bank of Montreal, and for the last fifteen years a director on the London Board.

Judge Church in opening the winter session of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Montreal, yesterday, denounced in no measured terms private detective agencies.

Mr. Alfred Harrison, carpenter, while working in the Grand Trunk Railway yard, Stratford, on Thursday afternoon, unloading timber, was knocked off the car and injured very seriously, but it is thought he will recover.

There is considerable disappointment felt in English-speaking circles of Montreal at the appointment of a French Canadian Chief of the Fire Brigade over the head of a qualified English applicant by the votes of two English aldermen.

Lieut. Oscar Pelletier, of "B" Battery, Que., who was wounded in the thigh when in the Northwest, was yesterday attempting to catch hold of or drive into his quarters a buffalo which is owned by the officers, and which they brought with them when young from the Territories. The animal turned on Mr. Pelletier and badly gored him in his other thigh, from the result of which he will be laid up for some days.

Herbert Spencer's health has improved, but he writes from his retreat at Dorking to say that he never expects to be able to do as much work as formerly.

M. Alennikoff, director of the Caucasian Railroad, committed suicide yesterday by shooting himself with a revolver. He left a letter addressed to the Czar.

Patrick Gilligan was shot dead yesterday near Athlone, Ireland. The crime resulted from agrarian troubles. Four persons have been arrested for complicity in the murder.

During a torchlight procession last evening in Belgrade stones were thrown at the Austrian Legation and several windows were broken. A number of arrests were made. The authorities have made apologies to the Austrian Minister.

The Parnell Commission upon rising yesterday stood adjourned until next Tuesday in order that the Times may have leisure to arrange for the continuity of evidence, a course which Sir Charles Russell has from the first insisted upon.

Joseph Kavanagh, who shot at a man named Planche Cox in a tavern opposite the Law Courts, London, on Thursday, has been remanded for trial. He said he had admitted to Cox that he made a certain statement, which had appeared in the St. James' Gazette, but he intended to deny it when he was examined by the Parnell Commission. This confession caused the quarrel which resulted in the shooting.

Between 6 and 7 o'clock on Thursday night, when the streets were full of people, a man boldly forced the door of Col. McConnel's loan office, on Pearl street, Grand Rapids, Mich., using a jimmy for the purpose. He helped himself to valuables and departed without attracting attention. Several thousand dollars' worth of watches, diamonds and other articles are missing. The man was so bold in his operations that although seen at work nobody suspected anything wrong.

King Leopold of Belgium has shown himself possessed of almost as great a craze for building as Mme. De Pompadour, and many new buildings at Ostend and elsewhere are tasteful monuments to his love for improvement.

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

Saws! Saws!

Cross-Cut Saws! Cross-Cut Saws!

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having five gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined siller steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you Another line I would particularly call your attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

Several beavers has been caught in the rocky Saugeen, near Durham, this fall.

Mr. Thos. Earle, of Badgeros, died suddenly of heart disease while picking potatoes on his farm.

The Grey Review last week published a poorly-constructed synopsis of Dr. McLellan's lecture in the Town Hall, Flesherton, of three weeks ago. Another evidence of the editor's enterprise.

It seems that the report of the entering of a protest against the return of Mr. R. S. White as M. P. for Cardwell is without foundation.

A. T. Biggar, of Glenelg, had eighteen out of twenty-five fine geese killed by a mischievous fox last week.

The Times complains that Owen Sound fishermen openly violate the law, and that, too, while the Government steamer is in that harbor.

The Bruce Herald says the citizens of Walkerton have discovered a plan to dispose of surplus cats, by dumping them into the editor's well. Well, well! quite a catacomb, indeed.

Mrs. Morrow, Glenelg, a lady of some 63 years slipped while getting out of the buggy and fractured her hip bone. The injury is considered serious, especially owing to the age of the woman. Dr. McBride attended the patient, and she is doing as well as could be expected. [Markdale Standard.

A great big, healthy dog poisoner struck Orangeville last week and silenced forever the "yaps" of eight or ten valuable dogs.

The Durham Chronicle man wants a good sized, permanent boom to strike that town. That's what the residents have been waiting for this last twenty-five years.

Suicide. Robert Futhey, a superannuated school teacher, about 84 years of age, of eccentric disposition, living at Singhampton, on Thursday made a determined attempt to take his life by cutting his throat almost from ear to ear with a razor. He is in a precarious condition but with care may recover. [Colling wood Bulletin.

The trustees of the Dundalk Public School had over a hundred applications in answer to their advertisement for teachers, with salaries ranging from $350 up to $600. After six hours' deliberation Mr. S. Nelly, of Lakefield, was chosen to the position of head master, and Miss Sutherland of Linton appointed to take charge of the thrid division. There were only 8 female applicants. [Herald.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

PREPARED BY

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1; six bottles, $5.

BOOTS & SHOES!

I have a large stock on hand, suitable

For Fall Wear.

Men's and Boys' Long Boots,

Also a large variety of LADIES' AND CHILDRENS' WEAR. A lot of Summer Goods Selling off Cheap.

WM. CLAYTON'S, - - FLESHERTON.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MES. BULMER,
FLESHERTON.

A Positive Cure. ✠ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

A Permanent Cure. ✠ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equal.

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS:

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London,

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☞ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 84. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, NOV. 22, 1888. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR

L-O-O-K!

—AND—

READ CAREFULLY

And you will find that at

Russell's - Noted - Jewelry - Store,

FLESHERTON.

Is to be found the finest, best and cheapest stock of Watches, Clocks, Jewelry, Spectacles, etc.

In Watches we have the famous Waltham, Elgin, Springfield, Illin is Hampden, Columbus, New Haven, in silver and gold and gold filled cases, in ladies and gents' sizes, from $9.50 to $75, warranted from two to five years. Swiss silver watches, ladies' and gents' sizes, from $7.50 to $50, warranted from three to five years. Also the finest line of

AMERICAN SPRING AND WEIGHT CLOCKS

In prices from $2 to $10, bearing warrants from two to four years.

The finest line of ladies' Barpins, Brooches, Earrings, Necklets, and Chains; gents' Solid Gold and Rolled Gold Chains of the finest quality and pattern; full 18 K plain rings and ladies' gem rings; cuff buttons, collar buttons, scarf pins, charms, etc. A beautiful line of

SILVERWARE

Suitable for birthday and Xmas presents, at very low prices. Also the famous B Laurence Spectacles, Eyeglasses, etc., the finest in the world. Buy no other.

If you have a watch or clock that refuses to go or keep time, take it to

Russell's Noted Jewelry Store,

FLESHERTON,

And it will be made perfect at a reasonable price.

HEARD'S

Carriage Works,

FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

General News.

Right Hon. Jos. Chamberlain was married to Miss Endicott at Washington on Thursday last.

Several vessels have passed through the Cornwall Canal.

W. P. Webb has been sentenced to death at Brandon, Man., for the murder of his wife.

James Edward Beswick, a well-known insurance man, was accidentaly shot and killed by his friend, Edward Apted, at Toronto Thursday.

The legal expenses in connection with the Parnell Commission are estimated at $15 a minute. Seven thousand pounds of the Parnell defence fund have already been spent.

The loss by the stoppage of navigation in the Cornwall Canal is estimated at $551,500.

The Manitoba Legislature adjourned on Saturday, to meet again on January 31st next

Mr. Keely has been put in gaol for contempt of court in failing to produce plans, etc., of his celebrated motor, as ordered by the judge.

Received—1 carload Goderich salt, 1 carload coal oil, part carload groceries and dry goods, at M. Richardson & Co's.

Oddfellows' concert Tuesday, Dec. 11th. Don't you forget it,

Catarrh cured, health and sweet breath secured, by Shiloh's Catarrh Remedy. Price 50 cents. Nasal Injector free.

Look here! You can get coal oil for 15c. a gallon by taking 10 gallons, at J. G. Anderson's.

Another stock of those heavy overcoats received this week at M. Richardson & Co's. These goods are fine value and sell quick!

Mr. S. Frost, merchant, ran across a curosity, on Monday, while dealing out tea to a customer. The curosity consists of a fine piece of workmanship in the form of a delicately made little box filled with tooth-picks. The box is thirteen sixteenths of an inch wide, five sixteenths of an inch thick and two-and three eights of an inch long, and on one side, within a space angling from nine-sixteenths of an inch on one edge to an inch an a half on the other edge there are nine distinct squares and three half squares of wood so closely fitted that one can scarcely discern a joint, and the entire box consists of eighteen pieces of wood entirely foreign to any grown in this country that we have ever seen. On one side the box is stamped "Kobe Tea Company, Hiogo, Japan," and it was filled with eighteen tooth-picks, one of which was presented to us and now stands in our museum alongside of the 10 foot cornstock.—[Chatsworth News.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Rev. [illegible] Timmins preached in the Presbyterian Church last Sabbath.

If you want a good watch or clock at a very small price, go to Russell's noted Jewelry store, Flesherton. It will pay you.

Shiloh's cough and Consumption Cure is sold by us on a guarantee. It cures Consumption.

Mr. Nelson, Flesherton's new barber, arrived last week and opened up his new shop. He may be found in Moore's block, Durham street, in the premises lately occupied by Miss McBride as a dressmaking establishment.

Remember the grand concert and lecture in Town Hall, Flesherton, under the auspices of R. T. of T. on Dec. 18, 1888.

Vitality and color are restored to weak and gray hair, by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. Through its cleansing and healing qualities, it prevents the accumulation of dandruff and cures all scalp diseases.

Mr. J. G. Keefer, of Forest, Ont., was visiting his parents in Flesherton this week. He returned on Monday.

For Winnipeg.

Mr. Wesley Armstrong, who has been with Russell, the jeweler, for the past three years, has secured a situation with W. F. Doll, Winnipeg's big jeweler, and leaves next week for the west.

If your watch or clock needs repairing always take it to Russell's, Flesherton, for a perfect job.

A Prolific Animal.

Mr. Rufus Wickens, of Kimberley has a two-year old sow which downs the record. Within eighteen months past she has given birth to, and raised, thirty-seven porkers. She is now caring for a litter of ten. The sow herself is black, and the pigs are pure white.

If your eyes are weak and troublesome, call at Russell's, Flesherton, and get a pair of the famous B. Lawrence spex. They are best it the world buy no other.

Examination.

The high school entrance examination will be held in the school house, Flesherton, on December the 19th, 20th and 21st. Teachers having intending candidates will kindly notify Inspector Campbell at an early a date as [illegible]

A complete stock of the far famed B Lawrence spex at Russell's, Flesherton, to fit any sight.

Thanksgiving Day.

Thanksgiving day went off very quietly in Flesherton. Every person who owned a gun was on the war path. No services were held in any of the churches. A tea meeting and lecture was held in the Baptist chapel, but the attendance was not large.

Christmas Cards and all foreign Christmas Papers are completely put in the shade in Canada this year by the publication of the greatest Christmas Paper ever published. Those who know, say the Chrismas Number of THE MONTREAL STAR will take the public completely by storm. For sending away to friends and to preserve at home it will be the most taking thing ever seen in this country or in Europe either.

Feversham news too late for this week.

Croup, whooping cough and Bronchitis immediately relieved by Shiloh's Cure.

Boots of every description at prices to just suit you, at Andersons.

FOR SALE.—A black Percheron mare rising three years old, apply to Peter Holman, Flesherton.

The Mount Forest high school will hereafter present to every entrance candidate that passes there, a handsome diploma. Gold and silver medals are also offered to the highest candidates. Examination begins Wednesday, Dec. 19th.

First cold snap of the season this week. Hawk Bros. had 200 doz. eggs frozen Monday night.

It is rumored now that Flesherton is to have two barbers.

W. W. Buchanan, of Hamilton, the great temperance speaker, will be in Flesherton on 18th Dec., under the auspices of Royal Templars of Temperance; also the glee club and Parks Bros.

No woman can be contented and happy if her skin is covered with pimples and blotches. These disfiguring eruptions are easily removed by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. The medicine is perfectly safe to take, and is a thoroughly reliable blood purifier.

Wm. McLaughrey, Esq., assessor for the township of Artemesia, received a telegram from Minneapolis of few days ago informing him that his brother had been stricken down with typhoid fever, and was confined in the hospital at that city. It was a very severe attack, but we believe he is progressing favorably.

Nothing New, Gentlemen.

There is absolutely nothing new in municipal matters here yet. Other constituences are making preparations for the fray, but Artemesia is dormant. From which we infer that the municipal fathers of the past year will still remain our "daddies" next year. Well, we guess the family is agreeable.

Didn't Arrive.

Of late we have had two or three complaints of letters which have been forwarded to us remaining unanswered. We can only say that such letters never arrived. Two letters mailed at Priceville never reached us. We cannot account for this, but if any more complaints reach us there will be an investigation by some one.

A Martyr Wanted.

With the advent of snow and ice Flesherton youngsters have commenced sleighriding upon the sidewalks. When somebody gets a leg and nose broken, collar bone smashed, spinal vertebrae unhinged and seven and a half ribs pulverized into kindling wood, then, perhaps, the authorities will make a mild request that the boys desist in future. Who will [illegible] himself a martyr?

Save your money for the grand lecture and concert under the auspices of R. T. of T. Music by the glee club and Parks Bros. and lecture by W. W. Buchanan, of Hamilton. This will be a great treat. Don't miss it.

Bear!

Mr. W. McLeod and J. McFadyen, Esqs. of the station, were out shooting partridge on Monday, and came home with a bear story. They claim to have shot a bear twice back of the station. The first shot tore away what should have been his tail and the second took his head half off. The bear then took to the woods in a swamp. Messrs. McLeod and McFadyen have never been known to tell a lie under ordinary circumstances. Their veracity is as unquestioned as George Washington's. But then George Washington might not have stuck to facts had he thought it best to run from a bear and tell about it afterwards.

Birth.

In Flesherton, on Sunday, Nov. 18, the wife of Mr. John Wright of a daughter.

The Veil of The Future.

The veil of the future was lifted to night
As I sat in the darkness alone,
And I saw the rough pathway my poor feet must tread—
There were hopes to be buried and tears for the dead,
And I mournfully, tremblingly, sobbingly, said
"Yes, the veil of the future
Is lifted to night,
But my path lies in darkness—
Look, where is the light?"

The veil of the future was lifted again,
And a glorious light met my eyes,
'Twas the Beautiful City whence sorrow and [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible]" der'd,
And I silently prayerfully, joyfully said
"Yes, the veil of the future
Is lifted to night
I must pass through the shadows—
Then, Lord, comes the light."

[illegible] VANDUSEN

Go to J. G. Anderson's for fur caps, coats or robes; best value in town.

Get a pair of felt sox and rubbers, away down cheap, at J. G. Anderson's

FOR SALE.—A top-buggy in good condition. Will take part pay in wood Apply to W. J. Bellamy, Flesherton.

Felt boots, felt socks with heavy rubbers, felt overshoes, all at lowest prices at M. Richardson & Co's.

W. J. BELLAMY is still lending money for North of Scotland Mortgage Co., interest 6½ per cent. Mortgages maturing can be renewed at 6½ per cent at a cost of $3.50.

P. H. Morris, of the firm of B Lawrence & Co., the great spectacle firm, will be at J. G. Russell's on Wednesday Dec. 12. This will be a chance in a lifetime to get your spectacles fitted. Remember the date.

J. P. Marshall, dentist, visits Markdale professionally the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of every month and will resume regular visits to Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton, which will fall on Nov. 8th, being the day after the first Wednesday. Mr Marshall is well known in this vicinity

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the head, How they may be cured at your home Post free. H. Address Dr. NICHOLSON, 30, St John Street, Montreal.

COMPETITION DEFIED!

Fine Gold and Silver Watches for Presentation or Personal use.

AND SILVERWARE.

Quality and completeness of stock select from not equalled in Central Grey.

Sizes Complete in Genuine 18 K. Wedding Rings.

No Catch Prices. Goods represented OR "CASH" REFUNDED.

Can do better for Customers—"Cash or "Credit"—than any other jeweler in "Grey Co.

Watches carefully and promptly repaired.

JEWELER BROWN,

MARKDALE, ONT.

BELINDA: A BEAUTY

"Your philosophy is beyond your years, senora. Surely nothing should seem so good as laughter in one's youth."

"Youth!" echoes Belinda, raising her head quickly, and forgetting the Spanish accent and her assumed character together. "What have I to do with youth, sir? When I was young? Why, from the time I was thirteen——"

And there her eyes met Roger's full in the moonlight. She stops, and droops her face, crimsoning.

"Plenty of hard training has come to me in my life, senor," she goes on after a space, but without lifting her eyes again to his. "Sometimes I feel, a little too keenly, how well my name Lagrimas fits me. But why should I talk of such things to-night! You know my country, Spain?" turning to him with the most irresistible of all coquetry, the coquetry of ignorance. "No? Well, you should run down there some day, now that you are so near. I will be your guide, if you choose.'

"Done," says Roger, gayly. "It is a bargain that we take a Spanish tour together, Senora Lagrimas, is it not?"

"I don't think I said anything about 'together,' did I? But never mind about that. Yes, we can go down to Granada first, if you like. It will take us about a week to see the Alhambra, and then—— But is His Excellency quite sure," pointedly, "that his time is his own, that his friends will give him leave of absence?"

"Oh, no question of that," says Roger, with the airy assurance of an unfettered man. "The doubt is rather, will the Senora Lagrimas keep her promise?"

No question of that! Ready, after three minutes' temptation, to be led captive by the first strolling actress who accosts him from a balcony! So much for engaged men, thinks Belinda. So much for the romance of two young hearts, the fidelity of a lifetime, etc. Let us try this devoted lover of Rosie's a little further.

"I mentioned your friends, senor, because I know that you are not alone here. You may not have noticed me, but I certainly saw you to night at the Casino with ladies.'

Roger Temple looks the very picture of innocence. "At the Casino?" he repeats. "With ladies? Ah, to be sure, I believe I did speak to some English acquaintances of mine for a few minutes."

"There was an ugly little girl for one; a girl very sunburnt, very ill dressed; you danced a waltz with her; and another lady not so young. Your mamma, probably, senor."

"Step-mamma," assents Roger, unblushingly, "and the step mamma also of the little sunburnt girl with whom I danced."

"Consequently you and the girl—are—are——"

"Ah, that is a knotty point, the precise relationship between that young lady and myself. I will not allow you to call her ugly, though, Senora Lagrimas. Sunburnt she is, ill-dressed she may be, ugly, never."

"Well, for my part, I did not see a good feature in the young person's face," says "Lagrimas," with a contemptuous shrug of her shoulders. "A skin like a gipsy's, a wide mouth, a low forehead!"

"Magnificent eyes and eyelashes, teeth like ivory, graceful little hands and feet, and the sweetest smile, when she chooses to smile, in the world."

"I should think hers a vile temper, judging by her expression, and as to her manners! I have been here some time, senor. I know the girl by sight, and by reputation. She plays boys' games with boys, robs henroosts after dusk with that dog of hers; she talks—swears, some people will tell you, like a gamin of the streets, and——"

"And for each and all of these oddities I like her the better," interrupted Roger, warmly. "Belinda is just the kind of girl to grow into the most charming of women, in time."

"A charming woman! After the pattern of the other lady who is not so young, the step-mamma?"

"No, not after that pattern precisely, senora. Your vast experience must have taught you, surely, that there are more kinds of charming women in the world than one. Belinda has been neg—allowed to run a little too wild, hitherto; but circumstances, I am happy to say, will place her under my guidance now."

"Will they, will they, indeed, Captain Temple!" interpolates Belinda, mentally. "We shall see more about that by and by!"

"She will live in my house, will stand to me in the position of a daughter, and I mean to reform her."

"Ah, heavens, how praiseworthy! How Christian! Reform Belinda? With the aid of a prim English governess and a staff of attendant pastors and masters of course?"

"Well, no," answers Roger. "I have no great belief in prim English governesses, neither are pastors or masters very much more to my taste. I shall reform Belinda, as much as she needs reforming, by kindness alone. It strikes me, that what the poor little girl wants is not sternness, but love."

Belinda turns her head away with a jerk; her throat swells, the big tears rise in her eyes. If he had said anything but this, if he had called her ugly, wicked—any hard name he chose, she could have borne it better!

"Belinda should be extremely grateful for your—your pity!" she remarks, as soon as she can command her voice enough to speak. "For my part, I don't in the least value that kind of regard."

"No? And what kind of regard do you value, may I ask?" says Roger Temple, his tone softening.

"Ah—what kind? when I have known you a little longer than ten minutes I will tell you."

"The day we visit the Alhambra together, for instance?"

"Perhaps. Meantime, in Belinda's name, I thank you a thousand times for the pity you are charitably enough to bestow upon her! Good-night, senor. I leave you to think over your fine projects of reformation alone."

And with a mocking reverence "Lagrimas" salutes him then, assuming the air of a princess at least, and with a grand sweep of her rustling silken train, leaves the balcony.

She quits him, I say, with the air of a princess; the moment she is out of sight, turns, peeps through a rent in the dilapidated Venetian blind, listens with eager, breathless curiosity to find out what Roger Temple would do next.

Captain Temple for a minute or two keeps silence. Then "Senora, Senora Lagrimas," he cries softly.

But no answer comes to his appeal.

"Only one word—do you live here? Is there any chance of my seeing you again to-morrow night?"

Belinda is mute as fate.

"I shall listen for your voice toward eleven o'clock. If you do not take pity on me, I shall remain out here all night, remember, heart-broken."

"So much for engaged men, I say," thinks Belinda. "Oh, if I was really wicked—if I was half as bad as they give me credit for—could we not have a comedy in earnest out of all this?"

"The balconies are not very far apart, senora," remarks Roger, presently. "It would be quite possible for a desperate man to leap from one to the other."

A half-suppressed, malicious laugh is Senora's only reply to this thrilling suggestion.

"I all certainly make the attempt before long, and if I fail, mind—if I fall, and am stifled down in all that harbor mud below, my death"—plaintively—"will be upon your conscience."

A laugh, rather more malicious, rather louder than before, is her reply.

"Senora Lagrimas! for the last time, will you or will you not come out and speak to me?"

And once more Belinda's silence says "No."

"I give you three chances, Senora Lagrimas."

Silence.

"Lagrimas."

Silence.

"Belinda, my dear!"

She flashes out upon him like a storm-wind; her lips apart, her eyes gleaming, so that they eclipse the saint's diamonds on her throat.

"You you dare to say you recognized me all the time?" This she asks him as soon as her indignation gives her breath to speak.

"I recognized you all the time," Roger confesses humbly. "I knew you when I was lighting my pipe; I believe, before you saw me at all. Why in the world should I not recognize you, my dear child?"

"Because I had been fool enough to disguise myself under this rubbish." With a fierce little gesture she apostrophizes Miss Burke's fine silk. "Because—oh, if I had known, if I could have guessed that you, of all people, would see me! And the nonsense you talked, sir; the nonsense you dared to talk, knowing it to be me!"

"We have been talking very pleasantly," answers Roger Temple. "I cannot say I remember talking any particular nonsense."

"What, not when you told me to my face that circumstances had put me under your guidance, that you meant to reform me? You to reform me!"

"It was a rash speech, I admit. I am not sure that it was nonsense."

"And then our tour in Spain—but you shall keep to that, you shall keep to that, Captain Temple. Whatever Rose says, and whether the scheme is up to the Miss Ingram standard of propriety or beneath it, I mean to hold you to your word. We are going to spend a week in Granada together, you and I."

"Of course; Rose with us. What could be pleasanter? Rose with us, and——"

"And Augustus Jones, too, if you please," interrupts Belinda, a curiously abrupt transition in her voice. "In the selfishness of your own happiness, you and Rose, you seem entirely to forget other people's. I go nowhere without Augustus, now."

"Without Augustus," repeats Roger blankly. "Why Belinda, is it possible—can you mean——"

"I mean that I will go nowhere without Mr. Jones. Now come, Captain Temple, or as we are discussing family matters, let me call you by a sweeter future name—come now, step-papa, don't pretend! No concealment between near and dear relatives. As if you and Rosie did not know everything about my poor Augustus just as well as I do!

"I should be very sorry to know one thing," says Roger culpably negligent of his future match-making duties as a parent. "I should be very sorry to know that you cared seriously, young, ignorant of life as you are, for a person like—Jones!"

It seemed as though the obnoxious monosyllables would nearly choke him.

"Care! And, pray, who said anything about caring, sir? I am going to marry Mr. Jones—we settled the whole affair to-night—marry, not care for him."

Marry, not care for him. As much repulsion as a man can feel, theoretically, toward a distractingly pretty little girl, not five feet distant from him in the moonlight, Roger feels at this moment toward Belinda O'Shea. Rose was right. The Vansittart blood runs in her veins, poor child, and the blood is bad! Scarce seventeen yet, and she has the cold, mercenary instincts of a woman of thirty, and not by any means a good woman of thirty, either!

"You are slow with your congratulations—and the match is really a desirable one, step-papa; not of course for a moment, speaking of Augustus personally. Brand-new villar at Clapham—if he does leave out a few of his h's, poor fellow, he makes up amply for them with his r's—villar at Clapham, opera-box, diamonds. My appearance is greatly improved by diamonds, is it not?" Holding up a pendant of the saint's necklace between her fingers.

"Certainly. What lily is not improved by a little paint? All that glittering finery Mr. Jones' first offering, I presume."

"No," answers Belinda, calmly. "There has not been time, I am sorry to say, for offerings yet. He walked home with me after I left you and Rose at the Casino (poor Augustus felt, as I did, that our company was not wanted), and I invited him in, just to keep me company while I ate my supper. And he proposed."

"He proposed. And you——"

"Accepted him, step-papa—what else should I do? And then, when I was alone again, the thought struck me of borrowing Burke's Sunday silk, just to see how I liked the taste of fine clothes; and I stole this necklace, sir, from the throat of old Beata who lives on our second landing—a paste necklace, only, not real diamonds such as I shall have when I am Mrs. Augustus Jones! Was it wicked, I wonder?" sudden compunction for the sacrilege she had committed coming back upon her. "Captain Temple, do you think, now, the blessed old saints, when they are once safe in heaven, ever trouble themselves about the jewels they have left behind them on earth?"

They talked on and on, and presently Augustus is forgotten, and presently Rose. Belinda is Lagrimas again, and Roger the wandering Englishman who has fallen but too quickly a victim to Lagrimas' charms. By and by the air, all at once, grows fresh; a flicker of pink light begins to show above the glorious chain of mountain peak toward the east, and with a start Belinda realizes that it is morning—that Miss Burke will be back before noon, that Roger is the lover of Rose, and that she has decided to spend her life at Clapham with Mr. Augustus Jones!

"Captain Temple, do you know that the sun is going to rise, that we have been out here since midnight, you and I? I hope you never mean to talk of reforming me again. Oh, if Rose knew! Shall you tell her?"

"Shall you tell Mr. Jones, Belinda?"

And then their eyes meet, with a sweet, sudden look of intimacy; they have been acquainted now near upon a dozen hours, and the girl questions him no more.

They bid good-bye and part; the tacit promise exchanged, though no word of promise be spoken, of seeing each other at the same place and time to-morrow night.

CHAPTER IX.

THE FINGER OF FATE.

"You would never guess what has happened, Roger, never! And I am not at all sure that I am wise to tell you, you naughty, naughty, jealous man—only when he comes it may be worse!"

It is noon next day; and in Rosie's cool, Moorish-looking drawing-room at the Isabella the lovers are love-making, the widow in an embroidered India muslin wrapper, and as coquettish and playful of demeanor as any youthful bride of eighteen.

"If it will ease your conscience to make confession, I promise solemnly to restrain my jealousy," says Roger; not, it may be presumed, without some uneasy conscience twings of his own. "You have made another conquest, Rose?"

The droop of Mrs. O'Shea's eyelids says yes.

"I was sure of it. That little Portuguese Jew at breakfast—no, the Spanish officer last night at the Casino! Rose, if it is that good-looking Spanish scoundrel——"

"Oh, Roger, don't be violent! How can I help men being so ridiculous? and I, who never give one any encouragement! No, it is neither the Spaniard nor the Portuguese—I mean it is some one else as well. "Oh, I do feel so guilty, I'm sure these things never happen to anybody but me."

"I dare say they happen to most pretty women," says Roger. "But put me out of my torture, quick. Who is my latest rival, Rosie?"

"Well, you must know, dear, Spencer went to the post-office this morning and there was a letter for me."

"It was a declaration?"

"It was from cook. I left orders with her to write regularly every week and indeed a friend of Spencer's is staying in the house as a precaution. I never like to doubt the honesty of the lower classes, Roger, and of course you cannot make away with tables and chairs; still there are the clocks and ornaments, and as to the house linen——"

"But my rival, Rosie, my rival? While you talk about the cook and the house linen, I am burning with impatience, remember."

For once at least during his courtship, Roger Temple contrives to unite veracity with sweetness.

"Well, it seems he called very soon after we left. 'A tall, military-looking gentleman with a moustache,' cook says, 'and would take no denial, but walked in as if the place was his own' those are exactly her words—'and looked round at everything, and particularly hard at the photograph of Captain Temple in the breakfast-room.' Ah, Roger, what he must have suffered! Well I know what he must have suffered at that moment!"

"What who must have suffered, my love? The end of the story is naturally that cook searched for the teaspoons on the military gentleman's departure and found them missing."

"The end of the story is nothing of the kind," said Rose, fluttering up her feathers like a little sparrow. "The end of the story is that cook gave him my address here—and I am afraid told him other news that made him most unhappy—and he said he should follow me straight to St. Jean de Luz. I call that something like constancy, poor fellow! Although he must have known the hopelessness of his position, to resolve, without a moment's hesitation, upon following me."

"Other people, knowing the hopelessness of their position, have remained constant to you, Rose," says Roger Temple, tenderly.

Does it flash across his mind that fidelity seems to be more closely allied with the state of hopelessness than with that of hope?

"And I shall have you both upon my hands at once. And I am sure he is of the most fiery, combative temperament—those glowering, deep-set eyes that give a man such a look of power, and beautiful, long, auburn moustache, and six feet one at least, adds Rose, with a reproachful glance at her lover's inferior stature.

"Rosie," says Roger, with a thoroughly sincere sigh, "do you want to drive me clean out of my senses? Who is he? Deep-set eyes, auburn moustache, power, and six feet one! I cannot endure it, Rosie. There are limits, remember, even to my long-suffering."

Rose dimples and colors and casts her eyelids up and down as, all unsuspicious of latent irony, she drinks in this flattery which is the very meat and drink of her small soul.

"It is Colonel Drewe, then, as you insist upon knowing. He refused, it seems, to give his name to the servants, but I—oh, there are intuitions that cannot be mistaken. It is Stanley Drewe."

"Drewe, Drewe—the lackadaisical old dandy with a flower in his button-hole, whom you have got in your photograph book? You had a tremendous flirtation with Colonel Drewe once, my dear, had you not?"

"You would not blame me in that affair, Roger, if you knew all. You were far away in India; indeed, it was in poor Major O'Shea's lifetime, and I am sure his passions were so violent I never dared look at any man twice. But whatever party I was seen at during one whole season, Colonel Drewe was certain to be there too. If I went to the opera I saw him. If I drove in the park I saw him. It was an infatuation, and if I had been free—however I was not free!" says Rose in a tone of exquisite abnegation. "I was not free, and he behaved beautifully, poor Stanley! He went to Gibraltar with his regiment, and we have corresponded a little since; only the other day, indeed, I sent him an announcement of Uncle Robert's death. What a blow this must be to him."

A look not so much of anger as of pain passes over Roger Temple's face. He may have ceased to be enamored of Rose; he has not ceased to be enamored of his own ideal love for her; the love which, wise or foolish in itself, has for a dozen years been part and parcel of his life. For the sake of that, not because of the fade flirtation of these two elderly London butterflies, he feels wounded.

"A blow to Colonel Drewe! What—our engagement, Rosie? Had matters gone so far between you then, that Colonel Drewe has a right to consider your marrying another man than himself 'a blow!'"

"Ah, Roger dearest, I implore you not to be angry! How can I control poor Stanley's feelings? I declare between you all, I don't know which way to turn. And now to think of the dreadful embarrassment of having him here!"

"As far as I am concerned, there will be none whatsoever," answers Roger, coldly. "You and Colonel Drewe, of course, know best what reason you have for embarrassment."

He is annoyed, lowered, for her sake, rather than his own. But Rose, who is now adept at reading the character of others, sets him down simply as "jealous" (a mistake into which vanity not unfrequently conducts intelligence of her calibre), and twitters on and on about poor Stanley's infatuation and deep-set eyes, and her own innocence and the embarrassment of riches that awaits her in the way of admirers, until the very excess of her folly brings her lover back to good temper. Dear simple-hearted little Rosie! Who can be angry with her long! Her vanities are so childlike, her flirtations, like her whole character, so transparent.

"You may be sure he rushed to England as soon as ever he got the news of Uncle Robert's death. I am not a fool, Roger, and I don't think myself quite hideous, but I know very well that men like to marry money, and that in my small way I am an heiress! Can't you fancy him looking round the house, speculating? And then to come upon your portrait. I wonder, now, whether it was quite proper of me to have it hung up yet! Nothing would pain me more than for Colonel Drewe to think me indelicate."

"We are certain, I suppose, that it is Colonel Drewe, Rosie? There is no one else among your numerous victims whom the cap would fit?"

Oh, yes, on this point Rosie is confident. If it had not been for the moustache it might have been the Rev. Rowland Lascelles, whom she met last year at Malvern, the most elegant, the most spiritual-minded of men. But no, with a conscious little sigh over her Malvern reminiscences, the moustache settles it. Colonel Drewe it must be and no other. "And what makes it the more remarkable, Roger," adds Rose, with her most sapient and logical air, "I declare, it looks like the finger of fate—I dreamed of poor Major O'Shea only last night! It seemed some one in America had told him of my engagement—in dreams, alas, in dreams only, our dead are restored to us!—and he had brought me over the most lovely turquoise and pearl set as a wedding present (Major O'Shea always used to say how pearls became me), and was exceedingly pleased at the marriage, and said he wished you joy from his heart. Was it not most remarkable?"

"Most remarkable and most unpleasant," answers Roger, getting annoyed in earnest. "For God's sake, Rose, dream no more dreams! Rivals of flesh and blood, powerful colonels and elegant parsons, I can stand, not the others——"

But happily, at this very delicate juncture, the door opens, and the entrance of Belinda and Miss Burke puts an end to the love scene.

CHAPTER X.

"LAGRIMAS!"

Miss Lydia Burke is by no means an unfavorable sample outwardly of the Women of the Future. She has a tolerable sandy complexion, tolerable sandy hair, teeth almost over-white and even, and a pair of very wide-awake, and small grey eyes. Her walk is wiry; her figure like a bit of watch-spring; her age the hitherward side of forty. What in this bright, energetic-looking lady should have introduced the sad elements of hatred and disbelief into Belinda's young life? What has caused the inalienable discrepancies between them?

Mainly I imagine, this unchangeable law; that reality and shams will no more mix together than will oil and water. Born of no superhonest stock, reared in no superhonest school, one virtue from earliest babyhood took sturdy root in Belinda's soul; the virtue of absolute truth. Organizations exist so fine that their possessors can detect the presence of certain flowers or animals as if by instinct. Belinda is gifted with the same prescience, the same kind of moral divining-rod as regards imposture. And poor Miss Burke, while she forever preaches Earnestness, Women's Work, Women's Mission, is an arch impostor—false, sham, to her finger-tips! Not an uninteresting type to the philosophic student of character; but to an ignorant, ardent mind like Belinda's, about as nauseating a specimen of human nature as our race can produce.

They never came to open or violent rupture, Belinda's money stood between Miss Burke and want; Miss Burke stood between Belinda and her step-mother. They detested each other, were necessary to each other, kept together. Is not a good half of the world forever performing that same duo, in this queer comedy of errors, this jumble of mistaken, enforced companionships, that we call society?

"Poor little Belinda is so curiously frivolous, so thoroughly, constitutionally devoid of all seriousness of purpose," Miss Burke explains, whenever the subject seems to require self-extenuation. "But, her health being delicate—her papa and mamma both in an early grave!—I try to reconcile the out-of-door life she leads, to my conscience."

"Burke is the out-and-outest impostor that ever walked," Belinda will say to her gamin friends. "I saw Tartufe at the play once, and by Heaven, he was nothing to her! What is she an impostor for? If I knew that I might detest her less. I believe the creature is false to her own conscience. I believe she dreams lies!"

So things have gone on until they are as we see them now. Miss Burke collecting ideas for her new great work on social reform, "The Woman of the Future;" Belinda running wild, neglected, as nearly on the road to ruin as was ever innocent, honest little human soul, about the streets of St. Jean de Luz. The practical at war with the ideal, as we so often find to be the case in this imperfect world.

Nothing can be blander than the meeting between Belinda's step-mamma and her preceptress. Miss Burke has held religiously to the letter of the bargain sealed between them in London, has kept the girl conveniently out of Rosie's way during the past three years. Rosie has held to hers; each quarterly payment for material watchfulness and superior intellectual culture has been paid in advance without a question. They begin to talk platitudes. Rose thinks dear Belinda grown, though a little sunburnt; Miss Burke trusts dear Mrs. O'Shea has overcome the fatigues of travelling? A very wearying journey from London to St. Jean de Luz.

"Yes, indeed, especially when one is travelling alone with one's maid," cries Rose, sensitive even as to the smaller proprieties, and virtuously conscious that she only "met" Roger Temple in Paris, Bordeaux and elsewhere. "One does feel so miserably helpless without a gentleman!"

"Well, for my part, I see no use in them, whatever," says Miss Burke. "When you are alone you have nothing but your luggage to look after. When you are burdened with a man," this with a depreciatory glance in the direction of Roger, "you have to look after him and your things too."

"My things!" exclaims Belinda, in her mocking voice. "Well, Miss Burke, in the present state of affairs, my "things" would not require much looking after, with a man or without one. Do you know, ma'am," seriously, "the washer-woman says there is really nothing more of mine for her to bring back. The last remaining tatters I had have vanished.—carried away by the sbirds, I suppose, to build their nests."

She perches herself on her accustomed favorite place, the corner of the table, and looks round cheerfully on the company as she volunteers this information.

A cold glitter comes into Burke's eyes. "You are almost of an age, I must say, Miss O'Shea, to begin to care for order. No achievement in life can ever be made without order. When I was seventeen I had no greater delight than in the neat arrangement of my wardrobe."

"But I have no wardrobe to keep clean, ma'am. Wardrobe? Why, this is my only frock, and as to stock——"

"Belinda, my dear Belinda, you forget! Another time!" interrupts Rose, coloring. "What have you been doing with yourself to-day, my love? And last night—did Mr. Jones see you safe home? I had a note from him this morning saying he had gone off to the mountains, and that I must ask you for particulars. Now what does it all mean?"

She frisks over, like a little lambkin, to her step-daughter's side, and putting her arm round her waist—Belinda holding herself uncompromisingly stiff under the caress begins to gush and titter, school-girl fashion, in her ear. Miss Burke and Roger are thus left to make conversation for each other.

(To be Continued).

How It Feels to be Hanged.

Frank H. Mason, the paroled prisoner who was brought from West Virginia last week by Mr. Cherrington, was "strung" up three times by a mob in the wilds of West Virginia, about forty miles from any railroad. He was suspected of stealing $43 from a store in Calhoun County, and was captured in Roane County by a posse of horsemen, who levelled their guns on him just as he was entering a cornfield. He was then subjected to a variety of inhuman treatment which would make a Hercules shudder, with a view to making him confess. He said: "At dusk I was taken out of the jail to a beech tree about 50 rods away. They threw the rope over a limb, and swung me off over a little embankment. The pain at first was terrible, but soon stars flitted before my eyes. There were more than a million of them, it seemed to me, moving in every direction. Then I began to see all the different colors imaginable, blending in the most beautiful and fantastic outlines. I tell you if you had a thousand paintbrushes, and all the paints in the world, you could not make so many pretty colors. This sensation was pleasant, and I thought I was in a dream. I don't know how long I hung, but my most severe pain was just as I was coming to my senses again. I shook violently, and it seemed as though it would kill me."—Ohio State Journal.

A Point in His Favor.

"This is scandalous," said Mrs. Lushly as she ushered her spouse into the hall very early in the morning. "You must have been making a nice exhibition of yourself down town."

"I was perfectly (hic) shober, orderly, an' dignified all er time," replied Mr. L., assuming an injured look that almost threw him off his balance.

"That is nonsense," said his wife positively, "just a moment ago, while I was looking out of the upstairs window, I saw you trying to unlock the door with a toothpick."

"Posh'bly. Posh'bly; but you bessher life I knew too much to pick my teeth wisher door-key (hic) didn't I?"

A Victim of His Wife's Rapacity.

"Seems to me you are always wanting money, Mary Jane. I gave you 75 cents yesterday. Do you think I am a gold mine? Here's a quarter."

(Uptown an hour later.) "What's that? Carry this State by 15,000? I've got $50 that says he won't. Put up, gentlemen, or shut up. Money talks!"—Chicago Tribune.

The infant child of Paul Bullintz went into spasms on hearing the shrill whistle of the steamer City of Newport, at Bullock's Point, recently, and died in a short time. The family were on the wharf, and the father will sue for damages, claiming that the whistling was unnecessary.

A drum major at Flint, Mich., hurt himself severely while playing with the gorgeous staff with which he excites the wonder of he small boys.

At the Beach Hotel Hop.

How lightly through the dance she trips!
How tastefully she dresses!
What eyes, what cheeks, what lips!
What lovely golden tresses!
Ah, surely, ne'er, o'er shoulders fair,
Rolled such a wealth of golden hair!

In every dancing trees we read
The oft-repeated story:
That lovely woman's hair, indeed,
Is lovely woman's glory.
Love lurks among the tresses fair,
And every ringlet is a snare.

Oh, rare and radiant maid, at thee
How many eyes are glancing!
Around thy snowy neck they see
The golden ripples dancing;
And thou art deemed an angel bright,
Dropped down to grace the ball to-night.

What rapture, were that beauteous head
Upon my breast reclining,
And every gleaming, golden thread
Were round my fingers twining;
Wherever in the world I'd be
That would be joy enough for me!

But, gracious! what do we behold?
The damsel sweet is crying;
Her rippling locks of shimmering gold
Upon the floor are lying;
And to recover them she springs—
'Tis nothing but a wig, by jings!

Girls Who are in Demand.

The girls that are wanted are good girls—
Good from the heart to the lips:
Pure as the lily is white and pure,
From its heart to its sweet leaf tips.
The girls that are wanted are home girls—
Girls that are mother's right hand,
That fathers and brothers can trust, too,
And the little ones understand.

Girls that are fair on the hearthstone—
And pleasant when nobody sees;
Kind and sweet to their own folks
Ready and anxious to please.
The girls that are wanted are wise girls,
That know what to do and to say;
That drive with a smile and a soft word
The wrath of the household away.

The girls that are wanted are girls of sense,
Whom fashion can never deceive;
Who can follow whatever is pretty,
And dare what is silly to leave.
The girls that are wanted are careful girls,
Who count what a thing will cost,
Who use with a prudent, generous hand,
But see that nothing is lost.

The girls that are wanted are girls with hearts;
They are wanted for mothers and wives;
Wanted to cradle in loving arms
The strongest and frailest lives.
The clever, the witty, the brilliant girl,
There are few who can understand;
But, oh! for the wise, loving home girls
There's a constant, steady demand.

Japanese Hush-a-Bye Baby Song.

"Nenne no omori doko ye itta?
Ano yama koete a-sato ye itta.
O-sato no o-miyage nani moratta?
Denden, taiko, ni sho no fuye.
Oki-agari koboshi, ni inu hariko.
Boya wa il ko da,
Ne-ne shi-na!"

Translation.

Hush-a-bye, bye!
Darling baby is so good,
Hush-a-bye, bye!
Where is nursie gone, where did she go?
Over mountains far away to the town, I know.
What buys she for baby dear, in the village store?
Cymbals, drums, flutes, and oh! plenty, plenty more.
Paper doggies, pretty toys, everything for baby,
Darling baby is so good,
Hush-a-bye, bye!

WORE ONE GOWN ALL SEASON.

Mrs. Oscar Wilde Surprises Her Society Associates—Style of the Dress.

It has long been the cause of hissing and reproach on the part of tedious and discursive reformers that women must rival the Athenians in their desire for new things wherewith to clothe themselves and flaunt within the radius of the male regard. If a gown is a good one—a becoming and a beautiful gown—they ask: "Why must a female consider it a reason for shame and sorrow that she must wear it many times?" And then we are told that in the days of our grandmothers it was not thus; that gowns then were handed down from mother to daughter, and a woman's best frock remained her best frock for a generation without causing her a pang. Those can believe such tales who choose, but at all events it is true and vouched for by veracious Americans just now returning from the season in London that Mrs. Oscar Wilde, one of the acknowledged beauties of the world's capital, has worn one evening gown, and one only, throughout the entire three months which make the fashionable period of society there. The esthete designed it for her himself, and it is eminently becoming, being made of pale pink China crape, embroidered with gold and in the extreme of the directoire styles. Of course pale pink crape will not last out a season. It is almost needless to suggest that at the end of three months it would have probably changed to deep gray, but while the material was constantly renewed the model remained the same. Mrs. Wilde has a beautiful, a perfect figure. She is tall, and while well rounded is lithe and sinuous, and there is not an angle about her, therefore she can afford to wear that extreme type of directoire fashions which pitilessly display the faults of a woman's outlines, and beside whose revelations those of the bathing dress are as nothing. This eccentricity on the part of the esthetic's wife caused infinite talk. People couldn't believe their eyes when they met her night after night in the same gown. It came to such a pass that when they knew she was on the list of the invited the guests always watched for her and laid bets among themselves as to whether she would have the courage to wear the pink gown again. When she appeared—always in the pink gown—a smile would pass over the waiting audience and the women would raise their eyebrows expressively at each other.—New York World.

Such Weather!

"And how are we to-day, madam?"

"Well, doctor, the cold I caught the day before yesterday is rather better; but the one I caught on Monday week is ever so much worse—and I caught a brand new one last night!"

At the Seashore.

"Yes, I have seen the day when Mr. Rich, the millionaire, did not have a pair of shoes to cover his feet."

"And when was that, pray?"

"At the time he was bathing."

—"It is no longer fashionable," says the Boston Journal, "to wear flowers in the street, but it is considered correct to carry two or three roses, a cluster of pinks or a bunch of violets in the hand."

—How can you say that a man contracts debts when he is constantly expanding them?

WHAT HEAVEN WILL BE LIKE.

Dr. Talmage on the Probable Experiences of Those Who Will Get There.

THE SENSES WILL SURVIVE.

A New York reporter has been asking various famous clergymen for their views on heaven, "as seen by the eye of faith." Here is what Talmage thinks: "I imagine that we shall do in heaven what we do on earth in our most elevated moods. The constitution of our minds will not change, and I imagine that our tastes that are dominant now will be dominant then. One of the great satisfactions of heaven is in the fact that a man can follow his tastes there that he has possessed here. A great many persons cannot follow the tastes they naturally possess in this world because they have to encounter difficulties in getting a livelihood. A man may be fond of music, yet here he is obliged to heave coal. Another has a fine taste for paintings, but on earth he can afford nothing better than a chromo. A woman may have an exquisite taste for beautiful flowers and can appreciate fine scenery, but she hardly ever sees anything outside of the city in which she lives or the dull routine of her home, where all her tastes are suppressed. In heaven her tastes will be gratified. A Christian astronomer when he dies will enter upon an enlarged sphere. He will have a better observatory at his disposal, a further reach of exploration. In heaven the astronomer will see these other worlds. He will see all that God has created. In other words he is going to be furnished with celestial rapid transit. He will be able to visit Jupiter before breakfast and after tea go to Mercury, after having spent the day with a few friends in Mars. The bodily limitations that confine us will all be gone. The soul will be released and enjoy a freedom which will be delightful and expanding. On earth we can have no real or adequate conception of the human soul, no more than we can the aspirations of the bird we see confined in its cage. The soul is cabined up and has only a couple of windows an inch or two square to look through. In heaven the vision will be limitless, its movement swifter than thought. My ideas of heaven have greatly changed. When I first entered the ministry I had imagined a poetic heaven; now it has become to me a home circle. We can do there whatever we please; our nature is enlarged there; we will enjoy more freedom, a higher state of existence, and go on improving through all eternity We have an imperfect nature in this world, and here we cannot no as we please. We are bound down; our best moods have no scope, no freedom; we are tied down in a great many instances to uncongenial pursuits to which we have become devoted by accident or the force of circumstances. In heaven all this will be changed. Locomotion will be rapid, and, to use a material idea, we shall be able to fly like the bird—that is, if we want to go anywhere the mere wish will accomplish it. This body of ours is the same in outward form that it was seven years ago, yet it is another body. Here is a scar on my finger that I got when I was a boy. It is not the same scar, for our bodies change every seven years, yet it is there. We lose this body at death, and we are promised another body at the resurrection. But that body will be a spiritual body. It will be diaphanous, luminous, ethereal. The soul will have room for expansion, there will be no dross or corruption. My idea is that in heaven our natures will be so enlarged, beautified and enriched that every delightful longing of the purified soul will be satisfied. Our higher aspirations will be gratified, our sensibilities refined and soothed, our tastes for the beautiful, the true, the noble have full and perfect satisfaction. In short, heaven will be a state, a condition of happiness the extent and fulness of which no human mind can comprehend or fully understand. There will be no material life there, as the Spiritualists believe, but an immeasurably enlarged sphere of existence, no time, no space, no hindrance. To wish will be to do, a beatific existence, the glory of which will be equal to the glory and goodness of God."

He Was Green.

City Editor (to a new reporter)—"You say this man was blown up by a can of nitro-glycerine, but you don't say whether he is dead or alive."

New Reporter—"I waited around there four or five hours, but couldn't learn it."

City Editor—"Why couldn't you learn it?"

New Reporter—"Because he hadn't some down when I left."—Binghamton Republican.

Why He Went.

"Is Mr. Bromley tall?"

"Personally he is."

"Personally?"

"Yes. Officially he is short—$30,000 short. That's why he went to Montreal."—Harper's Bazar.

Non-suited.

Lawyer—That coat's too long, the waistcoat is too long; in fact the whole suit is too long.

Tailor—I am very sorry, sir; but I always supposed gentlemen of your profession preferred long suits.

The Charm of Truth.

Angry farmer (to boy in tree)—What are you doing in my apple tree? Boy—Stealing apples, sir. Angry Farmer (after a second thought)—By gosh! Eat'em, my boy, eat'em.—Life.

—Thousands and thousands of people who were once addicted to intemperance in drinking have quit for good. The majority of them are dead, however.

Oh woman, what can man to you deny,
With charms and beauties that make mortals daft?
Fair as the river that reflects the sky,
Deep as the river and as full of craft.

Mrs. Humphrey Ward, author of "Robert Elsmere," is writing another novel.

Upward of 1,000 children are reported to have died from measles in Santiago, Chili, in less than two months.

A toadstool will lift 340 pounds of solid weight while growing, and a common cabbage head will burst staves as thick as those used in pork barrels.

TWO GHOST STORIES.

Was it a Dream?

A press telegram relates that Stephen Pearl Andrews and Courtlandt Palmer had an agreement that the one dying first should within one year after death send to the survivor a certain message. The exact words of the message were fixed upon, and as neither the meaning nor wording of the message was known except to these two, the receipt of it by the survivor would go a good ways towards proving life beyond the grave. Andrews, the noted spiritualist, died first, but although in the flesh familiar with most leading mediums of this country, his disembodied spirit found no means to send the significant words fixed upon to Palmer, the materialist, and the latter went to his grave unconvinced of the life of the soul after the death of the body. The writer can tell of a similar compact, having a dissimilar but hardly more satisfactory ending. Eighteen years ago a disciple of some unusual medicalism hung out his shingle in a small city in the State of New York. A lack of patients rapidly taught him the need of patience, and ere many months he was confronted by grim necessity, the mother of invention. His office was on the second floor, and nearly all the front wall of the building between the sill of his windows and the tops of the windows below was occupied by the sign of a wholesale liquor dealer, who did business on the first floor. With the doctor's family occupying a position as companion and friend of the wife and in some measure governess for the children, was a young lady whose mental brightness was out of all proportion to her worldly fortune. She urged upon the doctor the necessity of some announcement of his principles which should attract first attention and then business. Accepting her views he had painted a long, narrow sign to hang just under the window, and above the sign of the liquor dealer. The sign was hung one morning, and the doctor stepping into the street was startled by an effect the young lady had foreseen from the first. He read:

.....

He who deals out Poison deals out Death.

.....

John Baxter, Wholesale Dealer in Liquors.

Within twenty-four hours the doctor was famous in the city, and, thanks to the pens of the reporters, within forty-eight hours his name had gone all over the State. His lack of patients ended. The young lady alluded to, while a member in good standing of the Methodist Church, was a fearless free-thinker. She was not a spiritualist, but an honest inquirer as to the future. She had marvellous mastery of planchette, but explained it without allowing spiritual interference. However, she believed that if mind did not exist beyond matter, there should be some way of making it known to the living, as she firmly held in the supremacy of mind over the body on earth. While discussing these and like topics, an agreement was entered into between this lady and the writer to the effect that the one dying first, if still retaining spiritual life, should return and set all the doubts of the survivor at rest. Years passed away, the writer had been for a long time a resident of Minnesota, and the compact was a thing scarcely ever thought of, when it was recalled by the reception of a newspaper then two weeks old, which contained an account of the last illness and death of the lady, a sketch of her life, and a full report of a funeral sermon not at all in harmony with the views she held while living. Whether cognizant of the sermon, she gave no sign so far as I know. No message relative to that or any other ideas or experiences after death came back at that time. Some months after a member of a secret Order, to which I belonged, died. He was not an intimate friend, press of business kept me from the funeral and there was nothing to impress it on my mind—surely nothing to connect it with my compact with the dead lady.

Another year went by. Then one morning, after I had been some time awake and as I was lazily summoning resolution to get out of bed, a singular thing happened. The wall of the room opposite the bed, and directly in front of my eyes, became a stone wall. That this change caused me no surprise was the only experience making this seem like a dream. Piercing the stone wall was an arch about eight feet high and opening into a passageway which I knew to be of interminable length. Into this archway from the long passage approached the dead member of the secret Order already alluded to. He was fully clothed in uniform he had no right to wear except in transacting business for the society, under orders. He bore orders in the manner customary in the society. He gave me the salute due from him to one holding the position I had attained since his death. He spoke clearly, plainly, perfectly naturally, and with official gravity: "Miss —— instructs me to tell you that there is a life beyond the grave. Her duties are such as to render it impossible to return herself to give you any information." He saluted again and disappeared, the arch and wall were gone, and I, now the most astonished man on the face of the earth, was staring at the familiar features of my room. There was no consciousness of an awakening, no sensation of having slept since early dawn, but greater wonder and an excitement momentarily increasing, which made it difficult to dress. So far as I know there had been nothing in my mind or surroundings for weeks previously likely to call up such a vision. I do not explain the affair, nor regard it as significant. It left me only confident that I was not sleeping at the time. Whatever illusion or delusion may have deceived me, it was not, in my opinion, a dream.

Recently I read of the doctor as a great leader in some mind or faith cure movement in Chicago. Just how it differs from the rest I never took the trouble to find out, but as his medicalism is different from orthodoxism so his faith differs from other faiths or his cures from other cures. In interviews given to press representatives, he is to-day teaching almost identically the theories held by the lady, but which he scouted while she was a member of his family. Perhaps she has converted him by posthumous argument. The foregoing is a record of facts and actual experiences.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

THE STANDARD OF LOVELINESS.

Something About the Belles of Different Races.

Various, says the London Standard, are the opinions held by a wide diversity of races regarding their beauties, though it is often difficult for people bred under another sky to share their enthusiasm. The Circassian women, who have a sort of conventional reputation for loveliness, are affirmed by those who know them best to be far from worthy of their celebrity. Short legs, glaring red hair, faces so long and narrow that their heads seem to have been squeezed between two boards and flattened, noses out of proportion to the rest of the features, and complexion of a dull lead-like hue, scarcely constitute beauty according to our standard. The Moors and the Tunisian Jews regard corpulence as absolutely essential to beauty, and the inmates of rich men's harems are stuffed with nutritious food, like Strasbourg geese for the market. The Chinese poets sing of deformed feet as "golden lilies," and the rocking of their women in attempting to walk as the "waving of a willow." Other races have equally odd ideas of what constitute loveliness, for they "improve" their persons by flattening their foreheads, tattooing their skins, cutting off their fingers, filing their teeth or dyeing them black, blue or tartan, painting their bodies, slitting their ears, compressing their waists, putting stones, bone or metal through their lips, cheeks or ears, and in a dozen other ways trying to enhance the poor 'prentice work of nature. A Felatah lady dyes her hands and feet with hennah, stains her teeth alternately blue, yellow and purple, one here and their being left its natural color, pencils her eyelids with sulphuret of antimony and dyes her locks with indigo. The Hydah woman inserts a plug of wood or ivory through her lower lip until it presents the hideous appearance of a fleshy shelf over her chin. A Chinese or a Siamese lady cultivates long nails. A Hottentot belle cannot get her nose flat enough, or a Persian beauty hers high enough. On the northwest coast of America no reproach is more bitter than for one Indian girl to tell another that "Your mother was too lazy to flatten your head." Tattooing is almost universal among half-civilized or savage races; in New Zealand the Maori women, before they began to imbibe European prejudices, even tattooed their lips, lest they should have the reproach of being red. Some races slit their ears until they hang in loops on their shoulders. Others insert huge rings and other ornaments through the cartilage of their noses. The Louisiade Islanders regard the lid of a sardine box as a particularly neat piece of jewelry; and even European women have not yet ceased to suspend bits of stone and metals through the lobes of their ears. There is, in truth, no possibility of arriving at any standard of beauty.

SLEEPING AFTER MEALS.

A Widespread, but Mistaken Belief—Rest for the Brain.

There is a widespread superstition, cherished by a great majority of the people, that to sleep immediately after they have taken food is to endanger health, to favor the onset of apoplexy, etc. a superstition based on the assumption that during sleep the brain is normally congested. There is, no doubt, such a thing as congested sleep, but during normal sleep the brain is anæmic. When a person has taken a fairly abundant lunch or dinner the stomach demands a special influx of blood, wherewith to accomplish its work of digestion; no organ can more easily comply with that demand than the brain, which, when in full activity, is suffused with a maximum amount of the vital fluid. But a derivation of blood from the brain to the stomach can only take place, except in exceptionally full-blooded and vigorous persons, on the condition that the cerebral functions be meanwhile partially or wholly suspended. Hence many people after taking dinner feel indisposed for mental action, and not a few long for sleep. The already partially anæmic brain would fain yield up to the stomach a still further supply of blood and yield itself up to refreshing sleep. Doing so it gains new strength; meanwhile digestion proceeds energetically, and soon body and mind are again equipped to continue in full force the battle of life. But superstition, the child of ignorance, intervenes, declares that sleep during digestion is dangerous, admonishes the would-be sleepers to struggle against their perilous inclination, and, though telling them that after dinner they may sit awhile, assures them of the adage, "after supper walk a mile." The millions of its victims continue, therefore, the strife to which it condemns them, and ignore the suggestions offered to them by the lower animals, who have always practiced the lessons of sound physiology by sleeping after feeding whenever they are allowed to do so. Hence the human brain and human stomach of such victims contend with each other during the digestive process; the brain, impelled by superstition, strives to work and demands blood to work with, while the stomach, stimulated by its contents, strives to carry on its marvellous chemistry, and demands an ample supply of blood for the purpose. The result of the struggle is that neither is able to do its work well, and the brain is enfeebled by being denied its natural rest during the digestive process, and the healthy function of the stomach degenerates into dyspepsia.—Westminster Review.

When Mrs. Cleveland received the Persian Minister the other day she wore a rich brown faille draped over a white cloth petticoat, with a border at the foot braided in gold, Persian in colors and design. A white cloth vest with similar braiding was inserted in the basque, and she looked very handsome.

A young Syracuse lady has become so addicted to the use of cloves that her health is becoming broken and her physician says that unless she abandons the habit she will pay the penalty with her life. She has been known to consume a quarter of a pound of cloves in a day. As a between-the-act operator, she would be an expensive success.

Lady Dudley, the famous English beauty, is as white as a pond lily.

There is, perhaps, no more infallible sign of vulgarity than the mistaking of fashion for good breeding, and yet there is perhaps no error more common.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe has made the most remarkable recovery her physicians have ever witnessed. When she left Sag Harbor it was believed that she could not live to reach Hartford. Now, however, she is better than she has been for some years and is able to walk.

A contributor to Nouveaux Remedes cites a statement by a Brazilian physician to the effect that flies are, as we lately suggested, most active agents in the propagation of yellow fever. Their agency in spreading pulmonary consumption is unquestionable, and Koch is of the opinion that they may play the same part in spreading cholera.

Princess Louise her and mother-in-law do not seem to pull well together. The Marchioness is now staying at Inverary Castle on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, and Lord Lorne is also there. More than ten years have elapsed since the Princess was last at Inverary, and her stay will be brief, as she is to open a new College of Science at Newcastle-on-Tyne on Monday next.

J. Q. A. Ward, of New York, is engaged upon a statue of Henry Ward Beecher for Prospect Park, in that city. It will be of heroic size and will show the subject dressed in his characteristic manner. The granite pedestal, to be designed by R. M. Hunt, will be nine feet high. At either side of the pedestal will be bronze figures. At the left a young negress will be seen laying a palm-leaf at Mr. Beecher's feet. At the right will be figures of two white children. Mr. Ward is also engaged upon a statue of Horace Greeley for the Tribune building.

Stories of the eccentricities of the baby king of Spain continue to amuse Europe. The continent is laughing at his latest escapade, which came near to involving his country in serious trouble. A newly-appointed minister to Spain from an influential European country reached Madrid and after a time was presented to the young potentate. The minister is bald-headed, but wears a long, flowing beard. "Oh, mother," exclaimed Alfonso, when he caught sight of the diplomat, "he's combed his hair the wrong way." The relations between Spain and the minister's country are somewhat strained at present, but a settlement of the misunderstanding is hoped for.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes: For the first time in the annals of the London University College, a lady is put up as candidate for a professional chair. The Chair of Archæology, vacant by the retirement of Sir Charles Newton, will be contested by Miss Jane Harrison, whose lectures on Greek art have won for her a high place among the lecturers of the day. This lady, a graduate of Newnham College, is recognized by scholars as holding an almost unique place among them for her knowledge, especially of the popular form of Greek art expressed on vase paintings. She has been several times in Greece, where every sort of honor has been paid to her by the King, by professors, and by officials.

"Dr." David Hostetter, the bitters man, died in New York city the other day. He was a Pennsylvanian by birth who went to California in 1850, crossing the Isthmus of Panama upon a mule and going thence to San Francisco in company with Commodore Garrison and Ralston, the future banker. He kept a grocery store in San Francisco for three months and was then burned out. In 1853 he began the manufacture at Pittsburg of his bitters from a formula supplied by his father, an educated physician, and, it is said, peddled his goods through the street in a wheelbarrow. He originated Pittsburg's natural gas enterprise, having in 1875 taken the gas in rubber bags to that city for analysis. He carried a life insurance policy of over $300,000.

The official report on the Great Yukon River, just made by the Dominion explorers, shows that for 600 miles it is in British territory. This includes 200 miles of the gold-mining regions where the chief mining camps are situated. The river is 2,300 miles long, of which 2,000 are navigable without a single rapid or portage. Its breadth is six to seven miles in places and averages three or four. Rivers emptying into the Yukon are broader than the Hudson at New York. Little of the region traversed is fit for agricultural purposes, although there are valleys suitable for stock raising. Potatoes and other vegetables equal to the best produced in Ontario are raised at the further northern posts of the Hudson Bay Company. The country abounds with minerals and the winters are not more severely felt than those of central Canada.

In 1852, when Pierce (Democrat) and Scott (Whig) were the candidates for President of the United States, the New York Democrats wanted to carry Pennsylvania by sending a large sum of money to Philadelphia to help the boys "pay expenses." They were so closely watched by the Whigs that there was but little chance of effecting the scheme secretly. John Brougham, the great comedian of the day, was a strong Democrat, and undertook the job. He made a wager of $5,000 that he would play at the Bowery Theatre, New York, and in Philadelphia the same night. The wager created the greatest excitement. Brougham got through his piece at the Bowery by 10 o'clock, arrangements having been made to take his company by the wagons of Adams' express to the Jersey City depot. Everything was ready. The police cleared the streets on the line of route for the race against time, and away flew the express wagons to the ferryboat, all Broadway being in an uproar. The special train was reached and flew with lightning speed, reaching Philadelphia in due course, when the numerous boxes of silver and gold were safely landed, which accompanied the "theatrical baggage!" John Brougham played his piece, finishing after midnight, won his wager, and carried Pennsylvania for the Democrats! That's the way they did the thing "befo' de wah."

No Need of Worry.

Dame (at table)—My gracious! You are spilling that gravy on the carpet.

New waitress (cheerfully)—There's plinty more in the kitchen, mum.

In Scotland in October the weather was unusually genial, and this enabled farmers to overtake the late work of the harvest under exceptionally favorable circumstances.

THE ADVANCE.

Is published
Every Thursday,
FROM THE OFFICE,
Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.
TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:
$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1 50 per annum when not so paid
W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, NOV. 22, 1888.

ANNEXATIONISTS REBUKED.

At a banquet of dental societies of the State of New York, held in Syracuse, at which 250 members were present, Dr. Beers, of Montreal, replied to the toast: "Professional Annexation." His speech on that occasion has been published in the Empire, and has created a wide-spread interest in Canada. Its fearless tone and denunciation of American injustices have placed Dr. Beers somewhat in the light of a hero in the eyes of loyal Canadians. Right in the heart of the enemy he delivered telling blows, and scathing rebukes of political unfairness on the part of American officials, and to the croakers and intriguers in our own country. It was one of the most eloquent and telling efforts of the kind which has yet been delivered on the subject, and should be read by every Canadian. It does seem that the commercial annexationist, alias commercial unionist, alias political annexationist, should entertain from the reading of this article so strong a sense of shame that he would forever remain silent upon the question. Dr. Beers is well known in the literary world, and is a citizen of whom Canada may well be proud. The sentiment expressed in the following extract breaths of true loyalty, and it is men who possess this sentiment that are the true rulers of the destiny of a country. He said: No one more than loyal Americans would despise the poltroon who carries his patriotism in his pocket; the disloyalty of the political parasite who would make patriotism a house of cards, and dollars the chief end of the people; intriguers who hiss out secession or annexation when they fail to get their political crimes or crotchets enshrined; men whose hunger for notoriety and power is a fever of their existence. I am sure that you could have nothing but contempt for any free people who measure their allegiance purely by commercial standards, and who, fearing to face the difficulties which meet every nation, turn pedlars instead of protectors of their national birthright. Just as you had and have your croakers and cowards we have ours, but, Mr. Chairman, Canada is not forsale! There have been prophets like Goldwin Smith since the days of Elizabeth who have predicted England's decline in their time, but all the colonial [illegible] of England has been devel[oped] since the time of Elizabeth. We have, as you have, bitter partizans in the press and in politics who delight to foul their own nest, who revel in the rain that destroys the crops, and who sincerely believe they can change the climate if they could change the government. We have a few of those wiseacres of society who assume to possess a monopoly of foresight, and who, like Caius Caligula, think the world would have been better made could they have been consulted. But these people no more represent the convictions of Canadians than O'Donovan Rossa or our fire-eating politicians and papers represent those of true Americans.

And again:

Confederated Canada, respected Canada, loyal Canada, progressive Canada is a personal and political insult to the sore-headed parties who opposed Confederation, who would welcome annexation to Turkey or Russia were we neighbors, or rejoice even at annihilation rather than live the agonizing life of seeing their prospects and predictions destroyed. There were millions of your own citizens glad to do their worst to dismember your union; there were thousands who gave their lives to wreck the republic that their own State interests might be promoted. Yet when a few obscure cranks in Canada declare in favor of annexation, you think they speak the sentiment of a sober people who do not find it necessary to indulge in the spectacular or the rhetorical that you may see and hear the truth. You choose to ignore the treason of many a Southern newspaper to-day as you did twenty-five years ago, and you exalt as gospel the partisans of the Canadian press, who are incapable of telling the truth.

Dr. Beers is by no means an old man, and this remarkable speech strengthens the desire that he may some day prove himself a servant to his country in a public capacity and win for himself a name which will stand high upon the pedestal of fame, among the few grand titles which are already shining down the years.

Sam Armstrong, Esq., M.P.P. for Parry Sound district, is resigning his seat for the purpose of taking the registrarship of that district. Another good grit salted down!

Some one said that "Woman is the root of all evil." Last Saturday Frank Barber shot and killed himself at Niagara Falls. He had been entrapped into a marriage with a dissolute woman, and the horror of this disclosure was more than he could bear and live.

Municipal Matters in Euphrasia.

To the Editor of The Advance.

SIR, We notice according to the Markdale Standard, that councillor Erskine is once more aspirant for county honors in this township. It will be well remembered, that this same Erskine a few years ago was foolish enough to take the field in opposition to Mr. Fawcett, the then incumbent of the office of second county representative. On that occasion the electors of Euphrasia spoke at the polls with no uncertain sound. Erskine was given tangible proof that Euphrasia was not in need of his services as a county representative. Comprehending this fact, he complied with the township's request "to step down lower," and accordingly very soon appeared in the field as a candidate for the office of councillor. However, notwithstanding the very open reproof administered to him at that time, he is still mean enough to attempt to sneak into the coveted position between Fawcett and McAusland. He has not moral courage enough to oppose either one of the above named gentlemen alone, but finding them in deadly combat, he is willing to forego his manhood and attempt to sneak in as it were unobserved. His conduct brings very forcibly to our mind a story we read in our boyhood. On an occasion two mastiffs met one carrying a bone, the other torn by the ravages of hunger. The hungry one seized the other in an attempt to wrest the bone from him. On this No 1 dropped the bone and engaged the other in deadly combat. At this juncture a little half starved cur which had been following the first mastiff stole up, seized the bone, and made off with it. He had not gone far when the death of the second mastiff left the first at liberty to regain his property. On coming up with the cur he seized it, threw it down, placed his huge paw upon it, and in this position proceeded to devour the bone. This completed he grasped the poor little cur between his [illegible] jaws, carried it to a pond near by, swam with it to the centre, dipped it beneath the surface a few times and then dropped it. The poor little cur on being released, ran howling home while the mastiff trotted on his way wagging his tail with satisfaction. We have no objection to seeing Erskine in the field as a candidate for the Dept. Reeve [illegible] when the present contest between McAusland and Fawcett is satisfactorily decided. Fawcett claims [illegible] that it was inact[ive] [illegible] that defeated him a lot polling day [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] and McAusland [illegible] a small transaction which took place at the Council board. A certain individual living in the vicinity of Kimberley sold gravel to a pathmaster, and it appears in the drawing of the gravel some fancied damage was done to the individual's private roadway. He went to the Council and stated his grievance very generously on his own mind, making the remark, "that he did not expect full pay for the amount of damage done, that if he received one half he would be well satisfied. The reeve proposed giving him ten or twelve dollars. Oh! said Erskine, let us make it fifteen or twenty. McAusland immediately draws up a motion to the effect that this more than generous public philanthropist be paid the sum of fifteen dollars as a reimbursement for the alleged damage done. Said fifteen dollars to include five dollars, the price of the gravel sold and drawn over said private road. Erskine signed this motion and every member of the Board voted for it save one and that one, the very one who had the best right to understand the merits of this individual's claim on the public funds. We see then, that this township paid ten dollars for the drawing of five dollars worth of gravel. Moreover this was only half value, for surely they would not give more than the man claimed, so really our township fathers valued that damage at twenty dollars, such alone can be the inference drawn from the facts adduced. We noticed again this money was voted away without a report from any member of the Council Board, a case without a precedent in the annals of township affairs. Was it not clear to this gravel vendor, that if he sold gravel, there must of necessity be a roadway to the pit, that wagons would of necessity leave some impression on the soil they passed over. All this considered, he must have sold the gravel to make money, just as he would sell a load of wheat, hay or wood. Then in the name of reason, when he of his own free will took the consequences, why should McAusland and Erskine squander the township's money, in making presents of this kind to every Tom, Dick and Harry who has cheek enough to ask for them. Are your public thoroughfares in such a good state of repair, that our township must forsooth squander the public funds building individual private roads. We ask, has this township ousted Fawcett in order to place such a free-handed incumbent in the Dept. chair. Is this, or rather are these the men, who can with such lavish hands squander township moneys the men who aspire to a seat in the County Council. Electors of Euphrasia, beware

A WESTERN RATE-PAYER.

Inistioge.

From our own Correspondent.

Threshing is about wound up here for this season and the farmers seem satisfied with this year's produce.

Engineer Johnston has resumed his situation at the Proton Station saw mills.

Mr. McArdle has been re engaged as teacher in S. S. No. 4, Artemesia, for the ensuing year.

Mrs. W. Reid and Mr. A. Lonsaway, who have been on the sick list for some time back, are both able to be around again.

Practice is going on lively here preparatory to the Methodist S. S. Anniversary, which comes off about Christmas.

The Dandalk Herald has been trying to explain in its recent issue the difference between "master" and "teacher", and it has come to the conclusion that there is none. The two words are in the same gender of course. However we will leave the matter to the readers of The Advance and Herald, to judge which of the two expressions are the most proper, a "male head teacher" or a "male head master." We do not deem it necessary to enter into any lengthy discussion about a matter so trifling, but judging from the editorial we presume that the editor was absent from the Herald office last week and that he left his devil in charge of the paper.

That hacking cough can be so quickly cured by Shiloh's Cure. We guarantee it.

Will you suffer with Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint? Shiloh's Vitalizer is guaranteed to cure you.

Monthly Fairs.

Orangeville The second Thursday in each month
Dundalk Tuesday before Orangeville.
Flesherton- Monday before Orangeville.
Markdale Saturday before Orangeville.
Durham Third Tuesday in each month
Chatsworth Monday before Durham
Holland Center Saturday before Chatsworth.
Priceville Monday before Durham.
Hanover Monday before Durham.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$6 00 to	6 00
Fall Wheat	$1 10 to	1 10
Spring Wheat	1 10	1 10
Barley	0 50	0 65
Oats	0 33	0 33
Peas	0 58	0 58
Butter	0 17	0 18
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 25	6 25
Hay per ton	8 00	10 00
Hides	4 50	5 52
Wool	18	00
Sheepskins	0 50	1 06
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 8	0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 05	0 05

Flesherton Pathmasters' Statement, 1888.

RECEIPTS

J. W. Armstrong, treasurer, statute labor commutation	$172 40
Poll tax	9 60
Lumber sold	1 07
Councillor Sharp, grant	10 00
Peter Munshaw, grant	5 50
Borrowed from Council for statute labor account, 1889	13 00
	$212 57

EXPENDITURE.

Boyd Bros., account for lumber	$ 16 30
M. Akitt, account for lumber	93 54
Wm. Bradley, sawing and delivering crossings	5 00
John C. Adams, 5 cedar crossings, $5, and 100 posts, $4.50	9 50
Richard Smith, 1 cedar crossing	1 00
Wm. Heard, 32 cedar posts	2 24
J. E. Moore, 15 cedar posts	1 05
J. E. Moore, cedar plank	3 60
Wm. Irwin, 27 cedar posts	1 89
M Richardson, nails and spikes	7 35
J. G. Russell, building sidewalk	4 30
Wm. Smith, ditching and cutting weeds	4 25
D. Taylor, 2½ days' work	3 12
John Bellamy, 7¾ days' work	10 87
Chas. Bellamy, 10 days' work	15 00
W. H. Elder, ploughing and scraping	3 00
Henry Holman, drawing logs	1 00
Henry Wilson, drawing logs	1 00
N. Lawrence, teaming	0 50
Alfred Wilkerson, work	0 50
Wm. Varty, moving and building side-walk and filling earth	23 00
P. Holman, statute labor	1 80
Wm. Clayton, statute labor	2 10
Printing statement	1 00
Cash balance on hand	0 96
	$212 57

P. Holman and W. Clayton, pathmasters.

The Advance for $1 till Jan.1, 1890.

For lame back, side or chest, use Shiloh's Porous Plaster. Price 25 cents

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Came Astray.

Came to the premises of T. A. Gamey, lot 13 and 14, 2nd south of Durham Road, on Nov 12, a small black mare. The owner is requested to prove property, pay expenses, and take it away.
T. A. GAMEY, Flesherton Station P. O

SALE Of Valuable Farm Property.

Under and by virtue of the power of sale contained in a mortgage made by Andrew C. McRae, default having been made in payment thereof, will be sold by PUBLIC AUCTION.

At Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton,

ON

Monday, Nov. 26th, 1888,

at 12 o'clock, noon, the following property, viz:

Lot No 7 in the 2nd Concession, Township of Euphrasia, in the County of Grey, containing by admeasurement 100 acres more or less. This is a fine hardwood bush lot, and is about nine miles from Flesherton. The sale will be subject to a reserve bid.

TERMS one half cash, balance secured by mortgage payable in from one to five years option of purchaser.

A deposit of $100 to be paid at time of sale. For further particulars apply to STAUNTON & [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
Or to [illegible]
Auctioneer, Flesherton.
Nov. 7, 1888

AUCTION SALE OF Valuable Farm IN THE Township of Artemesia

Under and by virtue of the power of sale in a mortgage from David W. Jenison to the vendor which will be produced at the time of sale, and on default of payment of the moneys thereby secured there will be offered for sale by Public auction

AT MUNSHAW'S HOTEL, in the Village of Flesherton,

Wednesday, the 5th Day of December, 1888,

At 10 o'clock, a.m., by A. S. Vandusen, auctioneer.

The north half of Lot No. 36 in the ninth concession of Artemesia, containing 50 acres, more or less, of which about 45 are said to be cleared and under cultivation and fenced. On the premises are said to be a frame house and a barn and orchard

TERMS--Ten per cent. at time of sale, and for the balance terms liberal, and will be made known at time of sale.

For further particulars apply to
W. J. BELLAMY, ESQ., Flesherton,
Or to MOSS, BARWICK & FRANKS,
Vendors' Solicitors.
Toronto, Nov 12th, 1888

—It Pays To—

Go to THE BEST

AND THAT IS THE Northern Business College,
OF OWEN SOUND.

The best and most practical course of study.
The best teaching talent
The best accommodation for students.
The best methods of instruction
The best results from that instruction after students graduate.
For annual announcements giving particulars regarding the course of study, terms &c., address
C. A. FLEMING, PRINCIPAL.
Owen Sound, Nov 1st, 1888

Farm for Sale

The subscriber offers for sale that valuable property on the 4th line, Osprey, better known as lot 4 containing 125 acres; 90 cleared and 60 under cultivation, the remainder pasture and meadow. New frame barn, stone foundation; stables etc. new frame house, cellar, and stone foundation. This is a magnificent property [illegible] possession immediately. For terms, etc., apply to
A. McKENZIE, Maxwell P. O

Blacksmith Shop for Sale or Rent.

The blacksmith shop, known as Allison's, on the 4th line, Artemesia, about 3½ miles from Flesherton, is offered for sale or to rent. For terms and particulars apply to
DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Eugenia P. O.

Butcher Business for Sale.

A good paying butcher business is offered for sale in Flesherton, five and six beeves killed each week, besides small animals. To an enterprising man this is a first class opportunity for securing a nice business. For further particulars apply to
BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
butchers, Flesherton.

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
PURVEYORS TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Dealers in fresh and cured meats, sausage (our own make), lard, bologna, etc. etc

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only $4 per. hundred.

Call and ascertain prices, whether you buy or not,

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,
FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts, 2nd door North of Richardson & Co.

Medical.

DR. CARTER,
M.C.P. & S., ONT.
PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.
FLESHERTON.
Office S[illegible] Residence, J. G. Russel's

J. G. Hutton, MD CM.
M[ember] of the college of Physicians and S[urgeons] [illegible]
[illegible] east of Grier's store [illegible] Priceville, Nov 19, 1888
[illegible]
J. G. Hutton, MD.

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L. D. S.
SURGEON DENTIST
Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the [illegible]
Will [be] at FLESHERTON Munshaw's Hotel [illegible] Teeth extracted, inserted and filled in the [lat]est styles of the art, and at moderate rate
HEAD OFFICE, [illegible] YONGE ST., TORONTO

J. P. MARSHALL,
L. D. S., DENTIST.
Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.
Flesherton each trip on the day following.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,
Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.
Office,—Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.
A. A. CRESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.
MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P McCULLOUGH,
Barrister, Solicitor, &c.
Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,
FLESHERTON, CO. GREY.
DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER in B. R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent for purchase and sale of lands. Appraiser for C. L. C. Com and F. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. Issuer of MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC

MONEY TO LOAN.
AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES
On Town or Farm Property,
S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton

W. J. BELLAMY.
TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.
CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER INSURANCE AG'T, &C
DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance affected in first class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates

R. J. Sproule,
POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any pary of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,
The Tinsmith, - Flesherton
Repairing, Eavetroughing, and in fact everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts

—NEW—

FALL GOODS!

—AT THE—

Central Store,

Priceville.

Having received our Fall stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best Value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have confidence in a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well assorted stock.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and comprises substantial and serviceable for Men and Boys.

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

still retain the unapproachable. Our motto being good Goods and Low Prices. Come and see us.

Central Store, Priceville.

A. McCAIBE.

FLESHERTON

Implement

Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Binders,
Reapers,
Mowers,
Rakes,
Steppers,
Buggies,
Sleighs,
Cutters,
Fanning Mills,
Spring Tooth Cultivators.
Grain Drills,
Broad-cut Seeders,
Spring Tooth Harrows,
Iron Harrows,
Two-Furrow Gang Plow,
Hoes,
Scufflers,
Turnip Drills,
Land Rollers.

FLOUR, FLOUR,

STONE

FLOUR!

MR. P LOUCKS

Is prepared to do your Gristing on short notice and grinds on the old terms of every twelfth bushel. Seven cents per bag of two bushels for Chopping done every day. The Little Mill is big in the estimation of the public.

Satisfaction Guaranteed

P. LOUCKS, Proprietor.

Good stabling for horses.

NOTICE.

SHINGLES constantly on hand and for sale cheap. Just put in first class new Chopping Mill, now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B SLOAN,
Kinglnia.

FARM for SALE

Being part of Lot No. 24 in the 6th Con. of Artemesia containing fifty acres. The above property situated about one-and-a-half miles from the village of Kimberley, all under cultivation and magnificent land.

Apply to
A. ALDOUS
Kimberley P.

SALESMEN WANTED for the New England Nurseries, established over 30 years. The old reliable nursery. Men with push, energy, good habits and clean character always succeed. We can give you good pay and steady work. Write for terms to CHAS. BROTHERS' COMPANY, Nurserymen, Colborne, Ont.

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT and PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on
EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

Buy a new

HARNESS

PURCHASE A

SLEIGH ROBE

INVEST IN

A new Whip

BIG DISCOUNT

FOR

C-A-S-H

D. Clayton

HARNESSMAKER,

FLESHERTON.

is prepared to give you large DSCOUNTS for CASH on all kinds of harness, whips, blankets, etc.

A

Huge Stock!

—OF—

SINGLE, TEAM, AND DRIVING HARNESS, on hand.

Sleigh Bells, Robes, Whips, Hoof Ointment, Axle Grease, Curry Combs, Brushes, and everything required in the line of harness makers' supplies.

WE ALSO DEAL IN

A SUPERIOR

QUALITY

OF

TRUNKS

CALL and EXAMINE our extra large stock before buying anything in these lines elsewhere.

D. CLAYTON.

N. B.—My accounts are now ready and waiting for settlement. As I am in great need of money, all persons who are indebted to me are requested to call and settle, ON OR BEFORE DEC. 1st, otherwise their accounts will be placed in other hands for collection.

D. Clayton.

For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON.

The interior of the central hall is finished in polished granite and the rarest colored marbles, the roof being supported by massive pillars of polished granite, each column formed seemingly of one solid block, 25 to 30 feet in length. This hall is profusely adorned with statuary of eminent men. There are two other large halls, in which the courts are held. I recollect being at one assize here where I saw four men at one time on their trial for murder. They were all condemned and hung at one time at Kirkdale gaol, when executions were as public as it was possible to make them. We next visited the Brown museum, facing the west facade of St. George's hall. Near this is a lofty column surmounted with a colossal figure of the Iron Duke, old Wellington, who shares with Nelson the adoration of the people everywhere for their martial heroes.

After resting a while in the reading room we went to the museum containing the extensive colection of Egyptian and other antiquities and articles of vertu, collected by Joseph Mayer; also the contents of several other museums of the town, forming in all one of the rarest and richest collections in the kingdom. It would occupy a day to go through the department of natural history alone. Here are specimens of nearly every known bird and fish, numbering thousands, also almost every known animal except the domestic animals. There is attached an aquarium, where in large tanks with heavy plate glass fronts the denizens of the sea, as well as of fresh water, are seen disporting themselves in their native element, mid rocks, corals, shells or seaweed. The collection of Egyptian antiquities is very extensive, and contains mummies excellently preserved. Here we see a man who walked the earth in the time of Moses, and from the record on his coffin of stone was a door keeper in the temple of Isis. Here again we look on an Egyptian princess who lived two thousand years ago. Again we look on an Egyptian warrior who won earth's fame and died long before Britain had a name among the nations. Some of their coffins are of stone weighing several tons each, and covered with inscriptions. I was most interested in the extensive collection of rare and ancient clocks and watches, some of the latter being too large for any pocket; even the outside pocket of an overcoat would be encumbered with them. Others were very small and of strange shapes; one was a beetle with green enameled wings: on pressing a spring they fly up and disclose a tiny dial on the beetles back. Another watch was in the form of a tiny padlock, and was made by Louis XVI. for his queen, Marie Antoinette. We noticed a rare and rich set of jewelry made by order of Napoleon I., and given by him to Josephine. It consisted of exquisitely cut cameos set in enamelled gold, and included necklet, bracelet, ear rings, brooch, and tiara. The collection of ancient arms and armour was very extensive, but to give casual notice of the one hundredth part would be too long and tedious.

Our Toronto friend went north by midnight train, but we did not leave until 9.30 next morning. The ride through the country after the monotonous scenery of an ocean voyage was to us charming. It was hay harvest, and as the day was fine we passed scores of fields with groups of men and women busy making or gathering hay. The neatly trimmed hedgerows, the cosy homesteads, the deep green of the grass lands, divided in fields of all shapes and sizes, the picturesque groups of haymakers, all combined to give scenery to us unrivaled beauty. We recalled those beautiful lines of Mrs Hemans on English Homes.

"The cottage homes of England,
How beautiful they stand,
Amid their ivy mantled trees,
On all the pleasant land.

Mid glowing orchards forth they peep,
Each from his world of leaves,
And household there they newly sleep
As the birds beneath their eaves.

Passing the large manufacturing centre of Wigan & Preston, we came into a less populous but more picturesque district. Stopping awhile at Lancaster, we saw quite near the station, which is on an eminence over looking the town, the Ancient Castle remarkable for its elegance and embracing the courts and gaol within its precincts. Looking down into the old town we saw the magnificent aqueduct carrying the canal over the river, which is also spanned by a bridge with fine arches. Anon we are carried at great speed into the county of Westmoreland, and approaching the old town of Kendal, which lies in a hollow on our left, we saw on a hill overlooking the town the ruins of an old castle, in which Catherine Parr, on of the queens of the much-married King Henry the 8th, was born. Kendal is one of the oldest manufacturing towns in England, the woollen manufacturing having been established here by Flemish weavers in the 14th century. Kendal green cloth is mentioned by Shakespeare, and was celebrated in his time. From here the grade rises until we reach the summitt of Shap Fells, and the road passes the famous quarries of shap granite. The cuttings are through solid beds of granite, which give a peculiar metallic rumble to the train as though passing through an iron tubular bridge. From here I noted the rate at which we travelled to Penrith, ten miles, exactly ten minutes.

To be continued.

Sleepless nights, made miserable by that terrible cough. Shiloh's Cure the Remedy for you.

High License.

HOW IT STIMULATES SHEBEENISM.

A despatch from Scranton, Pa., says that high license fails utterly to do useful work in Lackawanna County. The court licensed only 241 persons to sell liquor, but more than 1,300 are paying the federal liquor-dealers' tax, (which is necessary even for those with a local license, to escape most severe penalties.) Thus more than 1,000 men are selling liquor in the county in violation

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene L. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

does sell." Prepared by

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1, six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

FREE $85 solid GOLD WATCH Sold for $1400 on application. Best ONE watch in the world. Perfect Time. Warranted Heavy Solid Gold Hunting Cases, elegant and magnificent. Both ladies and gents sizes with works and cases of equal value. ONE PERSON in each locality can secure one FREE. How is this possible? We answer—we want one person in each locality, to keep in their homes, and show to those who call, a complete line of our valuable and very useful HOUSEHOLD SAMPLES. These samples, as well as the watch, we send free, and after you have kept them in your home for 2 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property. It is possible to make this great offer, sending the SOLID GOLD watch and ONLY samples free, as the showing of the samples in any locality, always results in a large trade for us; after our samples have been in a locality for a month or two we usually get from $1000 to $5000 in trade from the surrounding country. This, the most wonderful offer ever known, is made in order that our samples may be placed at once where they can be seen, all over America. Write at once, and make sure of the chance. Reader it will be hardly any trouble for you to show the samples to those who may call at your home and your reward will be most satisfactory. A postal card on which to write us costs but 1 cent and after you know all, if you do not care to go further, why no harm is done. But if you do send your address at once, you can secure FREE one of the best solid gold watches in the world and our large line of COSTLY SAMPLES. We pay all express, freight, etc. Address GEO. STINSON & CO., Box 613, PORTLAND, MAINE.

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

s where can they get their flour, feed, and provisions cheapest in town.

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S.

All kinds of meal always on hand.

TO THE FARMERS AND PUBLIC GENERALLY:

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH:

at all hours of the day, ONLY 15 cts. All other lines in stock as usual.

The peoples faithful servant,

G. H. BLACKBURN.

Remember the place—Next door to M. Richardson's

Bargains

BARGAINS!

BARGAINS!!

BARGAINS!

Now is the time to secure them,

BEDROOM

—AND—

PARLOR SUITES

QUITE NEW in design, very tasty and neat, to be sold at a small advance on cost.

Beautiful new line of

LOUNGES

IN RAMIE.

TAPESTRY and NEW SILK COVERINGS.

These goods have all been bought very close and we intend giving custmoers the full benefit.

Handsome Hall Stands, in Mahogany Finish

Must be seen to be appreciated

Sideboards!

in a number of styles and finish

All at equally low prices.

THERE ARE STILL some of those low priced

BEDSPRINGS!

Try one, rest well, and prolong your life.

NEW RAYMOND SEWING MACHINE.

At $30.00.

J. E. MOORE.

Undertaker and furniture dealer. Undertaking special attention.

ANOTHER LONDON HORROR.

Body a Woman, Terribly Mutilated, Discovered.

"JACK THE RIPPER" ONCE MORE.

Enormous Increase of the British Navy Contemplated.

MEDICAL AND POLICE SURMISES.

The Police Management Discussed in Parliament.

SOMETHING ABOUT WHITECHAPEL.

A last (Friday) night's London cable says: The doctors who have examined the remains of the latest victim of the murder fiend refuse to make any statement until the inquest is held. Three bloodhounds belonging to private citizens were taken to the place where the body was, and placed on the scent of the murderer, but they were unable to keep it for any great distance, and all hope of running the assassin down with their assistance has been abandoned. The murdered woman told a companion last evening that she was without money, and unless she obtained a supply she would commit suicide. It has been learned that a man respectably dressed accosted the victim and offered her money. They went to her lodgings on the second floor of the Dorset street house. No noise was heard during the night, and nothing was known of the murder until the landlady went to the room early this morning to ask for her rent. The first thing she saw on entering the room were the woman's breasts and viscera lying on a table. Dorset street is short and narrow, and is situated close to Mitre square and Hanbury street.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT OF THE HORROR.

The murder which took place in Spitalfields, Whitechapel district, on Friday morning, is undeniably a continuation of the series which was for a while interrupted for want of opportunity or inclination. In this case the murderer worked leisurely, as is made evident by the fact that the killing was done in a room fronting on the street on the ground floor and within a few yards of a temporary police station whence officers issued hourly to patrol the district. Although the metropolitan police system is not yet discredited, the bloodhound theory is entirely thrown out, since the murder was not discovered until 10 o'clock in the morning, while the streets were teeming with people and traffic was going on uninterruptedly.

Gen. Sir Charles Warren was early on the scene and told a reporter that all the precaution in the world could not prevent the work of such murderers. The sole chance remaining to the police, he said, was to catch them red-handed, and their change of tactics increased the difficulty. In the open air, where the killing has been done hitherto, the chance of their apprehension was slight, but in the case of an indoor murder, such as the last, the hope of arresting the perpetrator was almost barren of fruition. This latest murder will undoubtedly cause a large number of arrests on suspicion, but whether the monster will be brought to book is matter of extreme doubt since he has left no clues not marked over by the officers investigating the previous cases. The most annoying feature of the case is that the arrest of a number of innocent persons will have to be repeated.

The opinion of Archibald Forbes and Mr. Winslow, that the assassin is a homicidal maniac, is confirmed by the latest murder, and the prediction has become general that another murder will soon follow. The brutality of the mutilation to which the last body was subject surpasses all the others. In the room to which the corpse was taken chunks of flesh and portions of the viscera were strewn on the floor and table, and the stomach of one of the surgeons gave way at the spectacle.

In the House of Commons last night Mr. Conybeare asked the question whether it was true that another woman had been murdered in London? General Warren, the Chief of the Metropolitan Police, he said, ought to be superseded by an officer accustomed to investigating crime. The question was greeted by cries of "Oh! Oh!"

The Speaker called "Order! order!" and said that notice must be given of the question in the usual way.

Mr. Conybeare replied I have given private notice.

The Speaker—The notice must be made in writing.

Mr. Cunningham Graham then asked whether General Warren had already resigned, to which Mr. Smith, the Government leader, replied, "No."

At 1 o'clock in the morning Mary Jane had been heard by a fellow lodger crooning a drunken song, perhaps to the murderer. From that hour till half-past 10 o'clock, when the body was discovered, is all a hideous blank. Before the post mortem examination a photographer was set to work in the court and house. The state of the atmosphere was unfortunately not favorable to good results. The photographer, however, succeeded in securing several negatives. The post mortem examination lasted two hours, and was of the most thorough character. Every indication as to the manner in which the murderer conducted his awful work was carefully noted, as well as the position of every organ and larger pieces of flesh. The surgeons' report will be of an exhaustive character, but it will not be made public until they give evidence at the coroner's inquest.

Dr. Forbes Winslow says the murder is the work of the same homicidal lunatic who committed the other crimes in Whitechapel. The harrowing details point to this conclusion.

THE SCENE OF THE TRAGEDIES.

Whitechapel is, I fear, becoming a much maligned district. It is not altogether the modern Alsatia that, from much we have lately heard, many people may naturally infer it to be. It is a quarter of eastern London containing not less than 60,000 inhabitants; but it is the most thickly populated and the poorest part of London, and the criminal element here is proportionately large. To a stranger by day the place has no other appearance than that of a very busy, crowded neighborhood, full of large warehouses and stores, and the streets so blocked with traffic that a timid person may be a quarter of an hour waiting for a chance to cross a road. Whitechapel is conterminous to the Thames and some of the large dockyards, and in addition to the stationary has a large foreign population. In the evening is the time to see Whitechapel to advantage, when the large houses are closed down and the hum of traffic has hushed for the day; then the women without bonnets and the men without coats take their ease in the street, in front of the bars, and at the theatres that throng the neighborhood. On Saturday evening the place is en fete, for three reasons—because every one has some money, because no one hurries home (not having to rise early in the morning), and because a large portion of the denizens are of the Hebrew persuasion, who after sunset go in for a "rare high time." Here, then, is to be seen a strange mixture of rowdyism and villainy, struggling poverty and drunken destitution, half naked impudence and flaunting vice, fine clothes and flash jewellery. Following is a graphic description of something that can be seen there, by the gifted pen of George Sims, whose knowledge of London is, like the late Mr. Weller's, both "extensive and peculiar":

We had not been surveying the busy scene many minutes - what a scene Whitechapel road is on Saturday night!—before we heard a cry, and instantly there was a rush towards a gateway. It was only two ladies quarrelling; but as we hurried up a small boy saluted us with a grin and exclaimed, "'Ere ye har, guv'nor! This way to the murder! Triple murder up this court!" There was a roar of laughter, and, the true cause of the case being ascertained, the crowd dispersed. The border line between the horrible and the grotesque has grown very fine in Whitechapel of late. There has probably been a revulsion of feeling, and the inhabitants have relieved their overstrained nerves by laughing. Certainly last Saturday night, although another murder was confidently expected, the general body of sightseers and pedestrians were making light of the matter. Along the pavement, which for many a mile is hedged with shooting galleries and various arrangements based upon the six-throws-a-penny principle, plenty of hoarse-voiced ruffians were selling a penny puzzle, in which the puzzle was to find Jack the Ripper. Jack was upon every tongue, male and female, last Saturday night. The costermonger hawking his goods dragged him in; the quack doctor assured the crowd that his marvellous medicine would cure even Jack of his evil propensities; and at the penny shows, outside which the most ghastly pictures of "the seven victims," all gashes and crimson drops, were exhibited, the proprietors made many a facetious reference to the local Terror. Just past the Pavilion Theatre we came on a gentleman who was standing in the roadway and banging on an empty bloater box with a big stick. As soon as he had obtained an audience he delivered himself as follows: "Tennybrooze! Tennybrooze! If there's any gent as was here when I give Tennybrooze for the Seesirwitch I'd be werry much obliged if he'd come forward. I give every one as bought my enverlope Tennybrooze when he was 20 to 1, and now I've got another enverlope 'ere what's got the winner of the Cambridge. If there's any one as 'ears my voice ternite as was here when I give it, he'll p'raps say so. I haint Duglis 'All, and I haint Jack Dickinson, but my brother's the 'ead jockey in a big racin' stable, and my information's the best as money can buy, though I sell it in Whitechapel for a penny. I belong to Whitechapel, and I like to do my neighbors a good turn. I haint Johnny the Ripper. I'm Johnny the Tipper. (Roars of laughter in the crowd.) Yus; Johnny the Tipper, what give yer Tennybrooze; and here I've got the winner of the Cambridge at 20 to 1, and it's one penny." Johnny the Tipper then went round with his envelopes, but evidently he hadn't a racing audience, for the sale was slack, and, cursing his "blooming luck," Johnny put his hands in his pockets and took the certain winner of "the Cambridge" off with him to another pitch. I'm afraid he hadn't backed his Cesarewitch tip for himself, as he was in the last stage of raggedness, and as he turned away I heard him mutter that he'd been out six hours and hadn't earned his "doss" yet.

Six Children at a Birth.

A Dallas, Tex., despatch says: Mrs. Judge Hirsch, of Navarro County, gave birth to six children on the afternoon of Saturday, Nov. 3rd. The mother and children are doing well, and the father is trying to be happy. A reporter who visited the homestead found about 100 people present, all examining the babies. There are four boys and two girls. The father, George Hirsch, is 31 and his wife 27. They have been married five years and have three children besides the recent accession. Hirsch is of German descent and has named the boys Frederick, Mills, Cleveland and Thurman. The girls are Victoria and Louise. All are perfectly proportioned, but very small. The babies all seem healthy. The Hirsch family is poor, and the mother is a large, healthy woman. The babies are all tagged to preserve their identity.

An Unhappy Medical Student.

A Kingston despatch says: There is an unhappy student in the medical college here. He has been boycotted by his fellows, who have sworn to refuse to speak to him or recognize him in any way. He is accused of telling the police the hiding place of the resurrected bodies recently recovered. He denies the accusation. Some years ago a student for similar work was given twenty-four hours to leave the city. Months afterwards it was discovered that he was not the culprit.

Good Cause for Forgetfulness.

Wife (tenderly)—Do you remember, Charles, how embarrassed you were when you proposed to me?

Mr. Hardup—No, dear; I've been so embarrassed since we were married that I have forgotten all about it.

—Things do not always follow as a matter of course. A man who makes puns is not a pundit; neither is one who plays in a band a bandit.

—Jay Gould is no ordinary man. He is one among millions—of dollars.

A REMARKABLE COFFIN.

Probably the Most Unique Casket Ever Devised—A Wife's Strange Tribute.

A Wilmington, Mass., despatch says: Dr. Henry Hiller died Monday evening and will be buried Sunday in the most expensive and elaborate coffin ever devised to hold the mortal remains of man. In order to avert this common fate of humanity or at least to lessen its force, Mrs. (Dr.) Hiller conceived the idea some years ago of preparing burial caskets for herself and her husband, which would not only rob the grave of its victory, but would express by their carved symbology the thought that life and death are one and the same in nature's grand economy.

Two vines creeping up from the foot of the lid meet about a human skull carved from nature. Out of the skull's left eye-socket creeps a lizard, giving the death's head a most ghastly appearance. A caterpillar crawls along the rim around the emblem of death, but round about are daisies and roses and a butterfly, while in the bottom of the vine is a bird. Above the plate and directly over the place where the heart of the deceased will be are branches of English and American oak intertwined. In place of a glass cover at the head there is a brass plate, cast and engraved, representing the river of death and the angel of death leading a fair maiden down through the reeds and grasses into Lethe's waters. In the horizon the sun is just sinking from sight. Below the river are engraved the words:

HENRY HILLER.

In each lower corner is a stanza of poetry composed by Mrs. (Dr.) Hiller.

The panelled sides of the lid are wrought no less beautifully than the top. In the centre of one side is a globe on wings, representing time; on the other is a burning urn, a symbol of death. On one of the end panels of the lid an owl—the bird of the night—holds a field mouse lightly in its claws; on the other end panel are a bat and two serpents.

All the panels of the lid have foliage and flowers, maple branches entwined with morning-glories and other symbols of nature's beautiful side, but mingled with them are snails and serpents and grasshoppers, a marsh fly and horrible dragons with ghastly grinning faces.

A CHILD'S TERRIBLE VIGIL.

Locked Up All Night in a Cold and Dismal Basement.

A New York despatch says: Mrs. Mathilda Matheson, a widow residing at No. 55 Summit street, Brooklyn, has been in the habit of sending her 6-year-old daughter Maggie to the Industrial School at No. 139 Van Brunt street every morning to be cared for during the day. One of her brothers always escorted the little girl to and from the school, which is conducted by the Children's Aid Society, and is a sort of day nursery. The children generally are quartered in rooms on the upper stories and fed in the basement. Mrs. Matheson said that shortly after 6 o'clock on Saturday evening she sent William for his sister. When he had rung the bell for several minutes a woman stuck her head out of a second-story window and informed him that Maggie had been sent home some time before. William returned, and, as Maggie had not yet arrived, the mother was nearly crazy with fear. After searching the neighborhood she gave the alarm to the police, but they were not able to find her. Mrs. Matheson searched the streets all night, and about 7 o'clock on Sunday morning found Maggie, surrounded by a number of gentlemen, on Van Brunt street. Her eyes were inflamed and her cheeks swollen. She was blue from the cold, and could hardly stand on her feet from exhaustion and fright. Mrs. Matheson said, after taking the child home, she told how, after being dismissed, she went down in the basement, where she fell asleep and remained so for some time. When she awoke she was unable to get out, but spent most of the night in screaming and crying. Nobody came until morning, when the 14-year-old son of the janitor descended the stairs and turned her into the street. Mrs. Matheson indignantly said: "They might have either brought her home or sent me word that she was there, instead of turning her into the street in her broken-down condition."

MORMONS IN THE NORTHWEST.

Interview With a Delegate from the Colony at Lees Creek.

An Ottawa despatch says: Canada will have to wrestle with the Mormon question next. Messrs. Card, Lyman and Taylor, three members of the Mormon Church, are here. They represent the Mormon settlement at Lees Creek, N.W.T., and came to Ottawa on business with the Interior Department. The delegates are desirous of securing a town site at Lees Creek. Mr. Card was interviewed by a reporter yesterday. He said: "We have numerous letters of introduction, and before going home we will visit Montreal. The colony consists of 125 souls. We do not exclude other Christians from the settlement. Our business is combined ranching and farming, but not on a large scale."

"Do you propose to practice polygamy?"

"We do not propose to break the laws of the country," was the response. "We are Christians. We believe in Jesus Christ, and believe in Him as strongly as any sect on the face of the earth."

"In what essential particular do you differ from orthodox Christianity?"

"The great difference is that we believe in modern as well as ancient revelation, through the medium of prophets, seers and revelators. We will not do any proselytising in any particular place."

"Is your Church gaining ground?"

"It is in a prosperous condition, despite persecution by the American Government. The faith was revealed to Joseph Smith, our first prophet, in 1830. Our adherents now number half a million and apart from Utah we have colonies in Arizona, New Mexico, Idaho, Colorado and Nevada. The settlement in the Northwest is not the inception of a movement to transfer our entire Church to the protection of the British flag."

Premature Age.

Customer—"Is that horse fast?"

Dealer—"Well, he's not so fast as he used to be, but he s a fine horse yet."

"He looks awfully old."

"Yes; he was fast in his youth, you know."

THE PLACE OF CRUCIFIXION.

Where Was the Real Calvary of the New Testament?

(Rev. Dr. Charles S. Robinson in the November Century.)

The only representative site for Calvary now offered pilgrims in Jerusalem is found in a couple of rooms inside the old edifice; one is owned and exhibited by the Greeks, another by the Latins. These share the same disability; both—since the church is already so full of traditions on the ground floor—had to go up a flight of stairs into free space nearer the roof. And there it is, amidst tawdry curtains and gilt bedizenments of candles and altar shrines, that this ancient spot upon which the cross of Jesus Christ rested is pointed out, and the veritable hole is shown in which it was planted. And the thieves' crosses—a decorus but rather inadequate distance of five feet between them on the right and left of the middle one—are ranged alongside. And down underneath, far below across some intervening space, left by grading away the actual soil of the hill, so we are sagely told, is the grave of Adam! Tradition has related that at the crucifixion of Jesus some drops of blood fell through upon Adam's skull and raised him suddenly to life; and there are commentators who declare that so the prophecy quoted by the Apostle Paul (Ephesians v. 14) was well fulfilled; "Awake, thou Adam, that sleepest (for thus the former versions read in the text), and arise from the dead, for Christ shall touch thee." The art-people say this is the origin of the fact that in those early rude representations of the death of our Lord a skull is introduced. Can any man of sensibility be blamed if he makes an imperious demand that something more—something else at least—shall greet him in answer to his question, Where was our Lord crucified? If there should be no other advantage gained by the acceptance of a new site as now proposed, this would be enough; it would put an end to the awkward and offensive imposters daily exhibited under the roof of that filthy old church. They are a standing mockery of the claims of the Christianity they profess to uphold. Those ceremonies of Easter at the tomb where our Lord is declared to have been buried are a caricature of an event so glad and holy. The struggle around the flames that are chemically forced out of the smoky hole in the sepulcher, so that devotees in frantic zeal may light their lamps, brings death from the trampling of thousands, fills the house with howls that put heathenism to shame, and sends true believers away with an infinite disgust and horror deep in their hearts. How long must such a scandal be patiently endured?

AFTER DINNER TALK.

Salisbury Speaks at the Lord Mayor's Banquet—He Jokes About the Sackville Affair, and Talks of European Peace.

A last (Friday) night's London cable says: The procession to-day on the occasion of the induction into office of the new Lord Mayor was devoid of the usual pageantry, and was a tame affair generally. The weather was fine.

The usual banquet to the Cabinet Ministers was given at the Guildhall this evening. Lord Salisbury delivered a long speech. He denied that the Government had yielded to their opponents on the question of policy. They were never more resolute or more confident in advancing a policy which they honestly believed they could successfully execute. England had perhaps noticed that popular institutions existed to the westward. (Laughter.) Events in America would add more to the history of electioneering than to the history of politics. (Laughter and cheers.) If there was any complaint against the Washington statesmen it did not involve the two nations. (Cheers.) The Washington statesmen had not apparently commended themselves to the approval of Americans. (Cheers.) In regard to the peace of Europe, Lord Salisbury said it appeared that all of the rulers had an earnest and intense desire to maintain the peace. He trusted that they would continue in their present attitude. The only danger might be an outburst of the people of some country, who might disregard the wise counsel of those in power. Year after year saw larger armaments and vaster services for defensive purposes. If the process continued where would it end? He had heard on good authority that five great powers maintained 12,000,000 of armed men. He did not suggest that that fact ought to diminish the confidence of the public in the maintenance of peace, but he thought that amid such preparation the English Government must not remain unready. (Cheers.) If England's commercial community felt that the Government's power of protection was insufficient, the terror that would result would cause a greater loss than any expenditure necessary to maintain confidence. But European nations must view their armaments with misgiving. England only sought to protect her shores and her commerce.

The Turf.

The smallest winning jockey on record is, without doubt, Kitchener, who rode Red Deer, the winner of the Chester Cup (England) in 1844. Red Deer's impost was 56 pounds, and of this Kitchener's bodily weight was a few ounces less than 40 pounds, the balance being lead in the pad.

The late Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Randolph Churchill, says "Rapier" in the London Illustrated Sporting News, Oct. 27th, has taken to dreaming winners, and, what is a very great deal more, dreaming them accurately. In a vision a few nights since His Lordship dreamed that No. 22 (Veracity) on the card had won the Cambridgeshire, and, being a practical dreamer with a belief in himself, he backed No. 22 to win him £1,000. There is no doubt about this most recent addition to the list. For one moment he may have doubted whether he was a flyer at dreams after all, for the first number put up by the judge was "2" (Tenebreuse), and we began to wonder how it was we had missed the white jacket and green cap, but "2" was speedily taken down. The judge had told his man to hoist "22," but the chattering round his box made his voice inaudible, and so caused the mistake. However, the "22" was soon put up, and Lord Randolph awoke to the fact that he had developed a new accomplishment and had won £1,000

CALENDAR OF HEALTH.

What is the Proper Temperature for Chill November.

With November's chill days, furnace fires are aglow, and the great stove in the cellar has begun its season's work. After watching sick beds in rooms heated by steam, by open fires, by stoves and by furnace heat, I am decidedly in favor of the last, provided sufficient moisture be added to the heated air before its comes into living rooms. Steam heat is too dry, open fires cannot keep up an even temperature nor warm a room in northern midwinter, and stoves burn oxygen from air too rapidly without providing a fresh supply. In a certain house where professional duty led me every day of last December, there was not a daily variation of temperature of two degrees from 70° Fahrenheit the whole month. Plants grew luxuriantly and flowered in wide halls, and climbing vines converted more than one room into an amateur conservatory. The master, a man of leisure and scientific mind, told me that his delightful winter home was heated by two furnaces; that he had discarded steam after a year's trial and was satisfied. Ventilation was fully provided for, and the sick chamber, whence my patient soon emerged, was attractive enough, even to one who was leaving for summer islands of the Caribbean. What is essential, from a sanitary point, in heating houses, is to have temperature even throughout. There is probably no better way of catching cold, of laying foundation for pneumonia or bronchitis than stepping out of a warm bed into a cold or cool hall. Every skin pore is open or relaxed, every nerve of resistance is half asleep, and the insidious chill that has proved forerunner to so many dangerous diseases of chest and throat, sends one shivering back to blankets that are some time in getting warmed up again. While sleeping, room temperature should be lower than the rest of the house, kept so by open windows, and if this suggestion is followed there can be no harm done by needful nightly wanderings. A proper range at night is 60 to 65 degrees Fahrenheit. Beside the bed of those who are given to these nocturnal excursions should always stand a pair of bedroom slippers, ready to be slipped on at short notice; for cool currents of air are always playing about floors, and bare ankles are exceedingly sensitive to small temperature variations. There is a change of late years in the winter heat of American homes. With almost universal substitution of better forms of heaters for old time stoves, and better understanding of ordinary health law by the people, has come a cooling down of the suffocating temperature that made our homes dry forcing-houses and sent our people out into the wintry cold about as well fitted to face it as if they were naked. Except in rooms where sick are, or aged peasons, mercury should never rise above 70°, nor fall below 65°. A narrow range, truly; but within such limits lies the zone of health. Foreigners coming here in cold weather used to find our houses insupportably hot; and more than one visiting medical man has said to me, "Now I see one of the causes at work to produce American nervousness."—American Magazine for November.

A Merry Heart Doeth Good Like a Medicine.

The cheerful man or woman is infinitely less likely to succumb to disease and infection than the discontented and unhappy. When we found a soldier in the general hospital during the war, discontented and homesick, we made no delay in getting him a furlough, well assured from previous observation that few under such conditions would recover. On the other hand, no sickness was so threatening and no wound so severe but that we had hope of his recovery when we found him plucky, cheerful and hopeful. We fear that too few physicians and attendants upon the sick—too few parents and children and neighbors—are well enough versed in psychology. Of all the misfortunes that befall the sick, none is greater than the visitation of a long-and-sad-visaged physician or clergyman. One of the greatest blessings of the Christian religion is that it imparts to its sincere possessor a contentment with the present and a hopefulness of the future, a cheerfulness and happiness, that not only preserve health in the individual, but exert a healthful influence on others.—Bulletin of the Iowa Board of Health.

Tricks of the Mattress Trade.

At a meeting of the Provincial Health Board, in Toronto yesterday, a letter from a doctor in Guelph was read, enclosing a sample of the wool batting found in a mattress direct from the manufacturer's hands. It was a collection of the odds and ends about the floor of a woolen factory, including the sweepings. It had an offensive smell and was stated to have a most pernicious effect on the health of the unfortunate people who have to sleep on such beds. The letter concluded by urging upon the Board of Health the necessity of pressing on the Government to have an inspector appointed wherever such manufactures exist, with power to prevent such "abominable outrages upon the health of the unsuspecting public."

Expensive Building Material.

"How is your papa getting along?" asked Mrs. Yeast of the Crimsonbeak boy the other day, when she was waiting for his mother to make her appearance in the parlor.

"Oh, bully! He's going to build a house."

"Going to build a house! How do you know that?"

"Well, I heard mamma say he brings a brick home in his hat every night."

A New Theory.

"Papa," said Freddie, who has lately manifested some very deplorable mental tendencies, "is it proper to say that the sun sets?"

"Yes; certainly."

"I bet I can tell what the sun sets for.'

"Well, what for."

"So's to hatch out the moon."

California papers note that a great change has come over the old mountain mining counties. The mines are no more, but in their stead are orchards and forests. Bartlett pear trees growing in quartz piles, and a dense growth of young woodlands creeping down over the abandoned workings are among the things that would astonish the old forty-niner.

Contentment.

Once there lived a little maiden, who was very sweet and fair,
Who had eyes like purple pansies, and long, sunny, flowing hair;
And 'twas said through all the country she was loved beyond compare.

Yet she had no wealth nor dower—just a lovely, smiling face,
Just a kindly, gentle nature, and a maiden's winsome grace;
But at times she longed for jewels, to wear silk and costly lace.

And it chanced she lay a-sleeping in the garden once in June,
And the sunlight kissed her tresses, and the breezes sang a tune,
And the roses were half jealous all the summer afternoon.

And she dreamed of wondrous treasures, of a castle by the sea,
Of a prince who came to claim her, and whose praise seemed melody
Like the music of the waters flowing on delightfully

And she longed for Time to pass her like a sudden spirit flown,
For her youth to vanish quickly, and to be a woman grown,
That the prince might kneel before her, and might claim her for his own.

And in part her wish was answered, for there came to her one day
One who offered wealth and station, and indisputable sway;
Tho' she had no love to give him, yet she did not turn away.

But I've heard a sad-eyed woman stands alone at close of day,
And her heart is grieved and troubled, let men praise her as they may,
For her happiness has left her—taken wings and flown away!

And I think, O friends, 'twere better, in th journey here of ours,
Not to dream of power and riches, nor of stately domes and towers—
But to live in sweet contentment, like the little birds and flowers. —The Independent

NOT A FLAT.

The Woman Who Knew What She Had Bought.

A good story is told by the New York Press which a firm of prominent furniture dealers in that city succeeded for some time in keeping quiet. The firm alluded to had a very elegant parlor set of solid mahogany of the finest upholstery. It also had duplicates in veneered wood and cheap plush in the store-room. The costly outfit, which was worth about $200, was displayed in the window and marked:

THIS ELEGANT PARLOR SUITE
ONLY
TWENTY-SEVEN DOLLARS.

One day a mild, meek-looking woman came in, examined the furniture and invested. She took a receipt for her money, left her address, and was bowed out by the smiling salesman, who assured her that "the things would be sent right away." In due time the waggon arrived at the young woman's house and backed up in front of the door.

"Hold on," said the purchaser, "don't unload yet."

Then she climbed on the van and made a very peculiar examination of the load. At last she said to the driver:

"I'll go back with you to the store. These are not the goods I purchased."

And back she did go, despite protests and assurances that everything was all right. When she walked in she was not the mild mannered creature of two hours before.

"You've tried to swindle me," she cried. "I bought one set of furniture and you sent me another. Now, I want what I paid you for. How do I know? Because in every article of that set you sold me I stuck a pin while you were not looking. Now, I'm going to pick out my property and see that you send it over. If you don't there'll be trouble."

There was no trouble, and the little woman is again looking for a sharp merchant with a similar "bargain" on hand.

Ex-President Hayes' Home.

"Nellie Bly" writes very pleasantly in the New York World of ex-President Hayes' fine old homestead at Fremont, Ohio, and of the lives of its inmates. The mansion is of the old-fashioned southern type, with a broad hall through the centre and large, pleasant rooms on either hand. The Hayes are very popular among their neighbors. The ex-President has been charged with penuriousness, but all accounts from those who know him will agree that he is, on the contrary, extremely charitable, though very quiet and unostentatious. He and Mrs. Hayes expend on charities about $10,000 a year. The chickens, of which so much has been said by the newspapers with a view of poking fun at the ex-President, are the pets of Mrs. Hayes, who is extremely fond of all kinds of animals. Neither Mr. Hayes, however, nor any other man need be ashamed of raising good poultry. The homestead is filled with rare treasures of a literary and artistic character, the accumulations of years of culture, opportunity and pecuniary independence. The general still cares for his old war horse, Whitey. The Hayes' family life is a happy one.

On the Way to the Caledonian Games.

Officer O'Grady (recently appointed)—Shtoy, ye divil! Where's yer pants?

Fergus McTavish (in kilts and with bagpipes, with dignity)—Pants, mon! I hae nane!

Officer O'Grady—Then, divil the shtep ye take till ye go into Levi's store and put up th' harmonicon for a pair o' blue flannins to conserve th' dancency av yer legs. D'ye think ye're at home in Africa, ye haythen baboon?

A Fond Farewell.

Friend—"I say, old chappie, are you off?"

Sackville-West—"Well, rather! One can't open one's mouth in this blooming country without putting one's foot in it, you know."—Chicago News.

At Sea.

Miss St. Clare (from the west)—What is the bell ringing for? Saltonstall (concisely)—Fog. Miss St. Clare—I don't see why they have to ring a bell to tell there's a fog. Look at my bangs.—Boston Beacon.

Forty-one years ago a Rhode Island man asked the hand of a young lady and was refused. The pair have just been married and are enjoying their honeymoon, he at the age of 72 and she at 61.

—Originality is the faculty of adapting an old idea to a new occasion.

PRICES A CENTURY AGO.

Some of the Features of Life When the Country was "Rough, Raw and Democratic."

(Pittsburg Dispatch.)

Those who enjoy the benefit of a rum market and the "corner grocery" of today can have but a faint conception of the difficulty of procuring food in the western country 100 years ago. Around Fort Pitt it was found necessary to issue a military order to keep down prices and keep up a supply, while the courts in Virginia at that day established these prices in the counties over which its court had jurisdiction:

Price of corn, per bushel	$1 65
Oats, per quart	04
Whiskey, for a pint	06
Whiskey, with sugar added, one-half pint	08
Beer, per quart	04

In the posthumous papers of Wm. Clark, of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, the legal fee of that day is fairly indicated by this note:

JULY 4, 1811.

"Three months after date I promise to pay David Hayes, or order, $2 in merchantable wheat, rye or other trade, as will suit said David, for attending to a case of habeas corpus, in which Charles Take, imprisoned, was discharged. JOB MOSE."

In the vestry registry of St. John's Episcopal Church, Hampton, Virginia, three miles from Old Point Comfort, this occurs:

To Mr. Barlow, for seventeen sermons, at 350 pounds tobacco, 5,950 pounds.
To Rev. John Reid, salary, 16,000 pounds.
To Rev. John Reid, board, 1,500 pounds.
To Rev. John Reid, for clerk, 1,000 pounds.
To Mary Clark, sexton, 400 pounds.
To Widow Lawrence, being poor, 500 pounds tobacco.
Agreed with James Briggs to keep Eliza Miket for one year and to find her in clothes, for 1,300 pounds tobacco.

From an entry elsewhere in the book it appears that 16,000 pounds of tobacco sold for £101 11s. 7½d.

In 1776 the Virginia House of Burgesses took the salaries of the clergy, and in 1802 confiscated the glebes, and in that year "Parson Hubbard," the last of the Colonial parsons, laid down the Bible and prayer book and was buried in the poor farm churchyard of Isle of Wight county.

A curious letter has been preserved from Francis Yeardley, son of Sir George Yeardley, one of Virginia's early governors, written to John Ferrar, telling of a notable transaction with "Emperor of Roanoke," who sells North Carolina, at this time called South Virginia, to the King's agent for a house and £200. In conclusion, Yeardley begs to kiss the hand of his correspondent with the fair hands of his "virtuous countrywoman, the worthily to be honored Mrs. Virginia Farrar." Mrs. Virginia Ferrar, or Farrar, was the daughter of John Ferrar, jun., and the granddaughter of John Ferrar, of the Virginia company.

From the old records of Montour's Run Presbyterian Church, of Allegheny county, it appears that in response to the call Dr. John McMillan, the pioneer Presbyterian preacher of western Pennsylvania, and the founder of Jefferson College, was appointed to preach at Montour's Run, "On ye fifth Sabath of July 1, 1785."

There was no church or meeting house at that day, but services were held in what William Cullen Bryant calls:

God's first temples, the grove in the vicinity where the church now stands. In winter services were held in any member's house to suit convenience. On April 9th, 1789, the united congregations of upper Raccoon and Montour Run issued a call for the pastoral services of Joseph Patterson, on these terms:

Salary, $110, to be paid in corn, wheat, pork or provisions.

The call, which was accepted, was signed by 162 men and one lady, Mrs. Mary Wilson. None of the pioneers survive, but their descendants still meet in the old Montour church.

The Minister Thanked Heaven.

An old sea captain sat in the lobby of the Custom House yesterday afternoon. He was in a talkative mood, and related a number of funny experiences he had had with the ministers. There was one in particular which amused him very much as he recalled it.

"Once, when he left London, he began, to make a trip to Baltimore, among the passengers on board was a preacher. We had hardly got out of the river before the good man became awfully sick, and he felt sure something was wrong with the ship. He related his fear to me, and to allay them I took him to the fore part of the vessel, where a number of sailors were busy working.

"'Do you hear those men swear?' I asked.

"'Yes,' he replied. 'Isn't it shocking. What will become of them?'

"'Well, I don't know,' I answered, 'but it must be plain they are not worried about the condition of the ship.' The reverend gentleman saw the point and felt much easier.

"The next day a terrible storm arose. The vessel plunged in the trough of the waves, and the passengers were greatly frightened.

"I noticed the preacher going to the same part of the ship, and I followed him. Suddenly he stopped and listened attentively. Then he exclaimed: 'Thank heaven, they are still swearing.' I need not add that the boat didn't go down."—Baltimore News.

No Extenuating Circumstances.

Judge—"Prisoner, the evidence shows that you brutally assaulted the plaintiff. Have you anything to offer in extenuation?"

Prisoner—"No, sir; my lawyer took all the money I had."—Puck.

HER FATE.

No longer on the garden gate
Fond lovers swing.
November breezes regulate
That sort of thing.

Within the cosy parlor now,
Before the grate
They sit, and never notice how
It's growing late.

The blazing coals illuminate
With ruddy glow
The cosy room, and, though 'tis late,
He does not go.

Nex day she has a sleepy air,
Her pa's enraged;
But, after all, what does she care?
She's engaged.

—Every dog has his day, my boy; but how much better off is the mule, who has his years. Haw, haw, haw!

FIGHTING A GRIZZLY.

Terrific Encounter of a Western Stockman with Mr. Bruin.

James Ingle, a stockman, residing near the main range of the Rockies, in Colorado, has for some time past been losing large numbers of cattle, often finding their carcases terribly mutilated and half buried in some deep canon or glen far up among the fastnesses of the mountains. So, taking one of his best herders and a full supply of arms and equipments, he started out with the bold determination of hunting up some of these wild and savage beasts. A ride of several miles brought the two men to the foot hills, and they began at once to scout the ravines and patches of brush where they supposed one of the monster animals might lie concealed. For over two hours their efforts proved fruitless, but at length, emerging from a deep and narrow valley, they suddenly espied an immense grizzly less than six rods distant, and leisurely moving in an opposite direction, evidently making for the craigs and peaks further up in the range. On perceiving the hunters the bear started to run for a dense thicket near by, but Ingle, in order to head him off from the hiding place, put spurs to his horse and dashed ahead recklessly. The grizzly, seeing his chance of escape likely to be cut off, became infuriated and rushed toward the men savagely. It being down hill the animal's jumps were enormous, and he rapidly shortened the distance between himself and the hunters. Ingle's horse was frightened so badly that it became unmanageable, and while he was struggling with his equine the bear overtook him, and with a tremendous leap caught the horse by the withers, hurling both it and the rider to the ground. Ingle, being an active man, regained his feet instantly and darted toward cover. A few bites and groans, and the bear killed the horse almost instantly, and then proceeded to overtake Ingle, who was rushing for a place of safety at the top of his speed. Fortunately, the ranchman's herder came to his rescue, and placing himself and horse almost squarely in front of the bear's course, diverted the latter's attention, and caused the bear to give them a hard chase over rough ground that well nigh resulted in their destruction. At length, skilfully avoiding the animal, the herder returned to his partner, and again, with guns in hand, they started after the bear. He was found behind a small clump of bushes, and, when he saw his enemies approaching, rushed out to vanquish them. The men stood their ground and gave him several shots from their Winchester rifles, but even these failed to quell his fury, as he continued to rush upon them, with open jaws, growling frightfully. The bear was almost against Ingle, when, at an opportune moment, and with great dexterity, the latter jammed his rifle barrel down the animal's throat and discharged the weapon. The bear was severely stunned and staggered, but he managed to give Ingle a fearful stroke with his paw that felled the latter to the earth breathless and seriously wounded. Springing upon his victim and with his mouth filled with gore the bear was in the very act of grasping Ingle's head in his enormous jaws when the herder gave the animal a [illegible] shot that dropped him instantly. The fall of the dead bear on the body of the hunter almost crushed the latter completely, and it will be many months before he fully recovers from his injuries. After taking his partner home the herder returned and skinned the bear, which was an enormous silver tip, the hide being considered quite valuable. The desperate encounter, however, has proved rather discouraging to the hunters of this section.

They All Shirk It.

Before one of the Liverpool revising barristers a claim was made on the part of John Pritchard, whose qualification consisted of freehold houses in Howe street, and whose residence was described as "Rhosllanerchrugog, near Ruabon." Mr. France (to the friend who appeared for Mr. Pritchard)—"You say that Mr. Pritchard lives at ——; you know the place." (Laughter.) The Applicant—"Where?" Mr. France—"Oh, I can't pronounce it (loud laughter), and I must leave it to Mr. Leader. (Renewed laughter.) Mr. Leader—"Does he live at Rose——; you know where I mean? Applicant—"Yes, he lives there." Mr. Leader—"Well, we must accept that, for I can't for the life of me pronounce the word. It is sufficient to strangle one." (Great laughter.) The vote was allowed.

It is Different When You Win.

Mr. Boggs—I invested a few dollars in a ticket in a lottery a spell ago, Amanda, and——

Mrs. Boggs (horrified)—Oh, Mr. Boggs! To think that I should ever be a gambler's wife!

Mr. Boggs—And it drew a $15,000 prize.

Mrs. Boggs (hugging him rapturously) Oh, you dear old Boggsy! Now I can have a sealskin sacque. Can't I?

Ran in the Family.

Bessie (just home from boarding school)—"I'm delighted to see you, mamma." (Kisses her.)

Mamma (regarding her suspiciously—"Bessie, you didn't kiss with a burrowing motion when you went away from home. You've learned that from somebody with a long moustache!"

Religion a la Mode.

The Rector—My dear Mrs. Worldleigh you must miss your church very much; I feel for you.

Mrs. Worldleigh—I don't miss my church as much as you would suppose, for I make Janet sit at the window Sunday morning and tell me just who are going by and how they are dressed.—Judge.

A little 4-year-old girl in Macon, Ga., has just got $600 for a father who is dead, and has the assurance of $19.50 a month from now until she is 16 years old. Uncle Sam makes the payment under the arrears of pension law.

—The girl who takes her engagement ring to the jeweller to find out how much it costs, will never make a satisfactory wife, especially if the young man finds it out.

THE Duke of Argyll is very fond of bird and animals. At one time he imported to Inverary some moose deer, Canadian starlings, wild turkeys and musk rats as an experiment. The deer died, the rats and starlings have never been seen since, but the gobblers are doing well.

BRING OUT YOUR DEAD.

A Story Told by George Francis Train in a Lecture for the Yellow Fever Fund.

George Francis Train lectured to 200 persons in Clarendon Hall last night for the benefit of Jacksonville sufferers. Nobody presided, and he introduced himself. He talked of a great many things, of which he himself was the greatest. Touching upon the Jacksonville fever scourge, he reverted to an epidemic in New Orleans fifty-two years ago.

"It was dreadful," he said. "No coffins there, nor any hearse, nor funeral, nor mourning. Only a cart and a boy that stopped before the door and called:

"'Bring out—bring out—your—d-e-a-d!'

"I remember they took out my little sister Josephine. I remember how they tossed the box over among a lot of others. My father and mother and I went after it in a carryall. I remember the rain and the water splashing about the wheels in the cemetery. Again in two days came that cry:

"'Bring out—bring out—your—d-e-a-d!'

"It was my little sister Ruby, then. How different from at Jacksonville, where they do it up in style, with fine coffins, and money and help pouring in from all over the world. Yet again we went to the graveyard, and there was left only my little sister Ellen, a weak, delicate little thing, gentle and mild, the fairest flower that ever bloomed. She had always been my special playmate. A little fellow 4 years old don't remember much, but her face has been with me all through my life, and I shall never forget it, nor how one day there came again that cry:

"'Bring out—bring out—your—d-e-a-d!

"I clung to the box, I remember, and struggled against their taking it away. After that went the servants, I remember, and the doctor, and then the nurse, and at last they showed me my mother, sick, and in a few days she, too, had gone. Then there came a letter from my aunt, far away in New England, and it begged them to send one—little Georgia, at any rate, before all were dead. So my father took me to the ship Waverly, and I remember how we walked from one ship to another to get on it. He tied a card about my neck, and on it wrote:

"'This is George Francis Train, my only child. Consigned to John Clark, jun., Dock square, Boston.

"'Take good care of the little fellow; he is only 4 years old; all dead but one out of a family of eleven.'

"I remember that I floated out into the warm, pleasant gulf, and along and along day after day, floating in the sunshine, floating north, floating at last into the beautiful harbor of Boston. And I seem to have been floating ever since."—New York Sun.

Vital Wicks.

"There are three wicks to the lamp of a man's life: brain, blood, and breath." Thus writes an eminent American author. The most frequent derangements occur in the blood and in the liver, by which, when in healthy condition, the blood is purified. Look out for the terrible chain of diseases that owe their inception to torpid liver and consequent impure blood. When the symptoms of liver and kidney troubles, consumption (Lung-scrofula), bronchitis, and dropsy, make their appearance, the system is in immediate need of a course of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Its marvelous effects have been tested and proven in the cure of tens of thousands of cases. It purifies and enriches the blood, restores lost vitality, and effectually eradicates the seeds of the worst maladies that afflict mankind.

In Chicago.

C.—"Have you heard about Jones?"

D.—"No; what is it!"

"Something very mysterious. He has disappeared with upward of $1,000."

"What is there mysterious about that? It happens every day."

"But, man alive, it is his own money that he disappeared with."

"Incredible! Incredible!"

Quack Advertisements

Are rapidly becoming a nuisance, and we think it behoves publishers to examine into the merits of many articles puffed up in their columns. We do not deny that many meritorious remedies are properly to be classed under this heading. Take the hundreds and thousands relieved from severe suffering by the use of Polson's NERVILINE, would it not be unreasonable to expect them to condemn this far-famed remedy? Now we know for a fact that Polson's Nerviline is without exception the most powerful, pleasant and certain remedy in the world for pain. It cannot fail, for it goes right to the bottom of pain, penetrates to the nerves, soothes them into quietness, and affords prompt and permanent relief. Nerviline is sold by all druggists. Sample only 10 cents. Try it.

Stallions for Canada.

The Edinburgh Agriculturist states that during the last nine months there were exported from Scotland 2,954 Clydesdale stallions. Of the number exported 1,671, or more than one-half, went to British North America and 568 to the United States.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching an stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form which often bleed and ulcerate, becomin very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It equally efficacious in curing all Ski Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

Worse Than a Failure.

Parson—I am astonished to hear a man with three married daughters say: "Marriage is a failure."

Citizen—Well, sir, when you have three families besides your own to support, you will learn that marriage is positive bankruptcy.

A Queer Lottery.

"What a lottery marriage is!" exclaimed Cora. "Why, there's Mary Andrews, she's married De Smythe—rather stupid, but the best catch of the season."

"Yes," assented Miss Snyder. "But it is a queer lottery. She drew a blank that is worth ten thousand a year.'

ROCKING STONE.

Wonderful Rock That Stands on a Pennsylvania Farm.

Imagine a stone, in size containing about five hundred cubic feet, in shape nearly as round as an orange, in weight not less than 80,000 pounds or 40 tons, and so nicely balanced upon a rock that a child 10 years of age by pushing against either the north or south side can rock it back and forth; yet the strength of a hundred men without levers or other appliances would be insufficient to dislodge it from its position. Such is the celebrated rocking stone on the farm of J. McLaury, two miles west of Monticello. This is one of the greatest natural curiosities in our whole country. What sculptor could chisel out a piece of marble of its size and then poise it so nicely that it would vibrate under so light a touch? But its shape, size and position are not the most wonderful things about it. Its body is composed of a somewhat loose and soft sandstone, in which are imbedded numberless round and flinty pebbles of a diamond like hardness. In all the valley where it is situated it is the solitary specimen of its class. Around and under the rock are of a totally different structure. The table on which it rests is a hard stone nearly as firm and close grained as the bluestone of our quarries. From whence came this wonder and how?—Philadelphia Call.

Ills, Wills, and Pills.

An odd mixture of words, but the sufferer from constipation, indigestion, impure blood, biliousness, and other such ills, can be cured if he wills, without taking the horrid, old-fashioned pills. These are superceded in our day by those wonder-working, yet tiny, little globules, known as Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. No griping, no drastic purging; do not cause costiveness afterwards, as the old-style pills do. One little Granule a dose.

The Modern Cane.

First Dude—Bajove, ole chappie, you've fohgotten yoah walking-stick to-night.

Second Dude—Didn't fohget it; too tired to carry it.

In mirthful measures, warm and free,
I sing, dear maid, and sing for thee!

But I think I would be performing a greater service to you and your sex by singing, not in measured rythm, but by setting out some strong truths in simple prose. If you or any of your female friends are suffering from ulcerations, displacement, bearing-down sensations, or unnatural discharges, use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which is sure to eradicate these complaints in a short time. It is the only medicine for woman's peculiar ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. The guarantee has been printed on the bottle wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

—Another good cure for insomnia is to have the nurse sleep up in the attic with the baby.

—When a man ventures an opinion he will find some one who opposes it. Hence a man without opposition is a man without opinions.

MERCHANTS, BUTCHERS AND TRADERS generally

We want a GOOD MAN in your locality to pick up

CALF SKINS

for us. Cash Furnished on satisfactory guaranty Address, C. S. PAGE, Hyde Park, Vermont, U. S

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in the country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that as a specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.

Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.

Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detroit 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington 1,316 at Boston, large classes of Columbia College students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Prin. N.Y State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

D C N L. 46 8

FOR SALE,

A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,

WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR

All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the

TIMES PRINTING CO.

HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

DUNN'S
BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

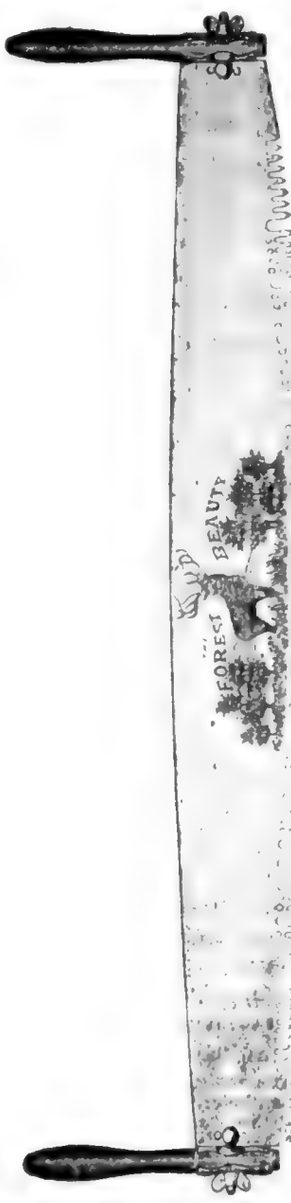
Saws! Cross-Cut Saws! Cross-Cut



AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having nve gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined silver steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at th

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you. Another line I would particularly call your attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to shew goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

The Grey Review only issued a half sheet last week.

The Chesley Enterprise has been enlarged. Six colums extra have been added to it, making it an exemplary country weekly.

The Dundalk Hearld man's longings are still unappeased He says: We want some wood, dry wood, green wood, stove wood. We have none left but a few sticks and the editor's head. Pay your subscription in wood and don't bring any that is watersoaked. See!

On Friday last the boom holding a large number of saw logs at the mill here broke and the river being high 300 of the logs went over the dam and were carried down the river. If not intercepted at Walkerton they may be captured at the lake.[Hanover Post.

In the garden of Mr. I. Welland may be seen a lilac tree in bloom The tree to all appearance had made due preparation for winter, its summer dress having disappeared entirely. If the mild weather continues the tree will in a few days be as green as in the month of June. [Hanover Post.

An Elmwood young lady lent her fellow her umbrella the other night which he promised to return on his way to the early train. True to his promise he arrived at the young lady's residence about 5 o'clock in the morning and rapped at the door. Judge of his surprise when the door was opened a moment or two afterwards to find the young lady herself standing there, in her night dress, and apparently sound asleep. She mechanically took the umbrella and closed the door again and when questioned about the matter afterwards remembered nothing about it whatever. Young ladies of somnambulistic tendencies shouldn't arrange untimely calls.—[Chesley Enterprise.

Burglars tried to effect an entrance into Messrs. Calhoun and Sons store last Friday night or Saturday morning by cutting the small window pane in the door, with the object no doubt of opening it from the inside. The glass was cut with a diamond and one or two pieces removed, but no sooner did a small piece of glass tingle on the floor inside, than one of the boys who was sleeping in the store heard it. He listened and on hearing them a second time he fired a shot into the counter whereupon they decamped and have not been seen since. The door in the store did not wake up. [Dundalk Herald.

Glenelg.- It looks as if the electors of Glenelg are going to have a fine array of men to pick a council out of at the approaching municipal election. For Reeve it is likely Mr. Jas. Skene will again try his luck in opposition to Mr. C. Moffat, and we are inclined to think with success For Deputy. Messrs. John McMillan, Jas. Staples and Geo. Lamb are spoken of. However it all of them run John McMillan will likely get the office. For councilors, Messrs. Williams, John A. Black, Pat Neil, Thos Sullivan, J Barry, J Firth, and Geo Firth jr are spoken of. If they all run there will be a lively time and a close contest. [Grey Review.

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Sold by Druggists and Perfumers.

A large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

—AT—

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Fulled Stockings, Overshoes, and Rubbers. Mens' and Boys' Long Boots, At prices to suit the times.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,

FLESHERTON.

A Positive Cure. ✠ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

Symptoms for which No. 8 should be Used.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, intuitrition, constipation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes in necessary required. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the ardent duties of business, unfascinated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. By a use of a vance 1 in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 17 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

A Permanent Cure. ✠ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT.

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equal

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London.

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☛ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 337. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, NOV. 29, 1888. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR

THE 12th of Dec. '88

REMEMBER!

The 12th of Dec. is the day that

Mr. P. H. Morris the great optician, of the firm of B. LAURENCE & Co., Montreal,

—WILL BE AT—

RUSSELL'S NOTED JEWELRY STORE, FLESHERTON.

to test eyes and fit the famous B. Laurence spectacles to all requiring them, if your eyes are weak and troublesome. This is a rare chance to

GET YOUR EYES THOROUGHLY TESTED.

COME ALL, COME EVRY ONE

IT WILL PAY YOU.

No charge for consultation.

REMEMBER, Wed. Dec. 12, 1888

—AT—

Russell's - Noted - Jewelry - Store,

FLESHERTON.

HEARD'S

Carriage Works,

FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

General News.

Hon. Mr. Chapleau is seriously ill.

The Quebec Legislature is called for the 9th January.

Seven ice-bound vessels have foundered in the Sea of Azov.

The first Chinese railway was formally opened on November 9th.

Aylmer, Que., was visited by a disastrous fire Friday night.

Two hundred Alsatian recruits mutinied on their way to join the German army.

It is rumored in Boulangist circles that the Government intend to expel Boulanger.

An impression that the French Republic is in serious danger prevails in London.

Ex-Judge Armstrong, chairman of the Labor Commission, died suddenly in Sorel Friday night.

The surplus revenue of the United States for the year ending June 30th last was $111,341,278.

The newly built barn of the Ontario Agricultural College was burned Monday evening; loss, about $25,000.

Lord Sackville and his daughters and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Chamberlain left Washington Friday en route for Europe.

The Toronto Labor Reformer says that nine teen city Aldermen have declared in favor of the $600 exemption on houses.

The schooner Edward Norton was wrecked on the Massachussetts coast and fifteen out of her crew of sixteen were lost.

It is said that an American has invented a contrivance by the use of which dynamite shells can be used with ordinary guns.

Two colored women, for keeping a disorderly house in Owen Sound, were sent to the Mercer Reformory last week for six months.

Gen. Harrison emphatically declares that he has said nothing, either before or since the election, regarding the annexation of Canada.

A fearful gale raged along the Atlantic coast Monday. Many vessels were wrecked and a number of sailors drowned—how many is not yet known.

In the race between O'Connor and Teemer, rowed on the Potomac on Saturday for the sculling championship of America, O'Connor won by ten boat lengths.

Dr. Valentine, of King street west, Toronto, was arrested Sunday charged with committing an abortion upon the person of a young girl named Lydia Charlton supposed to be dying.

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 182 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the head. How they may be cured at your home Post free 3d.—Address Dr. NICHOLSON, 30, St. John Street, Montreal.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Ask for our prices before clubbing with any other paper. It will pay you.

A nasal injector free with each bottle of Shiloh's catarrh remedy. Price 50 cts.

Hawk Bros. shipped their last carload of eggs last week.

Winter arrived in reality for the first time on Monday. It was a "corker" too.

Mr. W. H. Elder has removed to Proton Station, where he is going into the hotel business.

Shiloh's cure will immediately relieve croup, hooping cough and bronchitis.

We have received a splendidly printed and mounted map of the Dominion from Mr. John Lovell, of Montreal, who will accept our thanks.

If your watch or clock needs repairing always take it to Russell's, Flesherton, for a perfect job.

If your eyes are weak and troublesome, call at Russell's, Flesherton, and get a pair of the famous B. Laurence spex. They are the best in the world—buy no other.

Mr. W. J. Bates, of Toronto, was in town for a few days during the past week. Travelling for a furniture house appears to agree with him, judging by his jolly appearance.

Mr. Thos. Henderson, dentist, will be in Flesherton on Saturday and Monday, Dec. 1 and 3, to attend to your refractory teeth.

If you want a good watch or clock at a very small price, go to Russell's noted Jewelry store, Flesherton. It will pay you.

For dyspepsia and liver complaint you have a printed guarantee on every bottle of Shiloh's vitalizer. It never fails to cure.

Ayer's pills are always ready for use. They rre sugar-coated, easy to take, and sure to bring relief and cure. They are effectual in all diseases caused by disorders of the stomach and digestive organs

Southampton correspondence came to hand just as we were going to press. All matter intended for current week should be in our hands on Tuesday.

The date of the I. O. O. F. entertainment has been changed from Tuesday, Dec. 11, to Wednesday, Dec. 12. Don't forget this.

BUGGY FOR SALE. A good single buggy will be sold cheap. Wood taken in part payment. Apply to Jas. Kester, Flesherton.

Mr. Henry Down, who has rented his farm near Flesherton, left with his family for Detroit on Wednesday, where he intends taking up his abode.

Friends Meetings.

Mr. Wm. Moore, of the town line, Euphrasia and Collingwood, held three services in the Town Hall on Sunday last, morning, afternoon and evening, to very fair audiences. Mr. Moore is of the Quaker faith, and an ordained minister.

Sacred Concert.

A sacred concert will be held in Flesherton Baptist Chapel on Wednesday, Dec. 5, when an excellent program will be presented. Vocal and instrumental music, by good artists, and Flesherton brass band. Chair to be taken by Jos. Blackburn, Esq. Admission 15 each and 25cents per couple. See bills.

Returned Home.

Mr. F. T. Carr returned home from Gravenhurst on Saturday last, where he has been employed during the past summer in one of the large mills at that place. Mr. Carr informs us that on Friday the mercury stood at 25 ⊃ below zero at Gravenhurst, with about the same amount of snow that we have here.

A complete stock of the far famed B. Lawrence spex at Russell's, Flesherton, to fit any sight.

Shiloh's catarrh remedy---a positive cure for catarrh, diptheria and canker-mouth.

New mantle cloths and ulsterings received this week at M. Richdrdson & Co's.

Messrs. Petch and Hawk are on the warpath after raccoons. They have captured eight or nine thus for.

Why will you cough when Shiloh's cure will give immediate relief. Price 10 cts., 50 cts., and $1.

Mr. J. McFadyen held a shooting match at the station last Thursday, when a large number of turkeys and geese were captured by several lucky individuals.

Rev. Mr. Dobbin, of Caledon East, preached in the Presbyterian Church last Sunday afternoon, Rev. B. B. Smith, of Rosemont, will occupy the same pulpit next Sabbath.

Mr. Bradford Powell, who, it will be remembered, had his right arm severed in Bradley's saw mill last spring, and who has been away in Buffalo and Toronto all summer, returned home on Friday. His arm is quite healed, and although a little weak he can use it quite freely. The recovery was a surprise, even to the doctors who attended him.

Here is A Grand Opportunity.

The weekly Empire, Flesherton Advance, and a fine bust of Sir John A. Macdonald, all for the sum of $1.75. Balance of this year free. The busts will be delivered from our office. This also applies to old subscribers who renew.

Auction Sale.

An extensive auction sale of farm stock and implements will be held to-morrow (Friday) on the farm of Mr. Henry King, lot 22, con. 3, S. D. R., Artemesia. Sale at 1 p.m. sharp. The usual terms are given. D. McCormick, auctioneer.

Social.

The social held in the basement of the Methodist church on Wednesday evening of last week, under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid, was a very pleasant affair, and netted a little over $18. R. J. Sproule occupied the chair in a very satisfactory manner. The program consisted of refreshments, readings, music by the Glee Club, the Misses Richardsons, Miss Leitch, etc. M. Richardson entertained the audience with a short, laughable social talk, and a very pleasant social was brought to a close by singing the Doxology.

Blushing Out Loud.

A friend forwarded to Dr. McLellan some time ago a copy of The Advance containing our report of his lecture in the Town Hall in Flesherton. That friend showed us a letter on Friday last which he had received from the Dr., and the following opinion was given therein: "I like the report in the paper very much. It is not often that a local paper gives, or apparently can give, so good a report." All of which makes us blush so loudly that it would be painful to observe us.

Accounted for.

It now transpires that the letters spoken of last week as not having been received from Priceville were never mailed to us. One was, the writer says, given to the stage driver, and the other might have been sent in before the change in proprietorship. These two have now been accounted for, but there was one posted in the eastern part of Euphrasia which has not arrived, although it was mailed two months ago, according to the writer's assertion. It is very seldom a loss occurs, in fact it is almost impossible for a letter to go astray if properly mailed. Don't trust them to the stage driver; write your address plainly, leave your letter unsealed if for publication, and one cent will land it on our table every time. If these instructions are not followed out no blame can attach to any person but yourself. As for the possibility of a letter becoming lost in the mails between here and Priceville, it is absurd to think of, and we even doubt if the two letters complained about even left the store of the complainant. It was probably a case of forgetfulness.

The Baptist Teameeting.

We are informed that our item concerning Thanksgiving day in Flesherton was scarcely correct. The Presbyterians gave up their service on account of the service in the Baptist Chapel and on account of the same service the Methodists did not arrange for any special gathering. Rev. A. Grant—one of the most popular and original of Canadian ministers, preached in the afternon to a fairly good audience. The sermon was very impressive and was heard throughout with the most marked attention Tea was served in the evening. M. Richardson, Esq., presided in the evening. A number of the friends in the village gave several musical selections and rendered the "Te Deum" with excellent effect. Rev. A. Grant's address was full of pithy clearness and practical common sense. Rev J. W. Shilton, B. A., gave a very pleasant and appropriate address. Without collection or any appeal for money the proceeds of the day were nearly $23. The reason we were not able to give a complete report last week was on account of absence from the village.

They'll Get There Yet.

There are some young fellows in this village who are liable to get into trouble if they don't quit fooling with firearms. On thanksgiving day they had their poppers out and shot a valuable dog belonging to Mr. Hurd, but the bullet chanced to glance and the dog's life was saved. About the same time Rev. Mr. Shilton was in his yard when a bullet came flying past his ears—too close for comfort. If the young rascals had been arrested for attempted murder it might have taught them a salutary lesson. They'll get there yet, though, if they keep on monkeying with guns, let them not loose sight of the fact.

P. H. Morris, of the firm of B. Lawrence & Co., the great spectacle firm, will be at J. G. Russell's on Wednesday, Dec. 12. This will be a chance in a lifetime to get your spectacles fitted. Remember the date.

COMPETITION

DEFIED!

Fine Gold and Silver Watches for Presentation or Personal use.

AMERICAN CLOCK

AND SILVERWARE.

Quality and completeness of stock to select from not equalled in Central Grey.

Sizes Complete in Gem and 18 K. Wedding Rings.

No Catch Prices. Goods as represented

OR "CASH" REFUNDED.

Can do better for Customers—"Cash" or "Credit"—than any other jeweler in "Grey Co."

Watches carefully and promptly repaired.

JEWELER BROWN,

MARKDALE, ONT.

THE MODERN BORGIA.

She Escapes Hanging, but will Live in Solitary Confinement for Life.

A WOMAN'S TERRIBLE CRIMES.

A Boston despatch says: Sarah Jane Robinson, the Somerville prisoner, has escaped hanging on Friday for a fate scarcely less deplorable. The Executive Council, with the concurrence of the Governor, on Tuesday commuted to solitary confinement for life in the State prison at Charlestown, the sentence of death passed upon her for the murder of Prince A. Freeman, her brother-in-law.

This woman was also found guilty of killing six others by means of arsenic, and it is generally believed that those do not include all the crimes of this character that could be brought home to her. The lives of nearly all of her victims were insured, and at their demise she reaped the main benefit of the policies. In the early part of August, 1887, Wm. Robinson, aged 23 years, a son of the murderess, while at work in a wholesale house on Commercial street in this city, was struck in the back, between the shoulders, by an empty soap box that fell from about thirty feet above him. The injury did not seem to be serious and he went home alone. A few hours later he vomited freely, but this was not regarded as an alarming symptom. His mother dosed him a little, and as he did not rally immediately she sent for Dr. Emory L. White, of Somerville. Dr. White is the medical director of the General Prescott Colony of Pilgrim Fathers, a mutual benefit organization, in which young Robinson was insured for $2,000. Dr. White knew of the death of Lizzie Robinson, a daughter of Mrs. Robinson, a few months previous, and had heard of other frequent deaths in the family. This fact had awakened some slight suspicion in his mind, and he determined to watch William's case very carefully. He found his patient lying on the lounge, exhibiting apparently symptoms of nausea. The doctor called again the next day. The symptoms were then exaggerated, and, while he did not recognize convincing signs of poisoning, yet he was sufficiently suspicious to make an effort to procure a sample of the contents of the young man's stomach for analysis. He sought an opportunity to do this unobserved, but failed until his fourth visit, and then it had to be done with the knowledge of the mother. Dr. White sent the sample to Dr. Wood, the Harvard chemist, for analysis, and very soon received word that it contained arsenic in dangerous quantities. He called at the house again with this knowledge, and was at once importuned by Mrs. Robinson to tell her the result of his investigation. He evaded her questions as well as he could without exciting suspicion, gave her the impression that nothing out of the way had been discovered, and did his best to save the life of the young man, who at that time had sunk very low. The discovery, however, had come too late, and William died within a few hours. Dr. White took his information to the police and the medical examiner. The medical examiner's investigation corroborated the information furnished by Dr. White, and after a brief inquiry by the police they arrested Mrs. Robinson on the day of the young man's death for the murder of her son.

Immediately after the arrest the police began a thorough investigation of the strange woman's antecedents. They found that within five years no less than eight persons had died in her household, as chemical analysis proved, by arsenical poisoning. The victims were Oliver Sleeper, her landlord, 72 years old, who died August 10th, 1881; her husband, Moses Robinson, jun., 45 years old, who died July 23rd, 1882; Emma M Robinson, a daughter of 10 years, who died September 6th, 1884; Elizabeth B. Freeman, a niece, aged 1 year, who died April 25th, 1885; Prince A. Freeman, aged 33, a brother in-law, who died June 27th, 1885; Elizabeth A. Robinson, a daughter of 24 years, who died February 22nd, 1887; T. A. Freeman, 7 years old, a nephew, who died July 23rd, 1885, and Mrs. Annie Freeman, wife of Prince A. and a sister of Mrs Robinson, who died while under Mrs Robinson's care in South Boston on February 6th, 1885. On the 12th of last December Mrs Robinson was placed on trial for her latest crime, the murder of her son. After a trial lasting five days the jury disagreed. In February last she was tried for the murder of Prince A. Freeman, her brother-in law, and convicted on the 11th of that month. On the 28th of last June she was sentenced to be hanged on Friday next. Mrs. Robinson is a strange woman, full of whims and caprices. In personal appearance she is keen, rather ascetic, but tolerably good looking. She dresses in old fashioned style, and generally quite plainly. A remarkably sharp, dark eye gives her face an almost cunning expression.

The Nun of Kenmare Resigns.

A Utica, N. Y., despatch says: Sister Mary Frances Clare, known so widely in the religious and literary world as "The Nun of Kenmare," the author of about thirty books, and founder of numerous schools, convents and institutions for the training of working girls, has resigned her position as Mother Superior of the Sisters of Peace. She is now living in retirement in this city, engaged in literary work. It is estimated that the Nun of Kenmare has given over a million dollars to works of charity and mercy. She comes of an illustrious family and is a native of Dublin.

A Betrayal of Confidences.

A highly intelligent lady was superciliously particular that none of her children should ever hear any word spoken which has the most distant resemblance to a vulgar sound; but betrayed freely to them every confidence placed in her by others, telling them all kinds of secrets, and so habituated them to neglect all feelings of confidence, as though she considered that of no importance in bringing them up in the way they should go. If consistency be a precious jewel anywhere, it is in the training of a family of children.—Barnaman.

An Edinburgh cabman charged at the Police Court with failing to drive at a walking pace past a church during the hours of divine service, was let off by the magistrate on the ground that the hire was a doctor hastening to a patient.

LILY POWELL'S MURDERER

Still Remains Undiscovered—Allen and Worthen Both Discharged.

A Sherbrooke, Que., despatch says: Rev. Frederick Powell, a Congregational minister, came to this country from Birmingham, Eng., a few years ago, bringing with him his daughter Lily, a beautiful and accomplished young lady. For three years Mr. Powell travelled for Cadbury Bros., after which he purchased a farm near Dudswell, but not being an experienced farmer the profits of his labor were inadequate to meet the wants of his family. Lily then decided to go out and earn her own livelihood, and thus lighten the burden on her father's shoulders. Although she was of an amiable disposition, she was unaccustomed to the restraints placed upon one in the situation to which she had been reduced, and as a consequence, she did not remain any great length of time in one place. She was here last spring searching for a situation, when she met George Allen, a mill-owner of Danville, who engaged her as a domestic. She remained in his house but a short time, her excuse for leaving being that he had made improper proposals to her. She then secured employment in the house of one of Allen's neighbors, where she remained until one dark night a few weeks later, when she was waylaid on a lonely road and murdered, her body afterwards being dragged across a field and thrown into a small millpond. The murderer, whoever he was, evidently attempted to outrage the poor girl, who struggled in defence of her honor and who, being unable to maintain the unequal fight, was finally overcome and ruthlessly choked to death. The murderer then attempted to conceal the evidences of his terrible crime by throwing the body into the pond. Suspicion pointed to Allen, who, with his mistress, Algie Worthen, were arrested at Coaticook, on October 31st, and lodged in jail here. It was alleged that Allen had induced Miss Powell to accompany him home for immoral purposes, that she had repulsed him, and that determined to accomplish his fiendish purpose, he had waylaid her and in the struggle killed her. It was also believed that he was leaving the country when captured at Coaticook. The prisoners appeared before Judge Roux here, and the evidence of sixteen witnesses failed to connect Allen or the girl with the crime. The private prosecutor in his evidence said that the main reason for issuing a warrant against Allen was a rumor that he was leaving the country. When searched at Coaticook a return ticket to Sherbrooke was found in his pocket, while his valise contained tar-rope for use in his mill and a pair of shoes that he had purchased for one one of his neighbors at Danville. Both prisoners were discharged.

EVE-LIKE JAPANESE.

A Somewhat Startling Sight for an English Member of Parliament.

At Yokohama, Mr. Cain, M. P., had an embarrassing little adventure. At the back of every Japanese house, he says, is a pretty little garden with a large bath house, containing tubs of hot and cold water. The Japanese are as scrupulously clean in their persons as in their houses, and often wash all over two or three times a day. The room in which we had our dinner looked out upon the large open window of the bath house, in which three men and two women were tubbing with that absolute disregard to decency which characterized our common parents before the fall, when they were naked and not ashamed.

Later on in the evening, as I was passing to my room, one of the waitresses, in costume of Eve, made me a most profound and grave bow, wishing me good night. No Japanese has as yet become civilized enough, with all their wonderful civilization, to believe it possible that he or she is naked. In summer time this condition of things is universal. It is a little embarrassing at first to the modest European, but one soon gets used to it, and accepts it as the primitive innocence of a simple and guileless people.—London Times.

WEEPING AT THE GRAVE OF ROVER.

Mrs. Wilmot's Pet Dog Buried in a Costly Casket at Bridgeport.

A Bridgeport, Conn., despatch says: The pet dog of Mrs. Samuel Wilmot died Monday, plunging the household into deep sorrow. Some heartless individual had administered a dose of poison. The funeral occurred this morning and was attended by the family and a few friends. The casket was lined with white satin and covered outside with purple velvet. The remains looked perfectly natural and peaceful. The interment was in the family's private lot. The members of the family stood weeping around the grave, while what remained of Rover was laid at rest. Some of the floral offerings were expensive and unique, one being a dog kennel of roses tipped with sprays of dog fennel.

To Execute by Electricity.

A New York despatch says: At the meeting of the Medico-Legal Society last night the Committee on Capital Punishment by Electricity made its report. The committee concluded that the death current should be applied to the criminal in a way that is effective and certain. A long perforated table should be laid on a chair, overspread with a rubber cloth. The criminal lies down on the table or sits upright in the chair and is bound tight with strong cords. His head fits into a helmet, which is strapped across his forehead and around his neck. The helmet should be securely fastened, and an electrode not over an inch in diameter should be placed immediately under his back and extending down to the feet. A dynamo with not less than 3,000 volts should be used.

Odds and Ends.

A Dickens Club has been organized in Thorold.

A chicken social was the substitute for a prayer meeting at the Barrie Methodist Church recently.

Robert McClung while skating at the Midland Roller Rink the other night fell and broke his arm.

A school teacher was fined $2 and costs at Ashton, recently, for whipping a child. Several of the children took up a collection and paid the fine.

J. Chittcik, of Walkerton, lost a valuable cow a short time ago and J. Morton found it dead in the bush with a large tree across its body.

STRIKING STRIKERS.

Serious Rows in Brooklyn Between Police and Street Car Employees.

A last (Thursday) night's New York despatch says: The striking street car employees in Brooklyn rioted this morning. At half-past 10 the company started a car from the stables near the King's County penitentiary, adjoining Prospect Park. Twelve mounted policemen and a patrol waggon containing nine officers acted as escort. The vehicle proceeded without obstruction to Myrtle avenue, when a tremendous body of strikers and sympathizers filled the street. They stood on the track and surrounded the car, refusing to give way. The officers charged on the crowd and dispersed them several times, but the rioters followed the car, throwing stones and other missiles. At Flushing avenue a large waggon was placed on the track. In the meantime the crowd increased to enormous proportions. Hundreds of yelling and shrieking men stood on the streets, asking the officers to come on and fight them. Again and again the officers charged the mob, but it was like trying to break a heavy stone wall. They would not yield an inch. A perfect shower of stones, rocks and clubs descended on the heads of the bluecoats. The police did great work and many of the rioters were carried off the scene with cracked heads, bleeding faces and badly injured limbs. Sergt. Sutton was severely injured by being struck in the face with an immense rock. The same rock, after injuring the sergeant, struck the driver of the car, a man named Hoffman, and also injured him severely. At Gwynnett street, where the Loriener line branches off, the mob succeeded in tearing up the switch, and the attempt to run the car any further was abandoned. The police left the car at the mercy of the mob and began to charge in earnest. The mounted officers drove their horses into the crowd, and many were trampled under foot. After clubbing the crowd until they grew tired, they devoted themselves to the task of arresting the ringleaders. Hugh Garrett, John Burke and six others were taken into custody.

At half-past 10 o'clock a car was started from the stable at Park and Nostrand avenues. One hundred policemen, twenty-five of them mounted, surrounded the vehicle. They had proceeded only a few blocks when a mob of frantic, howling men advanced upon them, hurling all kinds of missiles in the air. Inspector Reilly ordered a charge, and the big body of policemen swept down the street like a cyclone, driving everything before them. Right and left they whacked their long sticks on the heads of the rioters, scattering them. The mounted men drove into the mob, trampling upon them fearfully. Still the rioters rallied. The stones, bricks, mud and clubs continued to fly through the air and many officers were badly injured. Finally a last charge was made by the police and the mob was dispersed. Six men were arrested. At ten minutes past 11 o'clock another car was started from the Nostrand avenue stables. The mob made a feeble attempt to reform its lines, and some of the leaders began to roll heavy boulders on the track to retard the progress of the car. Inspector Reilly again swooped down upon the miscreants and in two minutes the street was clear. The car then proceeded.

Latest from Ireland.

Alex. Price, master of the Enniskillen Workhouse, died on Oct. 20th, at the age of 76 years.

James Hartigan, ex-Rate Collector for Limerick Union, has been arrested on a charge of embezzling £60.

At Collooney, on the 26th ult., James McLaughlin, who had been arrested at Derry, en route for America, was charged with the murder of John Brien, ex constable, near Sligo.

On the 27th ult. an esparto boiler burst in the North of Ireland Paper Mills at Ballyclare, county Antrim. Frank Rankin was killed and several persons were injured, the majority being scalded by the boiling water.

One of the notorious Invincible convicts, Joe Mullet, is said to be lying seriously ill in the infirmary of Maryborough Jail, while "Skin the Goat" has been for some time mad, and raves about the Phœnix Park murders.

The land sub-commissioners have reduced rents in South Tipperary by about 30 per cent.

Mr. Matthew Anderson, for many years Crown Solicitor of Dublin, died recently. He had charge of all important State prosecutions for the past thirty years.

The celebration of the golden wedding of the Earl and Countess Fitzwilliam was continued last week at Coolattin Park, where about four thousand persons shared in a series of festivities.

The Land Purchase Court have confirmed the sale of farms of Lord Abercorn's estates in Tyrone and Donegal to 411 tenants for £267,254. £53 000 will be retained by the Commissioners as a guarantee.

Dr. Freyer, a Galway student, who graduated with first class honors and who won the gold medal at Queen's, has treated successfully the Nawab of Nampur, an Indian Prince, and received the big fee of £10 000.

Very large consignments of Irish cattle have been made to Scotch and English ports, 50 000 head having been shipped in one week, and prices are improving, so that the prospects of the approaching Christmas markets are highly encouraging.

A Necessary Caution.

"Remember, Uncle Rastus," cautioned the Magistrate, "that you are not compelled to disclose anything which may criminate yourself." "Den, I reckon, I'll keep my mouf shet, Judge," was the wise reply.

Water was let into the Cornwall Canal on Wednesday night, yesterday a tow of light barges was let into the canal to test the strength of the new bank, and it is expected navigation will be fully resumed to-morrow.

The Duke of Argyll has a habit of star-gazing with his hands folded behind him. One day he was in this posture, with a fine bunch of grapes in one hand, when a monkey belonging to his coachman sneaked up and stole the fruit.

INSANE WITH GRIEF.

A Woman Sets Fire to Herself and Five Children—The Life of But One Saved.

A Pittsburg (Kansas) despatch says: Late last night Marie Berthune, wife of one of the victims of the mine disaster, set fire to herself and her five children, and all but the eldest daughter were burned to death. Among the bodies recovered yesterday from the fatal shaft was that of Louis Berthune, and when his wife recognized the mangled remains a shriek was heard and the grief-stricken woman swooned. When she recovered, her reason had gone. As she evinced no disposition to become violent, little attention was paid to her, and all day long she sat at her door, regardless of the cries of her five children, the youngest a babe five months old. Late Sunday evening she apparently roused from her stupor and took her children to the improvised morgue, where lay the body of her husband. She led each child up to the ghastly corpse and, still with that awful silence which had marked her from the beginning of her bereavement, led them away to the little hut which sheltered them in the past. No attention was paid to her by those who were busy with the dead and dying, but about midnight a cry of "Fire" from the village of Frontenac gathered a crowd of workers from the mine to the streets. It was seen that the Berthune cabin was in flames, and willing hands were soon at work to save the inmates. The eldest child, aged 9 years, succeeded in escaping from the fire which devoured the rest of the family, and her story was one that sent a thrill of horror through her hearers. She said that her mother sent each of the children to bed with a kiss, and then sat down by the stove. The girl could not sleep, and lay watching her mother, who, after sitting for some time, took the can of coal oil and poured it over herself and the bedclothes of the children. The grief-stricken woman then set fire to some paper and scattered it about the room, and soon the whole place was in flames. The daughter struggled a short time with her mother in an endeavor to get away, but the burning oil on her mother's clothes caused such intense heat that she soon relaxed her grasp. The girl finally managed to get out of the door, where she fell exhausted and frightfully burned. The cabin burned like tinder, and soon nothing was left but the glowing embers, from which were raked the charred bodies of the insane mother and her four children.

Latest from Scotland.

Lord Provost Sir Thomas Clark took farewell of the Edinburgh Town Council on the 30th ult.

A Frenchman is presently undergoing a fast of thirty days in Edinburgh to demonstrate the efficacy of a certain herb, which he wishes to sell for £20,000.

The Free Church of Scotland Sustentation Fund for the last five months shows an increase of £859 7s. 9d. compared with the corresponding period of last year.

The funds have now been raised—£5 000 from a private donor and over £2,000 by the community—for the erection and endowment of a Cottage Hospital in Forres, Morayshire.

By the bursting of a boiler attached to a threshing machine at the farm of Scotston of Usan, near Montrose, Forfarshire, on the 30th ult., three men were killed and another dangerously injured.

The strength of the Salvation Army in Scotland, as stated at the recent annual meeting in Glasgow, is 106 corps, being an increase of 32 during the past year. The income for the year amounted to £10,533.

Professor Paterson, of Edinburgh, referring to Dr. MacGregor's recent glorification of war, said that it was not more than thirty years since equally eloquent ministers were advocating the maintenance of slavery.

The British War Office authorities have approved of the Wallace sword being transferred from the armory at Dumbarton Castle to the National Wallace Monument, and the relic is to be handed over to Mr. C. Rogers, of Edinburgh, for that purpose.

The Queen has approved of the appointment of the Hon. Henry J. Moncreiff, advocate, to be a Judge of the Court of Session in room of the late Lord Craighill. The new Lord Ordinary is the eldest son of Lord Moncreiff, who retired from his appointment as Lord Justice Clerk only about three weeks ago. He was born in the year 1840, and was called to the bar in 1863.

Mr J. H. A. Macdonald on the 30th ult. presented his commission appointing him Lord Justice Clerk to the Judges of the Court of Session, Edinburgh, and was installed into office. His Lordship has taken the title of Lord Kingsburgh. Mr. J. P. B. Robertson, the newly-appointed Lord Advocate, and Mr. T. S. Darling, the new Solicitor-General, also presented their commissions and were sworn in.

Gored to Death.

A Montreal despatch says: A young Frenchman named Joseph Lemieux met with a terrible death this afternoon. About 1 o'clock an ox belonging to a herd that was being driven to St. Cunegonde, one of the western suburbs, escaped from its drivers and made off in the direction of the city. Finally it reached Mr. J. K. Ward's lumber yard. It was closely pursued, and suddenly it became desperate, and turning around made a rush at young Lemieux and gored him in the thigh. Blood streamed from the wound, and a telephone message was sent to Notre Dame Hospital; but when the ambulance arrived about half an hour later the young man was dying, and in a few minutes he breathed his ast. The exasperated animal's horn had ruptured the femoral artery and the victim had bled to death. Lemieux was only 19 years old, and was unmarried. The body was removed to his father's house in the neighborhood.

Convincing Evidence.

Squeezy—But do you think the young lady really cares for you?

Dudewell—My dear boy, I know she loves me.

"But how do you know?"

"How do I know? Great Christopher! didn't she listen to me for half an hour last night? Not many girls would do that, you know."

The last vestige of snow has disappeared off old Mount Rose. Such a thing has not happened before in the recollection of the oldest white settler.—Reno (Cal.) Gazette.

ANOTHER CHARLEY ROSS.

A Buffalo Boy Stolen in Chicago and No Trace Left Behind.

The Chicago police are mystified over the strange abduction of a Buffalo boy in that city, and as yet have found no clue to his whereabouts, nor can they find any one who would have an object in stealing the boy. Nearly a month ago John Conway, who is now residing at No. 769 Root street, Chicago, went there from Buffalo. Mr. Conway was out of employment and went there to find work. Having only one child, a boy named Johnny, 6 years old, his wife being dead, he decided to leave him in Buffalo temporarily, and the Sisters of Charity there consented to take care of the child. Mr. Conway found employment in one of the packing-houses at the stock yards and at once wrote to Buffalo to have the boy sent to him. Johnny was put on a Michigan Southern train, in charge of Conductor Ladd. He reached Chicago on the afternoon of Nov. 1st. The sisters had written to Mr. Conway to meet the boy at the train, but he failed to receive their letter in time, and the child arrived at the Van Buren street depot alone. For several hours the poor little fellow sat in the waiting-room expecting his father to come for him. Late that night an officer took him to the Harrison street station. He was cared for by the matron and efforts were made by the police to locate his father. A day or two later he was sent to the St. Joseph Orphan Asylum. Mr. Conway finally received the letter from Buffalo and was much disturbed. He went to the railway officials, and after some inquiry learned of the arrival of the child and that he had been taken to the Harrison police station. At the latter place he was informed of the further disposition of the boy and went at once to St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum. This was Wednesday night. An hour later Mr. Conway rushed over to the Stanton avenue police station and informed the desk sergeant that his boy had been stolen from the orphan asylum. He was sent up town to Inspector Bonfield's office, where he again related his story. The Chicago Herald, which relates the story as above, says the officers at St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum were nearly as perturbed as was Mr. Conway when they learned the state of affairs. They say that on Tuesday afternoon, election day, a man called at the institution and inquired if a boy named Johnny Conway had been sent there. He then said he was a police officer and had come for him. He showed a letter from Detroit to some person here, which spoke of the boy, mentioning the name of Conductor Ladd, in whose charge the boy came to Chicago, and telling the recipient to "have Crane investigate." The man did not give his name, but it is presumed that he was Crane. The boy was given into his charge, and the two left together. The police have as yet found no trace of either of them. The motive for the abduction, for such it appears to be, is not known, and Mr. Conway claims that he cannot imagine any motive.

A MYSTERIOUS CASE.

An Englishman Finds Himself in New York While He Thought He Was in London.

A New York despatch says: A well-dressed Englishman, with a full black beard, approached Policeman Ripple, of the 19th precinct, on Saturday night and asked where he was. Being informed, he asked, "London?" "No, New York," replied the policeman. The man looked bewildered, and after asking the question over several times said that at his last recollection he was in Cheapside, London. "I must have been insane," he declared. The strange individual readily consented to be taken to the station-house. Standing before the desk, he appeared perfectly rational, and expressed his inability to realize that he was not in London. "I just came to my senses a few minutes ago," said he to the sergeant, "when I heard a voice saying, 'There goes the Whitechapel murderer,' and I imagined everybody was looking at me." The sergeant deemed it advisable to detain the man, to which the latter made no objection. He gave the name of Henry Johnson, and said he was 37 years old, and that his home was in West London. He said he believed he had been in a trance. Soon after being consigned to a cell, the man began shouting loudly, and the doorman found him lying on the cell floor struggling about. He attacked the doorman when the latter entered his cell, and an ambulance which was summoned conveyed the strange prisoner to Bellevue Hospital. The police found in the Englishman's pockets portraits, taken by a London photographer, of two young ladies, and a third one was that of an old lady. There was also a lock of gray hair and a letter addressed to Lizzie McKay, of London.

The Wreck of the Umbria.

Capt. McMickan is credited with holding "scientific" views respecting the duty of a steamship commander in a fog. He thinks that the safest course in thick weather is to let the vessel go at full headway, because, if a collision occurs, the vessel that is making the better speed is less likely to be injured. The opinion certainly is justified, as a matter of scientific navigation, by the crash off Long Beach. The slow going tramp steamer was run down and sunk, while the ocean racer that was showing its paces in the thickest weather escaped with hardly a bruise on its keel. It was a very good exhibition of the science of self preservation on the high seas, but withal a merciless display of recklessness and selfishness. The race being ordinarily to the swift the fast vessels alone are to be considered safe in a fog, if this principle of navigation be generally applied. The greyhound of the sea will soon come to have another name if these ideas are to prevail. They will be known as marine tigers, preying on unsuspecting and timorous victims.—New York Tribune.

Inquisitiveness Rebuked.

Tramp (to gentleman in evening dress)—Sir, can you assist a man who is utterly broken down?

Gentleman—No, sir. I saw you emerge but now from a drinking saloon.

Tramp (catching the key)—When I solicited your alms, sir, I did not question the source of your wealth. Equal courtesy would have suggested that you leave unquestioned the source of my downfall, sir. I have the honor to wish you good evening.

Kissed by the Lips of Death.

I cradled my child in my arms,
  My babe, like a paradise bloom
Blown down on the breath of a song,
  And held by a thread of the loom
That weaveth all things beautiful—
  Even flowers and fair, earthly things,
And purpling mists borne through the gates
  On the sunset's shadowy wings.

And then, as I sat in the dusk,
  I sang in a confident tone:
"Mine all mine. No matter what comes,
  This blossom is always my own."
But, low! as the words left my lips,
  A stranger bent over me there,
Disputing possession with me
  For this, of all flowers the most fair.

"Not thine, but my loved one," he said,
  "And this is the seal of my right"
He kissed the white brow of the child,
  And, smiling, passed into the night.
Oh! I knew the face of him then;
  As I felt the chill of his breath
I knew that the child in my arms
  Had been kissed by the lips of Death!

TALES OF STRANGE LANDS.

Prices for "Charming and Good-Natured" Girls in Central Asia.

The famous Russian artist and traveller, Vasilli Verestchagin, in speaking of Turkestan recently, said: When you pass the Ural Mountains, the frontier between Europe and Asia, you enter upon the steppes, which in the spring are beautifully green, covered with grass and flowers, and which in autumn are made quite barren by the sun. Farther on begins the great desert of moving sands. The steppes during spring are covered with the tents of the Kirguis, a very large collection of tribes occupying the whole of Central Asia. The Kirguis are a mixture of the Mongol and Turks, and number a few millions. They are a very good-hearted people and are Mohammedans, but not very fanatic.

A charming and good-natured girl can be purchased for, say, 100 horses, 10 or 20 camels and a few hundred sheep, in addition to a large tent, some cloth and some money, if the man has any. Once the price of the girl is settled upon and one-half or one-third of the amount is paid, the future husband can come to the tent of the girl's father, and is even allowed to remain there with her in the absence of the girl's parents, but only for a short time.

When the whole amount is paid the husband can take his wife to his own tent. There in that country, as in Europe, it is not wise to let the future husband take his wife without getting from him all that he has promised to give for her.

I remember a charming young woman who was bought by her husband for 150 horses. As the husband was very old and she was the third wife, and moreover as she bore no children, she was beaten nearly every day, and finally came to me for consolation. I have a sketch of her in one of my albums, and you will see that she is a most beautiful woman.

The Kirguis look on their women, as I learned from actual conversation with a Kirguis chief, who introduced me to his young and pretty wife, as having no other object in life than to vie with the other wives in their efforts to please the head of the family.

"Do you mean to say that your custom to have only one woman is better than ours, which is to have many of them?" the chief asked.

"Certainly," I answered.

"But do you understand," he continued, "that when there are many they get along much better? Every one of them understands that, if she ceases to please me, or if she is capricious, I shall leave her tent and go to the tent of another wife and live with the other wife. So they strive one against the other to be kind to me."

I did not approve of this reasoning, and I said: "In our opinion there is something more in the woman than her person. Our women are united to their husbands, not only by the body, but by the mind, heart and soul."

"What!" he exclaimed. "But if my wife by accident should lose an eye and be blind in one eye for life? Do you mean to say that I must remain with her for the rest of my life?"

"Certainly," I answered.

Then the Kirguis chief spat in disgust on the floor of the tent and exclaimed, "What a miserable law!"

Quite naturally, the Kirguis remain on their camping ground so long as there is grass for their cattle; then they strike their tents, and as the summer becomes hotter they go higher and higher up the mountains, so that in July, for instance, they pitch their tents immediately under the snow line.

Is Thanks a Compensation?

There is a nasty little abbreviation going the rounds. It has been caught up, and has spread into all classes; I mean "thanks." People used to say, "I thank you," "I am obliged to you." Now, when you pick a young woman out of a ditch, she snips out "thanks," and skips off as if the matter were square. You wipe the mud off your shoes and meditate. Or if, going home at night, after a hard day's work, you secure a seat in a car and a woman comes in, you rise promptly and tender it to her; she sweeps her ample silk into the gap, and a small "thanks" floats through the air to you. Is it compensative? If that woman had only looked you straight in your eye and said: "Sir, you are very kind, and I am greatly obliged to you," you would have felt not only paid, but would have a great accession to your chivalry. To stand for an hour would be easy, for a happy exhilaration would put life into your whole frame. But to be paid with an abbreviation! I once had a manuscript returned as follows: "Dear Sir,—We return your manuscript, with many thanks. You were very kind to have allowed us the pleasure of perusing it. Only that we are full, so far ahead as to make it unjust to detain your valuable paper, leads us to return it." Bless my soul! but I believe I was just as glad as to have had that paper published.—M. Maurice, M.D., in Globe-Democrat.

At the Ball.

Miss Keane (to the handsome young physician)—Oh, doctor, how do you do? You look killing this evening.

Young Physician (quietly)—Thank you, but I'm not; I'm off duty, don't you know. —Drake's Magazine.

It is claimed that the most beautiful woman in all northern Michigan attends to the wants of travellers at the lunch counter of a hotel in Mackinaw city.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Interesting Experiments with Strawberry Culture.

ADVANTAGES OF WARMTH TO STOCK

(Uncle John's Budget.)

Preventing Hens from Sitting.

As the breaking up of broody hens is often a matter of annoyance and inconvenience, I should like to give my method, which has proved very effective, without resorting to any of the various cruel methods in use. I have a raised pen with a slat bottom, just wide enough apart so they can stand comfortably, and feed nothing but oats. As it is the oversupply of fat that causes the hen to want to sit, in the first place, the most sensible plan is to reduce her weight and thus cure her broody inclinations, and get her in good condition for laying at the same time. Three or four days' confinement under such conditions usually suffice to cure the most persistent sitter. And I should like to say that in case hens get too fat to lay, which often happens, a diet of oats is the best ration for reducing them to laying form.

Success with Strawberries.

There was grown on the farm of Hon. Erastus Corning, just outside the city limits of Albany, N.Y., the past season, a field of Sharpless strawberries that for luxuriance of growth and yield of fruit surpassed anything in the fruit growing line that we have heard of of late. The berries were grown on soil that ten years ago was used for nursery purposes—undrained, rich, black soil, with all the manure it will hold. The extent of ground planted was three-fourths of an acre. The plants were grown in matted rows, but many of the runners had been cut out and the plants thinned, so that when examined under the mass of foliage they seemed to stand three or four inches apart in the rows, which were fully two feet wide, and the growth seemed a foot or more high. One-third of the bed had borne one season. We speak thus particularly of the growth as it shows what high culture and fertilizers will do. The total amount received for berries from this bed was $605, which at an average price of ten cents per quart would make the yield 6,050 quarts. No account was taken of the berries used in Mr. Corning's family and also in that of the gardener. And yet we hear people talk that the berry business is overdone! Well, so it is, the growing of common five-cent berries; yet there is still "room at the top." Does not the above show it? The German gardener has found by trial that the Sharpless is the best berry for his soil, and he grows it to perfection. This is a great point in successful fruit growing, whether it be berries or other fruit. Experiment—try the different old and new varieties, and settle in your own mind which is best adapted to your soil, locality and market. All these conditions must be noted, and when the decision is made, then make still another decision—to grow the largest crop, to get the highest prices for the finest fruit, put up in gilt edge packages. But do not get conceited and think you know it all. Be quick to "catch on" to any good thing. Prove all things and hold fast the best, and success will follow.

Warmth of Farm Buildings.

Warmth in winter is only created by the food. No stoves, or methods of warming the buildings, can be conveniently used without risk of damage and increased cost of labor. The bodies of the animals are the stoves and the food the fuel. The better the protection afforded the animal the less fuel required to promote warmth. In addition to the warmth created the animal must be supplied with food for growth and fat. When more food is given than is required for bodily warmth the surplus heat is stored in the body in the shape of fat, and when the heat is insufficient the body will convert the stored fat into heat and eliminate it off in the shape of the warmth so often noticed when entering a stable. All energy or heat when used for service is dissipated or lost, and this is a constant process. What the farmer should do is to save as much of this heat as possible and convert it into fat.

It is not the open side of the stable that causes loss of heat, but the motion of the air. Every time there is a current of air, no matter how small, it carries off the warmth by putting the air of the stable in motion. The animals usually make the stalls very warm by the heat from their bodies, but a small current of air, coming down on the upper part of the body, may cause the animal to take cold and become ill. In view of these facts it seems as if there would be an advantage in plastering the barns and stables, not so much with the view of adding to the warmth of a building containing a large herd, but in order to close all cracks and crevices, or by using tarred felt the walls may be made close. Ventilation can then be provided in some convenient manner, but no system of ventilation will be perfect or safe that permits cold draughts of air to pass over the stock during the winter. There is a great saving of food when the buildings are warm and comfortable. The annual loss of stock food through the agency of cracks in the walls of stables in this country is large, and would be a surprise if a true estimate could be given. The annual saving of this loss would more than pay for all the repairs made to buildings, and it is economical, therefore, to have the buildings warm. Another point to be considered is that the health of the animals is promoted and there is less liability of disease, and consequently a greater production of meat, milk and butter. With warmth, and the requirement of a smaller ration for each animal, more stock can be kept, which not only adds to the profit, but also to the manure heap, upon which the fertility of the farm depends.

Other Farm Gleanings.

Mud on the cows should not be allowed. Use the brush. A cow should be kept as clean as a horse.

Cooked clover, and the mess thickened with ground oats, makes an excellent addition to the food of the brood sow.

It is claimed that an occasional rolling with a heavy roller will so compact the soil that ants will be driven away.

Cold frames can be used for forcing some of the hardy plants in winter. Early cabbage and lettuce are grown in this manner.

Mix wood ashes, cinders and gravel together for your garden walks, and run a roller over it after each rain until it is well packed.

Lawn fertilizers are clean, free from weeds and as odorless as possible, being intended for use by ladies who make a specialty of flower gardens.

For forcing lettuce, radishes, etc., in a greenhouse the temperature should never be more than 50° day or night. Too much warmth is injurious.

In feeding grain to poultry it is better to vary it, allowing wheat and oats as well as corn. Cooked potatoes make an agreeable change for laying hens.

Rhubarb plants should be covered with manure and the covering left on until spring. The result will be strong and large stalks when the growing season arrives.

An application of kerosene oil will materially prevent rust on the iron work of implements. Implements should be put away in a dry place where dampness cannot reach them.

Damp floors cause cold, due to evaporation. The feet of animals are injured, and disease of the limbs occurs when they are compelled to stand or sleep on damp locations. The bed of the animal is very important. It is economical to use clean, dry material daily, and not delay changing the bedding until the whole is saturated with urine.

The fall colt will pay well, as the dam will not have much labor to perform at this season. By the time the colt is weaned the spring work will commence, and the colt can be put out on the pasture.

Cut out the old canes of blackberries and raspberries as soon as the ground freezes and burn them, which will aid in destroying insects. It is not advisable to postpone such work until spring, as it cannot then be done as well as now.

If there be any place in your garden where the soil is poor, and in which nothing seems to thrive, plant it thickly with petunias. These will thrive through any drought and produce an endless supply of beautiful flowers throughout the season.

Early maturity is an important factor in the qualifications of beef cattle. A good 3-year-old steer can be made to dress 70 per cent. if properly fed. It is the young, quick-growing steer that pays, and it should be marketed as soon as it reaches that point at which the greatest profit is obtained.

Roses should be mulched around the roots with loose material. Leaves or straw, with cornstocks laid thereon to hold them in place, is excellent. Mulching greatly assists in protecting strawberry plants during the winter, and as leaves will soon be plentiful a supply should be collected for mulching purposes.

The Rural World believes that the general farmer with 200 acres of land should keep fifty sheep for utility's sake alone. Such men can afford to estimate the value of sheep from the standpoint of meat, fertility and the general advantage to the farm, regardless of the market price of wool.

Where raspberries and other small fruits are grown in the garden, and the labor is not great for so doing, they should be banked up with dirt as a protection to the roots and canes against frosts. Trees are also benefited by having earth banked against them. The earth should be removed early in the spring and the ground leveled.

Good cider vinegar is always saleable and it pays to convert the surplus apples into cider for the purpose of making vinegar. The artificial vinegar cannot be used for choice pickles and other purposes for which good cider vinegar only is adapted, and does not, therefore, largely compete with it.

Plants sometimes need a variety of food as well as animals. Variety gives them all that may be needed. A plant will not thrive if given an excess of one kind of food and stinted in another. In applying fertilizers, the object should be to use substances that are lacking, to a certain extent, in the soil.

Don't try to crowd fifty hens into a poultry-house suitable for only twenty-five, as the larger the flock the fewer the eggs, proportionately, unless they have perfect accommodations. As a rule small flocks give a larger profit from the same outlay than when numbers are kept that cannot be properly provided for.

Now is the proper time to select the seed potatoes for next year. They must be carefully handled and stored separately from the crop. Select those that are well matured, even and smooth, and particularly those that are free from all signs of disease, as disease is easily communicated by seed. The small potatoes may be cooked and fed to stock.

Though no correct estimate of the value of manure can be made, yet Prof. Lawes gives the following as an estimate that is as correct, on the average, as can be arrived at. He gives the value of manure from cottonseed meal at about $28 per ton; linseed meal, $20; beans, $16; clover hay, $10; cornmeal, $7; straw, $3; and turnips, $1. The value of manure depends not only upon the food, but also upon the condition of the animal that makes it.

The garden plot should now be cleaned up and all material raked and burnt. A heavy plough should be used, and the soil turned over so that the frosts can penetrate, which will kill cutworms and many insects, as well as render the plot more easily cultivated in the spring. All the clods and lumps will be pulverized by the frost, and if cross-ploughed early in the spring it will be an additional advantage. If the plough cannot be used spade it up. A light application of lime will also be found beneficial.

Some time ago Professors Morse and Sweet, of South Chicago, agreed to eat crow if Harrison was elected, provided Messrs. Smiley and Kendall, two prominent citizens of the place, would do the same upon the election of Cleveland. Yesterday the losers each ate a crow nicely toasted, and declared the dish was equally as good as duck. Each mouthful was washed down with a good gulp of wine.

Collections are being made in Chicago for the benefit of a large number of army veterans located in Dakota who are reduced to penury through the freezing of their crops last August and September.

A STARTLING STORY.

A Sensible Dead Man Who Ate Bread and Drank Wine.

An elderly gentleman, residing in the Rue Rochechouart, Paris, who was supposed to be dead, has suddenly come to life. He has a nephew, who, being duly informed of his demise on Sunday, repaired at once to the house with his wife, to keep watch over the mortal remains of his uncle until they should be borne to their last resting place. On Monday evening, as the lady was tired, her husband sent her to the drawing-room to take some repose on a sofa; and a servant, having placed some wine and broth on a table, he threw himself into an arm-chair in the bedroom and soon went soundly to sleep. On awakening at 4 in the morning he found that the broth had disappeared and that the bottle of wine was half empty. Becoming alarmed, he went to his wife in the drawing-room, aroused her and told her what had happened. She returned to the bedroom with him, but the pair had hardly reached the door when they heard a noise. They paused at the threshold and to their consternation, a voice bade them not to be afraid, but to come in. The husband entered the room, but soon rushed out with his hair standing on end. He had seen his uncle's ghost. The old man was sitting, enveloped in a sheet, on the side of his bed. The supposed corpse had the utmost difficulty in getting his panic-stricken relatives to understand that he was not dead after all. "I am alive!" he repeated, adding that the preparations for his funeral had not escaped his notice. He had been in a lethargy, and, waking up, he had helped himself to the broth, which had done him good. Hearing some one approaching he had got in bed, as he was anxious not to cause any alarm, but Richard was himself again. He felt perfectly recovered, and certainly on closer examination the uncle's appearance by no means belied his words. The refreshments had come in most opportunely to restore him, and as he was much pleased with the affectionate attention which his relatives had shown him after his supposed departure from this world, everything was soon made happy and comfortable all round. The doctor of the quarter had not yet officially confirmed the demise of the worthy uncle, who seems to have taken a new lease of life.—St. James' Gazette.

Latest News Notes.

Over thirty students have volunteered for mission work as a consequence of Mr. R. P. Wilder's stirring up in Toronto.

The students of McMaster College and the young ladies of Moulton College ate their Thanksgiving turkey together at McMaster Hall.

At Vienna the German Emperor noticed at court a lady with extraordinarily long and beautiful hair, and asked her, "From whence have you it?" "It is the gift of God, Your Majesty," she replied.

Not until Gen. Harrison's wife's portrait begins to appear on advertisements of tooth powders and cigarettes will the people fully realize that the Republican party has once more taken hold of the reins of government.—Chicago News.

Henry Hunter and William Alexander, two well-dressed and intelligent looking men, have been arrested in Toronto on suspicion of being the confidence sharpers who have been victimizing well-to-do emigrants and others in Montreal, Toronto and other places.

A Victoria (B.C.) paper tells the following curious story: "A merchant of this city, named Gordon, was in his office one night when a flame broke out in another part of the premises. He rushed over to the place and found that an ordinary vulcanized rubber ring, which had been brought up from the cellar during the day and placed on an empty cracker box, had taken fire. It was quite alone, and the only tenable theory of the combustion was that it was spontaneous."

A Royal Breakfast.

A letter written by Anne Boleyn about three and a half centuries ago has just been published. It was written on the occasion of her first visit to London, and the writer describes, among other things, the unfavorable effects produced in her case by the late hours and dissipations of the capital in the early part of the reign of Henry VIII. She writes: "We rise so late in the morning—seldom before 6 o'clock—and sit up so late at night—being scarcely in bed before 10—that I am quite sick of it. The irregular life which I had led since I came to this place has quite destroyed my appetite." She then proceeds to mention a little detail which illustrates the ideas of the Lady Anne Boleyn and her contemporaries as to what was the normal appetite in a healthy Englishwoman at that period.

"You know," she writes to her correspondent, "I could manage one pound of bacon and a tankard of good ale for my breakfast in the country, but in London I find it difficult to get through half that quantity."

The Mighty Dollar

is long distanced by a 10 cent bottle of Polson's NERVILINE, the newest and best pain remedy. It cures colds, cramps, colic, pain in the head, sciatica, pain in chest; in fact it is equally efficacious as an external or internal remedy. Try a 10 cent sample bottle of the great pain remedy, Nerviline. Sold by druggists. Large bottles only 25 cents. Try a sample bottle of Nerviline, only 10 cents. Take no substitute.

Theory and Practice.

Rev. Moses Meecker (jumping up)—Why on earth do you interrupt me in this way, Maria? You're enough to drive one crazy! Didn't I tell you I should be busy all the morning writing my sermon on Patience?

They "Swore Like Our Army in Flanders," may be said of many sufferers from biliousness, headache, constipation, indigestion, and their resultant irritability, intellectual sluggishness, ennui, etc. The temptation to thus violate a sacred commandment, however, is speedily and permanently removed by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets—tiny, little, sugar coated anti-bilious Granules; nothing like them. One a dose. Druggists.

It is possible in France to insure the life of a child one day old.

The quickest sight-seeing on record is that of an American woman, who claims to have done Paris in ten hours.

ON $115 A YEAR.

That Is What "A Woman Who Knows How" Can Dress On.

Ellen Osborn writes from New York to the Kansas City Journal: It is the incidentals which have to be looked after most closely. Little things count up so fast. I wear two pairs of No. 2 boots in a year, cost, $8; slippers, $1.50; rubbers, $1. I spend $3 for two pairs of kid gloves and 50 cents for a pair of silk gloves in summer. Somebody always knits silk mittens for me in cold weather. I spend an average of $10 a year for stockings, flannels, renewing underwear, etc. Such things don't all wear out at once. Of course, there are ribbons, which are great rejuvenators of languishing gowns, but I take them and an occasional pretty thing in ruching out of my car fare. If you walk you are so much the healthier, and the pennies saved will make you very fine. Count, now, and see if I have kept within my estimate:

Winter dress	$14 00
Winter bonnet	3 00
Winter cloak	18 00
Spring dress	2 00
Spring bonnets and hats	4 75
Summer gowns	10 00
Boots and shoes	10 50
Gloves	3 50
Flannels, etc.	10 00
Total	$95 75

Madeline had certainly not overdrawn her funds.

"What did $43 buy in a year?"

"Two good wool gowns at $8 each, soft, easily draping gowns they were, too, made at home, of course; $15 worth of shoes and underwear. Two bonnets at $3 each; $4 worth of checked wool from which I cut myself a spring jacket."

"An allowance of $25 a year more to admit, say once in two years, of a substantial silk for dress-up would put me above the cares for clothes. A woman who can't dress on $115 a year doesn't know how," and Madeline nodded decidedly.

"Woman! be fair, we must adore thee;
  Smile, and a world is weak before thee!"

But how can a woman smile when she is suffering untold misery from complaints from which men are exempt? The answer is easy. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is an infallible remedy in all cases of "female weakness," morning sickness, disorders of the stomach, nervous prostration and similar maladies. As a powerful invigorating tonic it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. As a soothing and strengthening nervine it subdues nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency. Sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, to give satisfaction.

Good or Bad—Which?

Jones—Good morning! Beastly morning, isn't it?"

Robinson—Horrid day. Good day.

"Good day."—Philadelphia Record.

Beauty's Dower.

Where grace and beauty most abound
True happiness will oft be found.
Where ruby lips and glowing cheek
The gift of rugged health bespeak,
The artist, Nature's nobleman,
We risk the treasure of his art,
Depicting deftly as he can,
The lines engraven on his heart.
Fair maiden, may life's richest joy
Spread her bright mantle o'er thee;
May years but gently with you toy,
And pleasures sweet, without alloy,
With fairest blossoms cover thee.
But should, perchance, thy beauty fade,
Thou can'st call quickly to thy aid
Our Golden Medical Discovery.

Remember that Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a sure cure for all skin eruptions and diseases of the blood.

Something to Match.

Major Stofah—"Can you sell me a blue necktie to match my eyes?"

Clerk, politely—"Very sorry, sir, we are just out of blues, but I can sell you a beautiful red one to match your nose."

Canon Liddon has been sojourning at Hawarden as the guest of Mr. Gladstone.

Canon Wilberforce, who has again broken down from overwork, has gone for a change to Constantinople.

MARVELOUS

MEMORY

DISCOVERY.

Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering
Any book learned in one reading.

Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore 1,005; Detroit 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington 1,310 at Boston, large classes of Columbia Law students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Pres. N.Y. State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from

PROF. LOISETTE, 257 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

D C N I, 47 8

FOR SALE,

A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,

WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR

All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the

TIMES PRINTING CO.

HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

DUNN'S BAKING POWDER

THE HOUSEWIFE'S BEST FRIEND

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1.50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, NOV. 29, 1888.

EDITORIAL COMMENT.

AN INSULTING PUPPY.—Says the Flesherton Advance: "THE GREY REVIEW last week published a poorly constructed report of Dr. McLellan's lecture in the Town Hall, Flesherton of three weeks ago. We would like to ask the wonderfully knowing scribe of the Advance who made him a judge of men who stands head and shoulders above him in literary attainments. The article referred to appeared less than two weeks after the lecture was delivered and the gentleman who wrote it is one who is a representative of the teachers of the riding, honored and respected by the whole profession. Just to get a fling at us the Advance man (if you can call him such) is willing to insult the intelligence of the teaching fraternity, who will no doubt remember him and estimate his ability about its full value."

The above delectable piece of composition is from the Durham Review. The editor evidently had a very sore head. There was no insult implied, in anything we said, to the teachers of South Grey, and no one but an imbecile could construe anything insulting out of it. The report referred to was poorly constructed; it was disconnected and fragmentary. That fact remains, even supposing it were the best public school teacher in Ontario who had penned it. In the eyes of the Review, this assertion is an insult to the teachers of South Grey because one of their number happened to be the writer! Bah! It was quite unnecessary to give us the gratuitous information that the editor (save the mark) did not write this report. No one in their sober senses would ever dream of him attempting anything more than a ten or twelve line local, and even then the construction gives him dead away. Now he wrote the item quoted above—observe the expression, "men who stands." The Review should know better than it appears to what constitutes an insult. It is an adept in such matters. When the late proprietor of this paper had severed his connection with it the Review flung after him an insult which no gentleman or man of gentlemanly instincts about him would be guilty of. In noticing his departure it said: "We may now expect something readable." You are getting it, young man. But it makes all the difference in the world whose ox is gored, doesn't it? We have always remembered that little discourtesy, displayed in the manner of a coward, a blow struck when there was no chance of defence. And this is the individual who shouts out "Insulting puppy!" The echo returns and howls around the Review editor's ears, "Insulting puppy!"

Canada has a new sculling champion. By O'Connor's defeat of Teemer at Washington on Saturday he becomes Champion of America. Hanlan was a marvel in his day, but the bright star faded, and with the fading Canada bobs up serenly with another and still brighter luminary. Stick to your back seat Uncle Sam.

He sah for dear ol Canada,
As o'er the Yanks she climbs,
Her muscle sons take all the buns
And U. S. silver dimes.

A process has lately been invented whereby milk may be kept from souring for a month, grape and apple juice for six months, and sweet wine for a year. The inventor is now experimenting on an apparatus which it is claimed will keep subscribers from souring on the editor. We are open to receive donations with a view to helping him along.

The canal through the Isthmus of Corinth was proposed about 2,500 years ago—600 years before Christ. The plan was laid before Mr. Mowat, who took it into his serious consideration. After 700 years of careful thought Mr. Mowat approved of the scheme, and work was begun in the time of the Emperor Nero. It is believed that it will soon be finished. —[Hamilton Spectator.

A despatch says: It is stated on good authority that Hon. Edward Blake received a retainer of $10,000 before accepting a brief from the Canadian Pacific railway in the Manitoba railway case just concluded in the Supreme court. Well, that's a very fair price for two day's work; Edward can't complain; $30,000 a week, $1,560,000 a year. Yes, after profound consideration and mature deliberation we have decided that Ed. has a little the start of us on salary. But then we give full value for ours.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR.—In your issue of the 8th inst, under the heading "Heathcote and Kimberley News," I observed a paragraph relating to school matters containing statements reflecting seriously upon myself, and questioning my right to take any action in the matter of so great importance as that to which reference is made. I am sure, had your correspondent known all the particulars in the case, and he could have known them had he enquired of me, he would never have written what he did. You will kindly allow me a little space to make a few explanations which I know will place the matter in a true light, and I hope be satisfactory to all.

There are few persons who take a deeper interest in the education of the youth of our country, and no class of men to whom Ontario owes more for her educational advantages, than the ministers of the Christian Church. This is as it should be. As a citizen and a parent I claim the right to use my influence to get the very best teacher possible to instruct my children. The exercise of that right need not interfere with any other person, and in this case it did not, as this following statement of facts will show.

Careful enquiry was made on two occasions of this present teacher as to whether the school would be vacant. An affirmative answer was given each time. Application was then made on behalf of the person in question, knowing him to be a man of grand principle and good character, fine spirit and first class record as a teacher. This application was made prior to any other, and therefore could not be in opposition to him, not for the purpose of taking advantage of another, for the return of Mr. Gaudin from B. C. was not known by myself at that time. The person applying wished to know the mind of the trustees as soon as possible, that if not engaged he could look elsewhere. No undue influence on my part was used to get him engaged. I simply made the application, answered a few inquiries, and left the matter with the trustees. If they yielded to any influence brought to bear upon them it was that of those who would not allow the trustees to be guided by their own honest convictions, and frustrated their own purpose by so doing. I am very sorry that anything has occurred to mar the peacefulness of our quiet village, and hope that in the end all will be satisfactory. There are other items in your correspondent's communication which I deem not worthy of notice, and allow them to pass in silence.

Yours in behalf of the public good, intellectually, socially, morally, and religiously. W. H. MADDEN.

P. S. I do not intend to pursue this matter any further.

Heathcote, 19th Nov. 1888.

Cheap Light.

Received—One car load No. 1 coal oil, and selling at 14c per gallon in small or large quantities, at R. Trimble's.

Salt.

Received—One car load fine Goderich salt, 300 lb. barrels at lowest figures. R. Trimble's.

Another consignment of those famous overcoats which cause such a commotion amongst clothing dealers, at R. Trimble's.

The finest and cheapest lot of ladies' and gents' fur caps in town, at R Trimble's.

Thirty-Day Race.

Free for all! Go as you please, for a pair of felt boots, socks or rubbers, lower than the lowest, at R. Trimble's

Overshoes and rubbers in endless variety and cheap at R. Trimble's.

Poultry Wanted.

The highest price paid for turkeys, geese, ducks and chickens, at R. Trimble's

Butter Wanted.

Top prices paid for choice butter in tubs and rolls, at R. Trimble's.

Cross-cut Saws.

All latest makes and bottom prices. Please inspect before purchasing elsewhere. R. Trimble.

We have done some wonderful whittling of prices. Call and see. We want the whole community to awake and wonder at our wanderful enterprise. R. Trimble.

Locals.

We have received some fine samples of job printing from Mr. J. G. Keefer, of Forest. They are very creditable. Thanks.

Master Wesley Armstrong departed on Saturday last to win fame, honor, experience, lucre, etc., in the far Northwest. We hope he may collar them all. Wes, went west by way of Weston and Toronto.

Coal oil of superior quality and lowest prices at M. Richardson & Co's. Call and get particulars.

Are you made miserable by indigestion, constipation, dizziness, loss of appetite, yellow skin? Shiloh's Vitalizer is a positive cure.

Just think, 50 cents for a pair of youth's long boots, regular price, $1.75. See them, at M. Richardson & Co's.

Do you suffer from indigestion or loss of appetite? Are you troubled with liver or kidney complaint? Take Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This preparation purifies and vitalizes the blood, thus restoring health and strength to the digestive and assimilative organs. Try it.

The Rev. Geo. H. Thayer, of Burbon, Ind., says: "Both myself and my wife owe our lives to Shiloh's Consumption cure.

Furs in coats mantles, shoulder capes, muffs and capes, for ladies and gents, all the new styles, at M. Richardson & Co's.

Ben Townsend, of the Durham Review, has taken unto himself a wife. Benny is a bolder young man than we gave him credit for. Long life and happiness to you old boy.

A large range of ladies and misses' mantles, ulsters, jersey jackets, etc., at M. Richardson & Co's.

Note Dr. Hutton's change of card this week. Priceville has only one doctor now, but he is quite capable of coping with any and all of the sickness.

Didn't Come off.

The mortgage sale advertised to take place at Munshaw's hotel on Monday last has been postponed until Jan. 30 next. There was but one bid made.

One Thousand Dollars Reward.

A reward of one thousand dollars is offered by the publishers for the best letter of suggestions for a Christmas souvenir that will equal the Christmas Number of the Montreal Star at the published price. Competitors to give their full name and address. This year's Christmas Star has twenty-eight pages of beautiful illustrations, articles from eminent writers, four superb supplements and other attractions of a surpassing character. It is far and away ahead of anything yet published. Orders for copies to be sent to England are the largest on record. Those who cannot procure it from a newsdealer will receive it by sending the small amount of 40 cents to the publishers, Montreal. Postage stamps of one and three cent denomination will be accepted.

Died.

CLINTON.—On town. line, Osprey and Artemesia, on Saturday, Nov. 24, Geo. Thomas Clinton, aged 19 years. Death was caused by the bursting of a blood vessel.

Mens' and boys' long boots at greatly reduced prices at M. Richardson & Co's.

Meaford Real and Inistioge correspondence crowded out.

In Memoriam.

OF ELLIE STEWART, WHO DIED NOVEMBER 10TH, 1888.

By Sister Jennie.

Oh death, how cruel Methinks thou art
To snatch from us away,
The flower that scarce had oped its bud,
And leave others in decay;
The sweetest flower in the garden plot
Could but satiate thy thirst,
Though faded ones around it grew,
You plucked the fairest first.

But Thy will, Oh Lord, on earth be done,
As it is in Heaven above;
Thy loved ones Thou call'st early home,
She answered that call of love.
We worked, we watched, we prayed in vain,
Thy hand we could not stay,
With feeling of regret and love
We saw her pass away.

Why is it we stop and sigh,
Or check the gathering tear?
Why is it then we call and look,
For Ellie we find not here;
To us the warning was too short,
No time to say adieu,
Till death had stopped the beating of
That heart so kind and true.

"We'll miss her now," you'll hear some say,
But ah! they little know
How pure a mind, how warm a heart
Was stilled by death's fell blow;
"We'll miss her now"—how mild the sense
To some those words may mean;
"We miss her." Oh, the anguished form
To us those words are seen.

"We miss her" Ah, 'tis lightly said,
But how should others know
The light, the hope that died with her,
When she was called to go,
It was Lord's word, God's call of love,
Why cease we not our weeping
We hope to meet to part no more—
She is not dead, but sleeping.

Flesherton, November 19th, 1888.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$6 00 to	6 00
Fall Wheat	$1 10 to	1 10
Spring Wheat	1 10	1 10
Barley	0 50	0 65
Oats	0 33	0 33
Peas	0 58	0 58
Butter	0 17	0 18
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 35	6 25
Hay per ton	8 00	10 00
Hides	4 50	5 52
Wool	18	00
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 7	0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 0

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

BOAR FOR SERVICE.

MR. Wm. CAMERON, Lot 35, 8th Con. Artemesia,

Has a thoroughbred [illegible]
TERMS, 75c. cash and $1 if booked.

STRAYED.

Came to the premises of the undersigned about the 6th of September, 5 yearlings, red and white. Owner can have the same by proving property and paying expenses

JOHN TYSON, Feversham P. O.

New Hair Dressing Parlor.

Mr. W. J. NELSON, having opened out a new barber shop and hair dressing parlor, in

Moore's Block, Durham St.

is prepared to attend to all work in his line, and would invite patronage.

Hair cutting, shaving, shampooing razors, etc., all done in the highest style of the art.

W. J. NELSON.

Came Astray.

Came to the premises of T. A. Gamey, lot 13 and 14, 2nd south of Durham Road, on Nov. 13, a small black mare. The owner is requested to prove property, pay expenes, and take it away.

T. A. GAMEY. Flesherton Station P. O.

AUCTION SALE
OF Valuable Farm
IN THE Township of Artemesia

Under and by virtue of the power of sale in a mortgage from David W. Jamison to the vendors, which will be produced at the time of sale, and on default of payment of the moneys thereby secured there will be offered for sale by Public auction

AT MUNSHAW'S HOTEL,
in the Village of Flesherton,
ON
Wednesday, the 5th Day of December, 1888,

At 10 o'clock, a.m., by A. S. Vandusen, auctioneer

The north half of Lot No. 36, in the ninth concession of Artemesia, containing 50 acres, more or less, of which about 45 are said to be cleared and under cultivation and fenced. On the premises are said to be a frame house and a barn and orchard.

TERMS—Ten per cent. at time of sale, and for the balance terms liberal, and will be made known at time of sale

For further particulars apply to
W. J. BELLAMY, ESQ., Flesherton,
Or to MOSS, BARWICK & FRANKS,
Vendors' Solicitors.

Toronto, Nov. 12th, 1888.

—I t Pays To—

GO TO THE BEST

AND THAT IS THE Northern
Business College,
OF OWEN SOUND.

The best and most practical course of study.
The best teaching talent.
The best accommodation for students.
The best methods of instruction.
The best results from that instruction after students graduate.

For annual announcements giving particulars regarding the course of study, terms &c., address
C. A. FLEMING, PRINCIPAL.

Owen Sound, Nov. 1st, 1888.

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
PURVEYORS TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Dealers in fresh and cured meats, sausage (our own make), lard, bologna, etc. etc.

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only $4 per. hundred.

Call and ascertain prices, whether you buy or not.

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts, 2nd door North of Richardson & Co's.

Medical.

DR. CARTER,
M.C.P. & S., ONT.
PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.
FLESHERTON.

Office, Strain's block. Residence, J. G. Russel's

J. G. Hutton, M.D. C.M.

[illegible] of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Ontario

Enquire at office, 2nd door east of Grant's or Atkinson's Hotel.

Priceville, Nov. 19, 1888.

J. G. Hutton, M.D.

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.
SURGEON DENTIST
Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the R.C.D.S.,

Will visit FLESHERTON, (Munshaw's Hotel) 1 and 2 of each month. Teeth extracted, painlessly and filled in the highest styles of the art, and at moderate rates.

HEAD OFFICE, 761 YONGE ST., TORONTO.

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST.

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.

Flesherton each trip on the day following

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,
Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office,—Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P. McCULLOUGH,
Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER in B. R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent for purchased sale of lands. Appraiser for C. L. C. Com and F. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. ISSUER OF MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES.

On Town or Farm Property,

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton.

W. J. BELLAMY.

TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AG'T, &C

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance effected in first-class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule.

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and, Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any pary of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavetroughing, and in fact everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts

—NEW—

FALL GOODS!

—AT THE—

Central Store,

Priceville.

Having received our Fall Stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have confidence in a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well bought article.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and comprises something good and serviceable for Men and Boys, in fact

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

are the unapproachable. Our motto being

Central Store, Priceville.

A. McCABE.

FLESHERTON

Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Binders,	Grain Drills,
Reapers,	Broad-cut Seeders,
Mowers,	Spring Tooth Harrows,
Rakes,	Iron Harrows,
Waggons,	Two-Furrow Gang Plow,
Buggies,	Plows,
Sleighs,	Scufflers,
Cutters,	Turnip Drills,
Fanning Mills,	Land Rollers.
Spring Tooth Cultivators.

FLOUR, FLOUR,

STONE

FLOUR!

MR. P LOUCKS

Is prepared to do your Gristing on short notice and grinds on the old terms of every twelfth bushel. Seven cents per bag of two bushels for Chopping, done every day. The Little Mill is big in the estimation of the public.

Satisfaction Guaranteed.

P. LOUCKS, Proprietor.

Good stabling for horses.

NOTICE.

SHINGLES constantly on hand and for sale cheap. Just put in first-class new Chopping Mill—now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B SLOAN,
Eugenia.

FARM for SALE

Being part of Lot [illegible] containing fifty [illegible] acres, situated [illegible] with village of [illegible] and magnificent land [illegible]

[illegible] to
S. ALDOUS
Kimberley P.

SALESMEN WANTED for the New England Nurseries, established over 30 years. The old reliable nursery. Men with push, energy, good habits and clean character always succeed. We can give you good pay and steady work. Write for terms to CHASE BROTHERS' COMPANY, Nurserymen, Colborne, Ont.

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT and PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on
EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

Buy a new

HARNESS

PURCHASE A

SLEIGH ROBE

INVEST IN

A new Whip

BIG DISCOUNT

—FOR—

C-A-S-H

D. Clayton

HARNESSMAKER,

FLESHERTON.

is prepared to give you large DSCOUNTS for CASH on all kinds of harness, whips, blankets, etc.

A

Huge Stock!

—OF—

SINGLE, TEAM, AND DRIVING HARNESS, on hand.

Sleigh Bells, Robes, Whips, Hoof Ointment, Axle Grease, Curry Combs, Brushes, and everything required in the line of harness makers' supplies.

WE ALSO DEAL IN

A SUPERIOR

QUALITY

—OF—

TRUNKS

CALL and EXAMINE our extra large stock before buying anything in these lines elsewhere.

D. CLAYTON

N. B.—My accounts are now ready and waiting for settlement. As I am in great need of money, all persons who are indebted to me are requested to call and settle, ON OR BEFORE DEC. 1st, otherwise their accounts will be placed in other hands for collection.

D. Clayton.

For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON.

PENRITH.

Old Penrith stands, of wide renown,
As once the finest northern town
Of England—ere a Saxon dame
Was allied to a Norman name,
And many a tale of love was told
Neath castle walls of Penrith old.

The town is pleasantly situated on the western slope and base of a wooded eminence, called the Beacon Hill, on the summit of which there is a tower, built probably for a lookout station when the beacon fires on the hill tops were the only means of signalling impending dangers during the long period of border warfare. This hill forms part of the once famous Inglewood forest.

As we came out of the railway station the first object that attracted our attention was the ruins of the old Castle on a fine elevation west of the town. It was built in the fourteenth century, and was the residence of Richard III. when Duke of Gloucester. The remains of the outer walls, still standing, show that it has been a place of considerable strength, being built of red freestone filled up in the middle with small stones concreted with hot lime, or cement, forming a solid mass and averaging five feet in thickness. It was besieged and destroyed by Cromwell or some of his followers.

It was about noon on market day when we arrived and walked down into the Old Corn Market, and I tried to locate the shop where I served as apprentice thirty years ago. The oldfashioned front with bow windows had disappeared, and it looked as strange to me as the faces of the busy crowds of country people, not one of which I recognized. We went to the Old Crown hostlery, where my forefathers had been accustomed to stop on market days, for the past seventy years. It was unchanged, but the people were all strangers to me. Shortly after I found my brother and sister, and we spent the rest of the day very pleasantly with them. We dined in the same room where John Wesley preached on his visit to Penrith over a hundred years ago, and as we sat we listened to the sweet music of the chimes in the old parish church near by, the same chimes that delighted Wesley. The bells were new then but the church was old, part of it having been there for seven hundred years. Indeed its foundation is beyond the scope of historic record. We looked with curious wonder at the colossal stones in the old church yard, marking the place known as Giants Grave. They stand there yet, probably little changed, for what is a hundred years to their age? They are said to mark the grave of Ewan Cusario, a man of gigantic stature and great courage, who ruled Cumberland with regal sway in Saxon times. There is another very ancient monument, called the Giant's Thumb, which, with the former, have excited and baffled the curiosity of autiquarians.

Leaving Penrith the same evening, our next stopping place was the old border city of Carlisle, which we left next morning for Glasgow. Passing the border into Scotland, the first place of much interest was Gretna, where run-away couples from England were formerly married by a blacksmith, who, dispensing with license and other formula, on receipt of a small fee declared the candidates for matrimony man and wife, and married they were by Scottish law.

Following the course of the Clyde through Annandale and Lanarkshire, past many romantic spots and places rich with historic interest—Carstairs, Linto Hill, Bothwell and Drumclay—one place the scene of a signal victory, the other of disastrous defeat of the Covenanters, so vividly described by Scott in "Old Mortality," we at length reached Glasgow, the industrial and commercial metropolis of Scotland, and next to London the greatest city in the kingdom.

At the commencement of the present century Glasgow had a population of eight thousand; now its population is about eight hundred thousand, and on the day we arrived there were excursions from all parts of Britain to see the Exhibition, adding probably a hundred thousand more to the population. We got outside seats on one of the main omnibus lines running through some of the busiest thoroughfares, and had a fine opportunity of seeing the enormous traffic of this busy city—styled by Max O'Rell the dirtiest and blackest in the kingdom, although it did not so impress us. Argyle street, the Trongate, St. Vincent and Sanchiehall streets will compare favorably with the finest business thoroughfares in England. Unlike Edinburgh, they are not adorned with statuary and monuments in every open space. Glasgow is too practical, too much given to moneymaking to have anything stand in the way of business; but one large open space—George square,—is set apart for statues. Entering it, you might dream that all the statues in the city were having a mass meeting; here are Walter Scott, Robert Burns, David Livingstone, James Watt, Prince Albert, Queen Victoria, Campbell and Peel, and many others. Some are on a bust, but unlike their prototypes are not noisy, but they seem to say Glasgow bodies are too busy to be bother with us and have packed us all into one square. The square looks like a cemetery or a sculpture yard. Some of the stone statues are on foot and some on horseback, and in the centre Walter Scott, on a column eighty feet high, overtops the crowd.

To be continued.

A job lot of boys' long boots, good stock, from 50 cents per pair up, at M. Richardson & Co's.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 26 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Price $1; six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

Farm for Sale

The subscriber offers for sale that valuable property on the 4th line, Osprey, bet or known as lot 4, containing 125 acres; 99 cleared and 60 under cultivation, the remainder pasture and meadow. New frame barn, stone foundation; stables, etc., new frame house, cellar, and stone foundation. This is a magnificent property. Possession immediately. For terms, etc., apply to

A. McKECHNIE, Maxwell P. O.

Blacksmith Shop for Sale or Rent.

The blacksmith shop, known as Adison's, on the 4th line, Artemesia, about 3½ miles from Flesherton, is offered for sale or to rent. For terms and particulars apply to

DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Eugenia P. O.

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

s where can they get their flour, feed, and provisions cheapest in town.

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S.

All kinds of meal always on hand.

TO THE FARMERS AND PUBLIC GENERALLY:

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH:

at all hours of the day, ONLY 15 cts. All other lines in stock as usual.

The peoples faithful servant,

G. H. BLACKBURN.

Remember the place—Next door to M. Richardson's

Bargains

BARGAINS

—IN—

BARGAINS!

Now is the time to secure them,

BEDROOM

—AND—

PARLOR SUITES

QUITE NEW in design, very tasty and neat, to be sold at a small advance on cost.

Beautiful new line of

LOUNGES

IN RAMIE.

TAPESTRY and NEW SILK COVERINGS.

These goods have all been bought very close and we intend giving custmoers the full benefit.

Handsome Hall Stands, in Mahogany Finish

Must be seen to be appreciated

Sideboards!

in a number of styles an finish

All at equally low prices.

THERE ARE STILL some of those low priced

BEDSPRINGS!

Try one, rest well, and prolong your life.

NEW RAYMOND SEWING MACHINE.

At $30.00.

J. E. MOORE,

Undertaker and furniture dealer. Undertaking special attention.

Married an' Gone.

The house is dretful lonesome since Milly's gone away;
Though she's only gone across the road it's [illegible] to stay,
An' when she comes to see me now she's full o' talk o' Fred,
Tell I'd like to take him back the barn an' punch him in the head.
It seems to me th' good old days is over now a r' gone,
An' nothin' left but lonesomeness an' gray hairs comin' on.
Why, I'member when she used to come a-toddlin' to the gate,
An' be watchin' down the lane for me, an' couldn't hardly wait
Tell she saw me comin' a-hurryin' up the lane to her an' h me,
An' then nothin' could n't hold her, she's so glad to see me come
Then when old sand man came around and sleep[illegible] would be,
No one could tell the stories right exceptin' only me.
An' then when she was older how her purty cheeks would glow
When she'd say, "I'm'd stick to father, did'nt want no other beau
There's no one now to scold me ef I wear a shabby coat,
There's nobody to lead me in the way that I should vote.
There's n one but remember tell suthin's like to break,
Though I try to seem as chipper as old times jest for her sake.
O, Milly, if you only could be hitt o once again—
Jest my four-year old, that didn't love no one but father—then
Jest to keep ye so—unchangin' tell the sleepy time me round,
An' you and me, my baby, slept together under ground!

Men and Deeds.

Wanted, men,
Not systems fit and wise,
Not faith with kind eyes,
Not wealth in mountains piled,
Not power with gracious smile,
Not even the potent pen—
Wanted men!

Wanted, deeds,
Not words of winning note,
Not thoughts from life remote,
Not fond realistic aims,
Not sensuous lazy calms,
Not soothly scented creeds—
Wanted, deeds!

Men and deeds!
They that can dare and do,
Not longing of the new,
Not praising of the old,
Good life and actions bold,
These the occasion needs—
Men and deeds!

—Parrar.

BELINDA: A BEAUTY

"A very interesting country this, sir," observes the lady, looking warily at Roger's handsome face—oh, Miss Burke, you who fifteen years ago, could look at no man without a melting smile! But such are the results of earnestness. "Interesting, I mean, to those who visit it with a purpose."

"Yes, I am told you get very fair snipe-shooting here in winter," answers Roger, who does not understand the argot of Miss Burke's sect.

"I speak of the inhabitants; sunk now in superstition, but the remnants of a noble race. You are, perhaps, not aware that the Basque has outlived five distinct peoples—the Carthaginians, Celts, Romans, Goths, and Saracens?"

"Murray," says Belinda, in a stage whisper. "'Introductory Remarks on the Pyrenees,' page two hundred and forty-nine."

Roger strokes his moustache and tries to look edified. "The Basque must certainly be very old," he begins, foolishly.

"But the work I am engaged on at present, the work that indeed fills every moment of my time, is the search of illustration. You have, perhaps, heard through Miss O'Shea that I am writing a book? No; I might have guessed as much. Miss O'Shea's interests do not lie in the direction of my own. A book entitled 'The Woman of the Future.' I am a laborer, sir, though a humble one, in the greatest reformation of our day, the work of restoring women to the pedestal from whence the blinded prejudices of centuries have dethroned her."

"Ah, yes," says Roger, in no very enthusiastic tone, and glancing as he speaks at the patches where darns ought to be in Belinda's stockings. "For my part," he adds, gallantly, "I cannot see that any reformation is needed. It seems to me that women are exceedingly charming as they are."

"As the Turk, as the debased Asiatic thinks of his slaves?" cried Miss Burke, hotly. "Do you, an Englishman, actually advance the proposition that to be charming is a fit motive for an immortal being's existence?"

"The most charming women appear to me to be so without any motive at all," says Roger, mentally measuring the distance between his adversary and the door. "But I am really the worst fellow living at an argument."

"Oh, that is a very easy way of escape. It is perfectly evident to what cynical school you belong the sunshine light in which you regard our sex! Can you solemnly affirm, sir, I ask it with the earnestness the subject requires, that you do not look upon us as toys?"

Thus put, as it were, upon oath, Roger Temple considers Miss Burke's personal attractions more closely than he has yet done; the thin, cold features, the glistening eyes, the watch-spring figure. He feels that he does not, that in his wildest moments he never could look upon her in the obnoxious light she deprecates, and with a perfectly clear conscience answers, "No."

"Then may I ask what do you look upon us as?" says Burke, pitilessly.

Roger not only measures the distance between himself and the door; he rises to his feet. He has been held a brave soldier in action, a hardy sportsman in the field; but he is horribly afraid of Miss Lydia Burke. "I—I really beg pardon—but I have usually looked upon women as women," he answers, humbly.

Miss Burke turns her head away in contempt.

"It really is most wonderful," sighs Rose, who has caught the last words or two of the discussion, "most extraordinary how gentlemen do dislike intellect in us! I am sure, for myself, I envy superior women, and I have always wished and wished to be blue; haven't you, Belinda?"

"Oh, I like my natural hue well enough, Rosie," answers the girl, pertly. "Still, if I were forced to change, I believe I would as soon be blue as some other colors. Superior women do not usually wear rouge or pearl powder, do they?" She looks more thoroughly hard, more deliberately, selfishly wicked than ever as she implants this savage stab. Alas, where are all the budding graces, where is the soft, shy, dawning womanliness of the "Lagrimas" of last night?

"But must your choice, of necessity, lie between the two, my dear Belinda?" Roger asks, in that quiet tone of his, which at once softens and exasperates her. "Are blue and rouge the only two colors in the world?"

"Certainly they are not, Captain Temple. There is sun-tan for instance, Van Dyck brown; the fine natural color of gamins, beggars, gypsies, and all the great unwashed of nature. My color."

"Unwashed! You quite pain me with these expressions, Belinda," said Rose. "But you must try not to despair about your complexion, dear. Spencer shall make you some of her milk of roses. She got the receipt from Lady Harriet, and they say the effect is extraordinary; that sun-tan, and even freckles, can be cured by it. For my part," encouragingly, "I have no great faith in cosmetics. You are fair or you are swarthy by constitution."

It is long before the visit draws to an end; and Captain Temple, doubly guarded by Rosie and Miss Burke, does not exchange another syllable with Belinda. At last, in the middle of one of Miss Burke's finest perorations on woman's destiny, the girl brusquely takes her departure from the room; and accompanying her to the top of the hotel stairs, Roger gets a word or two with her alone.

"You are not going to play paume to-day?" For she has a racket ball and schistera, as usual, in her hand. "Under this broiling sun! Belinda, I will not allow it."

"Will you not, indeed, Captain Temple? Why not, pray?"

"I do not choose to spoil your complexion, for one thing."

"My unwashed complexion that is to be improved by Lady Harriet's milk of roses! Isn't it fine to hear Rosie and Miss Burke talk! What advantages I have had, sir, in being guided by those two extremes of feminine intelligence."

"Promise me you will not play paume, Belinda, to-day, or any other day."

She hesitates and looks down; a quiver on her lips, a tell-tale blush shining beneath the clear olive of her cheek.

"Lagrimas!" he whispers softly. "Will you promise?"

And then she raises her eyes. They promise—unconsciously they promise a world too much to Roger Temple.

CHAPTER XI.

A TRANSFORMATION SCENE.

Have you watched an almond tree flower? Bare, shivering boughs to-day, to morrow, under the first warm kiss of April, a cloud of odorous blossom. Such change, such sudden miracle of growth is wrought during the next four days in Belinda. Her cheek gains color, her figure roundness; her hair no longer disfigured by the villainous plaits, hangs round her neck in waves of glossy chestnut. Her movements lose their masculine roughness, her dress grows neat. Girlish grace, girlish softness, modesty—all have come to her. Who shall unriddle those things?

"Belinda is not going to be so unfortunately plain, I do believe," Rose will remark complacently to her lover. "She has quite made up her mind to marry Mr. Jones—quite; and you see how she brightens up at the prospect of riches. I am afraid I was right about that poor thing from the first, Roger. Belinda has no heart."

Miss Burke accounts for the transformation otherwise. "A nature like Belinda's," says Miss Burke, "can only develop from one frivolity to another. Her childish love of play outgrown, and Belinda takes to what? Earnest work, higher culture, recognition of the world's wants and miseries? No! To muslins, ribbons, and laces; the livery, the badge of woman's degradation in the social scale."

So think these ladies. What does Roger Temple think?

Roger Temple is in the frame of mind, reader, when all of us are apt to shun self-communion, to keep the eyes of the spirit shut. By nature the most chivalrously loyal of men, Roger is drifting, daily, hourly drifting, into disloyalty. He is more attentive, more devoted than ever to Rosie during the hours that he is at her feet—poor, unconscious Rosie, perpetually devising toilets for Colonel Drewe, who as yet comes not! But there are a good many hours of the day when he is not at Rosie's feet. The adorers of mature beauty are generally debarred from adoration during the forenoon, that sacred, mysterious time for women to whom Heaven hath given one face and who manufacture to themselves another. Till eleven o'clock every morning Roger is free, and Belinda also. After the Casino ball at night he is free again; and then, in the starlight, "Lagrimas" steals out upon the balcony (so fatally near his own) of the Maison Lohobiague!

Miss Burke, absorbed in the "Women of the Future," sees nothing. Rosie enwrapped in lavender ribbons, Spanish combs, and agitated suspense about that elegant creature Stanley, suspects nothing. And then, under the southern sky, in this do nothing life, the path, no difficult one in any climate, that leads from flirtation to friendship, from friendship to a warmer feeling, is so easy.

Four glowing nightless days pass by like one; Miss Burke engaged philosophically, Rose making futile millinery preparations for Colonel Drewe, Roger Temple and Belinda falling about as desperately in love with each other as ever two people fell on this contradictory earth. For the fifth day Rose has planned an eight hours' excursion into Spain's Hendaye, Fontarabia, home through the mountain pass of Behobia by moonlight. Mr. Jones is to return early in the morning from his tour, and as a matter of course will accompany them. "Two pairs of lovers—I never heard of anything so ridiculous," says Rosie. With this Miss Burke, note-book in hand, as duenna or fifth wheel of the coach.

Augustus arrives punctually by the early morning train from Bayonne, and with lover-like ardor makes his way at once under the broiling sun to the Maison Lohobiague, where Belinda, already equipped for the day's excursion, meets him just outside the house. Forgotten Jones during his absence, she has not; nor her own quasi encouragement of his suit, having indeed been pointedly reminded of both about six times during each twenty-four hours by Rose. But just at this present moment, dressed, poor little girl, in a summer frock and hat that Spencer has condescendingly made up for her, a flower in her waist-belt, the sunshine that human lives know once in its extremest brightness shining from every feature of her face—at this particular moment, I say, the sudden apparition of Augustus, more blistered than ever after his journey, more mosquito-bitten, more amative, comes upon Belinda with all the cold chill of an unexpected misfortune. She changes color painfully, does not offer to take his outstretched hand, and can find no utterance of welcome more flattering, more lover-like, than the monosyllable, "You?"

"Me," says Mr. Jones, ungrammatically tender. "I have not kept you waiting, I hope? You have not been expecting me long?"

"Expecting? Well, certainly not. I don't know that I expected you at all," answered Belinda dryly. "You have seen Rose?"

No, Augustus has not yet had that pleasure. He found a note from Mrs. O'Shea on his table, inviting him to accompany them for the day into Spain and then—"Then, of course, I rushed off at once to see you, Belinda," he adds in tenderer accents than before. "Has time hung heavy on your hands?" Mr Jones has an unhappy knack of composing sentences brimful of murdered aspirates! "Has your heart told you that—that some one you cared for a little was away during the last four days!"

"My time has not hung in the least heavily on my hands," answered Belinda, coldly, emphasizing every "h." "But I have been aware of your absence, if you mean that."

"And what have you been doing with yourself? No paume-playing, I hope?"

"I have given up paume-playing forever," she exclaims, her cheeks glowing, a sudden shame coming into her eyes as she makes the confession.

"My dear Belinda, this delightful compliance with my wishes," begins Augustus.

"Your wishes!" she interrupts him quickly. "What do you mean by that, sir? What do you suppose your wishes have had to do in the matter?"

"A good deal, I should hope, considering how we stand to each other as—as engaged people, and that," says young Crœsus, purpling.

Belinda turns from him impetuously; she trifles with the flower in her belt, she stoops and pats Costa, who with an air of dignified triumph sits in the sunshine eyeing the discomfiture of his enemy askance.

"I did not think you would begin any of that ridiculous nonsense again, Mr. Jones," she remarks after a minute's silence. "Engaged, what for, pray? Maccaroons at Harranbour's? We shall have time enough to get some, I dare say, before we start for Spain."

Without answering a word, Jones shifts his position from one leg to the other, then stands critically gazing into the transparent, girlish face before him. Wounded vanity is flooding Mr. Jones' intelligence with a curious amount of light at this moment.

"I don't know how it is, but it seems to me that you have altered a good deal since I went away, Miss Belinda. Upon my word you look three, four, any number of years older."

"That is not a complimentary speech to make to a young lady, is it?" cries Belinda, but in a fluttering, ill-assured voice, with the traitor blood still deepening in her cheeks.

"And your dress—all those refined female elegances with which I have so often wished to see you invested," says Augustus, pompously. "But I suppose, as you expected me to-day, I may without vanity attribute a little of that to——"

"Pray don't hesitate."

"To the very laudable desire of giving me pleasure, my dearest Belinda."

Upon this she lifts her eyes, and returns his gaze unflinchingly. "I have taken to 'refined elegances' as I have given up paume-playing, to suit my own taste. I never thought for one moment of giving you or any one else, pleasure, never."

The natural expression, by no means an angelic one, of Mr. Jones' face, replaces in a second all the oily tenderness which, as a suitor, he had thought it wise of late to dissemble. Truth, he feels, is going to be told between him and this keen-tongued little vixen at last, and he is quite determined to render truth as unpalatable to her as may be. "Well, Mrs O'Shea," looking at his watch as he speaks, "you are not in a very complimentary mood this morning, it seems; so the sooner we wish each other good-bye, the better. As regards your party into Spain, you will mention to Mrs. O'Shea, perhaps, that circumstances do not allow of my accompanying you."

"I will deliver any message you like to send by me, Mr. Jones."

"I have received a letter that calls me back at once to London, and shall leave this cursed hole with only too much pleasure, by the twelve o'clock train. However, I have no doubt you will find Captain Temple a very willing substitute! Before we part there is one question that I should like, just for curiosity, to ask you. What was your object in giving me the answer you did four evenings ago, here in your own lodgings?"

"The answer!" she stammers. "I don't know what answer you mean. Oh, Mr. Jones, do forgive me if I have offended you!"

"What was your object, I ask?" he persists savagely. "Is it so perfectly impossible for you to speak the truth?"

"I answered you more in jest than earnest. You know it. I said that we might try being engaged. We have tried it, and—the thing is impossible. Forgive me, Mr. Jones. I have acted very foolishly, very badly, I know, but I ask you to forgive me. I am wiser now."

"No doubt of it," says Augustus, with one of his odious smiles. "It would be impertinent, I suppose, to inquire under whose influence your wisdom has been gained?"

She stands for several seconds dumb, as though she had not understood the question; then, from throat to temple, the poor little girl turns white. Her secret—a secret hitherto to her own inmost conscience—is bared before her, like a committed sin, in this moment's piercing light. She changes from pale to red, and then to pale again. Her whole childish face works piteously. "I—I am wiser now," is all she can repeat; oh, with what trembling lips, with what scorching, irrepressible shame!

"Wiser in one sense of the word, no doubt, you are," says Augustus, watching her with contemptuous coolness. "There may be two opinions, perhaps, as to the worldly wisdom of these little changes of fancy. Is it your step-mamma, I wonder, or Captain Temple who is acting as your adviser? Not your step-mamma, surely?"

At the insolence of his tone, his look, Belinda's self-possession returns to her. "My own heart is my adviser, sir," she cries. "My own heart tells me I could never endure to live a day with you as your wife, let alone a lifetime!"

"And have you made up your mind—although you do treat me so cruelly I must always take the warmest interest in your welfare—have you made up your mind, Belinda, to live under Captain Temple's roof for the future?"

"I shall do whatever he thinks best for me, sir." The words stab her, but she utters them with a kind of despairing resolution. "It would be impossible for me to live under the roof of any one I like and honor more than I do Roger Temple."

"Oh! What very delightful sentiments, what charming filial submission! And you were so desperately prejudiced, if you remember. Only four days ago you were ready to quarrel with me for assuming the possibility of Mrs. O'Shea's marriage."

"I did not know Roger Temple then," says Belinda bravely and simply. "I can excuse Rose now. I think she or any other woman would be honored by becoming Roger Temple's wife."

And having got back to the familiar region of truth, the girl's stout spirit rallies. No further blush of shame rises to her cheek, no further tremble of the lip betrays her. Shame was for the first discovery of her weakness. For her love itself, misplaced, hopeless though it may be, she can feel none.

Mr. Jones makes his exit, not again to cross the stage of this little drama; and Belinda stands blankly gazing at a world from whence all fair perspectives, all gracious harmonies of color, seem abruptly blotted out. The cheerful streets—'tis a high Basque festival, and the town is thronged with peasants from the neighboring villages—the balconies with their gayly-painted awnings, the flush of purple hills across the river, every familiar object upon which she looks seems changed—vivid, intensified, as external objects become in moments of sharp bodily pain, and still distorted to Belinda's untuned, jarring sense. Her life is distorted. The gamin life, with its April joys and tears, is over. Over! why she feels old already; those children playing yonder under the trees seem separate from her by a score of painful years! The past has died by sudden harshest blow, and she has no future. That is for Rose; for all happy women whose love has been sought for and returned. And then——

Then across the girl's heart sweep thoughts that are intoxication, memories of words spoken by Roger Temple to "Lagrimas" when there was only the night and solitude to hear—words carrying with them the ring of truth, of earnestness, all unlike the tawdry compliments he lavishes on Rose. Ah, if he care for her ever so slightly, and she may see him sometimes, feel the pressure of his hand, meet the kindness of his eyes, can she not be contented?

CHAPTER XII.

THE MEMORY OF A KISS.

On reaching the Hotel Isabella, Belinda finds her step-mother alone, dressed in the sprightliest, most juvenile white muslin wrapper, and wearing on the summit of her blonde locks what the Parisian milliners neatly term "a ravishing futility," in the way of a cap or badge of widowhood.

"Belinda! and not Mr. Jones? Well, it is positively a reprieve—I am too upset, too miserable to bear the presence of a man. Oh, my dear girl, think what tortures of suspense I am going through! Colonel Drewe has arrived—is staying in this very hotel."

There is not one of her little poses in which Rose is more successful than that of bashful girlish perturbation. In her youthful white dress, and holding a microscopic patch of cambric and valenciennes to her lips, she really at this moment does not look a day over two-and-twenty; in a half light, of course, and viewed, as every work of genuine art deserves to be viewed, from the proper focus.

"It appears he came by a late train yesterday, but I knew nothing about his arrival till this morning. The poor fellow picked up Spencer's acquaintance in the courtyard, and questioned her, and oh, Belinda, I fear things are worse than I anticipated! Spencer says the fiery look that came into his eyes when she told him Captain Temple was here was something fearful."

"Lucky that you can keep out of his way for the day, Rose. There was a beautiful Spanish duchess in this hotel last summer, and six duels were fought about her before the season was over. We must hope Colonel Drewe will have had time to get his fiery feelings under control by the time you come back to night."

Mrs. O'Shea for a minute or more examines the pattern of her laced handkerchief in silence. "The duty that lies before me is a most cruel one," she sighs at last, looking up with soft, remorseful eyes at the ceiling. "I hope, in consenting to marry my poor Roger, I have acted conscientiously. I hope it, and I believe it. My rejection of him would have cut Roger Temple adrift from his last moral stay in life. But I cannot forget that there are other, it may be prior claims. You talk of duels jestingly, Belinda! You little know how necessary it is for me to see Colonel Drewe without delay, and alone. For want of women displaying discretion," says Rose, solemnly, "some men's lives have been sacrificed in positions like this."

"But where is he all this time, Rose—where is this fiery-eyed Colonel Drewe? If you mean to see him before we start you must make haste about it."

"Ah, my dear child, there is the difficulty. Is it my duty to start at all?" And then, beckoning Belinda to her side, and speaking in whispers, Rose unfolds a series of little Machiavellian plans, by means of which she hopes to mystify everybody throughout the remainder of the day. Roger, in the first place, is to be told that she is suffering from headache, and the party must start for Spain without her. Then Colonel Drewe is to be admitted—not at first admitted; the wily Spencer must hold him at arm's length with accounts of her mistress's suffering condition until his feelings be sufficiently worked upon. "And then," says Rosie, "I shall take care, you may be sure, to put everything before him in a light as little wounding to his own vanity as possible. My engagement, fortunately, has never been actually given out, and I know, when I have him alone, I can say many things that will soften the blow to him. Poor, poor Stanley! Ah, if I could only persuade him to return quietly to England by this evening's express! Roger need never know more about the visit than I choose to let him know, and—"

(To be Continued).

A FIGHT TO THE DEATH.

Desperate Encounter Between Maddened Bulls on the Edge of a Precipice.

Thomas S. Moore, a well-known and substantial citizen of Garrard county, Mo., tells a graphic story of a desperate encounter that occurred on the crest of a knob in his neighborhood several days ago between a couple of enraged bulls, in which both were killed. The animals had wandered to these heights, and, upon sighting each other, at once engaged in a duel to the death. Those unacquainted with the instincts of such creatures cannot easily imagine what extreme ferocity they sometimes display. In speaking of the incident Mr. Moore said:

"Being interested in the study of geology, I happened to be on the knob at the time, and was startled about 4 o'clock in the afternoon by a fearful bellowing. Looking some distance ahead, I saw the animals advancing towards each other with their noses on the ground, turning this way and that, and casting dust into the air with their forefeet. When only a few yards apart they suddenly leaped to the attack with a frightful noise and began to gore each other with frightful energy. Above the fierce and noisy trampling could be heard the grinding of their interlocked horns and the violent snorting of brutal rage. The breeze blew aside the dust, and revealed the tigerish character of the onset, as with wide-set limbs and tails curling in the air, they charged again, stabbing with their pointed horns. Tiny streams of blood shot down their necks and sides, while their distended nostrils emitted a reddish foam. The prodigious strength of these magnificent animals thus brought into activity afforded a spectacle both tumultuous and thrilling. The exertion of the encounter, added to the pain of each newly inflicted wound, inflamed their combative spirit to the pitch of tempestuous fury. One of the bulls, following up a temporary advantage, plunged his horns into the chest of his antagonist, and, with a quick upward jerk of the head, ripped open the flesh to a depth of several inches, while from this gaping wound jets of arterial blood began to spurt. In a towering passion and with gleaming eyeballs, charging furiously upon his adversary, the wounded bull drove his horns into its abdomen, making a horrible opening, through which the entrails gushed. The impetuous and stormy nature of the contest had carried the combatants to the verge of the cliff, but, blind with deadly fury, they saw no danger. Each mortally wounded and weakening momentarily from profuse loss of blood, waged the battle with that fiendish desperation shown only in wounded animals. It was evident, however, that a crisis was near at hand. The situation had resolved itself into the grim condition of the death struggle. With lowered heads they backed away a few yards, defiant, implacable and again collided with a force that seemed to split their very skulls. This terrific shock staggered the bull with the chest wound and forced his eyeballs from their sockets. He suddenly plunged forward to his knees on the brink of the precipice, and remaining in a quivering stupor, with his open mouth burrowing in the dust. The other, tottering and covered with blood, but still terrible in his weakness, charged heavily upon his kneeling and senseless foe, struck him in the flank with the force of a ponderous projectile and hurled him headlong over the precipice. The body executed a somersault in midair, fell with a noisy crash through the tree tops upon the rocks below, where it was subsequently preyed upon by vultures. The remaining bull seemed to realize in a stupid way the danger to which he himself was exposed. He drew back from the brink over which his hideous muzzle had been momentarily thrust, and with his entrails trailing on the ground, staggered a little distance off, fell prone to the ground, rolled over on his side, shivered a moment and then lay still in the embrace of death. The battle lasted nearly an hour, and in point of sanguinary details and tragic horror has no parallel within the limits of my recollection."

Diphtheria Carried by a Turkey.

A fowl with diphtheria was brought to the house of a veterinary surgeon on April 24th and died on the 29th. The feeding and nursing of the bird devolved on a lad aged 14, who was assisted by his brother, aged 5. On the evening of May 11th the writer was called to see the little boy of 5, who had been poorly for a day or two. He had enlarged cervical glands on the left side, which had come on rapidly. He was a delicate little fellow, with fair hair and anæmic aspect. The fauces were more or less covered with diphtheric membrane, the left tonsil more especially. Under the administration of biniodide of mercury and iron the throat symptoms cleared up and the child made a good recovery. On the day after this case was first seen the boy who fed the fowl was feverish and had similar patches over his fauces, but not to the same extent as his brother. A sister, aged 9, had also a similar explosion on the fauces. On the 18th the mother, who nursed them, was attacked, and was similarly treated. They were all kept well up with beef tea and stimulants.—British Medical Journal.

The New President and His Wife.

Notwithstanding the result of the election Mrs. Cleveland's photographs sell as well as ever. Mrs. Harrison doesn't like to have her pictures placed on sale, and none are to be had.

President-elect Harrison was walking down to his office one afternoon of last week just as the Public Schools were dismissed, when an enthusiastic boy dashed up to him and exclaimed, "Oh, General, ain't you glad!"

Rev. W. T. Turner, Methodist pastor at Harrow, Ont., died suddenly the other day.

Office boy (to editor)—There's a mad old gent outside, sir, what wants to see you. Editor—Did he say what he wanted? Office boy—Yessir; he said that you printed a poem that his son writ, an' he says he'll have satisfaction or go to a hosspital.

MR. AND MRS. BOWSER.

BY MRS. BOWSER.

Mr. Bowser came home the other afternoon just in time to meet the cook going away with her bundle, and he rushed into the house to inquire:

"I suppose you've gone and done it again?"

"What?"

"Abused and maltreated the girl until her sense of justice has compelled her to leave."

"I hadn't anything to do with her leaving."

"Then who had? She looked heart-broken as I passed her just now."

"Did she? Poor thing! She got a letter this morning from her aunt in Canada, telling her that she had been left $5,000 in cash, and advising her to come home and marry a man who owns three farms. She must feel very sorrowful!"

"Humph! And didn't you put too much work on her?"

"No."

"Nor make her feel her position?"

"No. Her position was in the parlor about half the time."

"Well, it seems very queer to me that so many of our girls leave. Everything will be upset now for a week, I suppose."

"Oh, no. You can cook, you know, and you are such a sympathetic soul that you ought to be willing to go into the kitchen for a day or two. I shall depend on you, Mr. Bowser."

"Oh, you will?" Not satisfied with driving a dozen poor souls to destruction, you want a rub at me! I wouldn't have your spirit for all the money in the world!"

He went away with that, but he was home an hour earlier than usual, and when I inquired what for he said:

"What for? Why the child and I have got to have something to eat haven't we, and who's to cook it if I don't take hold?"

"I can cook."

"Mrs. Bowser, I've long felt it my duty to give you a few lessons in the culinary art. I have held off hoping your pride would force you to take hold, but the limit has been reached. The time has come when I must sacrifice my business to enter my kitchen and prevent my child from feeling the pangs of hunger."

"Please don't."

"But I will! I'm driven to it. I've got a wife who can't cook the northwest end of last year's turnip, and who can't keep a cook over a week at a time. I've put up with it too long—much too long, Mrs. Bowser. I must sacrifice my dignity to preserve the life of my child."

"Shan't I help you get supper?"

"Not a help. You'd only be in the way. Just sit down in the rocker, Mrs. Bowser, put your feet on the lounge, get a cud of gum in your mouth, and sit and chew and chew, and think what mean things you are going to say to the next girl to drive her away. When supper is ready I will call your royal highness."

He disappeared with that.

When he reached the kitchen he took off his cuffs and coat, pushed up his sleeves and kindled a fire. His confidence began to desert him at this point and he seemed to be studying deeply as he filled the tea-kettle even full and set it to boil. I had some fresh beefsteak in the ice-box and he got it out, scratched his head in a thoughtful way and laid it on the kitchen table. Then he went down cellar after the hatchet, wiped the head of it on his right leg, and pounded away until a good share of the steak had gone into the board.

Mr Bowser's next move was to hunt behind the pantry door for a spider which we had never used. He carried it to the kitchen towel gave it a wipe and then placed it on the stove. He had heard that grease was necessary, and he put in some butter, dropped in his steak and soon had it a-sizzling. Then he started in for the biscuit. He got down the dish pan, filled it almost full, and then reflected for a moment. I took advantage of the occasion to open the door and remark:

"Mr. Bowser, you needn't figure on an elaborate supper, under the circumstances. Just make us a cup of tea and we'll get along."

"Mrs Bowser, you ought to know by this time that there is no half way work with me," he replied with great frigidity. "You can afford to neglect the comfort of this family, but I cannot. Please return to your gum-arabic or novel."

Then he went ahead just as any other husband would.

He had heard about soda and shortening in biscuit, and he mixed the flour with cold water, put in pepper and salt, slashed off half a pound of butter and stirred it in, and then remembered the baking powder. There was nearly a quarter of a pound in the box, and the whole of it went in.

How Mr. Bowser managed to get a grease spot between his shoulder blades, flour on his hair, and baking powder in his hind pocket I do not know, but it was probably while he was rolling that mass out. He didn't trifle with the mixing-board, but used the spot where he had pounded the beef. I heard the mass of dough fall to the floor three different times with a dull thud, but he wasn't a bit discouraged. He got it rolled out at last, cut some biscuits with a tea cup, and presently the oven door shut on his tins. He had just forty biscuit.

By this time the steak had burned black on both sides, and he set it down behind the stove and prepared the tea. To two quarts of water he used one teaspoonful. Ten minutes later he summoned me to the banquet. He had the table-cloth on criss-cross, the butter on a pie plate, the cake in the cheese-dish and his beefsteak was placed in the centre of the table on a pie tin.

"Anything wrong?" he asked as I sat down.

"Oh, no. You have done splendidly."

"I am aware of it. This table has never looked so homelike before."

His biscuits were raw in the middle, white top and bottom were so wonderfully and fearfully made that I had to laugh.

"The biscuit, you can't beat 'em. Wait till you taste one!"

I didn't taste, but he did. I was watching him, and a look of horror came over his face at the first mouthful. He wouldn't give in, however, but crowded a whole biscuit down and pretended to enjoy it.

"I wouldn't eat any of that steak, Mr. Bowser," I said as he eyed it suspiciously.

"Wouldn't you? Perhaps you want it all yourself."

"I don't think it is properly cooked."

"Well, I do! If that isn't a nice steak then we never had one in this house."

He ate at least a quarter of a pound, though every morsel choked him. I offered to wash up the dishes, but he put me out of the kitchen and went ahead. He washed everything together in the flour pan, wiped on whatever he could find loose, and it was a week before we got the pantry in order again. That night after bragging of what a breakfast he was going to get, Mr. Bowser was taken with chills and colic, and when the doctor came and I showed him the beef and the biscuit he said:

"Mr. Bowser, if you hadn't the stomach of a shark you'd have been dead an hour ago. You'd better quit this sort of nonsense if you want to live the year out."

And as soon as we were alone Mr. Bowser turned on me with:

"Don't expect me to shield you again! Your jealousy prompted you to put poison into that flour while I was down cellar! If this thing occurs again I will send you to the gallows!"—Detroit Free Press.

A DOLLAR DINNER.

The First Offering in Competition for a Hundred Dollar Prize.

The New York Press prints the following as the first offering in competition for the best menu for a $1 dinner:

BILL OF FARE.

Meat: Roast leg of mutton. Vegetables, mashed potatoes, creamed onions. Dessert, rice balls with soft custard.

Cost—mutton, 4 pounds, 60 cents; potatoes, 1 quart, 7 cents; onions, 6 cents; bread, 5 cents a loaf; rice balls and custard, 22 cents. Total, $1.

Preparation—No good housekeeper need be told how to roast a leg of mutton or how to mash potatoes. For creamed onions boil half a dozen onions in three quarts of water one hour; pour off the water, cut the onions into small pieces, season with salt and pepper, serve with cream sauce.

To make sauce boil half a pint of milk; take one tablespoonful of butter and half a tablespoonful of flour; rub the mixture to a cream and stir the cream into the boiling milk. Stir until the sauce is smooth, and pour over the onions.

To make the dessert, soak a cup of rice in cold water one hour; pour off the water and add two cups of milk; then cook one hour. When cooked add a little salt.

Dip small custard cups into cold water and fill them with the rice and set away until cold. When ready to serve turn the rice balls on a flat dish and put a little currant jelly on top of each.

For custard put one pint of milk into a double boiler, mix one tablespoonful of corn starch with half a cup of cold milk; when the milk begins to boil stir in the corn starch and cold milk and cook ten minutes. Meanwhile beat four eggs with half a cup of sugar. After pouring the boiling mixture over the eggs and sugar cook the custard five minutes, stirring it all the time. Remove from the fire and add a little salt and a large teaspoonful of lemon extract; allow the custard to cool; pour over rice balls and serve.

Little Pick-Ups, Droll and Odd.

A grandmother only 25 years old is the chief curio in Hancock, Ind.

A man out West was acquitted of stealing sausages because a link was wanting.

Ann Arbor, Mich., claims the honor of originating the "He's all right" yell. It has been known for many years among college men there.

Willard Perkins, of Waterbury, Conn., has received the trophy annually given to the heaviest member of the Fat Men's Association of the State. Mr. Perkins weighs 452 pounds.

A Michigan man who decided to settle in Jasper, Ala., shipped his goods there by rail and then, with his wife and two children, drove the whole distance—1,000 miles. They had a splendid time.

A Maine genius has discovered that spruce sawdust is an excellent substitute for sand in making common mortar for plastering houses. He has used it making a house in Greenville, and other masons in the State are experimenting with it.

Under the laws of France a person reported dead by a legal official must remain dead, no matter how much he may come to life. If he wish to live he must take some other name.

A man at Laramie laughed at an Indian who slipped down on the street five years ago, and the other day the red man came around and stabbed him in the back as a reward.

Rev. Dr. Talmage says that General Harrison has daily family prayers at his home, and that few laymen can deliver more devout or impressive prayers in household worship than he does. He will maintain the same habit at the White House.

It is a piece of astronomical luck that, as viewed from California, the eclipse of the sun in January will be total. This will give the great Lick telescope a notable opportunity of usefulness—always provided that the day shall not be cloudy.

Sign Your Name Legibly.

If there is one man who deserves to be hanged without benefit of the clergy it is the one who sends you a letter, requesting a reply, and signs his name with such a combination of insane flourishes that the prince of darkness wouldn't be able to read it. This man will frequently write very plainly from the beginning of a letter to the end, and then, taking it for granted that you are perfectly familiar with his name, get up on the pen and ride it all over the bottom of the page, under the impression that he is appending his signature. A murrain on him and all his scurvy kind. —Lincoln (Neb.) Journal.

How Germans Do It.

Theatre-goer to his neighbor—See how I make that lady in front take her hat off.

Neighbor—Bet you don't.

Theatre-goer (aside)—Done. (Aloud) What charming hair that lady has!

The lady removes her hat.—Ulk.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR says that during 17 years' service as member of Parliament he came in contact with the most eminent medical men of England, and he put the question to most of them: "Did you, in your extensive practice, ever know a patient who was afraid to die?" With two exceptions they answered "No."

DISEASE IN THE COUNTRY

Caused by Sanitary Carelessness—Dr. Lucy M. Hall's Observations.

A New Yorker recently took a drive of some days with his wife through Vermont. One day they stopped for dinner at a pleasant country inn, situated in a beautiful little village, which from its location should be the abode of health. After dinner the New Yorker fell into conversation with the pastor of one of the village churches. It soon came out that the clergyman had previously lived for some years in one of the larger cities of New England, having been forced to abandon the charge of an important church there by impaired health, which he was here seeking to recruit. The stranger, naturally enough, asked the minister whether he thought there was more sickness or less in the village where they were talking than among people in equally good circumstances who live in our larger cities.

"I hardly know what to say," the clergyman replied. "Of course there is more disease to every thousand of the whole population in a city like New York than there is in a rural county in Vermont by reason of the great excess in the tenement house districts; but I have grave doubts whether there is as much sickness proportionally in those quarters of cities where people live in comfort and under rigorous sanitary regulations as there is in this village. Certainly there is a great deal of sickness and a number of deaths every year in a place like this, which might be prevented, and which would be prevented by the authorities in a well governed city. To mention only a single case, and this is not one to be talked about here: One of the most prominent families in this town, well to do people, living in an excellent house and presumed to be intelligent in matters of health, suffers constantly from disease. They have had typhoid fever and diphtheria, and somebody is ailing most of the time. They think it strange, but you would not. The truth is that if they lived in a city they would be hauled before the health board within twenty-four hours for violating the ordinances in letting all the waste from their kitchen flow into the yard and ooze there, polluting the air and breeding disease."

That there was nothing exceptional in the village referred to is proved by a very interesting and valuable paper which was read by Dr. Lucy M. Hall, of Brooklyn, at the recent meeting of the Social Science Association in Saratoga, upon "[illegible] Sanitary Condition of Country Homes." She had gathered the necessary data for a judgment by the examination, during her vacations, of sixty-five ordinary farmhouses in New England, the middle and the western States. She found that little care is taken as to the character of subsoil, and that over half were located on wet clay soils. In more than half the cases, also, the houses were too closely shaded, and sunlight was too much excluded from all parts of the house. In a majority of cases the cellars were found to be damp or wet. Barns and stables in New England averaged not more than fifty feet from the houses, and outhouses less than thirty feet, the water supply being undoubtedly contaminated by one or the other of these causes in a number of cases. Slops were thrown into the yard from the back door in three-quarters of the New England farmhouses examined.

Now for the result. Dr. Hall found that lung affections, diphtheria, typhoid fever and rheumatism had played sad havoc in these farmhouses. Ninety-three per cent. of the whole number in New England had a record of lung fever and diphtheria and 55 per cent. of typhoid fever. There is not a particle of doubt that the greater part of this disease was directly due to damp cellars, neglected slops or contaminated water; in other words, was preventable, ought to have been prevented, and would have been prevented if the sufferers had lived in a city with a thoroughly efficient health department.

We are glad that attention has been called to this important matter by an organization of such weight as the Social Science Association. So many city people pass a considerable part of the warm weather in the country that the danger is by no means confined to the permanent residents. One of the incidental advantages of the vacation season ought to be the spread of the fundamental principles of sanitary science among the farming population by their city visitors.

The Land of Hats.

Do any of you study geography? If you do, get your map and find Corea. That is the land of hats. If your father lived there he would have a hat to wear in the house, another out of doors, another to wear in the rain, another when he marches with the soldiers, besides several dress-up hats. His every-day out of door hat would have a crown shaped something like a top, and the brim would be as broad as the seat of your little chair. If your father had lost a friend he would put on a hat shaped like a wash bowl and it would cover his face all over. If you had three brothers, and they each owned so many hats, where would your mother keep them?—The Little Pilgrim.

"It's a Hextra."

At an old-fashioned hostlery in London two gentlemen were dining, when a dispute arose as to what a pineapple was. One of the diners insisted that it was a fruit. The other, with equal confidence, gave it as his opinion that a pineapple was a vegetable. A bet was made, and the friends determined to accept the decision of the waiter, who was called to the table. "John," asked one of them, "how do you describe a pineapple—is it a fruit or is it a vegetable?" The waiter rubbed his hands, placed his head on one side, and with a pitying smile replied, "It's neither, gentlemen; a pineapple is a hextra."

A Husband's Fault-finding.

"Wives in these days are very negligent about their household duties," said Young-husband.

"So I have heard."

"Yes, take my own case, for example. I come home at all hours and still my wife never has the dinner ready."

The "Mrs. Andrew Carnegie," which was exhibited for the first time at the Chrysanthemum Fair in New York, has created quite a furor among the florists; $1,250 was offered and refused for the plant. It is not particularly dainty, but is very large and vigorous.

A TALE OF TWO TAYLORS.

The Dromios Outdone by Two Western Reserve Ohioans.

Judge Ezra B. Taylor, who represents the Nineteenth Ohio district in the House at Washington, recently received a letter that called up a remarkable coincidence in his life. Here is the story as told by him to a Washington Star reporter:

He was born in Portage county, O., sixty-five years ago, attended school with Garfield, and the two kept up a friendship in after life. When Garfield was elected to the Ohio State Senate in 1859 Judge Taylor was practicing law in the State. Shortly after Garfield took his seat Judge Taylor got a letter from him stating:

"I received your letter and will be glad to do anything I can for you. I am surprised, however, that you should desire such a position. I thought your practice was worth much more to you."

This may not be the exact language of the letter, but it was about this. Judge Taylor did not understand the letter. He wrote to Mr. Garfield telling him so, and saying that he was right in supposing his law practice was worth more than any position under the State Senate.

Shortly after that Mr. Garfield called on him and handed him a letter, asking if it were not his. He examined the letter and replied that it was certainly his handwriting and his signature, but that he had not written it, unless he had done so in his sleep, and then he pointed out that it was postmarked from another part of the State. The letter asked for the appointment of a deputy sergeant-at-arms of the State Senate, was written in the judge's handwriting and signed plainly with his signature, Ezra B. Taylor. Mr. Garfield wanted to submit the letter to an expert to pass upon the chirography. Judge Taylor said he would acknowledge that he could not tell it from his own. It was submitted to an expert, who, without hesitation, said he could take his oath to its being Judge Taylor's writing. It was a mystery they could not penetrate, and they dropped it.

Not long after the State Convention assembled. Judge Taylor was walking down the corridor of the principal hotel. There were mirrors on the walls in which he could see his reflection. As he approached the end of the corridor he thought there was another mirror directly in front of him in which he could plainly see his own face and form. He drew closer, and——No; it was not a mirror. It was a man. It was himself in flesh and blood. The two looked at each other, and it seemed as if each had lost its identity in the other. Had they turned around three times neither could have been certain he was not the other fellow. Neither spoke. They just looked at each other and passed in opposite directions. Later in the day Mr. Garfield, with the double leaning on his arm, approached Judge Taylor. He introduced them: "Mr. Taylor; Mr. Taylor. No; Mr. Ezra B. Taylor, Mr. Ezra B. Taylor."

They were the same in name, in form, in face, in age, voice, carriage, manner and general appearance. Judge Taylor was then known as Colonel. He had been named after a distinguished clergyman, Ezra Booth. The duplicate was also known as Colonel, and said he was Ezra Booth, but he did not know after whom he was named.

A few weeks ago Judge Taylor got a letter from a lady in Wisconsin stating that she had noticed the name of Ezra B. Taylor as voting against the Mills Bill; that an Ezra B. Taylor, formerly living in a certain part of New York, had been a very intimate friend of her father, who was now dead. They had, she said, lost sight of this friend soon after her father's death, and they were anxious to find him. They hoped the Representative might be he.

Judge Taylor wrote a prompt reply, stating that he had never lived in New York State, and had never heard of the lady's father; but this did not end it.

A few days ago he got another letter from the lady stating that she had been delighted, on receiving his letter, to recognize in the address the handwriting of her father's friend.

It has not yet developed whether the Ezra B. Taylor this lady seeks is the one who died or yet a third party to the drama.

But, to add another romantic feature to the case, it now appears that the Taylor this lady seeks might have reasons for concealing his identity from the family on account of some business relations with the deceased father, whom he may have owed money.

Curious Causes of Combustion.

Relative to spontaneous combustion, the fires of the year in Boston have furnished some new observations of interest. In one case, according to the American Architect, a quantity of feather dust in a bedding manufactory took fire without apparent reason. It was found, however, that a piece of thick glass had been lying on the feathers, and the sun's rays, concentrated in some way by the glass, had set fire to them, although the day was a cold one in the month of March. In another case, a number of tarpaulin hats were lying, packed together, in a window. The high temperature, with, perhaps, the close packing of the hats, caused them to burst into a blaze. Two other fires were caused by putting paraffine paper, such as candy is wrapped in, into a refuse barrel, which contained a little sawdust; and a third, which destroyed $20,000 worth of property, was occasioned by putting some greasy paper, which had been used to wrap lunches in, into a wooden refuse barrel, which contained some sawdust and sweepings.

Latest Northwest News.

(Winnipeg Special.)

While skating on the ice on Red River on Saturday afternoon, Walter and Percy Skead, two brothers, broke through. Walter went down before assistance arrived and Percy was rescued in an exhausted condition. Walter's body is not yet recovered.

G. C. King, Postmaster at Calgary, was severely burned about the face yesterday and will be laid up for some time.

It is probable that a large quantity of wheat will be stored in the elevators at Portage la Prairie until the completion of the Red River Valley line early next year to get the benefit of competing rates.

A verdict of not guilty was returned by the jury at Brandon in the case of Fletcher, charged with the murder of one Matheson, at Binscarth, in March last.

A STRANGE FRIENDSHIP.

An Eagle and a Game Cock Dwell Together in the Utmost Harmony.

The time may never come when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together, and both be on the outside, but the spectacle of a chicken and its mortal foe, the eagle, resting in cordial fellowship on the same roost comes very near expressing the idea of universal peace foreshadowed in the prophecy of the lion and the lamb. While the Robinson Fishing Club, of which John O'Neil, the well-known restaurateur, at 600 Grant street, is a member, was encamped at North East Pa. last July, two large eagles were seen in the vicinity of the camp for several days. Frank Casey shot one of them, seriously injuring its leg. It fell, and was rescued from the dogs. The bird recovered, but it remained very lame. Upon the return of the club to the city the king of birds was presented to Mr. O'Neil, who keeps it in the rear of his stable. When it first came it ate large chickens with facility and without compunction, and small ones ditto. Mr O'Neil is somewhat of a chicken fancier, and takes pride in the fine qualities of his game cocks. Last April a splendid fighting cock of the black Spanish breed was hatched. As he grew older, a large Shanghai rooster, the lord and master of the roost, intimidated him and drove him out of the family circle, so that for a long time he has held himself aloof from his kindred, roosting always by himself. About two weeks ago Mr. O'Neil discovered that the eagle was amicably sharing his roost with the cock. The result has been a strange intimacy between the two. The rooster goes for short periods during the day to look out for his provisions, but always returns soon to the society of his friend, and, all in all, he spends the greater part of his time with the latter. The eagle, on his part, seems to have entirely conquered the predilection for chickens as food, and always welcomes the return of his little companion. He has also ceased to wage war on the other fowls, and is content to lunch on three pounds of fresh meat every day. Mr. O'Neil thinks the strange friendship will only be ended when the game cock comes to a realization of the fact that the blood of heroes courses through his veins, and proceeds to lay the black Spanish rooster at death's door, and takes his rightful place at the head of the barnyard family. The rooster is a handsome, red plumaged fellow. The eagle is of the variety known as the black eagle, and measures seven feet four inches from tip to tip, weighing between fifteen and twenty pounds. He stands captivity very well. He is quite gentle at times, and at others very cross. Two noticeable facts about the eagle are that he verifies the old statement that the king of birds won't eat carrion, for he won't even touch meat that has been killed a day; and that, when he has a fowl to kill, he knocks the life out of it with his wings. Pittsburg Dispatch.

MONEY IN STREET MUSIC.

Profits of Hand-Organ Men and Other Itinerant Noise-Makers.

The Boston Record says: Sympathetic ladies who send nickels and silver pieces by a servant to the poor organ grinder who stands at their door, or who throw down to him from an upper window pennies wrapped in thick writing paper, may like to know how much a man gets in the course of a day and what he does with his money.

For the latter he does not spend more than a seventh part of it. He puts it safely away, and keeps increasing it. Sometimes he joins at night a select club of his fellow-countrymen, who gamble their pennies away in long and delicious excitement.

How much do you think he earns?

More than a carpenter, a bricklayer, a policeman, a postman, or a salesman in a store who wears gloves and a high hat. He averages four dollars a day. He labors systematically, and has his regular beat and his varied art to extract the penny from persons of each class he plays before. On an average he plays on 200 blocks a day, and it's a deucedly poor block that does not pay two cents.

The girls who are seen daily on our streets dressed in pretty Switzer or Neapolitan costumes, drawing or playing what is known as a "piano or organ on wheels," average from ten to twenty dollars a day, and as a rule they are not required to labor more than six hours a day.

The latest "wrinkle" in street music is a young woman who sings, accompanied by three swarthy sons of Italy on the harp, violin and piccolo. She has a sweet voice, dresses attractively and sings "songs that reach the heart" and pocket at the same time. She is not an Italian, as many suppose, but an English girl, who is said to be the wife of a son of the sunny peninsula. One who is acquainted with her history informed the writer that she was of first-class family, fairly educated, and of a penurious nature. For the latter reason she adopted her present mode of obtaining a living. Her income is over thirty dollars a day, from which she pays a few dollars to her accompanists. She sings on an average fifty times a day, and always in localities where many men are employed; before printing offices, manufactories, etc., and in courts and places immediate to the principal thoroughfares where street pedestrians are numerous. It is said that in a few years she intends to "cross the water" and live in quiet ease for the remainder of her life, by that time having acquired a small fortune. Old women who sit upon sidewalks playing "hurdy-gurdies" with a placard of petition about the neck, average a laboring man's wages, even in dull times.

It is an old saying that "the world owes everybody a living," and from the above it cannot but appear as a truism.

She Had Made It White as Snow.

Mr Popsy (ruefully examining his pipe)—Who has been fooling with my old meerschaum?

Mrs. Popsy (a young bride)—O, darling, it was so old and black and dirty that I put it in the kitchen fire and watched it carefully until it was burned to this lovely snow-white.

A Good Reason, Too.

It is said that in eight cases out of ten if a man gets $50,000 all of a sudden he will either go cracked in the head or make a laughing stock of himself. That's doubtless the reason why Providence keeps $50,000 away from so many of us.—Detroit Free Press.

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having nve gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined siller steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you Another line I would particularly call yonr attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

There is wailing in Arthur town, Joseph Reid lost a black collie pup.

The Streetsville Review removed to larger and more commodious premises.

A party of Owen Sounders came down to Markdale on Thanksgiving day and took home fifteen rabbits and several partridges.

If the Meaford Mirror uses its other exchanges as much as it does The Advance, there can be very little original matter in it. Last week it cribbed four news items from us and palmed them off as its own. How much will you pay weekly for advance proofs if we forward them to you in time for publication, Mr. Mirror?

The Durham Chronicle man does not think we rank any too high as an artist. Sorry to hear you say so, dear boy. Do you think there is any chance of us improving ourselves? Do we show any evidence of a taste for art? Could we, think you, by forty or fifty years' practice, merit a favorable criticism from the Chronicle. Art critic. Tell us, tell us quickly, for the fate of this paper no doubt rests upon your profound verdict, Mr. Mitchell!

Bro. Thurston, of the Flesherton Advance, showed considerable enterprise recently securing a good cut of the new President of the United States for the columns of his paper.—[Streetsville Review.

The question to decide is whether is the Review or Chronicle the more competent judge?

The Mt. Forest Confed. says Mr. J. Allison has decided to supply Mt. Forest with milk, and that he is selling by auction his stock and implements. We suppose he intends to generate his milk from the town pump.

Feversham.

Johnny Grey, of the 12th concession of Osprey, when at the S. A. meeting a few weeks ago, was so much charmed by a fair damsel of very promising appearance that he attempted to escort her home on horseback, but the poor quadruped, like the donkey of old, stupefied by its exceedingly uncommon burden, refused to go, and set at naught his master's commands, when the gallant was compelled to dismount his pony, tie him to a tree, and lead his girl home arm in arm. He arrived at home before dawn, however. We pity the poor quadruped.

Captain Johnston of the Salvation Army is about to be removed from this station.

Faith is not measured out to fall men alike, or Geordy and Freddy had not done that which they did. They drove to a neighboring village for two ladies, brought them to the barracks, took them home because they were too gallant too do otherwise. One cutter carried the whole party, must they not have had faith as an over grown turnip.

Mrs. E. Hall has moved from this village to take up her abode in Toronto.

Master Herd Hamilton is learning the milling business with A. J. Gordon.

Messrs. Paul Bros. are doing a rushing business in the cutter line, having no less than a round dozen all waiting for the first snow.

JIM.

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral

Soothes and Heals

the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

PREPARED BY

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1; six bottles, $5.

A large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

—AT—

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Fulled Stockings, Overshoes, and Rubbers. Mens' and Boys' Long Boots, At prices to suit the times.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,

FLESHERTON.

A Positive Cure. ✢ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

A Permanent Cure. ✢ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equa

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London,

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 388. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, DEC .6, 1888. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROP.

THE 12th of Dec. '88

REMEMBER!

The 12th of Dec. is the day that

Mr. P. E. Morris the great optician,

of the firm of B. LAURENCE & Co., Montreal,

—WILL BE AT—

RUSSELL'S NOTED JEWELRY STORE, FLESHERTON.

to test eyes and fit the famous B. Laurence spectacles to all requiring them, if your eyes are weak and troublesome. This is a rare chance to

GET YOUR EYES THOROUGHLY TESTED.

COME ALL, COME EVRY ONE

IT WILL PAY YOU.

No charge for consultation.

REMEMBER, Wed. Dec. 12, 1888

—AT—

Russell's - Noted - Jewelry - Store,

FLESHERTON.

HEARD'S

Carriage Works,

FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

General News.

Saturday the inquest into the death of Meta Cherry, at Galt, was closed, the jury returning a verdict of wilful murder against the unknown party or parties who sent the poisoned candy.

Lydia Charlton, the victim of the abortion case, died early Saturday morning.

Lord Salisbury, in his speech at Edinburgh, expressed himself in favor of woman suffrage.

Roland Gideon Israel Barnett sailed from England Saturday for Halifax in charge of a detective.

Dr. Forest, M. P. P. for L'Assomption, was unseated for bribery by agents by the court at Montreal Saturday.

The stamping and japanning departments of the McClary Manufacturing Company's works, at London, were burned Friday night. Loss, $100,000.

Rear-Admiral Simpson, of the United States Navy, died on Saturdry.

The price of wheat on the farmers' market at Toronto on Saturday was $1, the lowest figure reported for about three months.

Lord Salisbury in one of his Edinburgh speeches indicated that his Government favored the emigration of Crofters. He also commended the hanging of Riel by the Canadian Government.

A strange accident of a fatal nature is reported from Madoc. Peter Carl and Joseph Sofa were felling a large tree, which lodged in another. When they had freed it they found that it was falling towards them and tried to get out of the way. In running away Sofa fell and his axe struck Carl in the calf of the leg, severing an artery. Before a doctor had arrived Carl had bled to death. The same axe, after cutting Carl, was struck by the fallling tree and flew back and struck Sofa, cutting a big gash in his leg above the knee. Sofa is likely to recover.

The Canadian Pacific station at St. Boniface, Man., was burned Monday.

At the annual session of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance Tuesday, Mr. Thos. Webster, of Brantford, was reelected Grand Worthy Patriarch.

Ex-Queen Natalie had returned all the presents which she had given to King Milan, and 1,000,000 francs has been placed to her credit in the bank of Servia.

Champion oarsman William O'Connor returned to Toronto Monday night, and 50,000 persons witnessed the procession which escorted him to the Horticultural Gardens, where he was presented with an address by Mayor Clark, a cheque for $1,000 and $300 in gold.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Teacher wanted for S. S. No. 1, Artemesia and Euphrasia. See advertisement.

Messrs Petch and Hawk are now mourning over the loss of six coon skins in the tannery fire.

Rev. Mr. Watson has built an extension to the Baptist Chapel shed, owing to a necessity for increased accommodation.

BUGGY FOR SALE. A good single buggy will be sold cheap. Wood taken in part payment. Apply to Jas. Kester, Flesherton.

Croup, whooping cough and Bronchitis immediately relieved by Shiloh's Cure.

High School entrance examinations will be held in Flesherton and Dundalk on on Wednesday, Dec. 19. Inspector Campbell will officiate in Flesherton, and Mr. Irwin in Dundalk.

Remember the I. O. O. F. entertainment in the Town Hall on Dec. 12. For program see colored bills. Come and bring everyone else.

Shiloh's cough and Consumption Cure is sold by us on a guarantee. It cures Consumption.

Rev. Mr. Buggin, of Markdale, had a slight attack of appoplexy while in his pulpit on Sunday morning week. His physician recommended him to retire from the active ministry.

See J. E. Moore's new advertisemen next week, and in the meantime examine the display of Xmas goods on show at warerooms, and select some of the various bargains he is offering.

For lame back, side or chest, use Shiloh's Porous Plaster. Price 25 cents.

The new station is nearing completion. It is now being painted, and when completed will be the neatest and best of its kind between Owen Sound and West Toronto. Mr. McGill, our urbane station agent, expects to remove into his new and cosy quarters about Christmas.

Beautiful fringed Christmas cards at Russell's Jewelry store, for only 15 cts.

Rev. Mr. Shilton preached on Sunday evening last from Isaiah LV., 10 and 11. His sermon was one of the most vigorous and earnest which we have yet heard from his lips, and attracted universal interest.

If you want a beautiful piece of silver-plate for a wedding or Xmas present, Russell's, Flesherton is the place to go.

The Methodist Church choir has been immensely improved of late by the addition of several new voices. The choir now numbers fifteen, and their singing on Sunday evening last was quite pleasing. May they go on improving, until they are at least equal to that of the Presbyterians.

We have never seen such a fine assortment of Christmas cards at the low prices that Russell of Flesherton has. Do not fail to see them.

Changed Hands.

The Dundalk Herald has once more changed hands, Mr. Spurr having disposed of the business to Mr. T. Hall, formerly proprietor of the paper. Mr. Hall has returned to his old love, and Mr. Spurr has not yet decided where he will pitch his tent. We hope it may be within talking distance, as we would not like to lose sight of friend Spurr altogether; and while sorry to lose him as a neighbor, we gladly welcome Mr Hall back to his old roost. While the Herald may have lost a "Spurr," it has probably made a little "Hall" by the transaction.

Catarrh cured, health and sweet breath secured, by Shiloh's Catarrh Remedy. Price 50 cents. Nasal Injector free.

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the head. How they may be cured at your home. Post free 3d.—Address Dr. NICHOLSON, 30, St. John Street, Montreal.

R. T. of T. election of officers will take place Tuesday evening next, Dec. 11th. All the members are particularly requested to be present.

A grand teameeting will be held in the Grange hall, Feversham, on Thursday, Dec. 20th. Tea from 5 to 7 p. m. Admission 25 and 12½ cents. See posters for particulars.

Have you seen the the Christmas cards and fancy goods at Russell's Jewelry store, Flesherton? If not you should go at once and you will see the finest assortment at the lowest prices in this country.

Flesherton division S. O. T., No 412, will meet on Tuesday evening, Dec. 11th, instead of Wednesday, to enable all to attend the Oddfellow's concert on Wednesday the 12th. W. Leitch, R. S.

The annual meeting of the L. C. Association of East Grey will be held at Markdale, on Friday the 14th day of December, at 2 o'clock p. m., for the election of officers and other business. All are invited to attend. Wm. McLoughry, President, A. Turner, Recording Sec.

The annual teameeting in connection with the Salem S. School will be held in the church on Friday evening, Dec. 21st. The program will consist of vocal and instrumental music, dialogues, recitations and readings. Speeches will be delivered by Rev. Mr. Watt, of Eugenia, Rev. Mr Leggott, of Maxwell, and others. Tea served from 5 to 6 o'clock sharp. Admission, children 10 cents, adults 25 cts. All are cordially invited to come and spend a pleasant evening. See Bills. J. W. Benson Sec.-Treas.

Here is A Grand Opportunity.

The weekly Empire, Flesherton Advance, and a fine bust of Sir John A. Macdonald, all for the sum of $1.75. Balance of this year free. The busts will be delivered from our office.

A very large stock of the finest sewing machine oil in the world, at Russell's Jewllry store, Flesherton.

Rev. W. G. Mills Chosen.

At a congregational meeting held in the Presbyterian Church on Thursday last the Rev. D McLeod, interim moderator, presiding, for the purpose of selection of minister for the charge from the candidates who have occupied the pulpit for the last three months, Rev. W. G. Mills, B. A., of Sunderland, was the unanimous choice.

The above item was overlooked in the make up last week.

That hacking cough can be so quickly cured by Shiloh's Cure. We guarantee it.

A Bad Accident.

Particulars have reached us of a bad accident which happened to a party of three ladies, about two miles east of Eugenia. Mrs. James Stewart, 10th line, Artemasia, her mother in-law, and Miss Turner were driving along the 35th sideroad about 7 o'clock in the evening of Thursday, 22nd ult., when some portion of the harness broke in going down a hill, the rig ran upon the horse's heels, causing the animal to kick ferociously, smashing the rig to atoms and rendering the three ladies unconscious, in which position they remained on the roadside fully an hour. Miss Turner was the first to recover and managed to return home and secure assistance, although she was scarcely able to articulate. Mr. Turner had Mrs. Stewart, jr. and sr., conveyed home, where the latter lies in a critical condition and being an old lady her chances of recovery are small. Mrs. Stewart, jr., and Miss Turner are recovering. The escape of the whole party from death was remarkable.

Will you suffer with Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint? Shiloh's Vitalizer is guaranteed to cure you.

Best quality yarn for 45 cents per lb., ready scoured, at the Flesherton woollen mills.

Mr. Richardson's letter is held over until next week.

All parties indebted to the Flesherton woollen mills, will please call and settle before the 20th inst.

The editor of this paper is somewhat of a sportsman. He bagged three rabbits and three partridges on Friday after last. Partridge soup and partridge soup and [illegible]

The promenade concert in aid of the East Grey public [illegible] to-day at [illegible] the first [illegible] have been held.

Mr. Wm. Clarke, who [illegible] by a fall at Mrs Lace's, is able to be around once more.

Heaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

On Monday morning, the 11th inst Mr J. Stephens, who had been ailing for some years past, passed away to that home from which no traveller returns to give an account of his journey. He has left a wife and five small children to mourn his loss.

Still another. On the following Sunday, the youngest child of Mr. C. Jones passed over to the same place.

Mr. John Warling lost a valuable mare last week by a kick from her mate. His loss is over $100.

Mr. J. G. Anderson is on the war path looking after the taxes for our township fathers.

Mrs. Richardson of Chatsworth is here on a visit to her friend.

Mrs. C. Pritchard had a wood bee last week. It was the first of the season.

SACRIFICE SALE

TILL JAN. 1st, 1889

10½ PER CENT. off all sales of WATCHES and CLOCKS or ONE SIXTH off marked price.

20 per cent. off RINGS, CHAINS, SILVERWARE, MUSICAL GOODS do. do.

25 per cent off general lines JEWELRY, SPEX, ETC.

Markdale is the only place this section where you can CLOSE COMPETITION PRICES.

It will pay you to drive here, as you can find a large stock to choose from at cut figures.

CALL THIS MONTH!

If you never have before,

—AND—

Test This Statement!

that I have a very fine stock at

Bed Rock Prices!

Discounts considered. Fine repairing receives general attention.

JEWELER and OPTICIAN,

MARKDALE, ONT.

A Pretty Good World.

This world's a pretty good sort of world,
Taking it all together,
In spite of the grief and sorrow we meet,
In spite of the gloomy weather,
There are friends to love, and hopes to cheer,
And plenty of compensation
For every ache, for those who make
The best of the situation.

The sun and rain ripen corn and grain
[illegible]
And truth shines white and clear, despite
The blackness of fraud and treason ;
There's plenty of work for busy hands,
A love to lighten labor,
And [illegible] for you and me to do
[illegible]

There are quiet nooks for lovers of [illegible]
[illegible] in happy union
[illegible] retreats from the [illegible]
[illegible] sweet communion
And there's a spot where the sun shines [illegible]
[illegible] always a lamp to light it ;
And if there's a wrong, we know [illegible]
That the God above will right it.

[illegible] for us to make a fuss
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
For the world's a pretty good sort of world
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] better.

BELINDA: A BEAUTY

"And altogether [illegible] two three falsehoods [illegible] Belinda, [illegible] myself [illegible] on her [illegible] falsehoods and deceits [illegible] Why have [illegible] of them. Why not go straight [illegible] take its [illegible]

"When you [illegible] older, child, when you have [illegible] the jealousies of the [illegible] I have you will know that [illegible] straight, as you call it, does not answer. Gentlemen like being deceived if the deceit saves them from undergoing anything disagreeable, and those women who know how to deceive gracefully gracefully, mind, are always the most popular."

At the door of the hotel Belinda finds Roger trying, with rather poor success, to look sympathetic while Spencer holds forth to him respecting her mistress's headache. As the comedy proceeds, an Englishman, tall, of military cut, but with the unmistakable air about him of a man at odds with fortune (Colonel Drewe must surely have fallen in the world of late), peeps through the trellice of vine and jessamine that overshadows the salle a manger window close at hand, and listens. He shifts about a little ; he turns red ; gets one good stare at the handsome, unconscious face of his rival, then draws back—draws back, but—alas for military honor that I must confess it—listens still!

"And so Rosie cannot go with us," says Roger.

"Rosie! He calls her Rosie!" The unseen takes out his pocket handkerchief and wipes his forehead.

"Belinda, what must we do? Put off the excursion till another day—"

"Mrs. O'Shea begs you would not on any account do that, Captain Temple," says Spencer. "It is one of her little headaches, you know, sir."

"Oh, he knows, does he?" thinks the gentleman behind the vines and jessamine.

"I'm afraid Mrs. O'Shea and you were out too late last night, Captain Temple. Mrs. O'Shea complained of her head before retiring."

Roger again does his best to look contrite, and again fails signally. "If Rose really wishes us to go, Belinda? Rosie is so unselfish—never likes other people to be disappointed—perhaps we had better be guided by her. We shall be a nice little party of three, you and Miss Burke and myself."

"And Mr. Jones," adds Belinda. What on earth should make Colonel Drewe start so oddly at the sound of the girl's voice. "Don't forget that Mr. Jones has come back from the mountains."

"Jones—ah, to be sure, Jones," says Roger in an altered tone. "On second thoughts, I don't know that I have courage enough for the expedition. If Miss Burke were to get me alone among the ruins and begin to argue about the suffrage, I might become a convert to the Women of the Future before I knew where I was. It will be safer for me to remain behind."

Belinda turns away abruptly. "Amuse yourself well, Captain Temple," she cries, looking back at him across her shoulder. "Mr. Jones is not going to Spain at all; in another hour Mr. Jones will be on his road to England ; but never mind, Burke and I will have an improving day by ourselves. Good-bye. I have not a moment to lose."

Her slip of a figure trips away out of the court yard, and before she has progressed a dozen steps Roger Temple has joined her—is on his way to Spain, his terror of Miss Burke and of her doctrines, it would appear, suddenly overcome. Spencer watches them curiously. Whatever other personage in a love plot remains blind to the truth, be sure that the lady's maid is never long unenlightened. Spencer watches them, drawing inferences of her own as to the future happiness of Captain Temple and her mistress. The stranger, from behind his cover of vines and jessamine, watches them also.

Belinda feels in a dream, still a dream that is no longer one of pain. Her child's life has been spoiled for her, 'tis true ; and all the future's gold is for Rose, not her. But she, not Rose, is with Roger now. Their excursion into Spain will last some six or seven hours—six or seven hours to be got out of a lifetime of separation! Her hand is upon Roger's arm—he insists that she needs his help to get her through the crowd—and his eyes are telling her that she is fair ; and her foolish heart beats with pleasure ; and she wants nothing on the whole wide earth but what the moment gives her!

Propriety, in the shape of Miss Burke, overtakes them at the railway station. They get their tickets for Hendaye, the last town this side the frontier, and in another quarter of an hour are walking, as well as the scorching, breathless heat will allow them, along the banks of the Bidassoa. Here, advised of Murray, their plan is to take the boat for Fontarabia. Fontarabia, that looks but a stone's throw distant, across the quivering expanse of harbor mud. But man and Murray may propose, fate finishes. They get into one of the unwieldy flat bottomed boats that ply between France and Spain, assured by the scarlet-skirted boatman, in patois, only understood of Belinda, that there will be water enough to carry them to Fontarabia this tide, and rather more than half way across run aground. The boatmen shove, swear, smile. When a Spaniard smiles you may know that your hour has come. "What is to be done? Ah, God knows. This, then, is to be done, as their excellencies insist upon an answer. Either they will remain where they are some small three quarters of an hour and walk ashore on their own legs, or be carried thither in the boatmen's arms, now ; or they can wait, a matter of several hours, for the return of the tide. Their excellencies will have the condescension to decide." Meanwhile the boatmen take out each a little roll of paper, and prepare with the most dignified good breeding imaginable, to fold their midday cigarettes.

"I vote for being carried ashore at once," cries Belinda. "Propriety, ma'am! What does that matter? I would rather be improper than have sunstroke any day."

"And I," says Miss Burke, "would sooner perish than be encircled by the arms of those men, of any men. I will never quit this boat living, save on my own feet."

And not by one hair's breadth can she be made to swerve from her principles. She will wait till the tide is so far ebbed that she may walk ashore across the mud ; will wait, if need be, till nightfall ; will risk the danger of sunstroke, to the profanation of a man's, although but a red-skinned boatman's arms; the Woman of the Future will never bring hers [illegible] to submit.

"[illegible] the [illegible] says Roger [illegible] if [illegible] there [illegible] her [illegible] mind. Miss Burke, perhaps the [illegible] would [illegible] for Belinda and me to [illegible] as we can, look out for a hotel, order [illegible] and so on. This will [illegible] more [illegible] seeing Fontarabia aft[illegible]ward, and—"

"Leave me, I beg, sir," says Miss Burke, putting up her umbrella sternly, "but without compliments. Miss O'Shea, I must ask you to dispose of your day entirely without reference to me. Settle with the boatmen? No, I thank you." Roger, enslaved by old world superstitions as to woman's helplessness, having at this point weakly taken out his purse. "I will settle with them when they have fulfilled their engagement, when I find myself safe on land, not before."

So the matter is settled. One of the men lifts Belinda from the boat, about as easily as a child lifts a kitten, then wades, bearing her in his arms, through the shallow water. Captain Temple is conveyed on the stout shoulders of the other. A couple of minutes later they are ashore on Spanish soil and alone.

"And now, Senora Lagrimas," says Roger, "what just cause or impediment should hinder you and I from going on to the Alhambra?"

The question is a jest, of course. Unfortunately, just as Roger puts it, Belinda's eyes meet his in one long, wistful, sorrowful look—then droop abashed. And the story is told.

As it is told in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, reader, the unbidden eloquence of look, or tone or touch, making itself felt before the lips have ventured on the colder expedient of speech. Well the intervening space of time that follows, be it of months or minutes, is, I take it, about the most ambrosial of all love's calendar, especially of love that shall never know its earthly end, to which the present is all in all.

They explore the sights of Fontarabia as conscientiously as though they were some prosaic couple whose romance had begun with money considerations, was now yawning itself into extinction throughout a wedding tour. They visit the ramparts, still lying in blackened ruins, as British gunpowder left them. They look down on the classic Three Fords, the scene of that wild night struggle when the Duke won the passage of the Bidassoa, inch by inch, from old Soult. By and by they saunter up to the church through the high street of the town. But they forgot two things ; to search for a hotel or to order dinner. They also forgot the existence of Miss Burke.

The church takes them more than an hour to walk round. Nothing remarkable in the way of art has Fontarabia's parish church to show; the gilded saints and virgins, the windows, the relics, are precisely like all others of their kind. They linger, side by side, silent, not meeting each other's eyes. Heaven knows what thoughts filling the hearts of each. At length the organ begins to play a dreamy set of waltzes, followed by an air from one of Verdi's operas. A sleepy-looking priest saunters down the aisle, putting on his gown as he goes, a sleepy looking chorister boy with incense burner and book saunters behind. And then in lounges a christening party, everybody gossiping and laughing, with that frank familiarity toward mother Church that characterizes the whole most Catholic nation. Belinda and Roger make their escape through a side door, left open by the drowsy eyed priest, and which leads down five or six breakneck stairs, into the sacristy.

The sacristy is old, older by centuries than the main body of the church, and is filled with vests, stoles, canopies, dilapidated Beatas and other ecclesiastical property of that nature. The air is redolent of stale incense, mustiness, and garlic—what place in Spain is not redolent of garlic? How if they were to open a window, afford other pagan lungs a little more of Heaven's pure air and a little less of the manufactured odor of sanctity? They open one and discover a balcony, or mural terrace, about twelve feet in length, exquisitely cool, sunless, and siesta inviting, and with the whole panorama of town, river mouth, and harbor outstretched beneath.

"Perhaps from this height we shall be able to see Miss Burke about somewhere," cries Belinda, tardily conscience-stricken.

Remark the cruelty of fate, the pertinacity of that unspiritual god, Circumstance. In the streets, upon the ramparts, guarded at every step they took by an attendant mob of beggar children, they were safe, comparatively. And then the christening drives them into the sacristy, and garlic and stale incense drive them out upon the balcony, where they are as [illegible] each alone as they were on that first evening when "Lagrimas" sang her student song under the stars, and then, and then

"Belinda," says Roger Temple, somewhat irrelevantly, "don't speak of Miss Burke, child, until the subject is forced upon us. There is something you have omitted to explain to me, and this is a good moment to have it out. Mr. Jones has gone—my profound gratitude go with him—but why? What sent Mr. Jones away?"

"I'm sure I don't know ; that is, of course, I know," answered Belinda, lucidly. "Mr. Jones went—well, because he found there was no good in his remaining any longer."

"I see. You have behaved badly to him, Belinda, confess it! Four days ago your dearest hope in life was to possess the Jones' diamonds. Don't you remember what you said that first evening of our acquaintance, the evening when Senora Lagrimas promised to show me the Alhambra?"

She turns away quickly, yet not so quickly but that Roger can mark the conscious reddening of her cheek. "I behaved badly to him, I know, and to myself too ; badly from beginning to end. It makes me ashamed when I think of it. But now—oh, I have grown old and wise suddenly. It seems quite a year since you and Rose first came to St. Jean de Luz."

"I am sorry we have made your time hang so heavily."

No answer. Though they are only talking of Augustus Jones and his diamonds—talking as they might do if Rose or Miss Burke stood by, instinct tells Belinda what supreme moment hurries on apace. And her heart is beating so that she can hear its beats. If her life depended on it she could not lift her eyes to Roger's!

"However, you will be rid of us soon. Spencer is not amusing herself, it seems, and Rose says she dare not stay more than two days longer. Don't quite forget us when—Belinda, oh, my darling!"

And with this all is over. The tears are raining down her cheeks, and Roger Temple has taken her hands in his and spoken words such as he never, no, not ever in that unlawful whisper beside the Loppepoint [illegible], spoke to Rose.

"I have been so miserable," she stammers, after poor little confession, presently, "miserable, hopeless, happy [illegible] at [illegible]. Don't think badly, don't think altogether badly of me, sir, and never, never, never tell Rose!"

"Think badly of you, Belinda, child! That is the cruelest stab. What, in God's name, do you suppose I think of myself?"

"And you will never tell Rose?—I mean when you are far away, and all this is like a dream? You will never tell Rose, and you will not blame me more than you can help, when you think of me."

"Blame you, my dearest!" And Roger draws her, shrinking, trembling, with a rapture that is half joy, half fear, to his breast.

The organ plays on and on within the church, and the priest's voice drones out the christening service, and down beneath, on the shore, the fisher children are calling to each other, and far off ebbs and falls the Atlantic. Belinda knows not whether the soul is last a minute or an hour. To human hearts in intense pain, the arbitrary divisions of time exist not. Roger loves her, Roger loves her, and she is with him—her hand clasped in his, his breath upon her cheek, his whispers——

"Montrez moi les robes de pretre," cries a voice in rasping tourist French. "Quand j'ai vu je paie, vas t'en."

And into the sacristy, note book in hand, stalks Miss Burke, her sharp little point of a nose crimsoned by the sun, her boots thick with unsavory harbor mud. A dirty small boy in a dirtier surplice, one of the functionaries of the church, attends her.

Belinda and Captain Temple come in at once from the balcony. Belinda, to whom, as we know, the small change falsehoods of conventionality are not familiar, hangs her head and is silent. Roger has the extraordinary assurance to express his satisfaction at the meeting, and to add—Miss Burke watching his face, I blush for him as I write it—that they were "looking for her."

"So I perceive," says the lady curtly. "Looking for me among the idolatries of a Popish church! May I inquire whether you have also looked for a hotel and ordered dinner? I believe, I believe, Captain Temple, it was for that purpose that you left me alone in the boat."

"Well, I—I—the fact is, I don't know that we came across any hotel," says Roger, with an air of penitence. "But if you and Belinda will remain here, I——"

"I have found a hotel, and have ordered dinner," says Miss Burke. "When a gentleman," with a northern emphasis on the word, "when a gentleman happens to belong to my party, I invariably take care to see to all practical matters myself. Lucky I am accustomed to independence."

She turns tartly away, and with the help of her small cicerone proceeds to overhaul the "idolatries" of the place ; the vestments, embroidered by loving, foolish fingers in many a distant convent cell, our Lady of Delight, our Lady of Pain—all are viewed in the same cold, business spirit by the Woman of the Future, and catalogued in the irrepressible note book for literary use.

Belinda keeps studiously by her side, and far away from Roger. The sound of Miss Burke's voice, the expression of Miss Burke's eye, have brought the poor child back roughly from Elysium to the world in fact. Five minutes ago she was in her lover's arms, happy to the verge of pain, uncalculating of the future, unconscious of either innocence or guilt. He is Captain Temple, Rose's affianced husband, now, and she is divided from him on, forever, and evermore. That caress was their first and last. The delight that, beat out thin, is made to extend over thirty or forty years of some women's lives, has lasted for her as long as a kiss lasts—no more.

They eat their dinner of strange herbs, garlic predominant, at the one modest posada the town possesses; drink their coffee, or what the innkeeper writes in his bill as coffee, in the street, the whole population, lay and clerical, of Fontarabia looking on ; then the quick Southern night falls suddenly on the plain and mountains, and they must prepare to return. Belinda's promised six hours of happiness are all but spent. All but—how many a fateful turning in one's life is encompassed by those two short words!

Miss Burke insists that she, and she alone, shall make the bargain for the carriage. "Captain Temple undertook to arrange for us about the boat," she remarks. "If we wish to get back to France to-night, the business part of the matter had better now be left to me. It requires moral courage to hold one's own with these shilly-shally, false tongued Spaniards, and gentlemen as a rule are not possessed of moral courage. I am."

As the sequel proves. After half an hour's hot contest, Miss Burke has succeeded in beating the cochero down to the very lowest fraction for which mortal souls may be conveyed across the frontier to St. Jean de Luz; the fruits of her moral courage being the oldest, craziest carriage that Fontarabia can produce, with a horse gaunt and shadowy as ever came from Dore's pencil in his illustration of Don Quixote.

And here again, mark one of these results of hidden causes which we are pleased to call fate. Had Miss Burke ordered any decent, Christian pattern of conveyance, with cattle to match, they had all remained decorously in each other's society throughout the journey; no further whisper, or ghost of a whisper, between Roger and Belinda possible. But this cranky vehicle is so heavy, the horse so weak, that long before they reach the frontier bridge at Irun, they are going at snail's pace ; by the time they commence the ascent of Behobia they have come to a dead lock. The driver descends from his box ; swears fearfully in Spanish, French, Basque ; cracks his whip, applies his shoulder, or goes through the pantomime of applying it to the wheel. In vain. Not a step further can poor Rosinante stir. Their highnesses, these ladies and the gentleman, must make the ascent on foot if they would reach St. Jean tonight. No help for it. The horse was one of the best horses in Spain in his day, but what will you have? to every pig comes Martinmas—his day is past. If their highnesses had only consented to hire a pair.

Roger and Belinda jump out at once; Miss Burke refuses to move, again on principle. The man undertook to drive her from Fontarabia to St. Jean de Luz, and he shall hold to his bargain, if he take the whole night about it.

So "fate" has her way. On goes the cranky carriage; on go the swearing driver and the high souled Burke. Belinda and Roger are left alone once more. Alone, but how far more cruelly divided, how infinitely nearer than when they loitered beside the altars of the old church at Fontarabia. Now has come the moment of temptation in earnest. They have but to turn their faces and the road to the Alhambra lies straight as road can lie before them. And in the heart of each is the memory of a kiss!

CHAPTER X I.

"BOHEMIAN HONOR."

"Take my arm, Belinda. The way is steep."

The way is steep, the loneliness profound. Upon one side stretches forth the Atlantic, silent at this hour, and motionless as any little mountain tarn ; upon the other are wild sierras and rocky defiles of the Pass. Behind them—the lights from a score of scattered villages gleaming through the dusk—lies Spain, the land of dreams, the land which even prosaic middle age cannot quit without a sigh.

"And we have not seen the Alhambra after all," says Roger, some minutes later. She took his arm, as he bade her; her hand has become clasped, who knows how? in his, and she does not seek to draw it away. "Correctness," the outwork of weakness, so prudently born of knowledge, is to Belinda's Arab soul unknown. She is only honest as yet.

"No, we have not seen the Alhambra," in rather a shaky voice comes her answer, "and we are not likely to see it together, at all events."

"Six short hours in Spain, and four of those spent with Miss Burke! Now what can be the use of people like Miss Burke?" speculates Roger philosophically. "I suppose one ought to accept them without questioning, like heat or electricity, or any other irreducible phenomena. They exist, and that is as much as will ever be known about them."

"I dare say I shall know enough about Burke before I have done with her," remarks Belinda.

"You—you are not going to live with Miss Burke any longer?" says Roger, hurriedly, and by no means calculating into what imprudence he will be betrayed next.

"I don't see what I should gain by leaving her, sir. We are accustomed, at least, to hating each other! I might be worse off among strangers."

"Belinda," stopping short and looking down into her face, "what is the use of talking or pretending to talk like this? As if either of us could forget! You to spend the best years of your youth with Miss Burke, and I—great heavens! the thing is a mockery! But it is not too late, my darling, it is not too late. We may draw back yet."

There are few men who make love really well, as regards eloquence of speech ; ardent emotion and rounded periods seldom going hand in hand, save in very highest regions of melodrama. But language that in black and white reads trite enough may easily be alchemized into poetry of a glorious summer night, in a mountain sierra, with the stars shining overhead, and an uncritical heart of seventeen beating time to all you say.

"I don't want to draw back," says Belinda, misunderstanding him. "All this has come upon me—I scarce know how—come upon me whether I wished it or not. But if I could, I would not draw back now, for I shall have been happy."

Roger folds her to him in a quick embrace. "And we shall be separated no more, my child," he whispers. "Why it would be monstrous for the happiness of our lives—of all our lives—to be sacrificed for mere want of courage to speak. We shall be separated no more."

"Never separated," repeats Belinda, half impatiently. "We shall be separated forever, sir, and you know it! Separated a thousand times more than if you were going to marry a stranger."

"Marry! Don't talk of my marrying. I can never marry any one but——"

The words are spoken under Roger Temple's breath, but they fall, with clearness such as human speech never possessed for her before, on Belinda's ear. She turns deadly white ; even with this mask of night upon her face, Roger can see her change color. She breaks from his embrace.

"Tell me what you mean outright, Captain Temple. Say what you have to say plainly. You do not consider yourself bound, then, to marry Rose?"

And thus Roger is forced upon the very horns of the dilemma. Easy to suggest a possible dereliction from duty, by sign or whisper ; horribly hard to put into language with the honestest pair of child's eyes in the world looking straight into one's weak, troubled soul. "He had made an egregious error." Something to this effect does he at length contrive to answer her. "During the past dozen years or more he had mistaken a sentiment for passion, and Rosie, poor Rosie, it may be, had mistaken too. But Rose must be appealed to—the happiness of all their lives left in her hands."

"Captain Temple, let us understand each other," she cries, lifting her eyes, with piercing earnestness, to his face. "After a dozen years' fidelity, you love Rose no longer, it seems—are ready to throw her and your fidelity to the winds, and for my sake! Well, now, if this indeed is truth, not flattery, carry it into effect without delay. If we mean to commit a dishonest action, let us get it over at once, and without the treachery of soft words—appealing to poor Rose's generosity, leaving the happiness of all our lives in poor Rosie's hands—bah! I, at least, am not made of such mawkish stuff!"

"Belinda, child. Great heaven! if you knew——"

"Over away there, sir, not a couple of miles off, is Spain. I know every turn, every short cut through the mountains. What hinders you and me from going to the Alhambra as we planned? Miss Burke will say she left us, and Rosie, poor Rosie, must guess the rest. Are you ready?"

(To be Continued.)

Latest from Scotland.

The old woman Boyd, who is in Ayr prison under sentence of death for murdering her grandchild, has been reprieved.

A child of Gregan, Culnaigtrie, Kirkcudbrightshire, recently fell into a pot of boiling porridge and was scalded to death.

All the money required to place a monumental brass over the grave of Bruce in Dunfermline Abbey has now been subscribed.

On the [illegible]th inst. Mr. Robert Porterfield, writer, Dumbarton, fell into the river Leven and was drowned. He leaves a widow and family.

The congregation of Regent Square Presbyterian Church, London, has decided to call the Rev. John McNeill, of Edinburgh, to be their minister.

Mr. W. Valentine, farmer, Stonehaven, was killed the other day. While oiling the machinery of the threshing mill the wheel started and broke his neck.

A movement is on foot at Aberdeen to place a memorial stone over the grave of William R. Broomfield, the recently deceased composer of hymn tunes.

The first meeting of the new Town Council of Edinburgh was held on the 9th inst. Treasurer Boyd was elected Lord Provost ; Councillor Clapperton, Treasurer ; and the vacant Bailie's chair was awarded to Mr. Steel.

Immense shoals of salmon have been lying in the sea off Berwick, and the salmon, many of them fish of very large size, jumped solidly and incessantly, and made the surface of the water, otherwise smooth, quite turbulent.

Rev. Mr. Donaldson, of Strathaven, recently said that Christianity is judged now more by what we are doing for Christ in the world around and how we are meeting its various demands, than by the stereotyped orthodoxy of our religious opinions.

The Cumnock people have received a rude shock on hearing the report that the local Covenanters' flag, at present in the Bishop's Castle at the Glasgow Exhibition, has been sold by its possessor, Mr. Dugald McGeachin, shoemaker, Cumnock, for £50. It seems to be the prevalent notion that the flag really belongs to the town, and not to the keeper of it. "This," writes Mr. A. B. Todd, "certainly was the light in which Mr. McGeachin's father looked upon himself—the 'keeper' only of the banner ;" and this seems to be confirmed by a poem on the flag written by the late Rev. James Murray, parish minister of Cumnock, nearly thirty years ago.—Christian Leader.

Fresh Foreign Waifs.

"High play" is the initial news of the season from beautiful, but wicked, Monte Carlo.

The average number of dog-bitten patients at Pasteur's establishment in Paris is 100.

Scattered all over Europe are sorrowful American girls who have found titled marriages a failure.

No less than eight steamships for the trans-Atlantic trade are now in progress of building on the Clyde.

Among the permanent residents of Paris, it is said, the exiles of Russian nobility are the most noted for extravagance and prodigality of life.

Duchess Decazes, formerly Miss Singer of New York, has astonished even the Parisians by the magnificence of her equipages on the Bois.

With the beginning of the new year, it is said, many English railway companies will abandon the use of second-class carriages.

English newspapers are full of advertisements of "castles," "halls" and celebrated estates for sale or to let. This is to be regarded as one of the significant signs of the times.

Helmets Superseding Travelling Skll Caps.

The old fashioned silk travelling or skull cap, says the New York Sun, is fast being superseded by the English plaid double-peaked helmet. By actual count on an evening train for Philadelphia on the Pennsylvania Road this week there were nine travellers wearing plaid helmets and only two with black silk head gear. The helmet covers the eyes and excludes the light if one wants to doze, while it feels and looks more like the orthodox head covering if one steps off the train at a station. On the other hand the skull cap always conveyed the idea that its wearer had pulled the lining out of his hat for temporary use.

Cannibals Live the Same Way.

Paterfamilias (at the supper-table to Mr. Thomas Catch, Susie's beau)—It is said that a Spaniard can live upon an onion and a few olives a day. It seems surprising to us, does it not?

Susie's Little Brother—Mr. Catch, know what you live on.

Mr. Catch—What, Tommy.

Little Brother—On your aunt said so.

The sale of Grattan's library has just taken place in Dublin, Ireland. There were upwards of 5,000 volumes, and Grattan, like Coleridge, was in the habit of enriching his books with marginal notes, of rare value for the generation amongst whom the intellectual riches of the great orator are being distributed.

A NEW ENGLISH GAME.

Which Is Described as Rivalling Chess In Fascination.

The inventor of the game of "naval blockade" has now invented another game called "invasion." The Boston Herald describes "invasion" as follows.

It is played on a specially prepared map, which is divided into a great number of small squares, and on which the Channel and the southeastern corner of England are shown. The general idea is that the English have lost command of the narrow seas, and that an enemy's invading fleet has appeared on the coast. The objects of the enemy are to effect a landing, to advance upon London and to seize the capital. The object of the British is, of course, to prevent his doing so. Britain is provided with fourteen blue counters, each of which may be supposed to represent a brigade or an army corps, and each of which, previous to the commencement of the game, must be put on a square which is assigned to it by the rules. When all the British counters are in position, they may be taken as representing bodies of troops posted at Yarmouth, Ipswich, Harwich, Southend, London, Chatham, Dover, Deal, Dungeness, Lewes, Horsham, Bognor, Portsmouth and Bournemouth respectively. Most of these places are connected with one another, and ultimately with London by arbitrary constructed lines of railway. The enemy is supplied with twelve white counters, which he may dispose anywhere at sea, provided that no counter be placed within one clear square of the British coast. Each of these counters also represents a brigade or army corps; but, until it has been moved to a square on shore, it is supposed to be on board ship and unable to deal a blow on land. White begins the game, and the players then move alternately, moving one counter one square at a time in any direction. Blue may not, however, move off England; nor may white, when once he has landed, retreat to sea. White, too, cannot land on a square which is already occupied by blue. If a blue and a white counter be in adjacent squares on the mainland, the player whose turn it is to move must capture his opponent's counter by removing it from the board and substituting his own; and if, from any cause, he fails to comply with this rule, he forfeits his offending counter. A variation in the method of moving may occur when a counter occupies a square through which there passes a line of railway. It is then entitled to be moved two squares forward and back, instead of only one, provided that it follows the line. In these circumstances it can also capture an opponent on the second square or on the first, but not at one move on both. One position on British ground is supposed to represent the Dover mouth of the completed channel tunnel. If white can occupy this without incurring immediate capture his position there becomes impregnable so long as he chooses to hold it, and, in addition, he recovers three counters, should he have already lost so many, or the first three which he may lose during the subsequent operations. White wins if he succeed in placing one of his counters on London. Blue wins if he capture all white's counters. The game is very simple and very attractive. A draughts player could learn it in five minutes. But, although it is simple, it is by no means easy to play with success. The number of combinations which may be made on either side is practically without limit. There is absolutely no room for the operation of chance, and the issue must in every case lie in the hands of the player who develops the greater amount of tactical ability. It is, therefore, a game which may easily, to some minds, become as enthusiastic as chess; and the impedimenta which are needed for playing it are so cheap and so portable that "invasion" may fairly be described as a game for all classes and for all places.

Personal Points.

Dr Oliver Wendell Holmes is one of the seven surviving members of Harvard's class of 29.

Mrs. Amelie Rives Chanler says she is anxious to have "The Quick and the Dead" forgotten as soon as possible.

Four brothers were married to four sisters at Louisville yesterday. This was settling up or settling down two families at short notice. It is not said whether they drew lots for choice.

Mrs. Crawshay, of Brecon, England, has placed in the hands of William Rossetti the sum of $12,500, the income from which is to be used annually as a prize to the woman who shall pass the best examination on the writings of Byron, Keats and Shelley.

The Italians were not pleased with the manners of Emperor William of Germany. They complain that he has a brusque way of cutting his sentences short and that he mounts his horse clumsily. Then, again, he is not fond of macaroni. Altogether, he is far from the Italian's ideal of a hero.

DR. GRACE PECKHAM gave a sensible talk on nervousness, the great national complaint, in New York the other day. In the course of it she said that "Americans are always talking about their health, and declaring their nervousness. Parents say to their children: 'You mustn't do that. It will make you too nervous.' 'How nervous you are to-day!' Only a few days ago a child of 9 years had said to the lecturer, 'I am so nervous to-day that I don't know what to do.' Thus by keeping this idea constantly before the minds of children they catch the infection and become nervous before their time." We have no doubt that Dr. Grace Peckham is right, and that a great deal of the nervousness so general is directly due to this constant hunting for it and talking about it.

PLYMOUTH Church has not gone to the ruin that was predicted since Beecher's death. A recent report shows that 110 new members have joined since Dr. Abbott became the pastor, and that through his wonderful faculty for organization he has got the church machinery in better shape than it ever was before. He has set the young people of both sexes to work, and he has managed to throw labor of some kind upon almost every active member of the church, and he has done all this in such a way that the people feel it is an actual pleasure to render the assistance asked of them, for Dr. Abbott himself remains the busiest and hardest working pastor in Brooklyn.

TO BE READ AT A GLANCE.

L[illegible] of Gossip for Miss and Madame.

If it pleases your ladyships.
—As You Like It, I, 2.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett is expected to spend the winter at Washington.

The latest bit of waggery is that the bustle has gone to join the dodo.

Mrs. Cleveland is continuing her study of French. Her teacher is a French woman.

Essie Jenyngs, the Australian actress, who is expected to throw Mary Anderson into the shade, is going to London at last.

"Coeducation is the thief of time." That's the way a Cornish man put it in speaking of the mingling of sexes as students in the college class rooms.

Rev. Dr. Dike declared at the meeting of ministers in Baltimore that in the last twenty years there have been 300,000 "broken marriages" in the States.

A friend who lately returned from a visit to Mrs. U. S. Grant in New York says that she is anxious to rent her house prior to a contemplated trip abroad next spring.

The Queen of Portugal is having a very jolly time in Spain. She and the Queen of Spain have become great friends, and Madrid society is enjoying the festivities which are only possible when two crowned women meet "to chase the glowing hours with flying feet."

A Rutland (Vt.) family while eating dinner discovered a small tin box in the centre of the butter. It was opened and found to contain a "reminder to some unmarried Christian gentleman of his duty." The note was from "a girl, 18 years of age, good-looking and an excellent housekeeper."

A lady visiting Nyack, N. Y., from the City of Churches took a hot brick to bed with her on Sunday night. About midnight she was awakened by smoke, and she found the lower part of her bed on fire and her toes just touched by the flames. A loud Brooklyn scream aroused the household. The impending conflagration was extinguished, and the lady's toes were anointed with sweet oil.

Well, Why Is It?

Why is a cat's tail like the earth? It is fur to the end.

What sin is the foe-man to the door? A step farther.

What is a point of time? The middle of an hour glass.

Why is a tutor ever scotch? He is apt to be taught.

Why does an ill maid wear mittens? To keep the chaps off.

Why is a door in the potential mood? It would, or should be.

What is a board of education? The sole trustee's struggle.

What sticketh closer than a brother? A postage stamp, by gum.

Why is a traitor tied to a dog's tail like death? It's bound to occur.

Why does a sailor know there's a man in the moon? He has been to sea.

What is it that will give a cold, cure a cold and pay a doctor's bill? A draught.

Why is the North Pole like an Albert whiskey manufactory? It is a secret still.

Why is a city official like a church bell? One steals from the people and the other peals from the steeple.

Why is it dangerous to go out in spring? Because the trees shoot, the flowers have pistils, and the bullrush is out.

What is the difference between an engineer and a school teacher? One trains the mind, the other minds the train.

What is the difference between an apple and a pretty girl? One you can squeeze to get cider, and the other you can get 'sider to squeeze.

Perhaps You Know That

Under the State law of Michigan no Jew-ess can cast a vote.

One pound of seed will yield about 10,000 asparagus stalks.

The oldest and largest tree in the world is a chestnut, near the foot of Mount Etna. The circumference of the main trunk is 212 feet.

A toadstool will lift 340 pounds of solid weight while growing, and a common cabbage head will burst staves as thick as those used in pork barrels.

It is said that when a girl gets to be 35 she is fond of being called Daisy, if that happens to be her first name. At 16 she insists on being called Miss Smith.

Ornamenting letter and note paper by hand is becoming a very remunerative branch of industry in New York, as well as in London, Paris and Vienna.

But Was Different.

Brown—Will you be my wife, Evelyn?

Evelyn—Well, really, I — —

Brown—I must tell you I lost $100,000 in Wall street yesterday.

Evelyn—I cannot marry, Mr. ——

Brown—But I got it back again the same day (lights a cigarette with a $2 bill).

Evelyn—As I was going to say, I cannot marry, Mr. Brown, anybody except you.

A Fatal Puff.

Newspaper Man—Did you see that clever little puff I gave you this morning about your recent success in business and how well you are doing?

Potts (gloomily)—Yes, I saw it.

Newspaper Man—Well, weren't you pleased?

Potts (earnestly)—Shears, there were seven creditors at my house this morning before breakfast.

Keeping Them Quiet.

Wife (returning from church)—Why, my dear, where are the children? I don't hear a sound.

Weary husband (who has been keeping house)—I don't know and I don't care; but I think likely they are down stairs in the jelly closet.

About Smoking.

Prof. Roberts estimates that London wastes $23,000,000 every year in smoke. Certain tobacco reformers will advise London to save this enormous sum by giving up smoking.—Buffalo Express. It would not mend matters to smash their pipes would it?

—Raining cats and dogs is surely no worse than hailing strangers.

THE JAPANESE MAIDEN.

A Country Where Flirtation and Coquetry Are Unknown.

A pretty Japanese maiden, dressed in soft embroidered silk, sitting on the mat on the floor, bending over a koto, on which she strums an accompaniment to her voice, would in all probabilities touch the heart of a young Japanese, but no matter how much he might be touched, he must appear utterly indifferent to her and ignore her charms and her presence. For, progressive as is Japan, young men and women are never allowed together alone and such a thing as a flirtation or coquetry is unknown. Unlike China and Corea, Japan allows parents to invite a young gentleman to their house as their guest, but he devotes his time to the parents, and the daughter may play the koto, or entertain him in other ways, but she is noticed no more than is a colored servant-woman by a guest in a southern home. It seems strange to us that custom can so control feelings and sentiment, especially when every day we see here at home young men doing the exact opposite, ignoring parents and older members of the family, and feigning more interest in the young woman than they really feel. Marriages in Japan are carried on much as they used to be, the parent making the choice, but now-a-days if it chance that either young lady or young gentleman, seeing the other, object to become husband or wife, the parents do not force the matter, and, as a rule, babies are not betrothed by their parents as they are in some of the Asiatic countries. Neither are women so secluded as they are in those countries, for nearly as many Japanese women are to be seen on the streets in Japan as are American women in this country. In fact, the Japanese woman or girl is to Asia what the American girl is to Europe. American Magazine.

The Silent Secret.

Helene Rogermere sat upon the silken divan in the palatial residence of her father, the plumber, on Fifth avenue. Beside her, his bow-lock drooping gracefully over his alabaster brow, sat Roe Reginald Rosecranft, the poet and lit-er-a-teur. The night was waning. Through the parlor window shone fair Luna, with all her pristine fire at the next-to-last quarter, while behind a fleecy cloud as she reached on a nocturnal flirtation with Jupiter. It was a time for the communion of souls to be [illegible] and attenuated atom encircled the tapering waist of Helene, and her fair head rested upon the shoulder of his threadbare coat. Roe was mossy.

"Is thy soul restless to-night, my love? Has the divine afflatus seized thee in its resistless grasp?" came upon tender accents from the poet, and inclining to her pliant beauty, he said: "Let me assuage. I serve."

And still the poet was restless.

"Will no word of mine relieve thee, dearest?" said Helene.

"Hardly," was the reply, in a hoarse, cadaverous tone. "Words will not suffice."

Then Helene leaned over her poet-lover and pressed a burning kiss upon his alabaster brow. Looking into the azure depths of his soulful eyes with an arch smile, she purred:

"With kisses sweeter, love?"

"Alas! no," was the heart-broken reply, "for these are evanescent."

"Shall we walk upon the balcony, dearest?" whispered Helene, in mellifluous accents.

"Alas! no, my love. I am too weak," murmured Roe Reginald with a consumptive sigh.

Helene was perplexed.

"Tell me truly," she pleaded, "has thy love for Helene grown cold? Has another usurped my place in thy affections? Art weary of me, love? Speak, I implore you!"

Driven to frenzy by these piteous appeals, Roe Reginald leaned over the fair woman soon to be his bride and clasped her to his breast in a passionate embrace.

"Wouldst thou know," he hissed between his clenched teeth, "what it is that gnaweth at my vitals which no poetry, no kisses, no love, no moonlight, no affection can assuage? Then list and I will tell thee."

Roe Reginald Rosecranft, the poet, placed his thin and trembling lips close to the shell like ear of his inamorata and in a tremolo-pizzicato voice shrieked:

"I'm hungry. Have you got any cold ham in the house?"—Evening Sun.

Will There be a Collector at the Gates Ajar?

Nothing so sure as death and taxes is true enough perhaps, but formerly people imagined that when death came along taxes stopped. It turns out that we're changing all that, witness this little item which is going round the country: "Cremation is illegal in France and bodies have to be taken to Italy to be burned. M. Morin, dying recently in Paris, left instructions that his body should be sent to Milan to be burned. This was done, and the cost of the incineration was but fifteen shillings. The Italian custom house, however, levied $70 import duty on the body when it came into the country, and the same amount export duty when the ashes were taken back to France."

Mackie & Co.'s steamer Newburgh, of Leith, while on a voyage from Grangemouth to Calhuns with coal, foundered in the North Sea. Sixteen persons were drowned, and one was rescued and landed in Norway.

A CRITIC'S idiosyncrasy is said to have possessed Miss Elizabeth Peabody, of Boston, the last of a circle of eminent men and women which once included Emerson, Alcott, Charlotte Cushman and Margaret Fuller. She is 86 years old, and although surrounded by intellectual friends of both sexes, she devotes herself exclusively to Sarah Winnemucca, an untutored Indian woman, even sharing her room with her.

IT is said that there is a general expectation that the senior wrangler for the ensuing year will be Miss Fawcett, the only daughter of the late Postmaster-General. She has always beaten the best men of her year in the Trinity examinations. There is a legend that she applied to one of the most famous of university mathematical coaches, and asked to be taken as his pupil. She was not received, however, and the story goes that the learned but ungallant tutor declared that "he would teach no tabbies." He might hold a different and more respectful opinion now.

IT WILL TOLL NO MORE.

St. Sepulchre's Bell Has Rung for Condemned Prisoners for Three Centuries.

The traditions of nigh three hundred years are about to be violated by the Charity Commissioners of the city of London, who have ordered that hereafter the bell of the Church of St. Sepulchre be no more tolled during the hanging of condemned persons in the Newgate prison near by—or, at least, that if the bell be tolled, it be at the expense of the parish or the friends of the criminals and that the fund from which payment for that last service to the living has been made since 1605 be devoted hereafter to some other charitable purpose in the discretion of the church authorities. Fifty pounds was the bequest made in the year named by Robert Dowe, citizen and merchant tailor, to pay as a rublet on the right hand side of the altar in the church and records, after ringing the greatest bell at the church on the day the condemned prisoners are executed and for other services forever concerning such condemned prisoners.

The "other services" were the most interesting thing about the affair. On the night before the hangings the clerk of the church had to ring a bell under the windows of the cells of the condemned men, and having thus attracted their attention, repeat certain warning rhymes appropriate to their approaching taking off. Having thus awakened in their bosoms thoughts of things eternal, he was to go away, and the next morning to stand in front of the church when the cart with the condemned passed on its way to Tyburn and to present to each criminal a nosegay. Then he had again to ring the bell that he had used the night before and repeat certain prayers, with an admonition to all good people to join him in beseeching mercy for the souls of the condemned. There were hangings every week in those days, and in order that the clerk might not grow careless and neglect to fulfil these last offices for the condemned with proper formality and unction, the beadle of the Merchant Taylors' Hall was directed to be present and supervise the ceremonies, and it was provided that for this he should receive an "honest crispend."

When the gallows tree was removed from Tyburn and hanging took place at the Bailey, the nosegay presentation and the prayings in front of the church were stopped, and in time the custom of tolling the bell after execution under a good wind was forgotten also. The tolling of the great bell, however, has always been regarded as a fair, and there is some opposition to its omission even at this day. The original fee was a penny, but it grew to a groat, greater sums being sometimes given to procure the devotion to the souls of deserving prisoners upon their release from Newgate, or to some other service more in accordance with modern ideas than the mournful tolling of a knell or the presenting of posies to criminals on their way to Bangor.

So identified has the church of St. Sepulchre become with these last rites for the condemned that its name is popularly supposed to have some connection with the fatal ceremonies. The church, however, was built and named long before Newgate prison was ever thought of, and its being the nearest church in the city reason why it was chosen as the shrine for saying masses for the souls of the damned. It was founded in the thirteenth century, rebuilt 100 years later, and after the great fire the present structure was built by the famous Wren. Capt. John Smith, one of Pocahontas fame, is among the great men whose bones lie in the vaults beneath its pavement.

Syllabic Enthusiasm.

Two well dressed men, both far advanced in liquor, happened to meet on turning the corner of Broadway into Fourteenth street, at the Morton House. One of them had a bedraggled bandana around his hat. The other's breast was covered all over with American flags and Harrison campaign buttons.

"Hurror f' hurror f' f' Cle," stammered the first man. Then the other broke in with

"Y' mean hurror f' Har-"

"No, f' Cle-"

"No, f' Har-"

"I tell y' it's Cle-"

"Har-"

"Cle-"

And they bumped against each other and tried to wave their arms, but so did not get beyond the first syllable of their candidates' names. When last seen they were bowling down Fourteenth street arm in arm, one shouting "Ror f' Cle," and the other "Ror f' Har-"—N. Y. World.

A Philosophic Middy.

At a ball given at St. George's Hall, in Liverpool, the London World says:

"The 'middies' were greatly to the fore, especially at supper, and that their coolness in difficulty has not diminished since the legendary days of Mr. Easy may be inferred from the reply given by a midshipmite to one of the stewards of the ball, who asked whether he preferred a married or unmarried partner. 'Well, you see, we're only here for a day or two, so it's quite immaterial to me which it is.'

Obituary.

Scottish literature mourns the loss of a hard worker in the field of letters in William MacDowall, for many years editor of the Dumfries and Galloway Standard. As the author of the "History of Dumfries," "Burns in Dumfries" and "Among the Old Scotch Minstrels," as well as works on phrenology and archæology, he left memorials that are likely to perpetuate his name among lovers of Burns and all who take interest in Scottish local history.

He Took the Ten.

A subscription paper for some religious object was passed to a zealous church member in town recently, when he remarked: "Well, I can give $5 and not feel it." "Then," said the solicitor, "give $10 and feel it." The point was seen at once and the "ten spot" was forthcoming.

THE inventor of Volapuk, Johann Martin Schleyer, is not dead, as a recent cable despatch stated, although he has been dangerously ill and received the last sacraments. The Baden baths cured him, and he lives to edit the Volapukable Zenodik, the official organ of the society, whose headquarters have lately been removed to Paris.

THE "KING DEVIL."

A New Weed That May Become a Great Pest—Its Origin.

In August, 1879, Prof. Lester F. Ward, while returning from a hunting excursion in the North Woods, discovered near Cartnage, N. Y., a new variety of hieracium, or hawk-weed, of which he obtained two specimens. The next day after a long search, he found it in a farm at Live's Mills, a small village about ten miles from Watertown, large patches of the same plant. The individuals were many of them smaller and [illegible] than the others, but there was no doubt they were of the same species as the specimens secured the day before. He secured a great number of the specimens, and remarked to his companion that, unless the farmers of that region adopted some measures to destroy the weed, it would give them much trouble in the future. On his return to Washington, Prof. Ward identified his specimens as belonging to the species hieracium pratum, a variety of hawk-weed very common and a great pest to farmers in many parts of Europe, but little known in America.

Last summer Prof. Ward visited St. Lawrence county again, and one of the first things he was informed of was the appearance, six or eight weeks ago, and the rapid spread since, of a weed they call the "king devil." Prof. Ward at once identified it as the novel variety of hawk-weed he had discovered during his former visit in that neighborhood, and, of course recalled to mind the warning he then uttered. When the king devil once gets into a field it completely covers the ground with its coriaceous green leaves, preventing the growth of any other plant or weed. It took such complete possession of one field of thirty acres that there was absolutely nothing else on it—there could be nothing else.

Inquiry as to the local origin of the king devil traced it to the [illegible] where Prof. Ward had found the [illegible] here, therefore, was the [illegible] was introduced one of the worst pests the farmers of the United States [illegible] under and from [illegible] over the country. [illegible] appeared [illegible] sent [illegible] Prof. Ward identified his specimens as belonging to the species hieracium pratum, a variety of hawk-weed very common and a great pest to farmers in many parts of Europe, but little known in America.

Last summer Prof. Ward visited St. Lawrence county again, and one of the first things he was informed of was the appearance, six or eight weeks ago, and the rapid spread since, of a weed they call the "king devil." Prof. Ward at once identified it as the novel variety of hawk-weed he had discovered during his former visit in that neighborhood, and, of course recalled to mind the warning he then uttered. When the king devil once gets into a field it completely covers the ground with its coriaceous green leaves, preventing the growth of any other plant or weed. It took such complete possession of one field of thirty acres that there was absolutely nothing else on it—there could be nothing else.

Inquiry as to the local origin of the king devil traced it to the [illegible] where Prof. Ward had found the [illegible] here, therefore, was the [illegible] was introduced one of the worst pests the farmers of the United States [illegible] under and from [illegible] over the country. [illegible] appeared [illegible] sent [illegible]

A MODERN HERCULES.

Philadelphia Lays Claim to the Strongest Man Yet.

[illegible] a man of [illegible] dollars [illegible] George Sepman, a sculptor in marble and statuary. He stands six feet four and a half inches in his stockings, measures [illegible] inches around the chest and weighs [illegible] pounds, scarcely an ounce of which is what you [illegible]. His proportions are symmetrical, and he can stand [illegible] the upright by resting his fingers of [illegible]. Sepman recently paid a visit to the gymnasium on Arch street and gave an exhibition of what he could do. The pupils stood [illegible] curiously when he picked up the 100-pound dumb-bell and twirled it between his fingers as a dude might do with a bamboo cane. When he stretched out his arms and asked all who possibly could do so to jump on his back, arms, shoulders and head to take a ride, eight sturdy and strong men complied with the request, and holding on to his ears, hair and collar button, they bore their weight upon him. He carried them without much difficulty, and the gymnasts who saw the performance were almost inclined to think contemptuously of their own comparatively puny physique. Not satisfied with this the young giant went to the strength testing scales and pulled up the 2,000-pound weight with ease. He then wrapped two straps around his shoulder and back, and fastening the ends to 1,500 pounds of iron, he calmly raised the weight and took a promenade around the hall with his load.

As his last act, instead of wrestling with a Numidean lion, as Hercules of mythological fame did, he caught hold of a bear which a friend had expressly brought and hugged the animal so hard that it grunted for mercy. Sepman has yet to perform seven more difficult tasks, and then he will pose himself as a modern Hercules and the hero of twelve unparalleled feats of strength.

Another Village Scandal.

Village Maid—"It's just as I supposed. The Widow Dash has forgotten all about her husband already, and he hasn't been dead a month."

Dame—"La, me! I shouldn't wonder."

"Yes, it's perfectly awful—it's abominable the way she acts, the heartless, cold-blooded, stuck-up thing. You know her husband's first name was Hamilton, and she always called him Ham."

"Yes, I know."

"Well, at the market to-day she asked for ham, and her voice didn't tremble once."—Philadelphia Record.

His Curiosity Aroused.

"Keep away from that," said a restaurant keeper to an Irishman who was standing in front of a newly arrived box of turtles, holding his finger in evident pain. "What are you doing there anyhow?"

"I wor investigating."

"Investigating what?"

"I wor trying to see which was the head and which was the tail ov that baste over there in the corner ov the box."

"What did you want to know for?"

"I've a curiosity to know whether I've been bit or stung."—Merchant Traveller.

THE London correspondent of the Dublin Express yesterday says: "Mrs. Gordon-Baillie, the notorious confidence woman, has resolutely refused to obey the prison rules, and has been punished in consequence. Her wealth of hair has been materially reduced, and a visiting justice declares that he had a difficulty in recognizing her as the saucy lady he had seen at the Old Bailey."

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1 50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, DEC. 6, 1888.

DURHAM AND MEAFORD RAILWAY.

There is a project on foot for the building of a line of railway from Durham, via Markdale, to Meaford. A number of prominent business men of those places have determined to apply for a charter at the next session of Dominion Parliament. Providing that the charter is granted, we do not anticipate that the road will ever be built. It would be a foolish enterprise if it were. This railway would never pay for its construction. The Markdale Standard of last week says: "The benefit to be derived from a connection with two gigantic competing lines, such as the Grand Trunk and the C. P. R., cannot be over estimated." Let us look at the situation and see where the competition comes in. Markdale is distant 25 miles from Meaford and the Grand Trunk at that point; 17 from Durham and the Grand Trunk there; therefore the proposed line would connect at each end with the Grand Trunk system. The new line would essentially belong to the latter system. It then becomes plain that Markdale would be the one solitary point to be benefited by the scheme, and we even doubt if the benefit derived by Markdale would amount to a "row of beans" as the great roundabout length of the Grand Trunk lines would practically preclude any material competition. Capitalists will thoroughly understand these facts, and the charter will be placed among other archieves to moulder away, incompany with the charter of the Saugeen Valley Railway, which was to run from Kincardine via Walkerton, Durham, Flesherton, etc. The Durham, Markdale, and Meaford railway will never be built.

Toronto has an "Old Curiosity Shop" in the person of one James French. About a month previous to each and every municipal election "Jimmy" French comes out in the press with a long letter detailing the many glaring abuses perpetrated by the whole aldermanic horde during the past year. He insists on every occasion that there is not one conscientious man among them. The whole council should be sacked. These convictions he not only publishes in the newspapers, but prints them on quarter-sheet bills and posts them all over the city. He is laughed at for his pains. His opinions have no weight. As a citizen he is not admired. He has wealth, and spends the most of his time looking after it, except when he is concocting some tirade against the august aldermen. His quixotic ideas upon how Toronto's municipal machinery should be run are quite amusing. Jimmy French has a mistaken idea that his wealth should command respect from every rank of society, and he appears to get no manner (a moral impossibility, to be sure) upon snubs. A few years ago he hand-picked a barrel of fine Northern Spy apples from his orchard in Yorkville and shipped them with compliments to Queen Victoria. They were returned in a few weeks, accompanied by a curt note from Mr. Ponsonby, secretary to the Queen, informing Mr. French that Her Britannic Majesty had no use for his apples. Mr. French paid the freight money both ways.

Letters now appearing in the Toronto papers recall the gentleman to our mind. There are some funny people in this world.

That old and influential paper, the Montreal Witness, is showing evidences of increased prosperity. The daily on Saturdays is now a twelve page paper, and on other days eight. We are pleased to note the thrift of this well-known paper.

The editor of the Meaford Mirror always keeps an open almanac before him, and informs his readers of all the astronomical occurences, such as "new moon," "first quarter," "second quarter," "sun crosses the line," and other kindred phenomena. The compositor has very nearly finished his almanac for this year, and at the end we expect to see "Try Yaggard's Hello Oil," or "Drink plenty of Northorp & Leeman's Burdock Blood Distractor."

In the prospectus which we received recently from The Youth's Companion office, we notice an array of noted contributors which promises unusual excellence for the coming volume. First among them is the Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone, affectionately called the "Grand Old Man," the greatest of living statesmen, who writes on "The Future of the English-Speaking Races." Then General Lord Wolseley, who will tell of his strange personal adventures in the field with British armies. Then Professor Tyndall, and Justin McCarthy, who writes of "Leaders in the House of Lords," Archdeacon Farrar, on "Musicians and their Struggles," and Professor Huxley. Among American contributors we find such well known names as Lieutenant Schwatka, who writes of "Tight Pinches in the Arctic," Andrew Carnegie, on "Bits of Advice to Young Men," Dr. Austin Flint, Judge Oliver, Wendell Holmes, jr., on "Young Men in the Law," Admiral Luce, Colonel Thomas W. Knox, James Parton and at least one hundred others.

The Companion is a welcome visitor weekly in more than 400,000 families, and has won a place in home life obtained by no other publication. The wonder is how any family can do without it. The publishers announce that any new subscriber who sends $1.75 now, can have The Companion free every week to January 1, 1889, and a full year from that date.

The Christmas Globe.

The Globe Christmas number, just received, is deserving of the highest possible praise. It is, without exception, the finest thing of the kind ever published in Canada, and reflects the highest possible credit upon its publishers. The three separate lithograph plates accompanying it are alone worth more than the price asked for the whole. There are 31 pages of original reading matter and illustrations, the literary work being from such well known pens as "Seranus" (Mrs Harrison), Luke Sharp, of the Detroit Free Press, Bel Thistlethwaite, and numbers of other graceful writers. The letterpress and artistic work of this elegant souvenir are fully equal to that of the London Christmas publications which are sold at 50 cents, while this is placed at the nominal price of 25 cents. It is a matter of surprise to us that the Globe should see fit to place it at so low a figure, but we hope their enterprise may meet with its just reward

Cheap Light.

Received One car load No. 1 coal oil, and selling at 16c per gallon in small or large quantities, at R. Trimble's.

Salt.

Received One car load fine Goderich salt, 300 lb. barrels at lowest figures. R. Trimble's.

Another consignment of those famous overcoats which cause such a commotion amongst clothing dealers, at R. Trimble's.

The finest and cheapest lot of ladies' and gents' fur caps in town, at R. Trimble's.

Thirty-Day Race.

Free for all! Go as you please, for a pair of felt boots, socks or rubbers, lower than the lowest, at R. Trimble's

Overshoes and rubbers in endless variety and cheap at R. Trimble's.

Poultry Wanted.

The highest price paid for turkeys, geese, ducks and chickens, at R. Trimble's

Butter Wanted.

Top prices paid for choice butter in tubs and rolls, at R. Trimble's.

Cross-cut Saws.

All latest makes and bottom prices. Please inspect before purchasing elsewhere. R. Trimble.

We have done some wonderful whittling of prices. Call and see. We want the whole community to awake and wonder at our wonderful enterprise R. Trimble.

THE FIRE FIEND'S FROLIC.

He Visits Flesherton and Leaves sad Traces Behind.

S. DAMUDE'S TANNERY BURNED TO THE GROUND.

Heretofore our village has been remarkably free from the ravages of the fire fiend, but it was not always to remain so. One of our old landmarks is gone. Mr. S. Damude's tannery, built some eighteen years ago, was, on Saturday evening last, standing; Sunday morning it was nothing but a heap of smouldering embers and smoking ruins. Between 1 and 2 o'clock Sunday morning Mr. Gibson, who lives nearly opposite the tannery, awoke and noticed flames breaking from the windows. He quickly gave the alarm, but the fire had progressed too far to admit of it being checked. A large number of willing citizens turned out and renderd good assistance in saving buildings at rear of the tannery, containing valuable stave and shingle machinery, bark, etc., and on which there was no insurance. In about an hour and a half from the time the fire was noticed no traces were left of the old tannery, excepting smoking embers; and to-day that portion of the town presents a dreary aspect indeed.

Comparatively few of our citizens knew of the fire until next morning, but those who were present worked like Trojans and with good effect, for which service Mr. Damude desires us to publicly and heartily thank them.

Late on Saturday evening Mr. Damude, as was his custom, visited the building to see that everything was all right, and found them so, apparently. There was fire in the stove, and the only satisfactory explanation advanced of the catastrophe is that through some defect in the stove or pipes ignition took place. The theory of incendiarism is too absurd to countenance for a moment. Mr Damude has no enemies. He is one of Flesherton's most energetic and highly respected citizens, and an unusual amount of sympathy is expressed for him on every side, as the loss to himself will be great. Insurance covers nearly one half the loss, which is estimated at between seven and eight thousand dollars. There was a large stock of finished and raw hides in the building, some of which, being in the vats, will be saved, though somewhat damaged. The engine and boiler are more or less injured, though not totally destroyed

Right at this point, and now that Flesherton has had a taste of the scorching element, we would insist upon the necessity of having some manner of means by which the natives could be aroused to assist in quelling possible conflagrations. In this case valuable time was lost while people were being awakened. In other cases the time wasted in summoning assistance might prove even more disastrous. If we cannot have a fire brigade and fire protection, at least let us have a bell by which the citizens could be summoned to assist in saving valuable property. In the past we have happily not required it; in the future there is every possibility that it would be of untold value.

Mr. Damude's safe came out of the ordeal very badly scorched, but papers and books were not destroyed.

Dundalk Again Singed.

About 4.30 Sunday morning last fire broke out in Dundalk in the harness shop of Mr. Douglas, Proton street, spreading to the Anglo-American hotel and Graham's store. The stock in the harness shop was wholly consumed. A portion of the hotel furniture was saved, as was also Graham's stock of dry goods and groceries, although the latter was damaged to a great extent. The newly formed hook and ladder company did good work in preventing a further spread of the flames. The loss is almost wholly covered by insurance in every case. Grahams loss, about $3,500, insured for full amount; Douglas' harness shop, $600 insurance, which covers loss; hotel, owned by John Connors, loss $3,000, partially insured. This creates another gaping void in the business quarter of Dundalk, but as the insurance companies will have to foot the bill it will probably be a blessing, rather than otherwise, to the place, resulting in larger and more handsome buildings being built upon the ruins.

It was another case of incendiarism.

Sleepless nights, made miserable by that terrible cough. Shiloh's is the Remedy for you.

Another batch of those nice cardinal wool mats, cheap, at the Flesherton woollen mills. Who will get first choice!

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

The tax collector is on the war path.

Mr. F. T. Carr, who has been in charge of a lath mill in Gravenhurst for the past summer, returned on Saturday. The invigorating air of the Muscoka lakes and rocks evidently agrees with him, as he is looking hale and hearty. His many friends welcome him back again.

I understand that Mr. Clemes, the school teacher, has been reengaged for the ensuing year.

Mr. Jas. Campbell met with a severe accident on Friday. He was engaged in boarding up the end of a building for Mr. Jas. Armstrong, and when near the top of the ladder the bottom of it slipped out and he fell to the ground, lighting on his knee, forcing the cap of the knee some inches out of its place. Dr. Carter attended to him on Saturday, and the patient is progressing favorably

Sewing machine needles of all kinds at Russell's Jewelry store, Flesherton.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

PREPARED BY

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1, six bottles, $5.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Teacher Wanted!

For U. S. S. No. 1, Artemesia and Euphrasia, holding a third class certificate, duties to commence 2nd of January. Apply to

JAMES STUART, Sec., Kimberley P. O.

BOAR FOR SERVICE.

MR. WM. CAMERON, Lot 35, Con 8, Artemesia.

has a thoroughbred Berkshire boar for service TERMS, one cash and $1 if booked

STRAYED.

Came to the premises of the undersigned about the 6th of September, 5 yearlings, red and white. Owner can have the same by proving property and paying expenses

JOHN TYSON, Feversham P. O.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 50	to $5 56
Fall Wheat	$1 00	to 1 03
Spring Wheat	1 00	1 03
Barley	0 45	0 55
Oats	0 31	0 32
Peas	0 57	0 57
Butter	0 17	0 18
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 00	6 40
Hay per ton	8 00	10 00
Hides	4 50	5 50
Wool	18	20
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 7	0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 06

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts, 2nd door North of Richardson & Co's.

Medical.

DR. CARTER,

M.C.P. & S., Ont.

PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.

FLESHERTON.

Office, Strain's block. Residence, J. G. Russell's

J. G. Hutton, M.D. C.M.

Member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Ontario.

Enquire at office, one door east of Grier's store or Atkinson's Hotel

Priceville, Nov. 29, 1888

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.

SURGEON DENTIST

Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the R.C.D.S.,

Will visit FLESHERTON, Monshaw's Hotel 1 and 2 of each month. Teeth extracted, inserted and filled in the highest styles of the art, and at moderate rates

HEAD OFFICE, 761 YONGE ST., TORONTO.

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST,

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.

Flesherton each trip on the day following.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office, Scarth's Building, FLESHERTON.

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER in B. R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent to purchase and sale of lands. Appraiser for C. L. C. Co. and F. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. ISSUER OF MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Town or Farm Property.

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton

W. J. BELLAMY

TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT, &c.

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance effected in first-class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any part of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavestroughing, and in fact everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts

—NEW—

FALL GOODS!

—AT THE—

Central Store,

Priceville.

Having received our Fall stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have confidence in a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well bought article.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and is now being sold cheap. Good and serviceable for Men and Boys in fact

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

are the best in the market. Our Motto is Good Goods and Low Prices. Come and see us.

Central Store, Priceville.

A. McCAIBE.

FLESHERTON

Implement

Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Reapers,	Grain Drills,
Mowers,	Broadcast Seeders,
Rakes,	Spring Tooth Harrows,
Forks,	Iron Harrows,
Waggons,	Two-Furrow Gang Ploughs,
Buggies,	Ploughs,
Sleighs,	Scufflers,
Cutters,	Turnip Drills,
Fanning Mills,	Land Rollers.
Spring Tooth Cultivators.

FLOUR, FLOUR,

STONE

FLOUR!

MR. P LOUCKS

Is prepared to do your Gristing on short notice and grinds on the old terms of every twelfth Bushel. Seven cents per bag of two bushels for Chopping done every day. The Little Mill is big in the estimation of the public.

Satisfaction Guaranteed.

P. LOUCKS, Proprietor.

Good stabling for horses.

NOTICE.

SHINGLES constantly on hand and for sale cheap. Just put in first class new Chopping Mill now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B. SLOAN,
Eugenia.

SALESMEN WANTED for the New England Nurseries, established over 30 years. The old reliable nursery. Men with push, energy good habits and clean character always succeed. We can give you good pay and steady work. Write for terms to CHASE BROTHERS' COMPANY, Nurserymen, Colborne, Ont.

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT and PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

EVER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on

EACH PLUG and PACKAGE

Monthly Fairs.

Orangeville—The second Thursday in each month.
Dundalk—Tuesday before Orangeville
Flesherton—Monday before Orangeville
Markdale—Saturday before Orangeville
Durham—Third Tuesday in each month
Chatsworth—Monday before Durham
Holland Centre—Saturday before Chatsworth.
Priceville—Monday before Durham
Hanover—Monday before Durham.

Buy a new

HARNESS

PURCHASE A

SLEIGH ROBE

INVEST IN

A new Whip

BIG DISCOUNT

—FOR—

C-A-S-H

D. Clayton

HARNESSMAKER,

FLESHERTON.

is prepared to give you large DSCOUNTS for CASH on all kinds of harness, whips, blankets, etc.

A

Huge Stock!

—OF—

SINGLE, TEAM, AND DRIVING HARNESS, on hand.

Sleigh Bells, Robes, Whips, Hoof Ointment, Axle Grease, Curry Combs, Brushes, and everything required in the line of harness makers' supplies.

WE ALSO DEAL IN

A SUPERIOR

QUALITY

—OF—

TRUNKS

CALL and EXAMINE our extra large stock before buying anything in these lines elsewhere.

D. CLAYTON

N. B.—My accounts are now ready and waiting for settlement. As I am in great need of money, all persons who are indebted to me are requested to call and settle, ON OR BEFORE DEC. 1st, otherwise their accounts will be placed in other hands for collection.

D. Clayton.

Singhampton.

To the Editor of The Advance.

SIR—Kindly allow me a short space in your valuable paper to correct a statement made in the Collingwood Enterprise of last week in regard to a number of young children being fined for talking and laughing outside of the Presbyterian Church of this place on the evening of Thanksgiving Day during service, by saying that their pas' and mas' are chasing Davy for his scalp. Now, Mr. Editor, this is false: they don't want his scalp as it might cost too much. Again, some of them were accused of keeping their children from Sunday School. Such is not the case, as the children refused to attend under the circumstances. We all know that Davy gets a number of pointers, and we know as well where they are coming from, but many thanks.

Not much news just now, but Joe is going to move in a few days to his new residence. We wish Joe and his family prosperity.

A large number of our village children are down with whooping cough, but by our skilful Dr., Hamilton, some of them are getting nicely over it.

Our little hamlet is getting a fast name, but it is principally owing to outsiders who very often disturb the peace. Wm. Milnie, Twp. Clerk of Osprey, is retireing, also Dr. Kerr, of Maxwell, and the Township Fathers proposed a send off in respect for them in the shape of an oyster supper, to be held in the village of McIntyre on the evening of Nov. 30th next. A very good time may be expected.

P. S.—I may here state that Davy should not be so fast at fining the children, as he has quite a number of them himself.

[The above came to hand too late for last issue.—ED. ADVANCE.

Feversham.

From our own Correspondent.

Dr. Scott is getting great call, and is giving good satisfaction. If success attends him in the future as it has in the past, he is destined to be a distinguished practitioner.

Mr. Thos. Henderson, of Toronto, paid his friends in this locality a short visit. He is looking well, and possesses features that tell of a joyous city life.

Mr. Sandy Hudson, who sold his farm to his brothers a few months ago, and until a few days ago was making great preparations for his removal to Michigan, now declares the sale null and void, alleged cause being the encroachment of female authority. But I guess the brothers backed out, because Sandy's farm is a little sandy.

Revival meetings will be held in Bethel church every night of the following week.

R. F. McCarr has become the possessor of a race driver of the name of Luke the Hunter.

Last Sunday night the S. A. barracks were crowded, some even standing, although the building is capable of seating between two and three hundred. Lieut. Dobson was there. She spoke well and delivered an intelligent address. But little Capt. Wright's patience was entirely exhausted by the flirtation of beardless youths and spinsters of not more than seventeen. Bad order and disturbance prevailed during the whole ceremony.

Mr. Geo. Holmes, of Toronto, is getting cattle spare timber very extensively.

JIM.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy: hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

Ayer's Pills,

PREPARED BY

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Sold by all Druggists.

XMAS, XMAS!

A

—CALL AT—

Russell's Noted Jewelery Store, Flesherton,

Will convince everyone that their stock of Ladies' and Gent's

GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, CLOCKS, CHAINS, BROOCHES, BARPINS, EARRINGS,

Silverware, Spectacles, Fancy Toilet Sets, Christmas Cards, Razors, Knives, etc.

Is the finest and cheapest in this section of the Country.

WE CAN AND WILL GIVE YOU

BARGAINS

A Ladies fine GOLD AMERICAN WATCH for $26.00 worth $33.00. Gents' fine GOLD from $35.00 to 50.00 worth from $40. to $00.

Big discount for cash

from NOW to 1st JAN. 1889 on all goods. Do not forget it: will pay you: and always take your watch and clock repairs to RUSSELL'S, Flesherton, for a perfect JOB.

It Pays To

GO TO THE BEST

AND THAT IS THE Northern

Business College,

OF OWEN SOUND.

[illegible]

McCULLOUGH

Valuable Farm

For Sale in the Township of Artemesia

[illegible]

in the Village of Flesherton,

Wednesday, the 5th Day of December, 1888,

[illegible]

TERMS: Ten per cent at the time of sale, balance in thirty days thereafter without interest.

[illegible]

W. J. HELLAWELL,
Vendor's Solicitor.

Dated, Nov. 12th, 1888.

Farm for Sale

[illegible] offers for sale that valuable [illegible] on the 1st Concession better known as [illegible] containing 95 acres. Well cleared and [illegible] under cultivation; the remainder pasture and [illegible]. New brick house, stone foundation, stabling, etc., new frame house, cellar, and stable [illegible]. This is a magnificent property [illegible] possession immediately. For terms, etc., apply

A. McKENZIE, Maxwell P. O.

Blacksmith Shop for Sale or Rent.

The blacksmith shop known as Adson's, on the 6th line, Artemesia, about ¾ miles from Flesherton, is offered for sale or to rent. For terms and particulars apply to

DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Eugenia P. O.

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

[illegible] can get your boots, feed, and [illegible]

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S.

[illegible]

TO THE FARMERS AND PUBLIC GENERALLY

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH:

[illegible]

The peoples faithful servant,

G. H. BLACKBURN.

Remember the [illegible] or to Mr. [illegible]

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,

PURVEYORS TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Dealers in fresh and cured meats, sausage our own make, lard, bologna, etc. etc.

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only $4 per hundred.

Call and ascertain prices, whether you buy or not.

New Hair Dressing Parlor.

Mr. W. J. NELSON, opened a new barber shop and bath

Moore's Block, Durham St.

is prepared to attend to [illegible] would invite patronage.

Hair cutting, shaving [illegible] all done in the highest style.

W. J. NELSON.

Came Astray.

Came to the premises of T. A. Gamey, lots 13 and 14, 2nd south of Durham Road, on Nov. 12, a small black mare. The owner is requested to prove property, pay expenses, and take it away.

T. A. GAMEY, Flesherton Station P. O.

THE ASHBOURNE ACT.

Hot Words Between Mr. Dillon and Lord Hartington.

LABOUCHERE AND TREVELYAN TALK.

A last (Wednesday) night's London cable gives the continuation of the debate previous to the taking of the vote on the Ashbourne Bill as follows: After Mr. Dillon had spoken last night on the motion to introduce the Bill, Major Saunderson held the floor for a while.

Lord Hartington said he thought Mr. Dillon's argument was not very cogent against the Bill, but was very cogent in favor of coercion, because he not only confessed, but boasted, that the value of land had been reduced from twenty to fifteen years' purchase by a combination which rendered it impossible for a tenant with safety to take a vacant farm.

Mr. Dillon denied that he used the words "with safety."

Lord Hartington retorted that nobody ever followed Mr. Dillon without receiving a contradiction.

Mr. Dillon hotly protested.

Lord Hartington, amid great excitement, resumed his speech. He said he had not intended to make any imputation, but Mr. Dillon insisted upon exactness in reproducing his arguments which it would be difficult to attain. He proceeded to argue that Mr. Dillon's language justified everything that the Government had been forced to do in order to uphold the law in Ireland. The land purchase and arrears questions were quite distinct. The rejection of the Bill would not facilitate fair dealing with arrears, the necessity for which he thought was much overrated. The Government never refused to deal with the arrears question. The delay arose from the difficulty in deciding as to how to deal with the subject. The Ashbourne Act had been a most successful experiment. Why abandon it now? The experience thus gained without loss would be invaluable when Parliament t embarked on a more ambitious scheme of land purchase.

Mr Morley made a spirited defence of Mr. Dillon against the remarks of Lord Hartington. He said that Mr. Dillon's character stood as high as that of any member of the House. As to the taking of vacant farms, which Mr. Dillon never denied, Mr. Dillon never spoke in favor of an [illegible] among the tenants, not to [illegible]. Mr. Morley fully supported Mr. Gladstone's contention that the arrears question was more urgent than the Ashbourne Bill, which, he said, ought to be postponed. The Government admitted the necessity of a settlement of the arrears question, and having a majority on both sides of the House they must be held responsible for not dealing with the question. (Cheers.) He denied that the Ashbourne Act had been such a success as Lord Hartington had asserted. Among other reasons in proof whereof he spoke, Mr. Morley said that only a sixth of the £3,000,000 used had been expended in the west of Ireland. He quoted articles from the Birmingham Gazette to show that the Chamberlain party considered that the extension of the Ashbourne Act would be as dangerous as Mr. Gladstone's scheme yet they preferred to support it rather than to injure the position of the Government, "and this," Mr. Morley exclaimed, "is the party that stumps the country, saying that a great moral gulf divides us!" (Cheers.) "Yes, it is a great gulf, and your morality lies at the bottom." (Renewed cheering.) The speaker said his position in reference to the land purchase scheme was unchanged, but he did not want to purchase land at any price. The Government professed to have prepared a comprehensive scheme, why not produce it? Depend upon it, he said, if they voted this five millions they would never see their scheme, but would vote for an indefinite postponement of the land settlement question, in addition to embarking on an unsound financial policy and delay in dealing with the arrears.

Mr. Smith, the Government leader, in defending the Government against the charge of a breach of faith, reminded the House that he, in July last, informed them that this Bill would be introduced in the autumn session.

The House then divided, Mr. Gladstone's amendment was rejected, 300 to 246. The motion to introduce the Bill was agreed to. The Unionists voted solidly with the Government. Two Gladstonians, Haldane and Grey, voted against the amendment, and two others abstained from voting.

LONDON, Nov. 21. In the House of Commons this afternoon Mr. Madden, Solicitor-General for Ireland, moved the second reading of the Irish Land Purchase Bill.

Mr. Labouchere moved that the Bill be rejected. He complained of the undue haste with which the measure was being pressed forward, and said there was an obvious desire on the part of the Government to prevent the country from considering their proposals on the question of land purchase. He denied that Parliament had obtained at the last election any authority to legislate upon this question, the immense importance of which requires the special sanction of the country. As the Bill stood it was a gross injustice upon the British taxpayer. Besides that, it was injurious to Ireland, as it would encourage a gigantic system of absenteeism. Until a Home Rule measure was carried nothing ought to be done toward land purchase.

Sir George Otto Trevelyan, Liberal, warned the House that if it assented to the Bill it would not be able to stop further grants and it would soon be called upon and compelled to advance millions. Among the dangers of the Ashbourne Act, not the least was that it committed the British taxpayer to a system of landlord purchase which gave no good security for advances and which left the tenant in a position to repudiate if bad years rendered him unable to pay his instalments.

On motion of Mr. Parnell, the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Gladstone leaves London on Saturday for Hawarden. He will not return to London during the present session of Parliament.

LONDON, Nov. 23.—In the House of Commons this evening Mr. Smith moved that the rule compelling adjournment at midnight be again suspended to enable the House to conclude the debate on the Irish Land Purchase Bill. Carried, 195 to 159.

On motion to go into committee on the Bill,

Mr. Parnell proposed an amendment giving the Government power to instruct the Land Commission to deal with arrears when fixing judicial rents. He urged that in view of the fact that it was agreed on all sides that the arrears question must necessarily be settled, it ought to be dealt with without delay in conjunction with the question of land purchase. This done, it would place the tenant in a position to contract freely with the landlord, protect the exchequer against loss, and give the Ashbourne Act the best possible chance to work with smoothness.

Mr. Smith contended that the course which Mr. Parnell proposed would place the tenant in a distinctly worse position than before, by recognizing arrears as a charge that might continue to hang around his neck even after completing his purchase. Now, after a contract for purchase had been agreed upon, the arrears became ipso facto wiped out.

Mr. Dillon held that the mischief of arrears occurred before the agreement for purchase was signed.

Mr Parnell's motion was rejected by 182 to 148.

THE WHITECHAPEL SCARE.

Jack the Ripper Writes a Saucy Letter—The Recent Scare.

A London cable says: The latest Whitechapel sensation has been sifted down to nothing but the mere ravings of a drunken woman after a row with her lover. The woman is even of a lower type than those who fell prey to the Whitechapel murderer. Her associates say that she is very quarrelsome, and that the man whom she accused of trying to cut her throat has been visiting her for a year. The people in the house heard them quarreling, and when the man ran down stairs and the woman came to the top of the landing and screamed, "He tried to cut my throat, follow him," three men gave chase, but the fellow got away easily enough. But the police know who the man is and where he lives. They have been watching his house all day, and when he gets over his fright and returns home they expect to get him. There is, however, not the slightest reason to suppose that he is the Whitechapel fiend. The police say that the woman inflicted the wound on her throat herself. The injury is very slight.

The most interesting incident of the day is another letter from Jack the Ripper, dated Portsmouth. Here it is:

"Dear Boss—It is no good for you to look for me in London, because I am not there. Don't trouble yourself about me this return which will not be very long. I like the work too well to leave it long. O, that was such a jolly job, the last one. I had plenty of time to do it properly. Ha! ha! The next bit I mean to do with a vengeance. I am going to cut off their heads and arms. You think it is a man with a black mackintosh. Ha! ha! When I have another one at catch me. So good bye, dear boss, till I return. Yours, "JACK THE RIPPER."

The letter is in the same hand as the one received just before Mary Kelly was murdered.

Investigations by the police show that the Whitechapel woman who reported this morning that she had been attacked by a man, who went to her lodging with her, is a prostitute of the lowest order. She suffered only a slight abrasion of the skin on her throat, and the police place no credit in her story of an attack. They believe she inflicted the injury herself while she was drunk.

A DREADFUL ACCIDENT.

Two Young Men Fatally Crushed by an Express.

A Montreal despatch says: A shocking double fatality took place at Dorval, fifteen miles from the city, on the Grand Trunk Railway, yesterday, by which two young men, Irish Noel and Philip Cassavant, met a horrible death. Both men, who were plasterers employed in the erection of the new station building at Dorval, were walking on the track in the vicinity of the station when two trains came along behind them, one the regular Toronto express and the other a gravel train, both bound west, but on different tracks. Seeing that the men made no attempt to get off the track, a crowd of laborers at the station shouted to warn them of their danger, but apparently owing to the noise of the trains they did not hear, and before either could leave the track the express rushed over them. Both bodies were terribly mangled, and death in each instance must have been instantaneous. The remains were gathered and brought to the morgue here, where an inquest will be held to-morrow.

THE "QUEENS OF THE ROAD."

Two Girl Horse Thieves Escape from a Kansas Jail.

A Hutchinson, Kan., despatch says: The two female horse thieves escaped from jail last night. The Sheriff of Hamilton County was in Newton, Kan., on other business, and had left the keys to the jail in a hotel. Some one got the keys, let the thieves out and then returned the keys. It is six weeks since these daring "Queens of the Road" earned extended notoriety by their bold attempt to steal a vehicle and team of horses. They had been stealing horses for a year, having run off with thirteen. The girls are of a dashing type, both blondes and handsome. Ida says she is the daughter of a Philadelphia minister, and Emma claims to be the daughter of a wholesale clothing dealer in Boston. They stood confinement in the little Western jail with an assumption of "don't care" which would have done honor to the most hardened frontier horse thief.

How He Got Ahead.

Editor Society Journal (to reporter)—Mr. Jinks, the directors have ordered me to raise your salary. You bring in more society scandal than all the other reporters put together.

Jinks—Thank you. The advance will be handed over to my wife. It is hers by right.

Editor—How so?

Jinks—She is secretary of the ladies' anti-gossip club.—Cartoon.

Capt. James Brooks, commander of the steamship Arizona, has crossed the Atlantic 601 times.

PARNELL AND CHURCHILL

Speak on the Irish Land Purchase Bill.

WHICH PASSES ITS SECOND READING

A last (Thursday) night's London cable says: The debate on the Land Purchase Bill was resumed in the Commons to night by Mr. Parnell. He declared emphatically that he opposed the Bill, as he believed that it was so designed that under the present circumstances it would be impossible to put it into effective operation. He had always held that the creation of a peasant proprietary was the only means of solving the land question. His own Bill simply asked that Church tenants be allowed to acquire land by paying the Church Commission annually for forty-nine years a rent equal to 4 per cent. on the capitalised value of the holdings. That would have created no risk to the Imperial Exchequer. The Conservatives opposed that proposal, but the time would come when they would find it needful to go further. The Irish party were always ready and eager to assist in a settlement of the land question. It was calumny to say that any one of the Irish members tried to make political capital out of the question or opposed the Bill because it would make the government of Ireland easier. (Cheers.) On the contrary, their opposition to the Bill was due to the knowledge that it would cause a loss to the Exchequer without effecting its ostensible object. The Government had not taken up the land question with a view to helping tenants, but at the solicitation of landlords, who, seeing that they could not any longer maintain their position, wanted to dispose of their property at inflated prices. (Hear, hear.) The Bill did not contain provisions enabling the State, when supplying money, to decide what tenancies it would be desirable to purchase in the public interest. The Government left the landlords to decide. Congested and rack-rented estates would not be touched under the Bill. The only way to make the landlords of congested estates agree to accept the value of their property was to empower the commission to purchase at such a price as would really represent the landlords' interests. Arrears ought to be considered along with the reduction. Otherwise the land purchase arrangements were futile. He would not like to predict that tenants might repudiate bargains made under the measure on the ground that advantage had been taken of their necessities, but the Bill would not assist that large and permanent settlement that was desirable. Any bargain with the farmers ought to have a basis that would put repudiation out of the question. (Hear, hear.) The measure showed an entire absence of consideration for the national sentiment. The present system of Government trampled upon the national feeling. If the Government meant to attempt a large scheme of land purchase it was essential to establish in Ireland representative authority to act as a buffer between the tenants and the State. The tenants would have their 85 and may be 101 members of Parliament. (Parnellite cheers.) Government would be as much dependent as now upon the Irish vote. No sane Government of self respecting character would tolerate the sending of tax collectors around the cottages with an army and a crowbar brigade to enforce payments. If the national sentiment was conciliated there would be nothing to fear from the influence upon the hot youth of the country of all the Fenian propagators from New York to San Francisco. It was those who exercised coercion that fomented disaffection far more than Ross. (Hear, hear.) This was not merely an agrarian question, it was knit up with national aspirations. If the Government meant well to tenants by the Bill he implored them to insert suitable provisions dealing with arrears the tenants' greatest difficulty. That done he could cordially appreciate the measure, and the Legislature would reap its reward in the conciliation of the people. (Cheers.)

Lord Randolph Churchill said that the assertion that the Bill was introduced to enable landlords to sell at inflated prices would not bear examination. The Parnellites know that inflation did not exist in Ireland, but very much the reverse. Regarding the national sentiment, he appealed to Mr. Parnell to say what room there was for romance in dealing with a matter of fact, the advance and repayment of money. (Hear, hear.) Had Mr. Parnell any alternative Bill? Would he support the principles of Mr. Gladstone's Bill of 1886? (Mr. Parnell here gave a negative shake of his head.) Then, what other scheme?

Mr. Parnell—I would accept the Bill if the disadvantages connected with it were modified by dealing with arrears.

Lord Randolph, continuing, said he trusted that after the recent speeches of the Ministers the Government would bring up the arrears question early in the future. In the meantime he could not admit that coercion militated against land purchase. (Cheers.) How could it impede free action on the part of either landlord or tenant? (Hear, hear.) As a financial operation the Bill certainly was not good enough. The security for advances was totally insufficient, but the risk might be worth incurring when limited to an advance of ten millions, which would not be tolerable under a larger scheme. It would never do to make the State the immediate landlord of the Irish tenantry. The present measure would not apply to more than 25,000 holdings. It was not likely to be a danger to the State, though probably it could not be safely extended. (Hear, hear.)

The Bill passed the second reading by a vote of 299 to 224.

Mr. Parnell has given notice that he will move that the Committee on the Ashbourne Bill be empowered to instruct the Land Commission to deal with arrears when fixing judicial rents.

Sir William Vernon Harcourt, in the course of the debate, criticized the Government's action, and in conclusion said he believed the Government would find when they had to render an account of these advances to the country that they had never made a proposal more damaging or disastrous to themselves.

The Radicals continued the debate, compelling Mr. Smith to carry a division by cloture.

TROUBLE AMONG THE IRISH.

Evidence Before the Commission as to the Cause the Kerry Outrages.

GETTING UP THE "TIMES" CASE.

Nationalist MPs to be Prosecuted. A Murder Verdict.

A London cable says: The examination of witnesses from County Kerry was continued at the sitting of the Parnell Commission yesterday.

Mr. Leonard, agent of the estates of the Earl of Kenmare, said the League was as active as ever. He thoroughly disagreed with the statement of Mr. Balfour, Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the League was a thing of the past. In his part of Kerry the fight that the League was making was at its hottest. The Plan of Campaign was all-powerful. Formerly a writ could be executed by the sheriff with the aid of four policemen, but now four hundred soldiers were required. The members of the League met every Sunday after attending mass to arrange the week's programme of rent resistance and intimidation. The resistance came from well-to-do people. Until the year 1881 the tenants had been friendly, but after the League was formed they scoffed at him and the landlord.

On cross-examination the witness admitted that in 1880 it was necessary to give tenants assistance, as some of them were blue with hunger. There were 2,000 tenants on the Kenmare estates. Two hundred of them, though very poor, had always tried to pay their rents. Since 1850 the Earl of Kenmare had expended £173,000 in the improvement of his estates. His bill for labor now amounts to £300 weekly. Only such rent was taken from poor tenants as they could afford to give. Witness did not seek to collect rent from persons blue with hunger, and the law was never enforced against tenants of that class.

The court adjourned.

The clerk of the commission handed to Edward Harrington a summons to pay a fine of £500 which the court had imposed upon him for contempt. Mr. Harrington states that he will not pay the fine and intends to question the right of the commission to enforce it.

A last (Wednesday) night's London cable says: At the meeting of the Parnell Commission to-day George Curtin gave the details of the murder of his father. After the murder the Curtin family were boycotted and their male servants were compelled to leave their service. On cross-examination, Curtin testified that he was a member of the League when it was first organized. His father was Vice-President of a branch. Witness had no reason to believe that the League was implicated in the crimes against his family. Various branches of the League had denounced the murder of his father.

Miss Fitzmaurice, another witness, deposed that in June, 1887, a letter signed by a man named Dowling, Secretary of a branch of the League, was received by her father, requesting him to attend a meeting. Her father did not go. After his the people's demeanor toward her father changed, and he obtained police protection. Witness gave in detail the facts in connection with the shooting of her father while he was on his way to attend the Listowel Fair in January. On cross-examination witness stated that her father and uncle had disagreed respecting the farm on which her father resided, and the people sided with her uncle. She knew the League had been suppressed in County Kerry.

Counsel for the Parnellites here read an article published in the Kerry Sentinel condemning the murder of Fitzmaurice, and regretting that the League had been suppressed, and that the beneficial effects which arose from the organization had been lost.

A last (Friday) night's London cable says: At the sitting of the Parnell Commission today Inspector of Police Huggins testified concerning outrages at Castle Island, county Kerry.

Sir Charles Russell objected to the witness giving evidence regarding matters beyond his personal knowledge.

Presiding Justice Hannen said he admitted the reports made by the police at times for what they were worth.

The witness, resuming, quoted from statistics which showed that from November, 1882, to September, 1887, 160 outrages were committed.

On cross-examination, the witness said he believed that armers' sons initiated the outrages in order to evade the payment of rent. He knew of twenty bogus outrages. He was not aware that men had connived to damage their own property in order to secure compensation from the Quarter Sessions. He did not think that all the outrages were due to secret societies. Some of them were the result of family quarrels or of private malice. He had connected the League with moonlighting, because prior to the existence of the League Kerry had been peaceful.

Mr. Reid, one of the counsel for the Parnellites, asked, "What is your ground for assuming this connection?"

Witness—At every meeting of the League landlords and bailiffs were denounced. As a consequence, both of these classes became unpopular, and nearly every man who has been murdered belonged to either one class or the other.

Mr. Lockwood, one of the Parnellites' counsel, then asked the witness how long he had been engaged in getting up a case for the Times.

Sir Henry James, one of the counsel for the Times, objected to the question, whereupon

Sir Charles Russell exclaimed warmly: "We charge and intend to prove that the whole executive authority, even including the resident magistrates, is engaged in getting up the Times case."

The witness then denied that the Times had employed him.

On re-direct examination by the prosecution, the witness stated that no case of bogus outrage had ever been returned by the police as a real outrage.

It is announced that Messrs. John O'Connor, Finucane, Sheehy, Mayne, Condon, Patrick O'Brien and Tanner, all members of the Irish Nationalist party in the House of Commons, will be prosecuted for intimidating renters of evicted farms.

In the House of Commons this evening Mr. Sexton asked whether it was true that seven Irish members were about to be prosecuted, and if so, whether there was any relation between the prosecution and the delay in the debate on the Irish estimates. If there was not, he asked if Mr. Smith, the Government leader, would give the assurance that the members would not be withdrawn from their Parliamentary duties until the estimates were settled.

Mr. Smith denied having any knowledge of the prosecution. He certainly desired the members to remain until the estimates were considered.

The Vatican has ordered the Bishop of Raphoe to recall Father McFadden, who is at present lecturing in London, to his parish duties.

A coroner's jury at Milton, County Cork, has rendered a verdict of wilful murder against Constable Swindel, who fatally stabbed Patrick Ahern during a conflict between the people and the police at that place.

Musical and Dramatic Notes.

Mr. Walter Lennox, jun., representing Mrs. Langtry, is in town making arrangements for that lady's appearance here.

Hoffman, the boy pianist, has recovered his health, but will not reappear in public for some time.

The expectation that Madame Adelina Patti will take the part of Juliette in the forthcoming performance of M. Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette," at the Grand Opera is causing a great stir in Paris. Twenty pounds is said to have been offered for an orchestra stall, and some enthusiasts have subscribed for the whole year in order to obtain the right to be present when Patti sings.

Sir Arthur Sullivan received a few days ago a letter from the Duke of Edinburgh who had, by request of the Sultan, sent several selections of Sir Arthur's operas for the Sultan's band. It appears that the Sultan was so pleased with the music that he asked the Duke of Edinburgh to acquaint Sir Arthur with the fact that he has been decorated with the Order of the Medjideh.

The Catholic News is authority for this little bit of personal history regarding Mary Anderson: "Notwithstanding her fatiguing evening's work and the comparatively late hour at which she is able to retire for rest she never fails to attend 7 o'clock mass every morning. She goes in dress plainer than a shop girl's, and can only be distinguished by the rapt earnestness of her devotion. How sweet and pure a lily in the dramatic garden of passion flowers!"

Eugene Oudin, leading tenor of the McCaull Company, is composing the score of a new opera. Those who have heard the numbers already finished are enthusiastic over the beauty and grace of the melodies and the skill and originality displayed in the setting of the ensembles and the orchestration.

The highest priced singer at the French Grand Opera is the baritone Lasalle. He gets $17,000 for an engagement of eight months. The contralto, Mme Richard comes next with $10,000. Escalais, tenor Melchisedec, baritone, Jean de Reske, tenor; Ed. de Reske, bass, and Mme. Escalais, soprano, follow in order. Mme. Mauri, the dancer, gets $8,000.

A curious paper by an English organist on "Melody in Speech" asserts that a cow moos in a perfect fifth and octave or tenth a dog barks in a fifth or fourth; a donkey brays in a perfect octave; a horse neighs in a descent on the chromatic scale. Each person has his fundamental key, in which he generally speaks, but which he often transposes in sympathy with other voices or when he is excited.

The little pianoforte "prodigy" Otto Hegner has been spending the last few months at his native town of Basle, diligently studying under Professor Hans Huber, with the object of increasing his repertory of classical music, which last season was somewhat restricted. Last week he gave a recital at Basle, and fairly astonished his fellow-townsmen. He is expected on this continent next year.

To Buy Canada.

A Detroit despatch says: An Indianapolis despatch to a sensational evening paper says an intimate friend of Gen Harrison says he, like all Presidents, will desire to do something that will give his Administration a prominent place in the history of his country, and he has reason to believe that one of his first official acts will be the negotiation for the annexation of Canada. The General believes the United States can and should receive Canada in this manner. His idea is that the territory can be annexed to the United States by assuming Canada's debt. If the territory cannot be assumed for that consideration Gen. Harrison would favor paying a considerable bonus. It is understood he has said privately that the surplus in the treasury could not be spent in a better manner than by buying Canada. He heartily approves such a move, and will so recommend in his first message to Congress.

She Fooled with Kerosene.

A special from Geneva, N. Y., tells the following story: Mrs. Carl Bardeck kindled a fire this morning. It did not burn fast enough and she poured kerosene oil on the flame. The result was an explosion which scattered the burning oil in every direction. The husband and three children, who were sleeping in an adjoining room, were awakened. Mr. Bardeck became so frightened that he mistook a window for the door and dashed through it, cutting himself in a horrible manner. The family were finally rescued after being terribly burned. The woman will die.

Lieut.-Col. Buller, commanding the 2nd Battalion Rifle Brigade, was fatally injured at Woolwich on the 8th inst. by stepping out of a railway carriage on the line instead of on to the platform. Col. Buller served with distinction in the Zulu and Egyptian wars.

Conjugal love cannot be preserved in family jars.

THERE is said to be kindred blood in the veins of Jefferson Davis and Gen. Harrison, the new President of the United States, resulting from numerous intermarriages between the Harrison and Davis families.

Miss Georgia Davenport, governess to the King of Spain, is a young Irish woman, hired to avoid offending any political party in Spain.

The Old Rocking-Chair.

My grandmother sat in the old rocking-chair
(But she was not my grandmother then),
And her pert little face was bewitchingly fair,
And she laughed a defiance to men!
Her sun-bonnet fluttered like bird on its string,
Her hair wandered free on the breeze,
And gayly, I ween, did my grandmother sing
Underneath those old gnarled apple-trees.

My grandfather rode through the white orchard [illegible]
And tethered his roan to a tree;
He'd a well-powdered wig on his silly young pate,
And high tasseled boots to his knee.
From the pink apple blossoms that over [illegible] hung
He brushed off the dew with his hat,
Till he came to the place where the rocking-chair swung
And my merry young grandmother sat.

The king-cup and daisy bloomed round in their pride,
And bees of their sweetness did [illegible]
[illegible] grandfather [illegible] and my grandmother sighed.
[illegible] the [illegible] with his whip,
[illegible] granny, she hummed her a charming song—
Faint heart never won [illegible] fair
He wooed, and he prayed, and before very long
[illegible] two in that old rocking-chair.
[illegible]

A HUSBAND TOO MANY.

The Story of Enoch Arden Re-Told With Variations.

A sort of Enoch Arden story with variations was related at the Central Police Station, Philadelphia, the other day. When the case of William Decker was called by Magistrate Pole, Mrs. Rachel Decker charged her husband with assault and battery, and said that he had worked but one week of the past year. The Magistrate asked William what he had to say, and the husband replied: "Her first husband came back last week, and my wife wants me out of the way so that she can live with him."

Mrs. Decker colored up at this and said: "It is true that my former husband is in the city, but when I married Decker ten years ago I thought my husband was dead. His mother died a short time ago, and I engaged a lawyer to secure some money left by her. Through mention of the matter in the newspapers my first husband returned. He came to my house last Friday under the influence of liquor, and quarreled with Decker, who was also intoxicated. If I had not interfered blood would have been spilled. My first husband's name is William Toner, and I would prefer to take him back if I must live with one of the two, for he treated me better than Decker has." She further stated that she had two children by each husband, and that her first husband is now supporting the children. Decker was held in $600 bail for Court.

Horses for Military Use.

A London correspondent, in a chatty letter upon European military matters, writes: "Several times in the spring I ventured to urge upon Canadian farmers the advisability of breeding horses fit for English military use. I have this week ascertained another reason why they should do so. Some military men were of opinion that we could get what we wanted at the Cape of Good Hope, and some months ago an army veterinary surgeon was sent to South Africa to report on the supply of horses available. It is the old story of the snakes in Ireland. There are none. Mr. Nunn says the Cape horses have deteriorated since the days in which India generally drew her supplies thence. The Suez Canal has diminished the contact with the Cape and farmers have stopped breeding, so that Cape horses do not run over fifty-eight to fifty-nine inches at the shoulder, are deficient in bone, narrow chested, pinned in at the elbows, badly developed, with split-up muscles in croup and thighs, and with crooked hind legs—in a word, 'good before but bad behind the saddle.' On the other hand, they are good-tempered and quiet, can live on what they pick up or a little oat cake, and can do long journeys on very bad roads in the hottest weather without showing signs of 'service.' In Basuto Land the animals are a little better, but they are only cobs, and yet they can cover 60 to 80 miles a day, carrying 180 to 196 lbs. So we cannot look to the Cape for horses for other than mounted infantry work, and the field is therefore all the more open for American breeders. I have on previous occasions said so much in detail of what our army requirements are, that it is needless to again occupy space with it." The Times has repeatedly pointed out the advantages to Canadian farmers and others in breeding horses for military purposes in foreign countries. Canada can become the source of supply if the farmers give it proper attention and breed their strong general purpose mares to thoroughbred horses.

Annie S. Swan on Niagara.

The authoress of "Aldersyde," Annie S. Swan, who has been staying in Hamilton for some time, in a letter in the Christian Leader, gives a description of her visit to Niagara Falls, which concludes as follows: "I was left to be lulled to sleep by that wild lullaby which for ages has thundered through the night. It did not disturb my slumber, and by sunrise I was up and watching the sun gleams and the rainbows making beauty amid the terrors of that awful torrent. It grows upon one, the majesty and grandeur seem to sink yet deeper into one's being. There is no monotony. I cannot imagine that familiarity with the sight could ever lessen the sense of awe. And yet perhaps it would. I have a feeling now that the memory of that great torrent rushing madly in its rocky bed, and the music of its roar as it gathered itself for the final leap, will remain with me while I live."

A Good Reason.

Mistress—Why, Nora, how dusty the chairs are!

Maid—Yes, mim, there's nobody sat on them to-day, mim.

At a Boston hotel the head waiter came out of the office and informed the learned and cultured clerk that a man was raising a disturbance because he could not have his accustomed seat at the table. "Go in again," said the Browning saturated clerk, "and propitiate him in some way. I leave it to you." Back went the waiter to the dissatisfied boarder and said: "If you don't like the way things is done here, you can get right out, or I'll propitiate you pretty quick."

INCIDENTS OF A MEMORABLE SIEGE.

Weighty Significance and Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy—"And Shall Keep Thee in on Every Side"—Date of Cessation of Jewish Sacrifices.

And when he was come near he beheld the city and wept over it. * * * For the days shall come upon thee that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee, and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another, because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation.—Luke xix. 41-44.

It was but a generation till all this was fulfilled to the letter, and it is known to-day from the page of history what horrors those were over which the Saviour wept as He foresaw them at that hour. Not to dwell upon the fearful story of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman army under Titus, son of Vespasian, in A. D. 70, let a sentence or two from a writer of to-day suffice.

"At last Titus drew a line of circumvallation round the doomed city, and began to crucify all the deserters who fled to him. The incidents of the famine which then fell upon the besieged city are among the most horrible in human literature. The corpses bred a pestilence. Whole houses were filled with unburied families of the dead. Mothers slew and devoured their own children. Hunger, rage, despair and madness seized the city. For the first time for five centuries, on July 17th, A. D. 70, the daily sacrifices of the temple ceased for want of priests to offer them. Disease and slaughter ruthlessly accomplished their work. At last, amid shrieks and flames, and suicide and massacre the temple was taken and reduced to ashes. The great altar of sacrifice was heaped with the slain. The courts of the temple swam deep in blood. Six thousand miserable women and children sank with a wild cry of terror amid the blazing ruins of the cloisters. Romans adored the insignia of their legions on the place where [illegible] had stood."

This was what sin had brought upon that city which was once "the joy of the whole earth." This was the vision of Jerusalem which led the Lord, as He beheld the city, to weep over it. And again, on the way to Calvary: "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and for your children."—Luke xxiii. 28-31. This passage is understood to have reference also to the second advent.

Mrs. Gordon-Baillie's Lovesongs.

The notorious Mrs. "Gordon-Baillie," now undergoing a sentence of five years penal servitude for swindling hundreds of British shopkeepers, is not unknown in the theatrical and literary world, says a contemporary. Her real husband is a young actor, Mr. Knight Aston, once well-known as an operatic tenor who played some years ago in "La Perichole" and other operas by Offenbach, with Miss Selina Dolaro, at the Royalty Theatre, London. Under the nom de plume of "Ayrd Whyte," this versatile woman has written passionate love poems for magazines, and was at one time very anxious to obtain the valuable acting rights of several popular comedies and dramas with the obligation of paying the authors for the use of their property. But even adventuresses are fallible, for Mrs. "Gordon-Baillie," possibly for the first time in her career met her match in a well-known dramatic publisher, who having momentarily secured some deposit money under a contract which the lady was anxious to rescind, was clever enough to retain the same, much to the chagrin of the pseudo-manageress. One of Mrs. "Ayrd Whyte's" love songs is singularly prophetic of her varied career. It is called "Aujourd'hui," and contrasts the present with the past, yesterday with to-day:

Cold blows [illegible] wind across the mountain,
Faded are [illegible] by the [illegible]
No kiss [illegible] all silent [illegible] fountain
[illegible] 'Tis to-day.

Where "My Lord" Caused Trouble.

A worthy Canadian professor of Trinity College, Toronto, following the custom of his country, fell into an awkward mistake at the Church Congress last evening by applying the title "lordship" to Bishop Coxe who, at the close of the professor's remarks, humorously declined the honor of a title which has no existence under our republican form of government. The bishop at the same time told a story of how an American, though in a contrary kind of way, landed himself in a little difficulty in the Dominion. "A citizen of our own fair city," said the bishop, "was summoned to a court somewhere on the other side of Niagara river, and he persisted in calling the judge, who was a distinguished jurist, 'Sir,' 'Sir,' 'Sir,' whereupon the lawyer who had employed him as a witness, cautioned him to be careful and say 'my lord.' In desperation the witness exclaimed: 'I can't say my lord, Mr. Judge. I can't talk like you Britishers.'"

Christmas Weather Proverbs.

A warm Christmas, a cold Easter.

A light Christmas, a heavy sheaf.

A green Christmas, a white Easter.

A green Christmas makes a fat graveyard.

A wind on Xmas day, trees will bring much fruit.

If Christmas finds a bridge, he'll break it; if he finds none, he'll make one.

If ice will bear a man before Christmas it will not bear a man afterward.

The shepherd would rather see his wife enter the stable on Christmas day than the sun.

If the sun shines through the apple-tree on Christmas day there will be an abundant crop the following year.

And Papa Said Never a Word.

Father—Johnnie, you must go to bed now.

Johnnie—I don't want to, papa.

Father—But you must, my son. Early to bed and early to rise makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise, you know.

Johnnie (sagaciously)—You didn't go to bed early when you was a little boy, did you, papa?

They say of Colonel Dupree, of Georgia, that during the late canvass he went up to a perspiring farmer, who was plowing with a stubborn ox, and offered to take his place while the plowman went for water. The offer was more than accepted, for the farmer stayed at the house till dinner, and the candidate plowed three hours under the hottest sun of the season.

A COFFIN FOR THE LIVING.

The Strange Caper of an Intoxicated Cincinnati Father.

A very peculiar case developed yesterday afternoon in Columbia, the east end suburb. About 1 o'clock a well-dressed man appeared at Watkins' undertaking establishment. He seemed excited and grief stricken and, in fact, exhibited all the semblance of woe natural in a man who had suffered death in his family. His name he gave as Edward Green, and explained between sobs that his little 5-year-old boy had just died with the diphtheria. Green ordered a hearse, carriage and a neat coffin. The tearful father left, and Watkins proceeded to fill the order with dispatch, as owing to the contagious character of the disease, the afflicted father had decided to have the funeral with [illegible]. The little cortege was soon on its way to the stricken house, which is on Eastern avenue, near Crawfish road. The undertaker reached the dwelling, and was a little surprised to find it bore no signs of death. [illegible] [illegible]

From the Bench to the Gutter.

The Chicago [illegible] says: The shadows of the evening were lengthening, and lights from the street lamps and the dingier shop windows were beginning to illumine the rough and broken sidewalks and dispel the gloom of the street, when an old man, clad in little else than rags, and tottering with the infirmities of age, entered one of the lowest of the many drinking houses on South Desplaines street, at the corner of Schiller. He entered by the side door very quietly, with the evident intention of being left unnoticed. And so it was. The bartender hardly glanced up from his seat behind the counter, and the old man tripped into a chair near the battered stove in the corner. He sat quite still for several minutes, with his head inclined forward, chin resting upon his breast. Then his hands dropped listlessly to his sides, the muscles of his limbs relaxed, his body slipped downward on one side, fell in a heap to the floor, and Wm. W. Drummond, who once wore the judicial ermine of the United States and was recognized as one of the eminent jurists of his time, was dead in a barrel house, the resort of the lowest of the low characters of a great city, dead among people with whom he lived for years yet [illegible] had once been a Chief Justice in the United States.

She Welcomed the Burglar.

Early this morning a [illegible] entered the residence of [illegible] [illegible] Armstrong [illegible] his two daughters sleep. Miss Hattie Armstrong was awakened by hearing a heavy footfall, and [illegible] the burglar threw a wrap over her head, with the threat, "Keep quiet or I'll shoot you!" Miss Sadie, her sister, seizing a poker struck the intruder on the head, the blow sending him reeling downstairs. He escaped through the window. [illegible]

The Grey Nuns.

The Grey Nuns were founded as a religious order in Canada about a hundred and fifty years ago, the mother house being in Montreal. La Minerve of Thursday contains an interesting account of the progress of this order, from which it appears that it now numbers in the Dominion 1,301 persons, namely, 1,080 professed nuns, 141 novices, and 80 postulants. They have 102 establishments in different parts of the country, spread over twenty-three Roman Catholic dioceses.

The First Kiss in the Honeymoon.

Anxious mother—Why, my daughter in tears! What has happened?

Married daughter—I—got mad at Arthur this morning and said a lot of mean things, and then he said lot of meaner ones and boo hoo! I couldn't think of anything mean enough to say back, boo hoo!

Custom Work.

"Ah, darling," he murmured, rapturously, as he entangled his arm about her necks, "you couldn't be nicer if you had been made to order."

Then the girl disentangled his arm, and rising to her full height, said in a low, it can never be done [illegible]

"Benjamin Harrison Worthington, [illegible] since E. Bird is no hand-me-down girl."

Too Sensitive.

[illegible]—I'm afraid, deacon, that we'll have to notify our pastor that his resignation would be accepted if tendered. The Deacon—Why? Don't you think he is an able and faithful expounder of the word? [illegible]—I'm! Well, he may be all that, but then you know a cultured congregation like ours may be willing to believe things, but don't like to hear them mentioned.

The Ruling Passion.

Child (to its father, a judge, deep in his papers)—Oh, papa, my pussy stole a cracker!

Judge—Ten days.

Annie Pixley does a whistling solo.

There is one woman journalist, and only one, reporting the proceedings of the Parnell Commission at the London law courts. She is said to be none other than Mme Venturi, the well known friend of Mazzini. She holds the seat allotted to an Irish newspaper and corresponds with some continental journals.

TOOTHMARKS IN AN APPLE.

A Slight Clue That Led to the Speedy Arrest of a Georgia Burglar.

The Telegraph's Hazelhurst correspondent made mention yesterday of the arrest and committal of a negro named Chandler Jones for burglarizing the store of J. L. Milton at that place on the night of the 15th. Jones was bound over in the sum of $1,000. The circumstances of his detection are peculiar, and the work was done by Detective E. A. Wilson, of Shackelford's agency at Macon. When he arrived at Hazelhurst he made an examination of the store and found that the [illegible] had been [illegible] by the insertion of a [illegible] between the [illegible] and [illegible] forcing the bolt into the [illegible]. He then [illegible] an examination [illegible] the way of a [illegible] apple [illegible] which [illegible] had [illegible] teeth. His detective instinct [illegible] he examined this apple [illegible] to the marks that were [illegible]. He saw the two front teeth of the [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] that he was [illegible] to offer no resistance, and submitted to the handcuffs. He was wearing a suit of clothes stolen from Mr. Milton, and a fine watch [illegible] from Mr. Milton. After [illegible] the detective found where he was stopping, and [illegible] a valise with a number of [illegible] goods and in the valise were the [illegible] attached to the clothing and on which were Mr. Milton's cost and selling marks.

And thus another [illegible] downfall [illegible]

Sprinting.

[illegible] says: The [illegible] question as to who was the [illegible] champion professional sprinter of this country was definitely settled at St. Louis on October 21st, with the first meeting of the Professional Athletic Association of America was held. Harry Bethune, of Cornwall, Ont., who has been generally considered the fastest sprinter in the country won the title of champion by winning the 75 yard dash [illegible] and the 100 yard dash in [illegible]. This is not the best that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Ont. May [illegible] 1862. He [illegible] [illegible] inches. He began as an amateur some five years ago in Canada, winning the 100 and 220 yard championships. His first appearance as a professional was in 1885, when he won a 150 yard handicap in Philadelphia from the [illegible] mark. Since that he has [illegible] races in every part of the country, and when he so wished has always won.

He Loved Her Very Still.

"And do you really love me, Ned, [illegible] now as you did when we were first married?" asked the fond wife of her busy husband, tenderly putting her arms around his neck.

"Yes, Mary, I do," was his soul-satisfying reply. "Now, hang you, keep still!"

Wine, Women and Song.

But the greatest of these is women. "Wine is a mocker," and song is good to soothe the savage, but women respond to every action, power and sentiment of the human mind when in good health. But [illegible] afflicted with disease [illegible] tantalizing, coquettish, cross, and hard to please. For all "female complaints," sick headache, irregularities, nervousness, prolapsus and other displacements popularly known as "female weakness," and other diseases peculiar to the sex, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the great world-famed remedy.

[illegible] line of John Boyle O'Reilly's poem on Crispus Attucks," says the Boston [illegible] is likely to live in popular memory. For years to come the orator, [illegible] and [illegible] will repeat the grand truth: 'The Tory is always a traitor [illegible]'

A Wise Husband.

[illegible] on the [illegible] extravagant [illegible]

[illegible] You seem [illegible] how [illegible] save [illegible]

Don't Read This for $500.

For many years, through nearly every newspaper in the land the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are thoroughly responsible, financially, as any one can easily ascertain by proper inquiry, have offered, in good faith, a standing reward of $500 for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure.

A Birmingham, Ala., man made a clock which he intended as a present for a friend. He set it running and it went all right for awhile and suddenly stopped. It was afterwards ascertained that the person for whom it was intended had died at the very time indicated by the clock. It has been set going frequently afterward, but always stops at the same hour.

WHO SLEW ALL THESE?

A Humorous Choir Boy's Ready Response.

A London correspondent, who vouches that he was present, sent the following from Reading: In one of the suburban churches there is a humorous choir boy, the avowed enemy of a severe curate. On Sunday evening the latter gentleman took for his text the words, "Who slew all these?" His enemy, the choir boy, was unable to resist the temptation, and in a voice audible in the remotest part of the church, replied: "Jack the Ripper." Thereon the [illegible] left [illegible] box, took the boy by the ear and led him into the vestry.

Love in a Cottage.

"Charley," said Mrs. [illegible] Jane, "I notice that your [illegible] seem to be [illegible] over with happiness. I am glad [illegible] tell me [illegible] what has [illegible] as he [illegible] a [illegible] for a while I was [illegible] had no appetite [illegible] but the use of [illegible] Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery [illegible] out and [illegible] a new man [illegible] there [illegible] store."

[illegible]

[illegible] for 50 cents.

[illegible]

[illegible]—What [illegible] breakfast this morning? [illegible] the [illegible] before [illegible] a cup of [illegible] and a [illegible] of water.

A Single T[illegible]

[illegible] that is needed to [illegible] that [illegible] is the most [illegible] and certain remedy in the world [illegible] costs 10 cents for a trial bottle. A single trial bottle will prove [illegible] to be [illegible] as an external or internal remedy for pain of every description [illegible] equal. Try a 10 cent sample bottle. [illegible]

Avoid substitutes.

—The season of A[illegible] began this year Dec. 2nd.

A woman [illegible] Broadway has the monopoly of all the [illegible] [illegible] So [illegible] boards [illegible]

MARVELOUS

MEMORY

DISCOVERY.

Wholly unlike artificial systems.

Any book learned in one reading.

Classes of 1,087 at [illegible] 1,005 at [illegible] 1,216 at Boston, large classes of Columbia Law students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] N.Y. State Normal College, [illegible]

PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

MERCHANTS, BUTCHERS AND TRADERS generally

we want a good MAN in your locality to pick up

CALF SKINS

[illegible] Cash Furnished [illegible] Address [illegible] [illegible]

FOR SALE.

[illegible] Boiler and Riley Automatic [illegible] 10-horse Power Engine.

WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR

TIMES PRINTING CO.

[illegible]

[illegible]

BAKING POWDER

THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

Cross-Cut Saws!

Cross-Cut Saws!

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having nve gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined siller steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you Another line I would particularly call your attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

Stayner has a bran new mechanics' institute.

One of the Shelburne papers claims that the Pickering News is the best local paper published in Ontario But then the Beeton World comes in competition with Shelburne, you know.

A serious accident happened to a child of Mr. Plumerfelt, of Sydenham, last week. The three children—two boys, aged respectively seven and four years, and a girl two years—were alone in the house, when the eldest, in handling a gun which was supposed to be unloaded, accidently discharged it and some 40 shots entered the body of the brother. The child is in a very critical state.

Thornbury Standard :- Our old friend Mr. Kay, who now lives in Manitoulin Island, sends us a report stating that the skeleton of a man has lately been discovered near the north shore of the Island, which when put together measures 12 feet 3½ inches. If correct, and we cannot doubt the veracity of Mr. Kay, this skeleton must be the largest ever discovered. It is also stated that the skull much resembles that of an Indian, but seems to have been from a man more intelligent than the average stamp.

Shelburne Echomist :- Last Sunday morning a heavy freight train from the north was proceeding down the grade into Orangeville yard when the men lost control of it and it ran into a siding on which a number of cars were standing. When the collision occured the train was moving at the rate of about fifty miles an hour. The fireman had three fingers taken off in some manner while he was in the act of jumping, while the driver sustained only a slight injury to one foot. The locomotive and a number of cars were completely wrecked. The loss is estimated at fully $50,000.

Dufferin Advertiser :-On Thursday last while a young son of John Leighton, of Mono, was amusing himself, in company with a couple of other boys, with a revolver, the weapon was discharged and the ball entered the abdomen of young Leighton. Dr. Henry of this place was sent for, and some time was spent probing for the bullet. The Dr. could not find the ball in the young man, and he abandoned the search. It became necessary to remove the boots from the feet of the young lad, and while this was being done the bullet dropped from one of them. In penetrating the body of the boy the ball had been diverted in its course and had sprung out of the hole it had made in entering his body. He will recover.

Hanover Post :- A case is reported from Owen Sound which requires looking into. About a year ago a German resident of north east Bentinck named George Schuerman went bail for the appearance at the Assizes of two young men who had got into a scrape. When the Assizes came on, the young men skipped out and left Mr Schuerman in the lurch. He is now in jail awaiting his trial, what for dear only knows, unless it is to make him pay the bond. It is a poor place to make money in jail The Crown is aware of it. He is a poor man with a large family depending upon him It is said there is nothing bad about him and that he is a good neighbor. His case is looked upon by the community as a great hardship Dr. Landerkin has been asked to intercede for Mr Schuerman and he has promptly set to work to find out the particulars of the case with the view to his release.

There are some very vicious pugs around Chesley. There are also some very courageous men in the same vicinity A Mr. Ramage bought three of those fighting swine, and the Enterprise tells the sequel: The pugs were, after a good deal of trouble, landed in Chesley, but before they could be put into the pen broke away and went home again. The next day they were brought back again and shut up, but the same night broke out and again went home. It required a small army to fetch them to town the third time. They were penned up and the doors barricaded, but when an attempt was made to kill one of them they made a combined attack on the butcher, and he had to climb up the wall of the pen to escape being torn in pieces. He clung to his narrow perch in terror until his assistant borrowed a rifle and came to his relief. Two of them were killed, but the third one still remains and there isn't a man round town dare enter the pen. For vicious hogs commend us to Sandy Blue.

A large Assortment

OF

M'en's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

—AT—

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Fulled Stockings, Overshoes, and Rubbers. Mens' and Boys' Long Boots, At prices to suit the times.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,

FLESHERTON.

A Positive Cure. ✢ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes in recently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wines in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. "If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

A Permanent Cure. ✢ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equa

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London,

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO 339. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, DEC ..78 1888. W. H. THURSTON.

XMAS, XMAS!

—CALL AT—

Russell's Noted Jewelery Store, Flesherton,

GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, CLOCKS, CHAINS, BROOCHES, BARPINS, EARRINGS.

Cards, Razor Knives, etc. is the finest and cheapest in this sect Country.

WE CAN AND WILL GIVE YOU

BARGAINS

A Ladies fine GOLD AMERICAN WATCH for $26.00 worth $33 00. Gents' fine GOLD from $35,00 to 50.00 worth from $40. to $60.

Big discount for cash from NOW to 1st JAN. 1889 on all goods. Do not fail to call: it will pay you; and always take your watch and clock repairs to RUSSELL'S, Flesherton, for a perfect JOB.

—CALL AT—

RICHARDSON'S Drug Store

AND SEE HIS STOCK OF GOODS SUITABLE FOR

Xmas and New Year's

PRESENTS

BEFORE YOU PURCHASE ELSEWHERE. HE HAS THE

LARGEST ASSORTEMENT IN TOWN,

BOTH—

Useful and Ornamental.

Albums. Satchels, Purses, Cards, Books, Toys, Sweets, etc.

OVER 500 LBS. OF SWEETS JUST IN.

A merry Christmas

and a Happy New Year to ALL.

Wm. RICHARDSON.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Artemesia Council will meet at Natal

Mr Dunnde is still in the fight. See adv.

The farm which was sold by public au sold for Mr. James

R. T. of T. Entertainment.

Baptist Chapel Concert.

New Livery.

Mr. W. P. Crossley has decided to go into the livery business. He will have two hacks, one at the station and one at Chantilla.

Shiloh's catarrh remedy—a positive cure for catarrh, diphtheria and canker.

Mr W. Taylor has rented the Mansfield house. He will go into the [illegible] with Mr. Sutherland. Possession to be given Mr. Newcomb Sept.

Concert.

A concert will be held in the school house, Flesherton Station, on Friday, Dec 14, when a choice program of recitations, recitations, songs, etc. etc. will be given. Admission 15 cents, 25c per couple.

Dr Sinclair, the specialist, will be at Munshaw's hotel on Wednesday, Dec 19. Dr Sinclair is a regular practitioner whose health will not permit the confinement of ordinary practice. He is well and favorably known in Flesherton. Don't forget the date.

Busy Death.

Death has been busy around our midst. On Tuesday Mrs. Russell, wife of Flesherton's well-known jeweler, was taken suddenly ill and died on Thursday afternoon. The funeral took place on Friday, and the corpse was followed to the grave by a large number of friends and sympathisers. The R. T. of T. turned out in force, deceased being a member of that body. Rev Mr Shilton officiated and the Royal Templars also read their beautiful burial service at the place of interment. Mr. Russell has deep sympathy from the whole community in his severe bereavement. The deceased lady was a general favorite, and her genial smile and kindly disposition will be greatly missed by her many friends.

Rev. Mr. Shilton preached the memorial service on Sabbath evening to an extraordinary large congregation.

DEAFNESS CURED. A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the Head. How they may be cured at your home, Post free 3d. Address Dr. Nicholson, 40, St John Street, Montreal.

Changing Their Resting Place.

Mrs. W. [illegible] Mrs. W. [illegible]

One year last [illegible] was taken ill with [illegible] and was carried to St. Louis. It was in the [illegible] Flesherton to have [illegible]

Mr. [illegible] Mr. A. [illegible] Mr. [illegible] assisted in removing Mr. Wright's remains to Mr. Crossley's, [illegible] deceased's many years ago.

Flesherton Cheese Factory.

The closing meeting of the [illegible] was held [illegible] for the purpose of winding up the past season's business, and as the proceeds of the last sale were to be distributed, and the cost in connection with [illegible] Ontario Act, it was necessary [illegible] for these was a large attendance of patrons. The following statement was given by the secretary. The total milk received at the factory was 1,306,966 lbs. from which 131,641 lbs. of cheese were made, and 105,440 lbs. of cheese. This was sold for $13,191.61, [illegible] average [illegible] cheese.

The disbursements were as follows: Making cheese, $1,320.50; dairy milk, $963.46; president, $20.00; secretary, $20.00; sundries, $17.35; cash to patrons, $[illegible] cheese to patrons, $228.18; total, $3,492.61.

The costs of the above mentioned Jaw suit, which were $550.00, was provided for by those who were patrons of the factory in 1886, according to the amount of milk sent in by each of them that year. Those of them who were present at the meeting paid their several shares without a murmur.

The following were elected officers for the following year: George Stewart, president; William Wilcox, vice president; James Brodie, secretary; W. Wright, J. Teeter, D. Thompson, J. Cullins, A. Stewart, T. Wright, J. Fenwick, R. Oliver and R. Akitt, directors; W. Wilcox and J. Wright, auditors.

Why You Feel

"The Life of the Body."

Blood and Blood Medicine.

Spring and Family Medicine

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

SACRIFICE SALE

TILL JAN. 1st, 1889.

WATCHES and CLOCKS

SILVERWARE MUSICAL GOODS

JEWELRY, SPEX, ETC.

CLOSE COMPETITION PRICES.

It will pay you to [illegible] can find a large stock to [illegible] from at cut prices.

CALL THIS MONTH

If you [illegible] buy

AND

Test This Statement!

that I have a very fine stock of

Bed Rock Prices!

Discounts [illegible] Parties [illegible] patronage receives [illegible]

JEWELER [illegible]

MARKDALE, ONT.

The Tongue.

"The lo[illegible] and weak,
Can crush and kill," declared the Greek

"The tongue destroys a greater horde,"
The Turk asserts, "than does the sword."

The Persian pr[illegible]blem wisely saith
"A lengthy tongue [illegible] an early death

Or sometimes take this form instead,
"Don't let your tongue cut off your head."

"The tongue can speak a word whose [illegible]ed
Says the Chinese, "outstrips the steed."

While Arab sages this impart,
"The tongue's great storehouse is the heart."

From Hebrew wit the maxim sprung,
"Though feet should slip, ne'er let the tongue."

The sacred writer crowns the whole,
"Who keeps his tongue doth keep his soul."

BELINDA: A BEAUTY

"Ready?" repeats Roger Temple gravely. Wonderfully has his blood cooled, amazingly has reason reasserted herself, under the shock of the girl's audacity. "You are asking me you know not what, Belinda, but the fault is mine, wholly mine. We will, as you say, stoop to no treachery of soft words. I will speak openly to Rose to-night, and ——"

"And whatever Rose answers, whatever you may work upon Rose to answer, mind, I have done with you!" cries Belinda, in a voice of concentrated passion. "You think you know me because you have amused yourself by flirting with me for a half dozen days, sir, because you have played a few scenes of moonshine love on a balcony, and won me to say what I said to you this afternoon. But you know me no more than the first stranger who meets me in the street. What! You think I would sink so low as to marry you—Rosie's lover?"

"You stooped so low, I thought, as to like me a little," is Roger's reply. "But you are ashamed already, small wonder. God knows of your folly!"

For a second or two Belinda is dumb. "If I lived fifty more years," she breaks forth then, "if I lived to be an old, old woman, I should never be ashamed of what you call 'my folly.' Never. If if such a feeling were shameful, how could it have come into my heart? I never tried, I never wanted to like you. I knew nothing at all about it till I woke up to-day, and then it was too late to go back."

"Too late, indeed," repeats Roger.

"Well, I can't help what I feel any more than I can help breathing, but my actions—those are my own. And to think that I would take you by stealth, dishonestly take you from Rose, —, who wouldn't do a sneaking thing to save my life!"

"Belinda, I ——"

"I don't pretend to be good or virtuous, you see, for I've been so kicked about here and there, and have seen so much and heard so much, that I don't rightly know what virtue is. But whatever game I play, I play it fair. You have promised to marry Rose, and you must marry her, by heaven! Whether you love her or not, you should love your own honor too well to think of change now."

"You read me a sharp lesson," says Roger Temple. "You make me see my own conduct in a fearfully clear light, Belinda."

"Yours! You have not been to blame at all," cries the girl, womanlike in this, that she would sooner guilt rested with them than blame with the man she loves. "You meant only to be kind to me at first for Rosie's sake. How could you guess I was going to make such a miserable fool of myself?"

Her voice quivers, breaks down; she covers her face between her hands, and once more Roger's arm, unresisted, holds her close. The embrace lasts for a minute's space or more and Roger is the first to speak.

"Before we go on our way again, before we go back to our path and duty, I want you to say just one word, child—that you forgive me."

"I have nothing to forgive. If I could choose, I would live the time over again, since I have known you yes, up to this very minute."

"And are we going to be friends or enemies in the days to come?"

"I don't know about 'friends.' I shall care for you till the day I die, as I do now."

"And I may have one more kiss—a last one?"

She throws her arms around his neck without a word.

But Roger does not misunderstand her this time. In the intensity, the abandonment of that caress he reads aright, that Belinda is taking leave of him for ever.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE CURTAIN FALLS.

And now the closing act remains to be played. Scene, Rosie's Drawing-room at the Isabella; a lamp or two artistically disposed round the central figure of the tableau; Venetian shutters, half closed; a voluptuous fragrance from the magnolias and orange flowers in the court-yard below. Central figure, Rosie, dressed in the palest lavender silk that ever milliner called mourning, with white Spanish veil, with jet comb and earrings, with the bloom of undying youth (warranted) on her cheek.

To her, just as nine o'clock strikes, enters Belinda, tired-looking, dust-stained, her cheeks paler than her dress, her eyes showing all too plainly the remarks of recent tears.

"Why, Belinda, I thought you were never coming back, any of you! And what an object! I am more thankful than ever I did not go. These sort of days are mistakes."

"Utter mistakes," repeats Belinda, sinking into the first chair she comes across. "You have had by far the best of it at home, Rosie."

"It certainly is nice to say one has been in Spain, but one can say it just as well without going, and as to churches and things, they are all alike, and you never know what horrid disease you may catch. How do you like me in a veil? Spencer insists that she has pinned it right, but I am not sure that it should be fastened so high. Now, just see—oh, you must stand up to get the full effect—do you think one inch lower would be more becoming? Look at me attentively, full face and profile."

Rosie turns herself slowly round, as the wax ladies with big eyelashes turn in the barbers' shops, and Belinda watches her with a pang of wearied envy; envy, not of her charms, but of this all-engrossing vanity which so fills and satisfies the creature's own selfish life.

"Spencer is right, Rose. It is pinned to perfection. An inch, half an inch, either way, might spoil the effect."

"I thought it looked rather well," says Rose, coquettishly surveying herself in an opposite mirror. "But, of course, in trying a new style one is apt to be nervous. And then I have a horror of anything theatrical. Nothing, I know, would occasion Colonel Drewe such a shock as to find me looking theatrical. He had always the most fastidious taste."

"Colonel Drewe?" repeats Belinda, a little absently. "Ah, to be sure, I had forgotten. You and Colonel Drewe have not seen each other yet, then?

"No; poor, dear fellow—Stanley does not yet know the worst! He wanted to call on me, not ten minutes after you had started, but Spencer made so much of my headache—she is really a fool, Belinda, when you put her to the test—Spencer made so much of my headache, and my sufferings, that, at last, he took her at her word, and went to Biarritz for the afternoon, saying he would call again at nine, for certain. Spencer declares the passionate expression of his eyes when he said those words 'for certain,' was enough to make your blood run cold."

"Then I am not wanted, Rose," says Belinda, rising. "If Colonel Drewe is to be here with passionate eyes at nine, the sooner I take myself off the better."

But the widow will, for no consideration, be left alone; is coy as a girl of seventeen at the thought of receiving Colonel Drewe, any gentleman, at nine o'clock in the evening, unchaperoned. At least Belinda must stop until the first shock of the meeting the first agonized shake of the hand is over.

Just as she is speaking comes a discreet lady's maid's tap at the outer door of the apartment, and in another moment appears Spencer, in a faded grey silk dress, with mock jet cross and earrings, with downcast ogle of mock modesty, a cheap imitation of her mistress to the last.

"The gentleman who called this morning, ma'am, would be glad to know if you are sufficiently well to receive him?"

Spencer's face telegraphs the intelligence that the visitor, in point of fact, is at her heels; and Rose, stoking a little further away from the lamp light, adjusts her handkerchief and eyelashes to perfection point.

"I will make an effort to see this gentleman, Spencer"—how Colonel Drewe's heart must thrill at that veiled cooing voice! "I am far, very far, from strong yet, still, if it be a matter of business——"

Another two seconds and the visitor is midway across the room.

He is tall, just Colonel Drewe's height, and has the unmistakeable military air dear to Rosie's heart. So much, without uplifting her eyes, the widow can discern. But what—what ails Belinda? The girl has grown white as ashes; she starts, trembling, to her feet; a cry of doubt, fear, hope, all blended, comes from her lips.

"Belinda, my dear, let me introduce ——" begins Rose, rising with a languid grace from the sofa. "I don't think you and Colonel—Colonel——"

The poor soul turns green under all her pearl powder, feels her limbs give way beneath her; shrieks—a good natural shriek, for once, just as she would give at the apparition of a frog or a spider. Then, the genius of folly inspiring her, moves a step or two forward, and sinks into the stranger's arms.

"I knew it all along!" she gasps out. "My heart told me you were never really, really dead!"

O'Shea—for it is needed Cornelius—holds his wife in a sort of rapture to his waistcoat. He bends his head down over hers.

"There are feelings too sacred for utterance," he exclaims. "The years, the cruel years of our separation fade away, and it seems but yesterday I held my only darling to my heart."

"But I am changed!" murmurs Rose, the identical remark she murmured on that first night of Roger's return from India. "I am an old, old woman now!"

She lifts her face; traces of rice powder rest on Major O'Shea's waistcoat, as they rested erstwhile on Roger's, and then, looking into each other's eyes, and holding each other's hands, husband and wife, in broken oft-interrupted accents, make mutual confessions.

Cornelius throws infinite pathos into his. The newspaper announcement of his death, he declares, was, in the first instance, a hoax, one of those cruel practical jokes to which the most innocent men may fall victims. Afterward fretting, as was his habit, about his poor devoted wife, away in England—the idea crossed his brain of working out the mistake to her benefit. "My life, up to that time," and tears are in the good old fellow's eyes as he speaks, "my life up to that time, had brought little else but harm to those I loved. I resolved to see if the supposition of my death might not prove to their advantage. My Rosie's mental sufferings!" Rose, at this point having managed to falter out something decorous about the suddenness of the blow and her own anguish of bereavement. "Ah, my love, the years of tranquil domestic happiness before us now must atone for that. The end, my Rosie—'tis false morality but let us hope that in this case at least the end will justify the means."

"I'm sure I hope it will make no difference about Uncle Robert's will." This is Rosie's first really earnest and coherent utterance. "I know my uncle would never have left me a shilling if he had thought ——"

"That that worthless scoundrel and spendthrift, Cornelius O'Shea, still haunted the earth," interrupts Cornelius, with admirable frankness. "Set your mind at rest, my dear girl. I consulted my lawyers about all the troublesome business technicalities of the matter, immediately upon my return to England. The money is as legally and truly yours as you are legally and truly mine, and only mine, Rose."

So much for Major O'Shea. Rosie gets through the difficult part she has to play not without credit. After looking forward to being the wife of a man, young, handsome, distinguished, as Roger Temple—nay, after hesitating, one short quarter of an hour ago, as to whether Roger Temple or that elegant creature, Stanley Drewe, should be the object of one's choice, now suddenly to find one's self folded in a husband's legitimate embrace! A husband with his nose redder, his head balder, his whole person, alas, a vast deal older, slovenlier, uglier than when one parted from him. Would not the situation be tragic to many a wiser and better woman than poor Rose?

She sighs more sincerely than she ever sighed in her life before; she weeps some furtive scalding tears on O'Shea's well-worn waistcoat. She is sorry exceedingly; sorry in the very depths of her soul over his resurrection. But although a husband, Cornelius is still a man, and it is not in Rosie's nature to act otherwise than with angelic outward sweetness toward any member of the other sex.

"You seem to forget that we are not the only people in the world," she whispers to him, after a time. "You quite forget the cause that brought me to St. Jean de Luz—Belinda."

And now Belinda, who has with difficulty restrained herself during the scene of tender connubial reunion, rushes forward and flings herself upon her father's breast.

She never sees that his coat lacks fashion and his waistcoat freshness. Cheap cigars, brandy, absinthe, none of these things are perceived by Belinda. "Papa! My own darling papa!"

As she clings to him, she feels his lips upon her head, the blind, adoring love of old childish days thrills through her heart. She kisses his face, his hands, the sleeve of his threadbare coat. She sends up a passionate, mute thanksgiving to Heaven in her great joy.

"And so Belinda has grown up a beauty after all," says O'Shea, holding his graceful brown girl at arm's length that he may the better admire her. "But I have seen you already to-day, Belinda. I watched you this morning—little you all suspected it—when you were starting from the hotel. A good-looking young fellow that who was with her, Rose, eh? It would be indiscreet, I dare say, to ask his name?"

"His name is Temple, Roger Temple," answers Belinda, her face burning with blushes, more for Rose's sake than her own.

"An old friend of mine—and Mr. Shelmadean's," adds Rose. Poor Rose! She must be really more than mortal could she make this renunciatory speech in a cheerful tone. "I had run down here with my maid to see our dear Belinda, and—and we met Captain Temple—accidentally——"

"As you have now met me, Rose," says Cornelius, coming, with admirable tact, to her rescue. "Quite a chapter of accidents, is it not? But never mind, my love! All's well that end's well, and I shall be only too delighted to make Mr. Roger Temple's acquaintance. This moment," adds O'Shea, looking much as gentlemen look when they get on their legs to return thanks after dinner "this moment is the happiest—the crown, the flush, so to speak—of my whole chequered life. But let me set myself right in the opinion of those who are dearest to me. I come back, after long absence, after years of reputed death; I find my Rosie fairer, younger than when I left her, and with her affections still mine, and I am the happiest fellow this side of the equator. But," exclaims Cornelius grandly, "had a cruel fate ordained otherwise, had I found my beloved wife in a position where duty demanded such a sacrifice, I would, whatever the cost, have kept the fact of my existence a secret, and in a distant land have prayed to my last hour for the happiness of her from whom honor, the strongest feeling of which man's breast is capable, held me apart."

Major O'Shea seems to have grown an inch taller during the course of this peroration. He pronounces the word "honor" with the marked emphasis you will frequently observe men of somewhat shifty character attach to it. His daughter gazes at him with fond, wet eyes and trembling lips, while his wife—well, I don't want to be hard on Rosie any more, so we will say that his wife, too, weeps.

Just as the family group has assumed an interesting position, in walks Roger Temple.

"This—this is Captain Temple" stammers poor Rosie, "Cornelius, my dear ——"

"Captain Temple, let me introduce myself," says O'Shea, airily, and moving towards his wife's friend with outstretched, cordial hand. "A dead man may dispense with formalities. Very happy and proud to make Captain Temple's acquaintance!"

Five minutes later the restored husband and supplanted lover are chatting together with a friendliness that must dispel Rosie's last lingering dread as to the probability of a duel. In half an hour's time O'Shea is whispering affectionately in his wife's ear—Darby and Joan together on the sofa (I have been harsh, too harsh, upon Rosie, more than once: it gives me a pleasure to part from her in peace, happily restored to a husband's sheltering arms); and Belinda finds herself at an open window, in the farthest corner of the room, with Roger Temple by her side.

They talk commonplaces for a long time, talk about the clearness of the night, the beauty of the stars, the sweetness of the orange flowers in the courtyard. They keep at a distance; they dare not look into each other's eyes. And all the while they know that they are lovers; that the good-bye spoken between them a couple of hours ago is cancelled; that they are free; and God willing, mean to pass the rest of their lives together, hand in hand.

"Time for me to be thinking of the Maison Lohobiague and Miss Burke," says Belinda at last. "There is Costa waiting patiently at the gate, as usual, to take me home."

"Home! Don't let me hear you say the word any more in connection with the Maison Lohobiague," exclaims Roger. "You have finished with the Maison Lohobiague and Miss Burke forever."

"Yes; I suppose papa will like me to live in England now. Poor papa—if you knew how good it is to be able to say that word again!"

"I hope another word may seem as good to you some day!"

No reply in speech. She only turns to him her dark eyes shining through a mist of joyful tears, and Roger Temple is contented.

THE END.

A large panther followed by three cubs ran along a much-travelled road near Middletown, N. Y., last week. Nobody was harmed and the quartette escaped.

—An eagle sailing half a mile above the earth can see a field mouse; but while that is pretty good it is beaten by a chap in this town who can see his tailor a mile away on a cloudy day.

SLAVERY IN AFRICA.

Horrors That Are Being Perpetrated These Very Days.

"I paid a visit to Sayol's camp. A scaffolding of beams at its entrance was ornamented with fifty hewn-off right hands. Musket shots later on proclaimed that the leader of this gang was practicing musketry at his prisoners. Some of my men told me that the victims of this cruelty had been cut up immediately to furnish a cannibal feast, for Tippoo Tib's auxiliaries from the Lomami, the Bene Kalebwe and the Batetela are cannibals." Reading these words one would think that they were part of some romance, due to the vivid imagination and genius of Mr. Rider Haggard; but no, they are, alas! an actual narration of facts witnessed by the famous African traveller, Lieut. Wissmann, and related by him in a paper read before the Royal Geographical Society on the 25th of June, 1888. It may be urged by some that surely this horrible and diabolical conduct of Sayol, the lieutenant of Tippoo Tib, is a solitary and isolated instance, and that other slave dealers do not behave so atrociously. It may, perhaps, be the worst case which has up to the present been witnessed and described by a European, but it is unfortunately only a fair sample of what is daily occurring in tropical Africa, where murder and rapine are destroying whole tribes of negroes, the few and scanty survivors being dragged away as slaves. According to Cardinal Lavigerie, Africa is every year drained of 2,000,000 human beings by the slave trade. Not a tithe of these ever come to be domestic slaves "who after all are not so badly off," as is so commonly said by people who wish to plaster over the prick their conscience gives them when they say they are not the neighbor of the oppressed negro, and, like the priest and the Levite, pass by on the other side. For every slave they carry off the slave raiders murder about twenty, and of those they do drive away not a fifth come into the hands of the humane (?) slave owners of Morocco, Fez, Tuat, Tripoli and Arabia. The ivory trade has been blamed with causing most of the slave hunts in Central Africa. This is no longer the case. In several regions the stock of ivory is nearly or quite exhausted, and still villages are hourly burned and their inhabitants murdered or put into slave chains, clogs and forks. The only difference is that now, the able bodied men being no longer required for the painful and laborious work of ivory porters, they, along with the aged of both sexes, are slaughtered in cold blood, while their wives, sisters, daughters and young children are dragged away to become the servants, concubines and worse of depraved and debauched mongrels.—London National Review.

A Coachman's Awful Discovery.

A curious case is now engaging the attention of the police authorities here, telegraphs a Montreal correspondent. About six months ago a Mrs. McKean left her husband at Lake St. John and came to Montreal, alleging before she left Quebec that she was afraid of her life, and would stay no longer with the man whom she had promised to love, honor and obey. Coming to this city Mrs. McKean arrayed herself in man's attire, and entering the service of a well-known gentleman, was given a bed in the same room with the coachman. The latter remained in blissful ignorance of the real condition of affairs until last night, when the terrified Jehu discovered that for a half year his apartment had been shared, not by a handsome youth, as he supposed, but by Mrs. McKean, from Lake St. John. The indignant coachman had the woman arrested this morning, but there does not appear to be any law applicable in the case.

Plenty of Weather.

Maine Man—"I tell you down East beats the world for quick changes of weather. One day last spring I cut ice all one morning and had to run out and plant sun umbrellas over my tomato vines in the afternoon."

Western Man "Shouldn't wonder. I remember one day in Kansas when I went out with a mowing machine at sunrise and traded it for a snowplow before night, but that wasn't a circumstance to the day I went swimming in the Missouri River, and got carried so far out by the current that I was like to drown. I just tell you, I never expected to see shore again."

"Eh? How did ye get back?"

"The river froze over and I skated back."

Can't Get Head nor Tail of It.

A fellow who was not used to propounding conundrums got mixed thusly:

"Why is a hen—no, I mean a rooster, like a cent? No, that isn't it. Why is a cent like a fence on a rooster? Pshaw! I mean why is a fence like a rooster on a penny. No, like a cent on a rooster. Hold on a minute, that's not right either. Why is a rooster like a fence on a cent? I mean like a penny on a—no, I don't either. I mean, why is a rooster like a penny—a fence a—now, why is a penny like a fence on a—like a rooster on a fence? Well, anyhow, the answer is, because its head is on one side and tail on the other."—Dansville Breeze.

A Tonic Needed.

"Come here, Johnnie," said the old man, bringing out the strap, "it is time you had a taste of this."

"I didn't do nothing, pa," pleaded the youngster.

"In that case," said the old man, "I'll lick you for being idle."

An Unfortunate Admission.

Youngest daughter (of father of seven of them)—Papa, I can't I positively can't stand the strain! I m m must t-t-tell you I had planned to elope to night.

Papa—Just my luck! What did you want to peach for? Now I suppose I've got to stop you.

Sorry He Found It.

Office Boy—"Here is a pocket-book, sir, which you dropped." Muscular Merchant (grasping boy's hand and wringing it vigorously)—"Honest lad! What shall I do to show my gratitude?" Boy (wincing under his torture grasps)—"Let go my hand, sir, and we'll call it square."

—A man of strong character always makes enemies, but because a man has many enemies does not mean that he has a strong character.

MATHEMATICAL CURIOSITIES.

Singular Things That Can be Accomplished by Figures.

The Detroit Free Press says: A very curious number is 142 857, which multiplied by 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 or 6 gives the same figures in the same order, beginning at a different point, but if multiplied by seven gives all nines. Multiplied by one it equals 142 857, multiplied by two equals 285 714, multiplied by three equals 428 571, multiplied by four equals 571,428, multiplied by five equals 714,285, multiplied by six equals 857 142, multiplied by seven equals 999 999. Multiply 142,857 by eight and you have 1,142 856. Then add the first figure to the last and you have 142 857, the original number, the figures exactly the same as at the start. Another mathematical wonder is the following:

It is discovered that the multiplication of 9 8 8 6 5 4 3 2 1 by 45 gives 44, 44, 44,44, 44, 45. Reversing the order of the digits and multiplying 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 by 45, we get a result equally curious—5, 555, 555, 505. If we take 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 as the multiplicand, and interchanging the figures of 45, take 54 as the multiplier, 6, 666, 666 606. Returning to the multiplicand, 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1, and taking 54 as the multiplier again, we get 53, 333, 333, 34—all 3's except the first and last figures, which together read 54—the multiplier. Taking the same multiplicand, and 27, the half of 54, as the multiplier, we get a product of 26, 666, 666, 667—all 6's except the first and last figures, which together read 27, the multiplier. Now, interchanging the order of the figures 27, and using 72 as the multiplier, and 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 as the multiplicand, we get a product of 71, 111, 111, 112, all 1's except the first and last figures, which read together 72—the multiplier.

Very Good for a Detective Yarn.

A lady and gentleman were travelling together on an English railway. They were perfect strangers to each other. Suddenly the gentleman said: "Madam, I will trouble you to look out of the window for a few minutes; I am going to make some changes in my wearing apparel!"

"Certainly, sir," she replied, with politeness, rising and turning her back upon him.

In a short time he said: "Now, madam, my change is completed, and you may resume your seat. When the lady turned she beheld her male companion transformed into a dashing lady, with a heavy veil over her face.

"Now, sir, or madam, whichever you like," said the lady, "I must trouble you to look out of the window, for I also have some changes to make in my apparel."

"Certainly," madam," and the gentleman in lady's attire immediately complied.

"Now, sir, you may resume your seat." To his great surprise on resuming his seat, the gentleman in female attire found his lady companion transformed into a man. He then laughed and said:

"It appears that we both are anxious to avoid recognition. What have you done? I have robbed a bank."

"And I," said the whilom lady, as he dexterously fettered his companion's wrist with a pair of handcuffs, "am Detective J——, of Scotland Yard, and in female attire have shadowed you; now," drawing a revolver, "keep still."—San Francisco Wasp.

Curious Odds and Ends.

The Persian name for Americans is Yange Dconyn, which means a dweller of the new world.

People in Oregon have passed a very pleasant summer. They raised four crops of strawberries this year.

It was an old woman in Indiana who invented the whisk broom, and millions of them are whisking from daylight to dark without her having made a cent out of her invention.

A newspaper man in Liverpool secured the names of 482 sailors, and only two among them were named Jack. In all his talk with them he never heard them use a nautical expression.

A Brooklyn man intends to start a goat farm, which he thinks will bring him $10 80 per day. He will stock it with seventy-five goats, and as the ordinary goat will give three pints of milk a day, he calculates upon ninety quarts per day at 12 to 15 cents a quart.

The Prince of Wales has 17 brothers-in-law, 16 uncles, 57 cousins and 58 nephews and nieces.

A Clairsville (Ga.) druggist recently captured a young snake, to which he has been giving a certain amount of whiskey every day. At first his snakeship did not take kindly to the beverage, but of late has shown a decided hankering after it. When given all it can drink it rolls around on the floor and performs a number of odd antics, clearly proving that the glorious privilege of getting drunk is not denied even to snakes.

Not the First Time.

"Was it the girl's father who broke off the engagement?" inquired Jenkins.

"No," replied the jilted lover, "it was her little brother."

An Editor's Supply of Tongue.

Our thanks are tendered to Rev. Kenneth McLennan for a dried tongue of the northwestern reindeer, which is considered a rare treat by many.—Whitby Chronicle.

THE Tables of the Law have not been heard of since Nebuchadnezzar plundered the Temple at Jerusalem in the year 598 B.C. The Rev. Dr. Boardman, of Philadelphia, suggests that the archæological expedition sent out by the University of Pennsylvania may discover the original Decalogue amid the ruins of Babylon.

Revivalist Sam W. Small is trying to start an upstir in New Yook city, where there are more good people than there are words in the big dictionary.

On Saturday A. and H. Cartwright, sons of Sir Richard, went to Wolf Island on a shooting expedition. As Harry did not reach the bank yesterday anxiety was felt in regard to his safety, and Sir Richard went out in the afternoon in search of him. His brother is in Kingston from Toronto. It is thought the young men are all right.

Mr. Franklin McLeay, modern language master of the Woodstock Institute, is from overwork.

CURRENT TOPICS.

"BONE china," the very finest sort, which comes in Minton, Welgewood, Crown Derby, Royal Worcester, in fact, all the best makes, gets its name from the fact that phosphate of lime from calcined bones goes into its composition, and helps not a little to produce its creamy, translucent and velvety glaze.

So few are the Greek paintings which have survived that interest will be felt in a recent discovery at Eleusis of wall paintings, among which Jupiter enthroned can be made out, having a sceptre in the left hand and a Victory in the right. They are supposed to belong to the period of Roman domination.

THE case of a Christian bishop abandoning his creed to embrace Islamism is rare. Such an apostate is Monsignor Kerekin, Armenian-Gregorian bishop of the united diocese of Yurgah, Artakia and Marasch, in Asia Minor. He has assumed the name of Achmet Mukhtar, and his mother, who followed his example, is known as Fatmah Munire.

WHEN a defendant in Honduras is dissatisfied with the finding of a court he sometimes does not waste money on an appeal to a higher tribunal. Thus in Leimistan, Honduras, not long ago, Don Salvador Paredes, being worsted to the extent of $100 in an assumpsit case brought by Don Desiderio Paz immediately shot the judge dead.

A BUST of the late Norman MacLeod, executed by Mr. Hutchison, R. S. A., is about to be placed in the corridor at Balmoral, besides that of the late Principal Tulloch. Both of these illustrious Scotchmen were favorites of the Queen. It was of Dr. MacLeod she wrote in "Our Life in the Highlands" when referring to her first visit to Balmoral after the death of Prince Albert: "He spoke of the Prince so nicely and prayed for us so kindly that I felt a lump in my throat."

ACCORDING to L'Industrie Parisienne, a laundryman in the vicinity of Paris has discovered a very ingenious method of cleaning linen without soap. He uses no soap or lye, nor chlorine, but replaces these substances by boiled potatoes, with which he rubs the linen. This curious process, it appears, is much superior to those hitherto employed, and the worst-soiled cotton, linen or silk, cleaned by this method, are made whiter than they could be by the use of an alkali.

MR. F. BADEN BENSON, the President of the British Pharmaceutical Conference, adopts and recommends the following plan for the "happy dispatch" of poultry. A large wide mouthed stoppered bottle is kept charged with an ounce of chloroform. When a chicken has received sentence of death, it is held firmly under the left arm and its head slipped into the mouth of the bottle. A few deep inspirations follow, and the bird without a struggle becomes unconscious. Then, holding it by the legs its neck is dislocated by a quick stretch. The plan is so simple that it might be generally adopted.

ACCORDING to the following statistics France must be peculiarly blessed with a healthy climate. The number of persons in each 10,000 between ages 15 and 60 are: France, 5,373; Holland, 4,984; Sweden, 4,954; Great Britain, 4,722; United States, 4,398. The highest average ages of the living are: France 31.06; Holland, 27.76; Sweden, 27.66; Great Britain, 26.05; United States, 24.02. Out of every hundred deaths, those of persons over 60 are: 36 in France; Switzerland, 34; England, 30; Belgium, 26; Prussia, 19; Austria, 17. France has the lowest birth rate, which is 25.8 to a thousand; Great Britain, 31; Germany, 38.

DR. EDWARD W. BEMIS, a well known statistical authority, has written an article on the railways of the United States, in which he points out that the 150,000 miles of railway in the United States embrace one-tenth of the national wealth, or more than that of all our manufacturers, and that the yearly gross earnings of over $900,000,000 are more than three times the entire appropriations of the national Government, while the employees exceed three-quarters of a million of men, or more than any standing army in Europe.

ACCORDING to a correspondent in the San Francisco Chronicle the best blanket in the world is woven by the Navajo Indians. "These blankets are unique and curious, as well as durable, and hence their great price. The Navajoes raise their own sheep, and the wool is carded, spun and dyed by themselves. The very finest blankets are made, however, of threads raveled out of fine woollen cloth, called boletta, which they get from Old Mexico at $6 a pound. A first class blanket of this material would take a year's labor, and is worth as much as $150. An inferior grade may be had as low as $20. Germantown yarn is used for the commoner sorts, and a very fine article it makes. The cheapest kind may be had as low as $3, or even $1 50, though it takes three or four days to weave one. The chief, but by no means the only, merit of this blanket is its durability. Some are known to have been in constant use in Mexican houses for seventy years."

THE ground on which Philadelphia is built is claimed to be one of the richest gold fields in the world. The only difficulty is that the field cannot be worked. Nearly the whole city is underlaid with clay to the depth of about ten feet—an area say ten miles square. A cubic foot of clay, weighing 120 pounds, taken from a depth of 14 feet when the cellar of the 12th street market was excavated, was practically demonstrated to contain seven-tenths of a grain of gold, or one pound in 1,224,000. The experiment was repeated with about the same results with clay taken from a brick-yard in the suburbs. Supposing the whole mass of clay to be 4,180,000,000 pounds (and it is really much greater), the amount of gold would reach in value the enormous sum of $126,000,000. The gravel is much richer in gold than the clay, but there is not so much of it. Undoubtedly $200,000,000 worth of gold lies within fifteen feet of the surface, and still it cannot be used.

A SPOON-FED HORSE.

Queer Injury to a Valuable Animal—Fed Like a Baby.

A pure white Arabian mare that is being fed with a spoon is one of the curiosities that excites the interest and sympathies of the horsemen of Montgomery County. The animal belongs to John M. Wilson, of Norristown, and it is suffering from a most singular fracture of the jaw-bone. The injury is known as a fracture of the inferior maxilla of the lower jaw-bone posterior to the incisor teeth. Both bones of the animal's jaw are broken completely off, and the lower portion of the jaw is now being held in place by a mask of pliable copper, lined with cotton. The case is exciting widespread interest among veterinary surgeons. The accident to the animal occurred last Sunday night. While tied with a halter in its stall at Mr. Wilson's stables it broke loose, and, while mingling with the other horses, was kicked squarely on the front of the jaw. Dr. H. O. Dengler, a veterinary surgeon residing in Norristown, was summoned, and he found that the jaw was twisted to one side, and the animal appeared to be suffering but little pain. After an examination of the fracture he reset the broken bones temporarily, and applied a truss to the mare's head, and then bandaged it tightly.

On Monday Dr. Dengler telegraphed to C. J. Blank, of Easton, and J. Reinhart Z. Keelor, of Harleysville, Montgomery County, two veterinary surgeons, with whom he had a consultation. They made an exhaustive search of the archives of animal fractures, but could not find a similar case to the one they had under discussion where both bones of the jaw had been broken at the same time. Dr. Dengler then permanently set the broken jaw, an entire day being spent in the operation. The copper mask is kept tightly pressed to the animal's head, and its mouth is kept in a bucket of water to reduce the swelling in the jaw. The mare is kept in slings, which are securely attached to the roof of the stable, so as to guard against her lying down to go to sleep. The canvas slings will be kept about her body for about four weeks, by which time Dr. Dengler anticipates a marked improvement in the fractures. During that time it will be impossible for the animal to take ordinary nourishment, and she will be kept on a diet of milk, eggs, oatmeal, butter and gruel. This diet will be administered with a spoon, as the mouth is open but little more than an inch. The animal is in a comfortable position, and it is believed that by careful nursing and skilful surgical treatment she will recover.—Philadelphia Record.

JOSEPH MAHONE'S DREAM.

Part of It Came True, and the Remainder Is Awaited with Interest.

A bold robbery and a remarkable case of premonition connected therewith occurred yesterday. Joseph N. Mahone, a travelling man, representing one of the largest wholesale grocery houses of New Orleans, was the victim, being robbed of a fine gold watch and chain, $70 in cash, three checques aggregating a considerable sum and valuable papers. Mahone was overtaken when within three miles of Evergreen late yesterday evening by a dark skinned man with a small grip in his hand, who claimed to be returning from Andalusia, and said he had to walk back to Evergreen to take the cars home to Mobile, as his horse was taken sick and died at Gant's Mill, on the route. Mahone let him ride into town, and they put up at the same hotel, the stranger registering as James Pomeroy, Mobile. Upon retiring the stranger called for an adjoining room. When Mahone awoke in the morning he found an empty bottle labelled chlorofocm by his pillow. Mahone relates the following story connected with the robbery: He says he is a man of high nervous temperament, and from childhood has been affected at intervals by a strange, semi-conscious, trance-like affection, during which he has visions of different occurrences which in their vivid and realistic appearances almost persuade him of the truth of the scenes. He was so affected on Wednesday. While in a trance he saw plainly outlined before him a room with a man lying upon the bed, whom he recognized as himself. It was a darkened room, and it appeared to be night. By the faint glimmer of light through the window he saw a muffled figure stealthily enter the room and abstract a watch, money and other valuables from the clothes hanging on a chair. The thief left the room. He saw him go off, seemingly down a railroad. Then it seemed as though a cloud passed over the scene for a moment and in rapid panoramic succession he saw the party arrested stab the officer, overcome by superior numbers, confined in prison, tried for murder, convicted, sentenced to death and hung. This dream or vision made no particular impression at the time upon the mind of Mr. Mahone, but was deemed merely a vagary of the brain; but since the robbery he recalls the fact that the man who robbed him corresponds exactly with the one he saw in the dream. The room in the hotel and the other facts are exactly as they appeared. A part of the vision has come true, and it remains a matter of profound psychological interest to see if the remainder comes to pass.—Evergreen (Ala.) despatch to Chicago Globe

Agreed with Him.

Beggar (preliminarily)—"I've seen better days—"

Busy man—"So have I. Looks as if it had set in for an all-day drizzle. Confoundedly unpleasant. Got to take 'em as they come, though. Tra, la, la."

An investigation into the cause of a sudden fall in the Elkhorn river at Pierce, Nebraska, revealed the fact that a musk-rat had bored a hole in the dam.

The steamship Pomeranian is still kept in the St. Lawrence by the ice.

WHEN a landlord lets a house it is with the implied guarantee that it is not open to the weather, and that the plumbing and sewerage are not defective. At least that is the ruling of a Massachusetts court which has given judgment for $5,000 against a landlord who let a house in which the plumbing was so defective that the tenant's family were thereby made sick with diphtheria.

The English military authorities are getting out a new drill book, which will show some changes in drills. The book will be placed in use in Canada next season.

GIVING TO THE POOR.

Degrading Effects of Public Charity—London's Modes of Relief.

Those who are interested to examine the economic results of giving to the poor in England, Scotland and Ireland will find plenty of books on the subject. The "Encyclopedia Britannica" contains a good article under the heading "poor law." See also other encyclopedias.

The Scotch are proverbially thrifty and economical, and yet they have been degraded by the poor law of 1845. In some parts of Scotland there is ten times the poverty there is in Ireland! That law gives more relief than England's, and the money is regarded as a nice gift. Those who had savings in banks transferred them to others. Careful investigation, and even the labor test, did not quell the applications in any such manner as did the Irish workhouse. Matters came to such a pass that the fishermen of Wick could not get their nets mended, their former assistants saying that they could get a living easier from the parish.

In Ireland there is very little out door relief, the proportion of Scotland being almost reversed—five in door to one out door pauper. In spite of Ireland's unjust land system and high rents the whole number of her paupers does not amount to one half those of London alone. The Irish will submit to every privation rather than let friends go to the workhouse, which is the legal mode of relief, and is not a charity.

In London many people get relief who could do without it, and consider it no disgrace. Industry, economy, temperance and self restraint would enable most of them to take care of themselves if they would. Hence the workhouse is a necessary restraint, being uncomfortable or even disgraceful. They therefore shun it. If they may eat without work in some other way, they will; if not, many of them will work. Why are these people in such condition? It is a duty we owe to society to ascertain what are their thoughts, what the motives that have led them to such lives. If the result is that the vices and injustices and prodigality of the rich have in part induced such results, let it be exposed boldly and fearlessly. If injustice in the wage system and in land tenure is the cause in part, let this also be proclaimed.—Charles W. Smiley in Popular Science Monthly.

He Kept His Shirt.

The Mississippian said: "Down in my town some few years ago there lived a man who owned a small two story frame house. In the lower portion of that humble structure he 'kept store,' and in an upper room he slept. One night the house was discovered to be on fire, and it was feared for a while that the owner would perish in the flames. The fears were not realized, however, for the man awoke to the situation before the flooring on which he reposed was destroyed. There was no time for etiquette, nor for making any elaborate toilet. He just dropped out of the window, clad only in a shirt that was more remarkable for its brevity than its cleanliness. The devouring flames made short work of the house, and the luckless owner marched excitedly among the crowd, exclaiming in agonizing tones, as he fingered the shirt:

"'This is all I have in the world! I am utterly ruined—this is all I have in the world.'

"He repeated this so frequently that it became wearisome to more than one of those sensitive people who reside in Tupelo, and finally one of them yelled out:

"'If that's all you have, for heaven's sake tear it off, throw it in the fire, and start even with the world.'"—New York Sun.

Meeting Queen Victoria: Unawares.

The Queen drives daily, but never till 5 in the afternoon, and then, for the most part, in her own or her neighbor's forests, and not on the highroad. And the best piece of Deeside is peculiar. Whoever may by chance meet the Queen on these excursions will do well to behave as if he had not met her, nor seen her, nor let her see him. He will get behind a rock or tree, or otherwise as best he may make himself invisible, and act as if he had neither eyes to see, nor ears to hear. Such is Her Majesty's wish, perfectly understood of those who live in her vicinity and studiously obeyed. You may be going to dine at the castle that evening; reason the more why you should sink into the earth sooner than put Her Majesty under compulsion to recognize your existence when her soul longs for solitude. If, on the other hand, the passer by be neither tourist nor of such position as may entitle him to be known, but a gillie, or a groom, or laborer, the chances are that upon a signal from the carriage the postilions will pull up their four smoking ponies, and the Queen will ask a kindly question or two of the man about himself and his family.—Scotch Letter to the Boston Herald.

A Wise Old Man's Wisdom.

Enamored Youth (trying to sound his girl's father)—"About how much income should a young man have to be married on, Mr. De Rich?"

Mr. De Rich (meditatively)—"Well I married on $900 a year and was both comfortable and happy."

Enamored Youth (delighted)—"Indeed?"

Mr. De Rich—"Yes. You see I married a penniless girl who knew how to economize, but if I had married a petted and spoiled child of fortune like Miss Binks, or Miss Fiuks or—or my daughter for instance, I should have needed about $9,000."

Timely Caution.

Jeweller—Yes, sir: I will engrave anything you wish on this ring without extra charge. Young man—Well, inscribe on it "From George to Alice." Jeweller—Hem! The lady is your sister, maybe? Young man—The fact is, this is an engagement ring. Jeweller—Ah! My young friend, I have had considerable experience in engagement rings, and I would suggest that the inscription be simply "From George." Then it will do for anybody.

"Mr. Barrley, I would like to speak to you a moment on a subject——" "Some other time. Don't you see I am busy?" "I see, but I must speak now. I want your consent to the marriage of your daughter to me." "Go away at once; I cannot be interrupted except on business of importance."

GUARDS AT MILLIONAIRES' GRAVES.

An Occupation That Gives Many Detectives Constant Employment.

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody good," said a well-dressed, active-looking young business man the other day. "Now, it may sound strange to you, but the robbery of Stewart's body has been of great benefit to me and a great many other people whom I could name.

"In what way?" inquired the friend to whom the remark was addressed.

"Well, it opened up an entirely new line of business and created a demand for my goods in a quarter that I had never thought of before. You know I manufacture electrical watch clocks designed for use in factories and other large buildings where watchmen are employed. Well, ever since the Stewart grave robbery there has been a demand for these watch clocks in every part of the country for use in cemeteries. The grave of nearly every rich or public man is protected in some such way, and I could tell you of graves that are watched night and day by private watchmen.

"There's Vanderbilt's grave, for instance, down in the big mausoleum on Staten Island. I sold them two of my electrical clocks, one of which is placed inside the tomb and the other outside of it. Every fifteen minutes each clock is visited by a Pinkerton detective, two of whom are constantly on guard. One of these detectives patrols outside the tomb while the other is located in and sits behind the iron bars with a loaded repeating rifle on his knees ready for instant use. It would be next to impossible for any robber to get away with the remains of William H. Vanderbilt so long as the tomb is protected as it is now. The Pinkerton men are hired by the year, and there is quite a little colony of them established down there on Staten Island, very near the mausoleum. I think they keep eight or ten there all the time, so that those on duty at the grave are relieved at frequent intervals, and are, therefore, not liable to fall asleep at their posts. It costs more to look after the old man now that he's dead than is spent by most men when they're alive.—New York Correspondence Savannah News.

A MOUSE AT MASS.

How the Tiniest of Quadrupeds Came Near Stampeding a Congregation.

At the 10:30 high mass at St. Paul's Cathedral yesterday morning, while the wealthier and more pretentious members of the congregation were intent on their "Aves" and "Hail Marys," and had their minds as nearly heavenward as it is possible to get those of the ordinary mortals, a mouse, as innocent of fat as the contribution box was of pennies, crept out from under the altar and reconnoitred the neighborhood of the chancel with no satisfactory stomach results. He was a traditional church mouse, and a sidelong glance at him was sufficient to satisfy the well developed [illegible] that [illegible] could give Lazarus points the hungriest day that [illegible] ever saw. Down from the sacred precincts of the altar to where the skirmishers for salvation were genuflecting and attending to the prescriptions of the Church wandered the mouse, and the stillness of things encouraged him. When he reached the first row of pews and nubbed towards one of them he got the first idea of his importance. One of the most sedate and extra fashionable dames of the two cities saw him and in a moment a holy moment she forgot the whole string of saints and good people and, gathering her skirts about her knees, mounted the stone whereon she had a moment before knelt. A mon dieu under her breath replaced the words of prayer and she suspended respiration until she saw it was spread towards another pew where sat the beautiful wife of a prominent politician, who held a cross to her lips. She supplied the cross and gracefully but silently elevated her skirts rather higher than even Parisian crossings require just now. Her example became contagious. Young women, dowagers, middy steerers, debutantes girls big and little in short for a moment there was well nigh a panic and nothing but the mouse and its precipitate retreat saved a big feminine rave from that Cathedral.—Pittsburg Times.

The Bill Was Passed.

An ex member of the Virginia State Senate told me the other day of an incident in his legislative career which I do not remember ever having seen in print before. A. L. Prideaux, not many years ago a member of the House of Representatives from the Ninth Virginia district, was, before he came to Washington, a member of the Virginia Senate. One day he introduced a Bill for the relief of the sureties of H. G. Wax, who was collector of taxes in Scott county. He made a brief explanation of the Bill, and when he sat down Edgar Allen, familiarly known as "Yankee Allen," who represented the Farmville district, rose and said:

> I wish to ax
> If Mr. Wax
> Has been too lax
> In collecting the tax;
> If such are the facts
> I am willing to relax
> And remit the tax
> Which the law enacts
> We should exact
> Of his sureties.

It is needless to add, my informant says, that the Bill passed by a unanimous vote.—New York Tribune.

No Cure For Him.

Old Lady—You seem to have a cold, sir.

Stranger—Yes, madame.

Old Lady—Well, I tell you what you do. Jes' go home and put your feet in a tub o' hot water an'——

Stranger (gruffly)—That's fine advice to give to a man with a cork leg; now, ain't it?

Louise Balfe maintains that marriage with handsome men is a failure. She has tried it twice, and has just cleared herself by law from both. "And I will not give up my freedom again," she declares, positively, "until I am wooed by a man who conceals his good qualities of mind and heart behind a very ugly surface. Male beauties are so egotistical, particularly if they are actors." Miss Balfe is an actress. Her ex husbands are good looking fellows, and each won Miss Balfe while playing the lover to her on the stage.

INDIANS NOT DYING OUT.

The Chief of the Senecas Before the Anthropologists.

New York Times. The Rev. W. Sanborn, of Lockport, who combines with his parochial duties the functions of chief of the Senecas, at the Cattaraugus Reservation, gave an interesting talk at Cooper Union yesterday afternoon, before the New York Academy of Anthropology, concerning the manners, traditions and growth of the Indians. The aborigines are not dying out, said he, but have been increasing throughout the country at the rate of 600 yearly, and they now number 300,000. Their first contact with civilization was blighting, like a sudden change from hot to cold, but by little and little they are learning to appreciate the comfort it brings. Mr. Sanborn spoke more particularly of the Six Nations or the Iroquois Confederation. They not only dress in the manner of American citizens, but have many of their home comforts. Mr. Sanborn attired himself in the garb of a chief, worn only on state occasions, and the ladies had an opportunity to inspect the really handsome bead work on the buckskin jerkin, sash, greaves and moccasins. An Indian couple sang with him several hymns that had been reduced to writing. There are no labials in the language, but it abounds in grunts, gutterals, the nasals, for some of which special characters had to be invented. On the table lay a big thigh-bone and tibia, a powerful jaw bone and a large and singularly [illegible] skull. They were the relics of an Indian chief found by Mr. Sanborn in a burial mound, twelve miles from Canandaigua. Evidently the chief was a man of brain as well as of muscle. Several stories were told, indicating that the Indian is by no means as stolid as represented, but is bright, keen and even witty. Mr. Sanborn believes in Fenimore Cooper's romantic Indians, and, to show the reason of his faith, read a pretty tale from the Bible of the tribe. He praised their hospitality and liberality. The women still cling somewhat to their traditional dress, but they are contented, for they enjoy the same political and social rights as the men. Courting is no longer done by proxy, and the women still have the right to pop the question when tired of waiting for a lover.

COON, BEAR AND DEER STORIES

Some Great Sport in the County of Simcoe.

John Reynolds, the veteran sportsman of Tecumseth, has been unbosoming himself to the Beeton World. Here are a few specimen bricks. Speaking of partridges, he said that they were not so thick as they used to be. Well, no. They were awful thick thirty five years ago round here. I remember one fall I had my gun with me, a muzzle loader—there were no breech loaders in those days—and I heard a partridge drumming near the creek. I saw it and was just drawing a bead on it when I heard something behind it. A big doe [illegible] I laid her out on the run. There were two bucks with her, and one stayed with the doe long enough for me to do for him. The other fellow made off but I knew he'd come back, so I laid waiting. Presently he comes along sparring very carefully and looking on every side of him as a scared deer. I let him come just so far and down he went. They were so big we couldn't get 'em out without putting a waggon road through the bush to 'em.

"Pretty good shooting. Yes, for but I've shot 10 deers with 10 shots one fall, and six bears with six shots. I have a good gun and there isn't a man stands in Canada to say that can be scared shooting. I can tell you when I've shot anything just where I've met before you see it. Deer used to be awful thick around here and I could go out at any time in the fall and have one in an hour. We had all we could eat and kept some on shares to venison too. The biggest bear I ever shot was a big black buck. It was raining and I had my overcoat on when I came across him living asleep in the bush. He had the finest horns, and I've often been sorry I didn't keep them. I won't tell you what he weighed, you'd think I was lying. Bears used to be thick too, and I've killed hundreds of them. I remember one big fellow that had played hog around. He'd think nothing of carrying off a pig of 300 lbs. I shot him in the cat-hold one night and if I was to measure what it we took to run him and what he weighed you'd scare me what an old hunter named Rogers did when I told him. But Matt Beal hauled him home for me on a jumper and he told Rogers he could swear to its weight. One of his paws cut off rose weighed five pounds—you can think what size he was."

A Young Man's Woe.

This world is a delusion and a snare, said a young traveling man to a companion.

"What's the matter now?"

"I have been fooled again. You can't judge anything by appearances, can you?"

"No, but what has set you in this melancholy train of thought?"

"Why, last Sunday I called on Miss Banksley and stayed for dinner."

"Didn't you have a pleasant time?"

"Extremely pleasant, but what impressed me most was the way Miss Banksley ate. She didn't touch a thing except a chicken wing, a biscuit and a Charlotte Russe."

"Quite spirituelle."

"I should say so. You can imagine the bold hardihood with which I asked her out to lunch at the theatre last night. But, oh, what a change——"

"Don't say another word, old fellow, you have my deepest sympathies. Here's five dollars, you can pay me when you get ready."—Merchant Traveler.

Talking to the Baby.

It is a wonder that brain fever and idiocy are not more common among infants when one remembers that 99 out of 100 babies are greeted with this speech, on which there is no copyright, soon after their arrival in the world:

"Well, well, well, it was a dear, s'eet b'essing, darling baby, so it dess was! Does it want to ky? Well, it s'all ky dess all it wants to, b'ess its own booful itty heartums of it! What! would it pucker up its itty mouf to ky—ky some more? there, there—they boo'se it, so they dess do, and they s'ant boo'se it, no they s'ant—b'ess the little sweetness of it! Now s'all it have on its own pitty d'ess? Yes, it s'all—its own booful dressmus? Oh, would it ky some more? Well, well, ky weel bard if oo want to! There, there, there!"—Time.

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Side Line Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1 50 per annum when not so paid

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON
THURSDAY, DEC. 13 1888.

The New York World is getting there very previously. On Dec. 1 it published a map of the United States with Canada all hacked up into nuncement and formed into twelve new states. Gol darn it, gall! The American butchers simply roll in gall. Canada is not growing fat to be slaughtered in this manner, and these sensational American publications may as well understand it right now and save their powder for more indifferent game.

John Dougall and Son of Montreal have hit upon a gigantic scheme to do cheap matter for their publications. They are offering prizes to school children for the best stories of adventure in pioneer life. Considering that all the school children in Canada have gone into the wilderness, fought bears, wild cats and wolves, hunted deer and undergone heartrending privations, we older heads who have lately come into the country will no doubt be exceedingly interested in the forthcoming reminiscences.

Professor Goldwin Smith says, "Great changers appear to be impending, and the day may come, as the Comtists think, when man will become so refined and intellectual that he will regard taking food as an ignominious necessity of his material nature, and will retire to eat in secret." Judging by Goldwin's attenuated form that day has already arrived at "The Grange," but we do not really think there is any danger of the infection spreading. When a man's intellect gets so far demoralized that it is ashamed to let the public know that its proprietor eats, then the intellectual and material nature might as well dissolve partnership, otherwise we'll perceive the result as exemplified in the professor himself. Ah, Goldwin! we thought intellect was getting a cool steam when you began the advocacy of Commercial Union, but now your new doctrine settles the matter. It was not only steamed but cracked. When the Englishman becomes ashamed of his roast beef, the Scotchman of his porridge, the American of his Thanksgiving turkey, the heathen Chinee his rice, or the Eskimo his blubber, then, we say, but not till then, will humanity become so intellectually refined that its material nature won't win the fight when a good square meal is placed before it after a day's labor in a field of rocks behind the plow. No, Goldwin, no!

Every one interested in growing fruits flowers or in forestry would find it to their advantage to take the Canadian Horticulturist, a beautiful monthly journal of high standing, devoted entirely to the subjects, and containing articles written by the leading fruit growers, florists, and foresters in Ontario. The Journal is to be enlarged in the month of January; the paintings and engravings of fruits and flowers continued and used even more liberally. Altogether, it is to be made as interesting and attractive as possible. It is published by The Fruit Growers' Association of Ontario, at $1 per annum, which also entitles the subscriber to the privileges of membership of the Association including a copy of the Annual Report of the meetings and discussions, given verbatim, and a share in the distribution of trees and plants for testing in various parts of Ontario. Subscriptions should be sent in to L. Woolverton, M. A., Grimsby, Ont., Secretary of the F. G. A. of Ontario.

Quantities of American flour smuggled into the Maritime Provinces have been seized by the Custom authorities.

The Presbyterian church members in Durham have discarded their organ. We wonder what these poor people will do when they get to the better land and are invited to take part in the music of the angels. Their ears will surely not be attuned to the harp and psaltry. Music caused a schism in their church a few years ago. The "kickers" cannot surely expect to go where music is a principle element of worship when they depart from earth.

The Durham Chronicle man tells us that the chance for improving our artistic taste is small. We therefore infer that it must be perfect now, as perseverance will always bring improvement to the learner. In the same item he says that, judging by The Advance, we do not evidence a taste for art. Well, just wait until next week. We have a picture of the Chronicle man and his girl in a leap year attitude, which any person will easily recognise, that will bring him to his knees with a jerk. We intend to strike right along in our artistic career, notwithstanding the advice of our self-appointed critic. Look out for next week's paper Bro. Mitchell, and let us know if the likeness is "catchy."

Gip's comic almanac.—This well known annual, for 1889, is now in the bookstores. For ten years Canada's "own and only" Comic Almanac has delighted her people, and the new number is decidedly the best of the lot. The calander pages are unique and ingenious; the double page cartoon, "Irrepressible Tug of War," is first-class, while there are several full-page cartoons of no less merit, and any number of side splitting illustrations. The letter-press is capital reading. Ten cents will secure the book at any newsdealer's a modest tax for so enjoyable a melange, surely.

The special features of The Youth's Companion for the coming year, as announced in the Colored Souvenir we have received, include six Serial Stories, and One Hundred and Fifty Short Stories, fully illustrated. Also Tales of Adventure, Illustrated Sketches of Travel, Humorous Articles, Scientific and Historical Articles, Household Articles, One Thousand Anecdotes, timely Editorials on the leading questions of the day, and a whole page each week for the little ones. The Companion has won a place in the home life obtained by no other paper, and is read every week in nearly Half a Million families. With its Double Holiday Numbers at Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's and Easter, its Weekly Illustrated Supplements, its fine paper, beautiful pictures, no other weekly literary paper can approach it in value. It is really a $2 50 paper for only $1 75 a year. If you send $1 75 now you can have it to January 1st, 1889, and the whole year from that date, including the Supplements and Double Holiday Numbers, and the Annual Premium List with 500 illustrations. Address The Youth's Companion, Boston, Mass.

A Cowardly act.

A colored woman residing near Flesherton sent her little boy into the village on Friday evening last to purchase a loaf of bread and some cakes. When starting for home he was set upon by about a dozen of Flesherton's courageous youths(?), his basket taken from him and filled with snow, completely destroying the contents. The little fellow went home crying, and without his supper. The names of these boys were secured, and upon being brought to task and shown the cowardliness of the act they agreed to more than make amends for the loss occasioned by their thoughtlessness, which was done forth-with, thereby showing that they were not wholly depraved. We think these boys will scarcely act the ruffian again in such a manner, at least we hope not.

General News.

Additions are to be made to the Russian fleet in the Black Sea.

The car ferry Maryland was burned at New York, causing a loss of $400,000.

The next session of the Ontario Division of Sons of Temperance will be held at Kingston.

The British steamer Hartlepool was wrecked near Norway and seventeen of her crew drowned.

Herbert E. Simpson, a photographer, has brought a libel suit asking $3,00 damages against The Toronto Evening News.

A mob at Birmingham, Ala., attempted to lynch a murderer, but were fired on and many of them killed by the sheriff's officers.

A deputation waited on members of the Ontario Government Thursday and asked for aid for the James Bay & Nipissing railway.

The contract for building the new Toronto Asylum at Mimico has been awarded to Messrs. John and Edward Dickenson, of North Glanford. The work will be commenced immediately. The new buildings will be on the cottage principle, consisting of eleven in all, covering seven acres. They will be of brick and will be constructed after the most approved plans, and the cost of the structures when completed will be in the neighborhood of $300,000.

An explosion of meal dust destroyed a Chicago oatmeal mill and killed four men Tuesday.

Priceville Items.

The fine weather and good roads are making business more lively of late.

The majority of farmers seem to be disposing of their hogs alive. There will be a very small quantity of dressed pork in this section of country.

McGowan's flour mills are doing a large and satisfactory trade.

The new church (Presbyterian) is nearly completed. The congregation is preparing for a grand service, to be held in the near future.

Sleighing parties are of daily (or rather nightly) occurence, some of them may end in a wedding party.

The curling club seem to spend many happy evenings with their "stanes" on the mill pond.

Kimberley Public School Report for November.

Sr. Fourth Class.—Peter A. Dynes 339, Ella Carruthers 336, John Dynes 319, F. Thurston 232.

Jr. Fourth Class, J. Howell 148, Geo. Burritt 140, Sarah Magee 134, Edith Gilbert 64.

Sr. Third Class,—John Hammond 140, Joseph Carruthers 134, Mary Stafford 117, Herby Fawcett 108.

Jr. Third Class, Ada Burritt 129, Hattie Dynes 123, Walter Baker 113, Richard Baker 112.

Second Class. Maggie Howell 121, Talmage Dynes 115, Christena Ellis 114, Rachel Lougheed 110.

Average attendance for sr. department 30.

F. J. HEWGILL Principal.

2nd Department.

2nd Class, Wesley Dynes 165, Henry McLean 157, Lillie Gilbert 141, Dawson Knott 127.

2nd Part sr. Millie Hurd 170, Mary Abercrombie 170, Geo. Knott 127, Geo. Stuart 126.

2nd Part jr., Willie McLean 65, Leslie Plewes 63, Mary Knott 63, Jennie Mundle 59.

1st Class, Beckie Hammond 59, Ethel Plewes 52, Clara Hurd 46, Maud Baker 40.

W. C. T. U.

In the light of these facts where is our boast of civilization: A petition has been presented to the King of Sweden, signed by 508,872 people, asking for the absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic in that country. The Burmese King would not permit the sale of intoxicants. Under British rule the Burmese are now legally provided with the means of getting drunk.

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,

Late U. S. Consul to Italy, author of "The Glory and Shame of England," "America's Advancement," etc., etc., etc., writes as follows:

New York, August 1, 1887.
122 E. 24th st.

Dr. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the afflicted impel me to make the following statements.

My voice gave out, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

A Priceless Blessing

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine.

Monthly Fairs.

Orangeville—The second Thursday in each month.
Dundalk—Tuesday before Orangeville.
Flesherton—Monday before Orangeville.
Markdale—Saturday before Orangeville.
Durham—Third Tuesday in each month.
Chatsworth—Monday before Durham.
Holland Center—Saturday before Chatsworth.
Priceville—Monday before Durham.
Hanover—Monday before Durham.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

BARGAINS!

A horse, cow, cutter and double sleigh, for sale. Lumber will be taken in exchange. Apply to J. W. ARMSTRONG.

Dec 7th, 1888. Flesherton.

Mount Forest High School

ENTRANCE EXAMINATION

will begin Wed., 19th Dec., at 1.15 p.m. A handsome diploma presented to each successful candidate.

GOLD and SILVER MEDALS!

offered for competition.

The school will reopen for spring term on Monday Jan 7th 1889.

Classes in teachers' and university work, and vocal and instrumental music.

E. W. HAGARTY, B.A., Principal.

NOTICE!

Notwithstanding the late disastrous fire which destroyed my tannery, I am now prepared to buy as usual hides, tallow, and sheepskins, and will pay the highest prices in cash for them, and request my many customers to continue their patronage. I will use my stable as store house in rear of tannery.

S. [illegible]

Card of Thanks.

To [illegible]

I beg to tender my heartfelt thanks for your [illegible] in saving from destruction my tannery. Had it not been for your determined and united efforts my loss would have been very much greater. By your valued assistance you saved my stock of hides, which contained a large amount of uninsured, on which there was no insurance. I am sorry I cannot offer you something more substantial than only my thanks, and with this assurance that your kindness shall never be erased from my memory. Yours truly,

S. DAMUDE.

"The Week one of the ablest papers on the continent." Descriptive America.

Enlarged and Improved.

THE WEEK:

A Canadian Journal of Politics, Literature, Science and Arts.

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY

$3.00 per Year. $1.00 for Four Months.

The Week has entered upon its sixth year of publication greatly enlarged and improved in every respect, rendering it all more worthy the cordial support of every one interested in the maintenance of a first class literary journal.

The independence in politics and criticism which has characterised The Week ever since its first issue will be rigidly maintained, and increasing efforts will be made to improve its literary character and increase its value and attractiveness as a journal for the cultured home. Many new and able writers are now, or have promised to become, contributors to its columns and the constant aim of the Publisher will be to make The Week fully equal to the best literary journals in Britain and the United States.

As heretofore, Prof. Goldwin Smith will from time to time, contribute articles. London, Paris, Washington and Montreal letters from accomplished correspondents will appear at regular interval. Special Ottawa letters will appear during the sessions of Parliament.

The Week in its enlarged form will be the same size as "Harper's Weekly," and the largest paper of its class on the continent.

SEND FOR FREE SAMPLE COPY.

C. BLACKETT ROBINSON, PUBLISHER, 5 JORDON ST., TORONTO.

Blacksmith Shop for Sale or Rent.

The Blacksmith shop known as Nelson's, on the 10th line Artemesia about 3½ miles from Flesherton is offered for sale or to rent. For terms and particulars apply to

DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Proprietor P. O.

Teacher Wanted!

For S. S. No. 1 Artemesia and Euphrasia, holding a third class certificate, duties to commence 2nd of January. Apply to

JAMES STUART, Sec. Kimberley P. O.

BOAR FOR SERVICE.

MR. Wm. CAMERON, Lot 35, Con 8, Artemesia, has a Pure-bred Berkshire boar for service. TERMS, 75c cash and $1 if booked.

STRAYED.

Came to the premises of the undersigned about the 6th of September, 3 yearlings, red and white. Owner can have the same by proving property and paying expenses.

JOHN TYSON, Feversham P. O.

SALESMEN WANTED

for the New England Nurseries, established over 30 years. The old reliable nursery. Men with push, energy, good habits and clean character always succeed. We can give you good pay and steady work. Write for terms to CHASE BROTHERS' COMPANY, Nurserymen, Colborne, Ont.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 50 to	5 50
Fall Wheat	$1 00 to	1 03
Spring Wheat	1 00	1 03
Barley	0 45	0 55
Oats	0 32	0 32
Peas	0 57	0 57
Butter	0 17	0 18
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	5 40	5 50
Hay per ton	11 00	12 00
Hides	4 50	5 50
Wool	18	20
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 7	0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 06

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts. 2nd door North of Richardson & Co's.

Medical.

DR. CARTER,
M.C.P. & S., ONT.
PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.
FLESHERTON

Office: Strain's Block. Residence: J. G. Russ.

J. G. Hutton, M.D. C.M.

Monday [illegible]

Enquire at office, one door east of Grier's store or Atkinson's Hotel.

Flesherton, Nov. [illegible] 1888.

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.
SURGEON DENTIST
Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the R.C.D.S.,

Will visit FLESHERTON, Marshaw's Hotel 1 and 2 of each month. Teeth extracted, inserted and filled in the highest styles of the art, and at moderate rates.

HEAD OFFICE, 761 YONGE ST., TORONTO.

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST,

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.

Flesherton each trip on the day following.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,
Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office, Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P. McCULLOUGH,
Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, C. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER for taking affidavits, Agent for sale of lands, Agent for Fire, Life and Accident Insurance companies, Conveyancer, and P. P. B. A. S. S. Most reasonable terms. Agent for [illegible] LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Town or Farm Property.

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton.

W. J. BELLAMY,

TWP. CLERK, ARTEMESIA

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT., &c.

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c. prepared and properly executed. Best house offered in first class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any part of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavestroughing, and in fact everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts.

ChristmaS

1884.

Flesherton Furniture

WAREROOMS.

SPECIAL ATTRACTIONS FOR THE HOLIDAY TRADE.

—A—

Nice Selection

—OF—

Reeds and Rattan goods consisting of Gents', Ladies' and Misses' chairs, work baskets, foot-rests, ottomans, Bassenetts, etc.

See these goods and enquire prices when you are selecting your

CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

We have some very handsome —AND—

Lowpriced

PARLOR and BEDROOM

SUITES.

Bedsteads, Mattresses and Bed Springs.

CHEAPER THAN EVER.

All Kinds

- OF -

REPAIRING

- AND -

PICTURE FRAMING PROMPTLY DONE.

All goods carefully packed and delivered a reasonable distance.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND A FULL SUPPLY OF

CASKETS

AND

BURIAL CASES, ETC.

A GOOD HEARSE IN CONNECTION.

Buy a new

HARNESS

PURCHASE A SLEIGH ROBE

INVEST IN

A new Whip

BIG DISCOUNT

FOR

C-A-S-H

D.Clayton

HARNESSMAKER,

FLESHERTON

is prepared to give you large DSCOUNTS for CASH on all kinds of harness, whips, blankets, etc.

A

Huge Stock!

—OF—

SINGLE, TEAM, AND DRIVING HARNESS, on hand.

Sleigh Bells, Robes, Whips, Hoof Ointment, Axle Grease, Curry Combs, Brushes, and everything required in the line of harness makers' supplies.

WE ALSO DEAL IN A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF

TRUNKS

CALL and EXAMINE our extra large stock before buying anything in these lines elsewhere.

D. CLAYTON

N. B. My accounts are now ready and waiting for settlement. As I am in great need of money, all persons who are indebted to me are requested to call and settle, ON OR BEFORE DEC. 1st, otherwise their accounts will be placed in other hands for collection.

D. Clayton.

For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON.

To be continued.

We went to the exhibition which, excepting the Centennial exhibition, was the richest and most extensive I have seen. I looked for Canada's Court and was disappointed to find an exhibit so unworthy of the wealth, resources, and advancement in arts, science, and manufactures of our young country. Far better have had no special court for Canada than one so meagerly and miserably furnished, and so ill qualified to impress visitors favorably with our country. Excuse me attempting to describe the exhibition or the contents of the immense buildings. Almost overwhelmed with the wealth, the wonders of the vast collections from all parts of the world, we went outside into the park, and from one of the bridges over the Kelvin we watched with keen interest the variety of motors used for propelling steam engines, hot air engines, and electric engines, with every variety of paddle and screw. A Venetian gondola, with native gondoliers in native costume, busily plied their craft, and secured their share of the thousands of passengers who purchase a penny sail on the river. We were shown the Queen's jubilee presents in a separate building and in another, called the bishop's palace, there was exhibited a collection of the rarest antiquities, brought from the various museums of Scotland, many of them old and ugly enough, and worthless but for their historic interest. Here was the stool that Jenny Geddes flung at the minister's head in St. Giles's Cathedral in Edinburg where he attempted to read a [illegible]

This wooden stool was the weapon used to strike the first blow in a national revolution, and is one of the most interesting relics of Protestantism. [illegible] Protestants have relics, although they do not use them to rub over broken legs or lame backs to cure them. This one came very near giving the Dean of Edinburgh a sore head in Old St. Giles church, on a Sunday afternoon two hundred years ago. He attempted to carry out the king's orders to restore episcopal usages and began to read the collect for the day. The indignation of the people was hardly suppressed when auld Jenny Geddes shouted "[illegible] ... Keep your [illegible]" and then she let drive with her stool, aiming at the Dean's head, which she barely missed. Thus began the struggle for religious liberty in Scotland [illegible] suffered cruel persecutions [illegible] were established [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] grounds seem to be laid out as a park [illegible] Leaving Paisley we [illegible] the [illegible] of Dunglas [illegible] Roman station at the terminus of the Roman wall. As we [illegible] we have a fine view of the [illegible] rock of Dumbarton, which seems like a huge boulder tumbled into the river. It rises ragged and bold some 600 feet above the surface of the river, and is connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus. The sun was setting behind the western hills of Argyleshire, and for a short time bathed the rock and its grey ruins in gold and crimson lights, and as it dipped behind the hills the outline of landscape and river grew dim and misty and we were at Greenock.

Next morning, taking a stroll still accompanied by our friend Mr B—, from Toronto, who was a charming travelling comrade, we came upon an old churchyard where Burns' Highland Mary lies buried. The gates were locked, but we climbed over and were standing by the grave over which a fine memorial monument has been erected, having a carved representation of the parting of the lovers, beneath this is the word "Mary," and the lines:

> Oh Mary, dear departed shade,
> Where is thy place of blissful rest?

Our meditations were disturbed by the shrill voice of an angry old woman who kept the keys of the churchyard and evidently feared she would miss her accustomed fee. "How gat ye in here, did ye no see the notice telling whaur the keys were keept." A shilling soon settled her clamour, and she shewed us through the church—the oldest in Greenock.

HEARD'S Carriage Works,

FLESHERTON,

—— MANUFACTURERS OF ——

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

FLESHERTON

Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity of thanking his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support at his new premises on the Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable [illegible] Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.

[illegible]

—NEW—

FALL GOODS!

AT

Central Store,

Priceville.

[illegible]

BOOTS AND SHOES.

BOOTS THAT R FOOTS!

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries [illegible]

Central Store, Priceville.

A. McCABE.

FLOUR, FLOUR, STONE FLOUR!

MR P LOUCKS

Is prepared to exchange [illegible] on the [illegible] bushel. Seven cents per [illegible] Chopping done every day [illegible] big in the estimation of [illegible] Satisfaction guaranteed.

P. LOUCKS Proprietor.

Good stabling for horses.

NOTICE.

SHINGLES constantly on hand and for sale cheap. Just put in first-class new Chopping Mill now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B. SLOAN
Eugenia

Farm for Sale

The subscriber offers for sale that valuable property on the 4th line, Osprey, better known as lot 4, containing 135 acres, 90 cleared and 60 under cultivation, the remainder pasture and meadow. New frame barn, stone foundation stables, etc., new frame house, cellar, and stone foundation. This is a magnificent property. Possession immediately. For terms, etc., apply to

A. McKECHNIE, Maxwell P. O.

—It Pays To

Go to THE BEST

AND [illegible]

Northern Business College,

OF OWEN SOUND.

[illegible]

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT & PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S.

TO THE FARMERS AND [illegible] GENERALLY

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH!

G. H. BLACKBURN

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,

PURVEYORS TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Dealers in fresh and cured meats, sausage our own make, lard, bologna, etc. etc.

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only $[illegible] per hundred.

Call and ascertain prices, whether you buy or [illegible]

New Hair Dressing Parlor.

Mr W. J. NELSON, [illegible]

Moore's Block, Durham St.

is prepared to attend to all work in his line and would invite patronage. Hair cutting, shaving, sharpening razors, etc., all done in the highest style of the art.

W. J. NELSON

Came Astray.

Came to the premises of T. A. Gamey, lot and 14, 2nd south of Durham Road, on Nov. 12, a small black mare. The owner is requested to prove property, pay expenses and take it away.

T. A. GAMEY Flesherton Station P. O.

AN UNHAPPY DUCHESS.

Extraordinary Behavior of the Duke of Sutherland.

ALLEGED WICKEDNESS IN HIGH PLACES.

A London cable says: The death of the Duchess of Sutherland has set the upper circles of society talking. It is the end of the first scene of a distressing domestic drama in which Her Grace was the victim, and which recently narrowly escaped exposure in the law courts, where the case was settled after the preliminary issue had been joined. Until recent years the Duke and Duchess were exceedingly happy. The Duchess achieved honor by entertaining Garibaldi first in London society, when the Liberator, wearing a red shirt and buckskin breeches, was surrounded by fair women and great statesmen in the gilded salons and picture gallery of Stafford House, which it is now reported has passed into the temporary hands of the Vanderbilts for next season.

Some years ago the Duchess was appointed Mistress of the Robes, almost coincident with a casual meeting between the Duke and Mrs. James, the wife of an army officer. This lady was as spare as the Duchess was stout, and as dark as the Duchess was fair. Both ladies were about the same age, but Mrs. James' hair was streaked with grey. The Duke was fascinated with the lady. Compensation was offered Mr. James, who, instead of accepting, blew his brains out, causing an immense sensation at the time. Divorce proceedings between the Duke and Duchess were stopped, partly by the good sense of the families and partly by the direct instigation of the Queen, who was an especial friend of the Duke's mother. The Duchess bore the deprivation of her husband's society with exemplary resignation, but never met him except on formal occasions. Meanwhile the Duke spent the autumn, winter and spring yachting, generally in Southern waters, with Mrs. James, whose prudery sometimes required the convenient presence of an easily found complaisant chaperon. Last winter the Duke, meeting Admiral Sir Reginal MacDonald and some other intimate friends of the Prince of Wales, invited them to share his yacht for the remainder of the cruise in Indian waters. All went well till one day when the lady insisted that they or she should leave the yacht. The result was the Prince of Wales' friends were bundled over the side, not sorry to quit the orgies of the Duke and his companion. After this the yacht went to Siam, where the lady's brother is legal adviser of the King, who placed a palace at the Duke's disposal. Here even native feelings were outraged by the proceedings of the party, and the yacht was obliged to leave, to the great comfort of royalty and foreign residents. On his return last summer the Prince of Wales spoke seriously with the Duke, but without result, for the connection continued until death relieved the Duchess. Suffering society is anxious to know whether Mrs James' fascination over the Duke will induce him to marry her. The woman is clever. Her family produced more first classes at Oxford than any other in England, the father having been public orator and Disraeli's host in 1853.

PANIC-STRICKEN CHILDREN.

Exciting Time in a St. Louis School—Escaping Steam Causes a Scare.

A last (Wednesday) night's St. Louis despatch says: A panic occurred at the Blair School to day, and nothing but the great presence of mind of the corps of teachers prevented loss of life. The steam heating apparatus got out of order, and the rattling in the coils, coupled with escaping steam, alarmed the children, who, fearing an explosion, started for the door. Miss Bettina Krebb, the teacher in charge, got to the door first and prevented a stampede. Scarcely had order been restored, however, when the noise in the steam pipes was repeated with increased violence, and before Miss Krebbs could reach the door a second time the terror stricken children had gained the hall. The faithful teacher was borne to the floor and trampled upon, sustaining serious injuries. The excitement spread to room No. 10, just opposite, presided over by Miss Clara Stickle, and the children became unmanageable there. The shuffling of feet and the hissing of escaping steam spread the panic to room 14, Miss Mary P. Miller, and she too was thrown from her feet and trampled upon. The janitor appeared on the scene, and did rough but heroic work in preventing the children from trampling each other to death. A pupil in room No. 5 raised the cry of fire, and the pupils made a rush for the hall. Miss Cullen, the teacher, with commendable presence of mind and heroic efforts, quelled the disturbance, and in a brief period order was restored. Two of the teachers, Miss Miller and Miss Krebbs, were badly injured. Seven pupils were also injured. The panic created intense excitement, and many parents hurried to the school building to look after their children.

Cleveland Had a Popular Majority.

The Boston Herald says Cleveland had a plurality of 79,500 of the vote cast for President, the totals being: Cleveland, 5,569 990; Harrison, 5,490,491. These figures, however, are only approximate, and the official returns may somewhat alter them. The entire vote thrown was 11,285,825, or about 1,250 over the vote four years ago, when Mr. Cleveland had a plurality of 62,683 over Blaine.

Two Signs.

"Don't you see that sign up there?" asked the grocer, pointing sternly to a placard on the wall bearing the fateful words, "No Credit Given Here." "Yes," replied the man who had just asked for a barrel of flour on tick, "I see it. But how about that other sign up there on the other side, 'If You Don't See What You Want, Ask For It?'"

Mr. Sankey arrived in England on November 1st. On the following Saturday he commenced a five days' mission in Bristol. Among the other American evangelists now in England are Rev. George J. Needham, Dr. Pentecost, Major Whittle and Mr. Philip Philips.

BREACH OF PROMISE.

The Suit Against Captain Walpole—Some Savory Evidence—Verdict for the Defendant.

A London cable says: Society received another distressing shock yesterday by the announcement that the heir of Sir Robert Walpole, the celebrated Prime Minister of the first and second Georges, and the future Earl of Orford, had been sued for breach of promise. The case was called in the Queen's Bench Division. The plaintiff, Miss Vallery Weidemann, brought the suit against Captain Robert Horace Walpole for breach of promise and for libel, claiming £1,000 damages.

Not many months ago Captain Walpole and Miss Corbin, an American lady, were quietly married in Paris, and from subsequent events it is presumed that the affair was conducted privately owing to Miss Weidemann's avowed intention of making trouble for the groom.

The principal witness yesterday was Miss Weidemann herself. She is a bright, fresh-looking blonde, the daughter of a North German pastor, and a person of education and refined manners. Although subjected to sharp interrogations she told her story in an impressive manner. She testified that Capt. Walpole met her in 1882 at the Hotel d'Angeleterre, at Constantinople, where she was employed as governess to the proprietor's daughters. He met her at dinner one night and made her acquaintance, much against her will. He paid her marked attention for several days after that, and finally asked her to marry him, at the same time forcibly kissing her.

She angrily left him, and when she returned from the opera that night she did not notice that the bolt catch on her bedroom door had been removed. She sat at the window a few minutes before she knew that Walpole was at her side. She ordered him from her room and tried to ring the servants' bell, but he forcibly restrained her, and, after convincing her that he loved her sincerely, he finally accomplished his purpose. Next evening he dined with her, and as an earnest of his intentions he placed his signet ring on her finger. She has it now, though Capt. Walpole made repeated attempts to recover it. Next day he persuaded her to go to Cannes, and gave her £100. On arriving there she met his mother, but when she spoke of her supposed engagement, Mrs. Walpole told her the captain was only a friend, and that he would be ruined if he did not marry a rich girl. Mrs. Walpole contrived to have her put out of the hotel. Capt. Walpole then sent a friend—Capt. Darlington—to her to take her to Paris, where he promised to meet her. At Paris Walpole told her to meet him in Berlin, but when she arrived there she found that he had no intention of meeting her. She then went to her brother in law, in Germany, where her child was born in 1883.

The witness admitted by implication that when she heard of Capt. Walpole's intended marriage she sent to Miss Corbin the following note: "I shall meet you one day, and you will bear my curse to the —— end of your existence. This for marrying a man you have no right to marry."

The case was continued to day. Capt Walpole denied the promise, and the defence further set up that if it was made it was in Turkey, where no action is maintainable. He claimed that the signet ring was stolen, and the letter which he wrote his agent accusing her of theft is the basis for an action for libel, which Walpole will plead as privileged. In cross-examination the plaintiff contradicted herself, and declined to answer vital questions. Finally the jury interfered, the trial was stopped, and a verdict for the defendant was rendered.

AN ARMY OF TRAMPS.

They Invade a Hamlet in New York They Overcome Armed Resistance.

A Rochester, N. Y., despatch last night says. It was reported in this city to night by railway men that at a little hamlet near Olean, on the line of the Buffalo, New York & Philadelphia Railway, upwards of seventy tramps made their appearance at an early hour this morning, and began to invade the town and ransack the dwellings. A messenger was sent to Olean for assistance, and forty members of a local military organization armed with shot guns responded. This force was not strong enough, and the tramps, it was reported, soon had possession of the shot guns. Further assistance was asked of the surrounding towns. No more particulars could be learned of the affair or the truth of the report corroborated, as telegraph communication to Olean was cut off.

Latest Scottish Jottings.

There died at Arbroath, on the 10th November, James Adam, Inspector of Poor, aged 73 years.

Mr. Robert Brown, long a leading elder in the church at Midmar, and one of the most notable laymen in Aberdeenshire, died last month in his 91st year.

Sir Charles Pearson, advocate, has been appointed Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute, in room of the Hon. H. J. Monorieff, now a judge of the Court of Session.

The Duke of Cambridge has approved of the Ross Volunteers adopting the kilt and pattern of accoutrements worn by the line battalions of the Seaforth Highlanders.

The other day a marriage was celebrated at Leith between a D. D. and a lady whose united ages are 134 years. Principal Cairns officiated. Both have been married before.

Mr. John Sharp, of Balmuir, jute spinner and manufacturer, in Dundee, has given £1 000 towards the endowment of the Convalescent Home in connection with Dundee Infirmary.

The late Mr. David Kerr, of Park, long an elder in Lochwinnoch Church, was a lineal descendant of the noted Covenanter, Robert Kerr, of Kersland, and had the same spirit as his ancestor.

—"Long live the turkey!" says an enthusiastic contemporary. We do not endorse the sentiment. Two years is the extreme limit of old age which should be permitted in a turkey.

Christmas comes next, darn your stockings!

The man who finds fault when his newspaper is damp is equally dissatisfied when it is dry.

MISS WEST'S ROMANCE.

The British Minister's Daughter and Her Little Piece of Heroism.

A Washington despatch says: It is now seven years since Miss Victoria West emerged from a French convent, with a governess for companion, and came to Washington to preside over Her Britannic Majesty's Legation, her father being Minister Plenipotentiary. Miss West was an artless, unsophisticated girl of 18. Her great charm of face consisted in what the Italians call her sympathetic blue eyes. Countess Lewenhaupt, wife of the Swedish Minister, was young, handsome, high-born and very popular in Washington society. She kindly chaperoned Miss West and made all the first calls with her which the etiquette of this city requires. Attached to the Swedish Legation was a young man with one of those sorrows for which there is no help. Mr. De Bildt, while living in Philadelphia, had met and married the handsome and wealthy daughter of Mrs Bloomfield Moore, a lady whose name has long been associated with that of the poet Browning. Mr. and Mme. De Bildt were very happy in their pleasant home in this city. After the birth of their third child the mother was ill and delirious. She has never regained her reason. She had to be sent to a private asylum. Mrs. Moore came to Washington and kept house for her son-in-law, and took charge of the children. The house was on Connecticut avenue, near the British legation. De Bildt and Miss West were thrown much together, and but for the obstacle would have been declared lovers. It was deemed prudent for De Bildt to be transferred elsewhere, and Mrs. Moore, hoping that something might be done for her afflicted daughter, took her to Europe, and at one time news came that she was restored and is with her husband. But this is not so. The diplomats spoke of Miss West as being disconsolate, but she has been brave through her trial and kept up her cheerfulness, and when one sister came and then another she acted like a mother in giving them advantages. She styled herself "an old maid" at 23, but continued the handsomest and most attractive of the three sisters. She has the dignity of a mature woman.

One of Ouida's first novels was founded on a similar plot to this story, only the hero and the heroine were not heroic.

HRONEK GETS TWELVE YEARS.

A Chicago Anarchist's Punishment for Conspiring to Kill.

A Chicago despatch of Sunday's date says: Hronek, the Anarchist, was given twelve years' imprisonment by the jury last night. The verdict was rendered at 11 o'clock, the jury being out about an hour. It was a compromise, many of the jurymen being in favor of a longer sentence. Hronek bore the news well, but his face whitened. His wife fainted in the court-room and was borne out by her husband's friends. Hronek was indicted for conspiring with Chleboun and Chapek to kill Judge Gary and Inspector Bonfield. The plot was discovered by some of Bonfield's Bohemian spies, and Hronek was arrested with dynamite sticks in his possession. At his house a number of infernal machines were discovered, and it was also found that he had concealed a small arsenal of explosives in the house of a fellow countryman. The evidence was conclusive that Hronek was engaged in the dynamite business, and that he was an intimate associate of the men who participated in the Haymarket massacre and subsequent Anarchist demonstrations.

A MINE ON FIRE.

Eight Men Missing, Who Are Probably Dead.

A Calumet, Mich., despatch says: Fire was discovered at the eighth level of No. 3 shaft, Calumet branch, of the Calumet and Hecla mine this morning. A large party of men were working at the time of the fire, which when discovered had made such rapid headway that the smoke was terribly dense and their lives in great danger. All made a rush for the surface, but eight men are missing. That they are dead is not certain. Among them are two Italians named Joseph Mosolir and Toney Catavara. The mine location is completely covered with dense smoke, and the fire looks worse than it did, but being near the surface it is believed the damage financially will not be great. Nothing is known of the whereabouts of the eight men missing. They were working 1,700 feet deeper in the main engine shaft, and it is supposed, smelling smoke, they tried to escape and were smothered. Over 100 men were in this portion of the mine at the time, but escaped.

A Fine Estate Purchased.

Sir Douglas Stuart has sold the whole of his family estates in Perthshire to Mr. John Stewart Kennedy, of New York, a Scotchman who has made a very large fortune in America, and proposes in future to pass half of each year in Scotland. The Murtly and Grantully estates, of 33,500 acres, include some of the best grouse moors in the Highlands, notably Loch Kennard, Rohallion and Durmour, which are respectively leased by the Comte de Paris, Mr. John Bett and Mr. Barclay Field. Murtly Castle is one of the most beautiful places in Scotland. The gardens, lawns and woods stretch for miles along the banks of the Tay. The new house, which has remained a mere shell, will be completed in accordance with the original plans, and become one of the finest seats in the country.

A Suicidal Challenge.

Steve Brodie challenges any man on earth to jump from any three bridges in the country for $1,000 and the world's championship. Steve stipulates that each man shall name a bridge and the tossing of a penny shall decide the naming of a third. Both men are to jump together and swim 100 yards to a stake out, the man reaching there first to be the winner, and the match to be decided by the best two out of the three.

George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, possesses the original manuscript of Dicken's "Our Mutual Friend." It is the only manuscript of Dickens, with the exception of a few short stories, outside of the South Kensington Museum. Mr. Childs has refused $6,000 for it.

TELEGRAPHIC SUMMARY.

There is an alarming increase of pauperism in Montreal.

London coal dealers have raised the price to $6 50 per ton.

The Grand Divison of the Sons of Temperance of Ontario meets in Toronto tomorrow.

The Leeds and Grenville Counties' Council, after a warm debate, decided on continuing the bounty on wolverines.

Deputy-Sheriff Sherwood, of Ottawa, has been removed to the Guelph asylum, suffering from acute melancholia.

Owing to a feeling of dissatisfaction with the action of the Montreal Carnival Committee, it is possible there may be two ice palaces.

The village of Farmersville, between Brockville and Westport, with a population of 900, has become incorporated under the ambitious name of Athens.

Wm. Ewart, of Portsmouth, was found drowned yesterday morning in the slip opposite the own Hall. He was about the village yesterday. He was a bachelor and an Orangeman and aged 70 years.

Early on Saturday morning ex Constable Park was found lying on the sidewalk opposite a saloon on Notre Dame street, Montreal. His head was cut and his arm broken. He said he had been thrown out by the saloon keeper.

Some vulgar men last week at Perth held a wake over the body of "Yankee" Brown. The dead man was dragged from his coffin and placed on a table, a pipe was put between his teeth and other devices of "sport" carried out. The affair created scandal.

A young man named Isaie Charpenter jumped off a Canadian Pacific train while it was in motion at Hochelaga last night, when he slipped and fell under the wheels. The conductor, hearing his agonized scream, had the train stopped, but it was too late, and part of the unfortunate man's head was cut off.

Rev. Dr. Wardrope, Guelph, was elected Honorary President of the Queen's University Alma Mater Society. E. J. Ryan was elected President, defeating C. J. Cameron by nineteen votes. The undenominational character of the college is shown in the fact that the President-elect is a Roman Catholic.

Charles French, butcher, swallowed poison in a mistake for a black draught yesterday. He died three hours afterwards in great agony. His wife caused the mistake, and she is frantic with grief at the terrible occurrence. Three physicians did all they could to save the poor fellow's life, but without avail.

While Mrs. R. Moore, wif of a Sandwich East farmer, and her son and daughter, and the latter's baby, were driving into Windsor, the horses ran away and they were all thrown out. Mrs. Moore fell on her head and shoulders and sustained severe injuries; the baby is believed to be fatally hurt, while the others escaped with a few bruises.

An accident occurred on Friday night about 5 o'clock in the woods, in one of Gilmour & Co.'s shanties, near Madoc. Peter Carl and Joseph Sofa were felling a large tree, and the tree lodged in another tree. When they freed it they found the tree was coming the wrong way and tried to get out of the way. In running away Sofa fell, and his axe struck Carl in the calf of the leg, severing an artery. Before a doctor arrived Carl bled to death. The same axe, after cutting Carl, was struck by the falling tree and flew back and struck Sofa, cutting a big gash in his leg above the knee. Sofa is likely to recover.

Mr. John Bright continues to gain strength.

Mr. Sexton has been re elected Lord Mayor of Dublin.

The Russians are building pontoons at Reni, in readiness to bridge the Danube at a location threatening to Bulgaria.

The British Land Commission has ordered large reductions in rents in the vicinity of Thurles. In some cases the reductions amount to 40 per cent.

Bishop O'Dwyer, of Limerick, has intimated that unless the boycotting of a man named Ryan, for taking an evicted farm, shall cease, he will close the church of the parish in which the farm is located, and suspend all masses, sacraments and burials.

Birmingham is to become a city. Though having a population of 440,000, it is only a borough, as it has been for fifty years, and now is ambitious of a title which, says the town clerk in a letter to the Home Secretary, is supposed to carry with it an accession of dignity.

Mr. Henry George spoke at a banquet in London on Saturday night. Many notable Radicals were present. The first thing to do, he said, was to secure land values for public use, which would open a whole vista of possible reforms. He opposed a peasant proprietary. His speech was received with great enthusiasm.

In spite of the fact that a decree had been issued prohibiting a procession, a parade was held in Waterford last night in memory of the "Manchester Martyrs." The processionists carried banners and were headed by bands of music. The police made a charge on them with batons and succeeding in dispersing them. The people retaliated, using stones as weapons, and a scene of great disorder ensued.

A large vein of coal, of good quality, has been struck near Chamberlain, Dak.

The Calumet, Mich., mine is still on fire and there is no hope of saving the eight imprisoned miners.

Capt. Bundy, of Buffalo, is endeavoring to raise $6 500 to enable him to purchase a steamer to take the place of the Gospel ship, to carry instruction to the different islands, fishing and lumber stations and cedar camps in the lakes, where the men are isolated from churches.

At noon on Saturday Mr. Jos. Williamson, of Philadelphia, gave to a board of seven trustees property valued at $5,000 000, to be spent by them in giving the poor boys of Philadelphia eduction in mechanical trades. Mr. Williamson is 86 years of age and was born in Bucks county. He is the principal stockholder of the Cambria iron works.

Yesterday a bloody and murderous fight took place in the streets of Portland, Ore., between two factions of Chinese Highbinders. About twenty Chinese, all armed with pistols, participated. Over fifty shots were exchanged and the row lasted about ten minutes. Four Highbinders were shot down and two others badly wounded. Four were removed to the hospital, where one died very shortly after, and three others will likely die.

On Friday evening, while switching a train at the Michigan Central Railway yards, West Detroit, Switchman Joseph W. Cleary's foot caught between one of the ties and the rail. Before he could make his situation known to the engineer the train backed down upon him, throwing him upon his face. The wheels of the first car passed over his body, breaking one of his arms and a leg and badly crushing his head. Cleary was taken to the Sanitarium in an ambulance, where he died shortly afterwards. He leaves a wife, but no children.

MRS. FRENCH'S FATAL ERROR.

An Ottawa Butcher Accidentally Poisoned by His Wife.

An Ottawa despatch says: Charles French, butcher, was accidentally poisoned by his wife last night and died this evening. French, who was a total abstainer, closed his shop about 11 o'clock, and not feeling well got his wife to go to MacEachran's drug store and get him a black draught. Mrs. French is very near-sighted, and after ordering the draught turned away from the counter and spoke to MacEachran's brother about a pair of glasses. She had left her satchel on the counter, and into this MacEachran put the bottle containing the draught. Mrs. French did not notice him, and seeing a bottle on the table took it home and gave it to her husband. It was a liniment compound of chloral, iodine and camphor intended for another patient who was suffering from neuralgia. As soon as he had swallowed it French felt an intense burning pain and ran to the druggist's, where the mistake was discovered. French was taken to Dr. Graham's and a stomach pump applied, but he soon became insensible and remained unconscious until this evening, when he died. He was a young Englishman, about 30 years of age, who had just started for himself. He had been married about four years, but had no children.

From the Prairie Province.

The Manitoba & Northwestern Railway is now open for business to Saltcoats, the end of the track. Twenty or thirty miles will be built next year.

Last Tuesday night L. Davis, a Donald merchant, was robbed at Clanwilliam, in the mountains, of jewellery to the value of $2 000. It was stolen from under his bed while he was asleep in an hotel. There is no clue to the thief.

D. B. Campbell & Co. have completed their contract on the snowsheds in the mountains. Mr. Campbell goes to Ontario to take a contract on the Windsor extension of the C. P. R.

The incandescent electric light is to be introduced in Brandon, a company having been formed.

Horace Sims, a Brandon youth, confessed to robbing the safe of A. McLean, a merchant at that place. He hid the money in a pile of sawdust.

The by-laws authorising the city to raise $130,000 for the sinking fund by loan, and $15 000 for the colonization of lands about the city were defeated, only 433 votes being cast in all.

A man named Hector McDonald, of Rat Portage, who had become insane with liquor, started bareheaded and barefooted to walk to Winnipeg. He had covered over seventy miles of the distance when he was picked up by a train and brought to a hospital in the city. He is in a pitiable condition.

Shields, the Toronto boy convicted of stealing a cheque and gun, was sentenced to two years.

A 3 weeks old foundling was left at the door of Rev. Mr. Pentreath last night.

During the year 16 883 immigrants have arrived, being 351 less than last year to the same date.

Epidemics in Ontario.

Diphtheria has made its appearance at Belleville.

There are several cases of diphtheria in Trenton, and one at Corbyville.

A number of cases of typhoid fever and diphtheria are reported in Ottawa. Although not as prevalent as last season, still the cases are numerous enough to warrant it being characterized as epidemic.

Dr. Bryce is in receipt of information from Nipissing stating that black diphtheria is prevalent in that neighborhood and in several of the surrounding townships. The writer complains of negligence on the part of some of the local authorities in not taking the proper steps to stamp out the disease. The provincial authorities will look into the matter.

A Montreal Murderer's Sentence Commuted.

An Ottawa despatch says: It is understood that His Excellency has decided to exercise executive clemency in the case of Kehoe, now under sentence of death in Montreal for the murder of Dogherty, and that the death sentence has been commuted to imprisonment for life.

In the case of Webb, who pleaded guilty of the murder of his wife in Brandon, Man., and of a British Columbia Indian named Tsimappore, which have been under consideration, the law will be allowed to take its course.

Artistic and Ugly.

Rural dame—Have you any pretty wall paper?

High Class Dealer (indignantly)—Pretty wall paper! No, madam. We keep nothing but the most highly artistic designs.

As near as She Could Get to the Name.

Mr. Chookley—It's quite a walk. Shan't I call that cab?

Miss Eastward (just arrived in town)—No; I don't think I should enjoy driving in one of those beautifuls.

Thos. Dean, one of the oldest residents of West Toronto, is dead. He was at one time a well-known cattle dealer, and did a large business with farmers and stock raisers of Western Ontario.

Lady of the house—Jane, who is that girl that just left the kitchen? Jane—Oh, ma'am, that's the lady what works for the woman across the street.—Boston Beacon.

An Episode.

SPASM I

In the vestibule at midnight
Stood the pair
And the sound was low and sweet
As their lips would gently meet,
While dear Charley would repeat,
"Oh so far!"

SPASM II

Down the dimly lighted stairway
Crept Her pa,
And his step was soft and low
As he nerved him for the blow
That would knock the dizzy beau
Oh, so far!

CONVULSIONS.

In the hallway shortly after
Lay her dad,
And his daughter held his head,
As the old man faintly said,
"I think his gloves were lined with lead,"
"Oh, so sad."

MORAL.—And the old gentleman didn't get just the same. J. H. W.

A FORTUNE TURNED HIS HEAD.

The Unfortunate Malady that Overtook Jeweller George Gowland.

For some time past neighbors and friends of George Gowland, a jeweller working in his wife's store at 191½ King street east, have noticed that his mind was wandering. A few months ago Gowland's father, reputed to be worth $80,000, died intestate, and in consequence of the action of a stepmother the estate was thrown into chancery. Gowland's share is said to amount to some $20,000, and as financial affairs with him have not been going on smoothly for the past few years, the immediate prospect of such a change in his circumstances had the effect of causing him to become quite unbalanced.

His peculiar mania is that he is now immensely wealthy. He indulged in monstrous real estate transactions, talked of banqueting the whole town, starting a crack livery-stable and in connection with this latter idea was making arrangements to purchase some twenty fast horses and fashionable turnouts.—Toronto World.

Physiology in the Public Schools.

Bona fide answers: "Occupations which are injurious are carbolic acid gas, which is impure blood." "A stonemason's work is injurious because, when he is chipping, he breathes in all the chips, and then they are taken into the lungs." "The body is mostly composed of water, and about one half is aviricious tissue." "The body has an infinite number of bones joined together by the joints." "The spinal column is made of bones running all over the body." "Digestion belongs to the lower animals." "The gastric juice keeps the bones from creaking." "The three coverings of the brain are the diameter, the perimeter, and the trachea." "The growth of a tooth begins in the back of the mouth and extends to the stomach." "Anatomy is dissecting of bodies generally lifeless." "The organs of digestion are stomach utensils, liver and spleen." "The extent of the mouth helps the digestion of food." "It is far more reliable to drive out the fire of a room and put on extra clothing than it is to put on no clothing and sit in front of a burning fire." "Soap is important in carrying off the fat of the body." "What is eaten by the body has sometimes been taken as food." "The first step in digestion is mastication and in salivation; second, the muscles of the gullet."—Popular Science Monthly.

Barter in Human Hair.

A human hair market is located at Moriaus, in the department of the Lower Pyrennees, and on alternate Fridays hundreds of hair dressers repair to the little place to buy the hair of the young peasant girls. The dealers wander up and down the long, narrow street of the town, each with a huge pair of bright shears hanging from a black leather strap around his waist, while the young girls who wish to part with their hair stand about in the doorways. The transaction is carried on in the best room of the house. The hair is let down, the tresses combed out, and the dealer names the price. This varies from 5 to 20 francs. If a bargain is struck the dealer lays the money in the open palm of the seller, applies his shears and, in a minute, the long tresses fall on the floor. The purchaser rolls up the tresses, places them in paper, and thrusts them into his pocket. Of course, a maiden can rarely see her fallen tresses disappear into the dealer's pocket without crying. But she consoles herself with the thought that the hair will grow again and by looking at the money in her hand.—Gallignani's Messenger.

Wonderful Feat of Memory.

Bets involving extraordinary and almost impossible feats have frequently been made and won. Some years since, when the late Rev. Henry Ward Beecher was delivering lectures throughout the country, Colonel de Meres, of the Troy Times, made a bet that he would sit on the stage with the orator, remember every word he said, and publish it in his paper the next morning. The wager being accepted, Colonel de Meres sat on the platform near Mr. Beecher, and at the conclusion of the lecture went to the office of the Troy Times, and without halt or stop dictated the entire discourse word for word.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Do Not Mourn for Buffalos.

We have cows that give better milk than buffalo cows, and the meat is far preferable to buffalo meat. Civilization has ceased to want even buffalo hides. A recent large consignment that had been stored away somewhere and forgotten proved a drug in this market. For robes other hides are now preferred. The stamp of nationality there is about the animal gives him a sentimental interest, but that is a most uncertain peg to hang the hope of his prolonged existence upon in this utilitarian age.—New York World.

—"Time and tide wait for no man," but when a woman is in the case even time and tide must wait or go on without her.

—Bustard (tragically)—I am ruined—ruined! I can't pay ten cents on the dollar! Friendly—Don't cut up so, dear fellow. Just think how much better off you are than your creditors.

At last we have a key to the whole mysterious affair. The Whitechapel fiend, "Jack the Ripper," as the Londoners call him, is said to be a powerful mesmerist. This accounts for it all. Jack not only mesmerizes his victims, and thus renders them powerless to resist, but puts the London police most effectually to sleep.

FASHION'S LATEST.

Trying "To Look as Much Like Men as We Can."

THREE NEW DANCES THIS WINTER.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.

Three New Dances

Will come into use among fashionable people this winter. One of these is the slide mazourka, which is a partial revival of the old round dance, combining the polka and the waltz. In its new form it has more of a waltz movement than before. The general effect is graceful, and the long, sliding step is sightly, unless practiced too carelessly on an overpolished floor. The other new round dance is called the Berlin, and is very ingenious, since its slow, graceful polka time can be used at will for a galop, waltz or a schottische. Many couples are either unable or unwilling to accomplish a polka and to them the Berlin will be welcome, while it will also be enjoyed by those who like a polka. The other novelty is the Diamond lancers, the figures of which are more intricate and fanciful than any of the showy quadrilles yet introduced.

Latest London Fashions.

"I promised," says Cousin Madge in London Truth, "to give you some further particulars about what is to be worn this winter. Well, dear, it appears to me that our chief aim must be to look as much like men as we can. To have a bodice made as closely resembling a man's shirt as possible is fashion's 'last cry,' to translate literally the French idiom. I saw several of these new bodices at Gloucester Road, when I went with Evelyn the other day.

"One was a pale-blue foulard, made exactly like a man's smoking-jacket in front, with a plaited shirt of white surah underneath, and a man's collar and a man's tie, all in the foulard. The dress was a sweet one, the skirting being also in this sea-green shade of blue foulard, and arranged in folds down either side of straight folds of white surah in front. There were double fronts of the blue, so that if the upper one were to blow back, the under ones were there to act as proxy.

"A very pretty yellow pongee silk dress had the skirt arranged in the same sort of wide plaits from the waist, each being caught near the hem with a bow of shot yellow ribbon. Bands of white silk guipure ran from the waist in the same direction as the plaits. The bodice had a drapery of silk from the right shoulder to the left side of the waist, a graceful arrangement that would be very becoming to the figure. The sleeve was gathered above the elbow and at the wrist.

"A pointed piece of silk guipure was so arranged in front as to look like an underbodice over which the pongee was draped. The high collar had a deep turn-down covered with guipure.

"A delicious ball dress was in eau-de-Nilmoire, the right side being draped with crepe of the same color, the folds looking admirably fresh, as though they had fallen there. A black net ball dress, with large spots of the size of a florin, was made with a bodice in velvet of an indescribably bright, soft tone of flame color. It will be a most effective dress.

"A gown that made me break the tenth commandment before I even had time to stop myself, was in striped tailor cloth, just like a man's tweed suit cloth, beige color. The bodice looked as if it must fit, the bones being molded so beautifully to the fall of the waist both in front and at the back."

Shaking Hands With a Saucepan.

What was there—was there anything that the woman of a hundred years ago did not pickle or preserve? They pickled parsley green to cheat grim winter of some of its terrors; they pickled nasturtions—and a very excellent pickle they make. They pickled the large shoots of elder to imitate the "Indian bamboo." They put out in the middle of May, and the middle shoots are the most tender." They pickled green walnuts "when they will bear a pin to go into them," which is also done to this day. They were aware that "the clusters of elder flowers make such a delicate pickle before it opens," and that to effect this it was only necessary to pour vinegar over them. They also knew that the seeds of elder should be pickled while still green, as a substitute for capers, and that "large cucumbers of the kind called green turkey, prepared as mangoes, are excellent, and come sooner into eating." They pickled radish pods, young artichokes, horseradish, samphire, marigold flowers and more things than can be enumerated. Having pickled nearly every green shoot, stalk, pod and seed, they began to do the same by plums, apricots, peaches, currants and grapes. When they set about making jams, no fruit escaped them, they even attacked vegetables. When they made cakes it was the same. Parsnips, raspberries, etc., were made into cakes, and red beetroot, potatoes and oranges into biscuits. The recipe for violet cakes reads delightfully: "Take the finest violets you can get, pick off the leaves, beat the violets fine in a mortar with the juice of a lemon, beat and sift twice their weight of double-refined sugar, put your sugar and violets into a silver saucepan or tankard, set it over a slow fire, keep stirring it gently until all your sugar is dissolved; if you let it boil, it will discolor your violets; drop them in china plates; when you take them off, put them in a box, with paper between every layer." Can anything be more charming and ethereal than this? The only point at which it seems to touch common earth is the sugar, and that is to be double refined. The china plates doubtless were such as would now make the joy of a collector and madden his wife by their price. Would that the time when women found healthy excitement in turning this mixture out of the pan, with the color of the violets undisturbed by the rude, passionate act of boiling, were back again; it was a time when Satan must surely have found fewer idler hands to do his work. For our own part, we never take up a paper and read some horrible story of a woman's guilt or folly without wishing that the days of silver saucepans and delicate confections were once more with us; it is more than probable that the women who err so greatly have, as Dr. Kitchener says, "never shaken hands with a saucepan in their lives."

Cheese Tartlets.

"These little cheese and damson tartlets, for which I am sending you instructions," writes Cousin Madge in London Truth, "are delicious morsels. Try them once:

Melt about one ounce of butter in a small casserole, then put in about eight or ten ounces of very fresh rich Cheshire cheese, which, however, you should have shredded finely previously; season it with a salt spoonful each of ground mace, saffron, nutmeg, cayenne and the tiniest pinch of salt. Stir it the whole time until it has dissolved, then remove it from the fire and let it get a few degrees cooler before mixing into it thoroughly two wine-glasses of warmed port and two of warmed cream, also the juice of half a very small lemon, and again whisk away to your heart's content until it is all a stiff froth. Set it aside to become as cold as ice, and while it is doing so line little patty-pans with either a well-made short paste or a puff paste. Put in as much as you consider sufficient of the "cheese stuff," also about six preserved damsons, with a little of their syrup. Bake in "quickish" oven until they are a lovely light yellow. Serve either hot or cold.

I myself prefer them cold. Either way, or anyhow, they are very good.

How an Empress Plays.

The Empress dowager of China amuses herself by playing a sort of hide-and-seek game on the water at night without lights. Lately her boatmen have taken to running away and others have refused to obey her orders. The reason for this disaffection is that according to law the penalties incurred should the Empress drown, even were it established that the boatmen were not in fault, include not only their death, but that of their families.

Fresh from Vanity Fair.

Novelty runs riot in the new boucle woolens, and one of the most striking designs exactly simulates the gimp used to edge carriage cushions.

Braiding done in a contrasting color appears on many of the handsomest cloth cloaks, and where fur is used beaver and skunk are easily long favorites.

The polka dot, like the poor, we have always with us, and never more than this season, when it appears on the necktie or the handkerchief of every other man you meet.

Immense round lace collarettes dated a la Pierrot are in great vogue, not only for children, but also for young ladies, who also wear them of colored crepe to match the dress.

It is said that if white velvet be not woven in sunshine, either in spring or early summer, there is no possibility of its keeping color, as the sun's rays alone can properly fix its paleness.

"Enhanced" is the last impossible epithet adopted by London tailors to designate any peculiarly atrocious fold or pucker or wrinkle wherewith it may please them to offend the gazing eye.

Paris just now sends out new winter underskirts woven in imitation of tiger skins, with the deep empire border, and they are so deliciously soft and warm that the bare sight of them is comforting.

Gray is beginning to divide honors with green in Parisian headgear, and in nearly all the models sent out by the best houses the bonnet brim is high and peaked, and the crown low and flat.

Pearl-edged ribbons have gone out of fashion. Thick-ribbed gros grain ribbon, with a plain satin edging, is that most in vogue, and also moire ribbon, which looks so well combined with velvet.

Ribbon plays a most important part in millinery, and as often as not constitutes the entire crown, with no foundation of any kind. In one of these a white wing had been placed in front, with a turnback brim of black crinoline.

Brains or Beauty.

Dufresny married his washer-woman.

Goethe's wife was a woman of mediocre capacity.

Emerson says: "It is not beauty that inspires the deepest passion."

Therese Lavasseur, the last dame of Rousseau, could not tell the time of day.

Racine had an illiterate wife, and was accustomed to boastfully declare that she would not read any of his tragedies.

Heine said of the woman he loved: "She has never read a line of my writings, and does not even know what a poet is."

It is an oft-quoted saying of Dr. Johnson that "a man in general is better pleased when he has a good dinner on the table than when his wife talks Greek."

"How many of the wise and learned," says Thackeray, "have married their cooks? Did not Lord Elden, himself, the most prudent of men, make a runaway match? Were not Achilles and Ajax both in love with their servant-maids?"

Jean Paul Richter declared that he would not lead a woman into the matrimonial noose whom it would not delight to hear him read the learned reviews of Gottingen, or the universal German library, when they sounded his praise, though it might be in some degree exaggerated.

Seven hundred people sat up all night to see the beautiful Duchess of Hamilton get in her carriage, but would one in a thousand lose a wink of sleep to get a glimpse of the learned wife of the pundit Yajnavalka, who discoursed with the Indian in Sanscrit on the vexed problems of life?

John Stuart Mill regarded the institution of marriage in its highest aim and aspect as "a union of two persons of cultivated faculties, identical in opinion and purposes, between whom there exists that best kind of equality, similarity of powers with reciprocal superiority in them, so that one can enjoy the luxury of looking up to the other and can have alternately the pleasure of leading and being led in the path of development."

Doing Him a Rank Injustice.

Dumley (to Brown)—Brown, I understand that Robinson referred to me yesterday as an old fool. I don't think that sort of thing is right.

Brown—Why, of course, it ain't right, Dumley. You can't be more than 40 at the outside.

—— Or for Worse?

Maria—Ye-es, d-darling, I will be yours. Don't ask papa to night; he might refuse. To morrow I'll get in one of my tempers, and then he's sure to consent!

The word "white" has been stricken from the Kansas Constitution.

AMELIA RIVES' SHOES.

The Digital Foot Covering of the Sensational Novelist.

Mrs. Amelia Rives Chanler is nothing if not odd. The other day she went to a reception with her hair in two pig tails, tied across her breast. She has taken to wearing sandals.

A gentleman who had occasion recently to visit the beautiful originator of the new shoes was in conversation with the lady when suddenly his eyes travelled to the edge of Miss Chanler's lovely home morning gown, and peeping out from the lower flounce he saw ten little white toes! Of course he started a trifle, and then his hostess laughed and showed him her new shoes.

"I have long thought of adopting digitated shoes," she said. "It seems to me heathenish to crowd the toes all together in tight shoes. Each toe should be as separate as each finger. Why should we crowd our toes all together and let our fingers go free? You have no idea with what comfort and ease I walk, now that I have adopted these shoes. Of course I cannot wear them in the city at present, but I hope soon to be able to do so, for I am sure many women of sense will adopt them.

Christmas Echoes.

"Now, my dear," said Mr. Younghusband to the partner of his joys, who was about to start forth on Christmas shopping bent, "get presents for all the family-in-law, and buy a little of things for the boys; but don't spend more than a hundred dollars. We must live within our income." "Why, George, returned the lady, in an aggrieved tone, "you told me we'd $2,000 this month—you know you did." And Mr. Younghusband looked puzzled.

"Can you lend me $2 this morning, Mr. Williamson?" asked a beery friend entering the dreamer's office. "Sorry, Barrows, but I really can't." Mrs. Williamson went out this morning to buy a little surprise for me, and she took all the money I had."

Ethel, said the matinee to her daughter, "we must make the Christmas season a pleasant one for the boarders. Suppose we ask them all to hang up their stockings on Christmas Eve, so that we may put some little remembrance in each." "That is a very good idea, mother. We can give Mr. Mouldy a penknife, to Mr. Palette the artist, we can give a box of paints, young Scribbler would be delighted to have a patent lead pencil, and for Mr. Slowboy—well, let me see—what would you suggest for Mr. Slowboy's stocking, ma?" "Mr. Slowboy's unreceipted bill will do for Mr. Slowboy," replied the old lady, sternly.

Have you decided on your presents for the boys yet, my dear?" asked Mr. Hendricks, after the lads had left the breakfast table for school. "Not quite all. But I have decided, William, that they shall all be given something useful. There is no use of wasting money on useless toys for them to break—and, by the way, we need a new rug for the parlor and a dozen tumblers, William." "Ah! well, why not get the rug for George, and give the tumblers to John?"

Johnny was Right.

Teacher—Johnny, I should think you would be ashamed of yourself to run away from school for the sake of boating around in that old, leaky, flat bottomed boat. Weren't you afraid of getting drowned?

Johnny—No m—not so much as on shore.

Teacher—What nonsense! Did you ever hear of anybody going in a boat for fear of getting drowned?

Johnny—Yes m.

Teacher (astonished)—Who?

Johnny—Noer.

The Golden Gate Special.

The Union and Central Pacific Roads and Pullman Company put on December 5th, a weekly train of Pullman Vestibule Cars, to run between Council Bluffs and San Francisco. Steam heat, electric light, separate bath rooms for ladies and gentlemen, barber shop, observation and smoking rooms, and a female attendant for ladies and children, make it the finest train in the world. Fare between Council Bluffs and San Francisco, including everything (meals, berth and meals—will be $100.

A Powerful Simile.

"As slow as a woman walking along the street, reading a letter," would not be a bad axiom to hurl into the language as a fixture.—Puck.

The Old Oaken Bucket
The Iron-bound Bucket
The Moss-covered Bucket

is very likely the one that has conveyed poisons to your system from some old well, whose waters have become contaminated from sewers, vaults, or percolation from the soil. To eradicate these poisons from the system and save yourself a spell of malarial, typhoid or bilious fever, and to keep the liver, kidneys and lungs in a healthy and vigorous condition, use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, the greatest blood-purifier of the age.

Life in Chicago.

Policeman (stopping citizen)—What are you running for?

Citizen—Because I'm cold.

Policeman—Well, don't do it again or I'll open fire on you.—Chicago Globe.

Make a Note of This.

Pain banished as if by magic. Polson's Nerviline is a positive and almost instantaneous remedy for external, internal, or local pains. The most active remedy hitherto known falls far short of Nerviline for potent power in the relief of nerve pain. Good for external or internal use. Buy a 10 cent sample bottle. Large bottles 25 cents, at all druggists.

Strained Relations.

Visitor—The milkman seems to be very gruff toward you.

Housekeeper—Yes; ever since I insisted that he must quit delivering us milk with straws and hairs in it our relations have been somewhat strained.

No lengthy advertisement is necessary to bolster up Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy.

According to Oscar Wilde, George Meredith's style is "chaos illumined by brilliant flashes of lightning."

LUCK-BEARING HORSESHOES.

Leave It on the Door—A Superstition Nelson Believed In.

The old superstition of nailing a horseshoe over the door of a house as a protection against evil spirits, and an assurance of good luck, is as widely spread in the United States as it is in England or Ireland. It also prevails among nearly all Teutonic and Scandinavian races, and flourished largely in the East and West Indies and Hindostan. The old writers tell us that there are three elements united in the horseshoe—in the first place it is crescent shaped, secondly it is a portion of the horse, and lastly it is made of iron. Popular superstition has long endowed iron with protecting qualities. During the time of the plague in Rome, the inhabitants of the Eternal City drove nails in the walls of their houses as a safeguard against the dread disease. When the Arabs in the desert are overtaken by the deadly simoom, they seek succor from heaven by crying "Iron! iron!" Celtic, Finish and Welsh superstitions all agree that against witchcraft iron is considered the only guard. Custom even recites that it has always been considered a good omen to find old iron, and particularly to find an old horseshoe. In the mythology of England, horses were, and are to this day, looked upon as luck bringers. In some parts of England nowadays it is still thought that many forms of disease can be cured by burning a horse alive. A horse's hoof placed under an invalid's bed is considered a specific for many complaints in the north of Scotland. Many years ago, in Ireland, so it is said, upon the death of a favorite horse its feet and legs were hung up in the house and even the hoofs are preserved. All of which, it is claimed, serve as a preventive of all sorts of disease. Even in New York, among a certain class, the superstition may be seen carried out over many a house or shop door. The well-known song which was sung by Edward Harrigan a few years ago, made a lasting impression, and served to remind many of the folk attending the iron shoes. One of the stanzas was

[illegible]

On account of its form, historians state that the qualities formerly accorded to the crescent have been transformed to the horseshoe. The Chinese build their tombs at the present day in a semi-circle form like a horseshoe, and the Moors use it in their architecture. Lord Nelson nailed a horseshoe to the mast of his flag ship Victory and guarded it as if it had been a citadel. Dr. James, of London, who earned the sobriquet of "Lucky" from the amount of money he made out of his patent medicines, attributed his phenomenal success to the finding of a horseshoe, which symbol he adopted as a crest for his carriage.—New York Mail and Express.

I know I'm sick
I feel it
I throw medicine
The deep truly down.

is the mental exclamation of many a sufferer from headache, indigestion, constipation, torpid liver, etc. The use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets however, would transform these unfortunates and cause them to sing—

[illegible]

A Poor Job.

Shoddy loudly—I'd have you to sir, that I am a self made man, sir!"

Letters (looking him over intently)—Well, Mr. Shoddy, you look like it you do, indeed.

Miss Oscar Wilde has been lecturing in London on "National Dress for Women." The lecturer is, says the London Star, very young and pretty, but as a public speaker she has much to learn. To begin with Mrs. Oscar Wilde is wholly innocent of the demeanor of a public speaker. She giggles at her own witticisms, incessantly twists her shoulders, bends her head and explodes in a titter when she reads what she considers a particularly good thing. Her lecture was good in the main, simple, clear, undecorated.

MARVELOUS

MEMORY

DISCOVERY.

Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering
Any book learned in one reading.

Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detroit 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington 1,210 at Boston, large classes at Columbia Law students at Yale, Wellesley Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by Richard Proctor, the scientist, Hons. W. W. Astor, Judah P. Benjamin, Judge Gibson, Dr. Brown, S. H. Cook, ex-N.Y. State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from

PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

DOM. 49 -8.

FOR SALE,

A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,

WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR

All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the

TIMES PRINTING CO.

HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

DUNN'S BAKING POWDER

THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

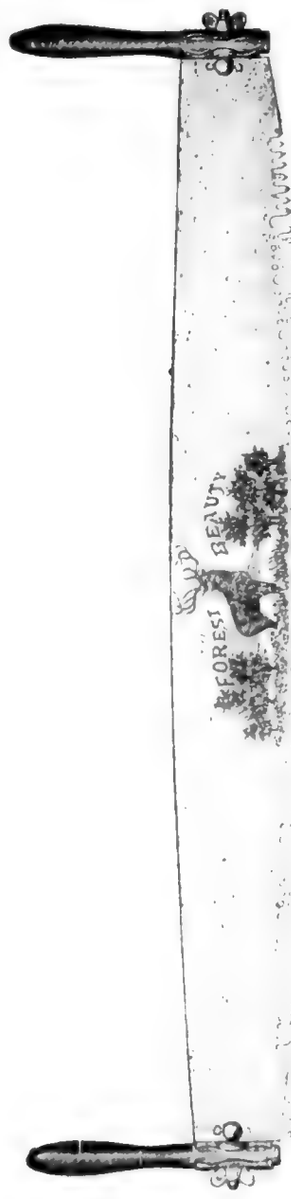
Saws! Saws!



Cross-Cut Saws! Cross-Cut Saws!

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having five gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined siller steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you Another line I would particularly call your attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

The County Council of Simcoe will build a poor house.

The Rep. says a turkey weighing 25 pounds was sold in Mt. Forest. At this season of the year, it would be worth, in Toronto, about $3,50. Pretty valuable bird, that.

A correspondent writing to the Beeton World says that he knows of no local paper "with more news or more spightliness or truthfulness." The first two are all right, but the latter well it shows that the writer has an overgrown swallowing apparatus. Some of Crawd's potato and turnip yarns would choke any ordinary man.

Shelburne Free Press :- It always pays to advertise On Monday afternoon Mr. John Hall, of Mulmur, lost $25 in Shelburne. He came at once to this office and ordered fifty dodgers In five minutes after they were printed Mr Hall had his money. The first dodger given out was to Mr. Mathews of the Massie House, and he happened to be the lucky finder He returned the money to Mr. Hall and refused the $5 offered as a reward Mr. Hall thinks Mr. Mathews is a very honest man, and we think so.

The Orangeville Post is to be issued as a daily for two weeks at Christmas time. The Post evidences this as a proof that the town is growing. Not at all dear Post. Twelve years ago, when we had the ill luck to tackle the printing business, we rolled up our sleeves and started in on the Orangeville Daily Advertiser, published by Mr. Munn It was a very respectable daily, too, and at it for the whole year No, the fact that the Post will run an advertising daily for two weeks during the holiday season does not prove that the town is any larger than it was twelve years ago.

After Many Years.

A despatch from Owen Sound says What promises to be an interesting case will come up before the Police Magistrate in a few days. The circumstances are these: About eighteen years ago a schooner, the Explorer, with a cargo consisting of mill machinery and two hundred barrels of whiskey, ran upon a rock near Tobermory and was reported lost. There was a crew of four on board the captain, his son and two men The captain and his son escaped, but the other two went down with the boat. The story of the wreck as told by the captain, whose name was Waddell, was that then striking the rock the vessel ran hard on and shifted her cargo forward. Sending the two men down to shift it aft, the vessel swung off the rock and went down bow foremost, carrying the two men with it. Reaching this place, the tale was related, and the insurance collected on the cargo and vessel Ugly rumors began to float about. Shortly after, Waddell and his son were out in a small boat on Lake Huron, and it was told by the boy that the boat capsized and his father was drowned; and he in his dripping cloths took the farmer, at whose house on the shore he first appeared, and showed him the upturned boat on the shore. The story was received as fact, and nothing more thought of the matter until about six years ago, when a small coasting vessel, going around picking up wreckage, was informed of the sinking of the vessel with the mill machinery and whiskey aboard, and the thoughts of securing two hundred barrels of "12 year old" was sufficient inducement to raise the boat So they went to work, and for their trouble found the boat had a full cargo of rocks and the two bodies of the crew among them. The bottom had been bored through in several places, and the whole surroundings indicated a plain case of cold blooded murder. These circumstances called to remembrance by some former acquaintances of Waddell, and, to their great surprise they recognized the captain in Chicago, and reported the fact to a friend of theirs. Mr Lymburner of this town, was also acquainted with Waddell, having shipped a cargo of lumber in the Explorer. Imagine Mr Lymburner's surprise a few days ago, when who should turn up on our streets but Waddell. Greeting him as Capt. Waddell, the man replied with a startled glare in his eyes, "I am not Capt. Waddell," and shot past past him. He was also recognized by a Capt. Morrow, who informed P. C. McAulay, who has the case in hand, and is working it up, with good prospects of bringing the guilty man to justice In the meantime Waddell is serving a fifteen days term in jail for beer drinking It is supposed the whiskey was sold and the proceeds pocketed and the mill machinery is reported to be now in use on a sawmill on the south shore somewhere being run by a son of Waddell's. Should the case prove true it will be one of the most sensational ever brought to here The appearance of the man who is now in gaol and known to Waddell, is that of a man of the most desperate character, so much so as to cause the magistrate to remark that he was the most villainous looking individual who has ever appeared before him In addition, there is a peculiarity in his walk which is identical with that of Waddell. The Crown Attorney has taken up the case and is making enquiries of the insurance companies interested.

A large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Felted Stockings, Overshoes, and Rubbers. Mens and Boys' Long Boots, At prices to suit the times.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MES. BULMER,
FLESHERTON

A Positive Cure. ✠ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH REVIEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Koh-i-noor of Medicines.

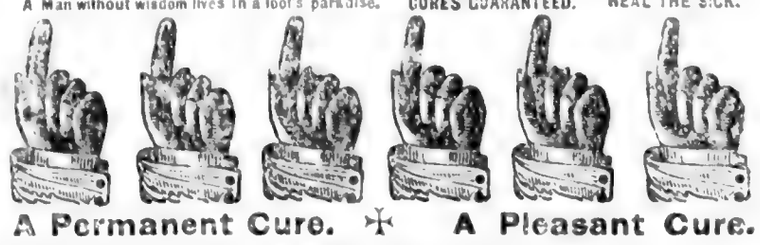
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

Symptoms for which No. 8 should be Used.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, dread for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feeling in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes insanity acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation. Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.



A Permanent Cure. ✠ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, and Bowels.

They are unequalled as a Medicine for Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the Aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT

is unequalled for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For Disorders of the Chest it has no equal.

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and Skin Diseases it has no rival, and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London.

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☞ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR"—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 390. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, DEC 20, 1888. W. H. THURSTON.

XMAS. XMAS!

CALL AT

Russell's Noted Jewelery Store,
Flesherton.

GOLD and SILVER WATCHES,
CLOCKS, CHAINS, BROCCHES,
BARPINS, EARRINGS.

Cards, Razors, Knives, etc.

CAN AND WILL GIVE YOU

BARGAINS

A Ladies fine GOLD AMERICAN WATCH for

Big discount for cash

CALL AT

RICHARDSON'S
Drug Store

AND SEE HIS STOCK OF GOODS SUITABLE

Xmas and New Year's
PRESENTS

BEFORE YOU PURCHASE ELSEWHERE AS HE HAS THE

LARGEST ASSORTEMENT IN TOWN,

BOTH

Useful and Ornamental.

Albums. Satchels, Purses, Cards,
Books, Toys, Sweets, etc.

OVER 500 LBS. OF SWEETS JUST IN.

A merry Christmas

and a Happy New Year to ALL.

Wm. RICHARDSON.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Locality.

R. T. of L. Entertainment.

Birth.

L. O. G. T. Con

Con'tinued.

WATCHES and CLOCKS

JEWELRY. SPEX.

CALL THIS M

Test This State

Bed Rock. Pri

JEWELER and OPTICIAN

MARKDALE, ON.

A Day Cut'e'el.

L. C. Association.

Anniversary.

The 13th anniversary of Chalmers Presbyterian Church, Flesherton, will be held on Christmas night. A Christmas cantata, "The Prince of David," will be presented. Tea to be served in the basement. Admission 15 and 25 cents. See large posters.

GEORGIAN BAY ROMANCE.

An Old-Time Whiskey Schooner Tragedy and Its Sequel.

HAS CAPT. WADDELL COME TO LIFE AGAIN?

A despatch from Owen Sound says: What promises to be an interesting case will come up before the Police Magistrate in a few days. The circumstances are these: About eighteen years ago a schooner, the Explorer, with a cargo consisting of mill machinery and 200 barrels of whiskey, ran on a rock near Tobermory, and was reported lost. There was a crew of four on board—the captain, his son and two men. The captain and his son escaped, the other two went down with the boat. The story of the wreck told by the captain, whose name is Waddell, was that when striking the rock the vessel ran hard on and shifted her cargo forward. Sending the two men down to shift it aft, the boat swung off the rock and went down bow foremost, carrying the two men with it. Reaching this place, the tale was related and the insurance collected on the vessel and cargo.

Ugly rumers began to float about. Shortly after Waddell and his son were out on a small boat on Lake Huron, and it was told by the boy that the boat capsized and his father was drowned. He, in his dripping clothes, took the farmer at whose house on the shore he first appeared, and showed him the upturned boat on the shore. The story was received as fact and nothing more thought of the matter till about 6 years ago, when the crew of a small coasting vessel going around picking up wreckage were informed of the sinking of the schooner, with mill machinery and whiskey aboard. The thought of securing two hundred barrels of "12-year-old" was sufficient inducement to raise the boat, so they went to work, and for their trouble found that the Explorer had a full cargo of rocks and the two bodies of the crew among them. The bottom had been bored through in several places, and the whole surroundings indicated a case of cold-blooded murder.

These circumstances called up the remembrance of Waddell to some of his former acquaintances, and, to their great surprise, they recognized the captain in Chicago. They reported the fact to a friend of theirs, Mr. Horace Lymburner, of this town, who was also acquainted with Waddell, having shipped a cargo of lumber in the Explorer. Imagine Mr. Lymburner's surprise when a few days ago who should turn up on our streets but Waddell. Greeting him as Captain Waddell the man replied, with a startled glare in his eyes:

"I am not Captain Waddell."

And shot past him. He was also recognized by a Captain Morrow, who informed P. C. McAuley. This constable has the case in hand and is working it up with good prospects of bringing the guilty man to justice.

In the meantime Waddell is serving a fifteen-days' term in jail for being drunk. It is supposed that the whiskey was sold and the proceeds pocketed, and the mill machinery is reported to be now in use in a sawmill on the north shore somewhere, being run by a son of Waddell.

Should the case be proven, it will be one of the most sensational ever brought up here. The appearance of the man who is now in jail, and reported to be Waddell, is that of a most desperate character; so much so as to cause the magistrate to remark that he was the most villainous-looking individual who had ever appeared before him. There is a peculiarity in his walk which is identical with that of Waddell. The Crown Attorney has taken up the case and is making inquiries of the insurance companies interested.

KILLED BY A COLLISION.

An Engine Runs Into a Street Car in Detroit—Ten Persons Injured, Some Fatally.

A last (Wednesday) night's Detroit despatch says: This afternoon the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern switching engine, on its way to the Junction, collided with a street car of the Fort and Croghan street line at Croghan street crossing, demolishing the car and injuring ten persons, five of whom will probably die. On the approach of the street car to the crossing the conductor, in compliance with the rules of the Street Railway Company, ran ahead to ascertain if the way was clear of trains, and seeing the engine, he turned to signal the car, which had kept on and was close by. But the signal came too late to Driver Thos. Evans, and despite his efforts the car glided down the sharp grade in time for the locomotive to come up and crash into it broadside. The street car was comparatively filled with passengers, about fourteen in all. When the locomotive crashed into it, the shrieks of the women and the cries of the men were heard a distance of several blocks. The side of the car was crushed in and the car overturned and pushed along a few feet, but a quick reversal of the locomotive prevented further damage. Opinion is divided as to whom to blame, whether Conductor Ross, of the street car, or Watchman Hurley, who did not have the block arms down to stop the passage of teams along the street.

An Embezzler Dying in Toronto.

A Wapakoneta, O., despatch says: Israel Lucas, ex Treasurer of Anglaize County, who fled to Canada about two years ago with $36,000 of the county's money, is dying with consumption. George Orr, while in Toronto, met Lucas and had a long conversation with him. Mr. Lucas intimated that he had prepared a complete history of the defalcation, and left the impression that all of the story of the steal was never told.

A Bride of 16 and Groom of 50.

A Reidsville, N.C., despatch says: Samuel Marsden, aged 50, and Gertrude Gibson, aged 16, eloped from Amelia county, Va., came here and were married last night. The bride, who is pretty, said she had plenty offers from younger men, but they were all drunkards.

That Would Be Nice.

A Mrs. Smith, of Grand Rapids, Mich., was caught in a patent folding bed which shut up with her, and she could not get out until the manufacturer of the bed had been sent for to open the combination. The manufacturer of every folding bed should go with the bed, to be handy in case of emergency.—Peck's Sun

A BLACKMAILING SCHEME.

The Men Who Tried to Entrap Phil Daly—A Remarkable Confession.

A New York despatch says: On top of the sensational developments in the now celebrated "badger" game played on Phil Daly comes a remarkable confession of one of the four conspirators, Herman, as made to Inspector Byrnes to-day. The confession lays bare a scheme of wholesome blackmail on prominent men and forcible extortion of money. The story puts yellow-covered literature to shame. Henry Harman was the green member of the gang. He was pressed early into the service, and weakened easily when Inspector Byrnes (in his presence) made the Stanton woman talk just enough to show that she was willing to turn States evidence. The man Herman is about 30, and is of German birth, and has a wife and children, though he spent most of his time with the Hammond woman. He is a butcher by trade. His last job was at the Grand Union Hotel, Saratoga. He met Meredith, the arch-conspirator, a couple of weeks before the election. Herman says that he introduced Meredith to the Stanton woman, and the quartette went to live at the 4th avenue flat, where the badger game was played upon Daly. Meredith was much pleased with the Stanton woman. She would make a good "crook," he said, because she had the "nerve," and he could make a lot of money out of her. The outcome of the matter was that about Nov. 28th Meredith told Herman that he had fixed it all with Addie Stanton for a big strike, and he would give Herman $15,000 to take a hand. The scheme was to write letters to men of wealth and prominence, to entrap them into the flat. The first who fell in and was "any good," that is, had any reputation or money to lose, was to be chloroformed and robbed. They calculated to get about $30,000 out of their victim by threats and blackmail.

Herman was assigned to the task of tying and torturing the prisoner. Daly, one of the chosen victims, came once and the chance was allowed to pass. Meredith was angry with Herman for it. The Hammond woman, who was a sort of a silent partner in the scheme, was out of the flat when Daly passed through his ordeal. She did not wish to be present at the time. The two men played cards in the kitchen, while the Stanton woman watched for the gambler. At 2 p. m. came the knock at the door. The woman played her part as agreed upon. When the rush came, Herman says he was so nervous that the pistol went off accidentally. Then they ran. What followed has already been told.

THE COMING BATTLE.

Arrival of British Troops at Suakim—Battle Expected Next Week.

A Suakim cable says: The first detachment of British troops arrived here yesterday on the steamship Hodeida, which entered the harbor, bringing from Suez 21 officers, 185 men of the Scottish Borderers, and 100 mounted infantry with horses. So soon as the troops assembled the Arabs opened a hot artillery fire from the trenches, mainly concentrated on the Twelfth Black Battalion, but they were quickly silenced by a reply from the forts and the Racer. The probability is that a fight between the Arabs and the troops under General Grenfell, sirdar of the Egyptian army, will take place next week. Reports put the strength of the Arabs in the trenches at from 700 to 1,000 men. There are, however, many more lying in the bush, within a short distance of the earthworks, and about 1,500 reserves stationed at Handoub wells, eight miles away. Many are merely tribesmen and slaves, but there are among them nearly 1,000 dervishes and ex Egyptian soldiers. The force under General Grenfell will consist of two brigades of Egyptian and black troops, supported by the second battalion of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, one company of mounted infantry, and a small force of Egyptian cavalry and artillery, altogether about 5,000 under arms.

Gen. Grenfell has informed the Government that he considers this force ample to raise the siege. He expects to be able to mass his entire force by the end of this week.

A DESPERATE GIRL.

Shoots Herself Dead Because Her Mother Scolded Her.

A Watertown, N. Y., despatch says: Miss Anna M. Moore, the pretty and accomplished daughter of H. W. Moore, a well-known hardware merchant of Antwerp, this county, committed suicide in a fit of anger, after having been scolded by her mother for remaining out until 10 o'clock at night. The girl was 18 years of age and idolized by her parents. Tuesday evening, about 7 o'clock, she expressed a desire to go out for the purpose of visiting a young lady friend in the village. Her mother asked her to remain at home, but she dressed and went. When she returned at 10 o'clock the family had retired. The mother arose, however, and, going to Anna's room, upbraided her severely for remaining out so late. After Mrs. Moore had turned to leave the room Anna arose in a passion, went across the hall to a closet, got a revolver, a 22-calibre, and, placing the muzzle to her right temple, fired. The report of the pistol aroused Mr. Moore, who rushed upstairs, but fell fainting to the floor when he found what had taken place. Anna lived about three hours after the shooting, but did not regain consciousness. She had threatened to kill herself before when reproved by her parents. The revolver with which she took her life was taken from her father's store.

A Man to be Afraid Of.

Brown (to friend from out of town)—Let us cross over, Jack, there's a tailor on the next block whom I don't want to see.

Friend—Like all you New Yorkers—afraid to meet your tailor.

Brown—Great Scott, man! I don't wear a hundred dollars worth of clothes a year. It's my wife's tailor; he's the only man in New York I'm afraid of.

Dug. Grothers, who demanded $350 per month to play in Buffalo, is now willing to play in Toronto for $200 per month. Ball players are getting sense.

Mr. Gladstone has begun classifying his letters and papers. He has a little batch of 60,000 letters that he thinks worth preserving.

A BUTTON'S ODD HISTORY.

Used to Conceal a Note from a Prisoner of War to His Wife.

A Columbus, Ind., despatch says: A most unique relic of the late war is possessed by George Clutch, Commander of the Isham Keith (G.A.R.) Post in this city. It is a button off of a private soldier's uniform. During the latter part of the war Mr. Clutch's brother-in-law, J. F. Gallaher, whose home is in Ohio, had the misfortune to be captured by the rebels and confined in Libby Prison. The story of how the prisoners in that hell-hole suffered and died from starvation, exposure and ill-treatment is a part of history. After Mr. Gallaher had been there some time he began to feel the need of money, which would enhance his prospects of reaching the Union lines should he succeed in making his escape. A surgeon of his regiment, who was in the prison, was about to be exchanged. He cut off one of the large brass buttons from his uniform, and, separating the two parts of it, made a cavity by taking out the filling. He then wrote on a slip of blank paper, in a small but distinct hand, the following note to his wife, which he enclosed in the cavity and again sealed the button together:

LIBBY PRISON.—DEAR WIFE,—If we are not exchanged by 1st of December send me $30 in greenbacks. Put in a vial canned up in a can of tomatoes or blackberries. Send it in a box of provisions. J. F. GALLAHER.

This note is well preserved and was still resting snugly in its place in the button when shown to-day by Mr. Clutch. To continue the story, the button was made to take the place of another on the uniform of the exchanged surgeon, who reached home and delivered it to Mrs. Gallagher in due time. It could not have escaped the close scrutiny of the officers had it been conveyed out of the prison in any other manner, as the officers were particular to search all of the exchanged prisoners, including the surgeon, most minutely. Mr. Gallaher did not have much hope that his scheme would succeed, even should the note reach his wife, but he was surprised, for the fruit arrived in a short time, and although closely inspected by the prison officials, they failed to discover the vial containing the money concealed in one of the jars of thick preserves. Soon after receiving the money Mr. Gallaher succeeded in making his escape from the prison, being one of the chief participants in the great tunnel expedition. He found the $30 obtained in so novel a manner to be of great service to him in reaching the Union lines. When Mr. Clutch was in Ohio a short time ago he was given the button and its contents to keep as a memento, and it is greatly prized as such.

CONFESSED HIS CRIME.

How a Prussian Village was Burned to the Ground Many Years Ago.

A Kalamazoo, Mich., despatch says: A most sensational confession was made by a Chicago German named Heinrich Schance, aged 70, to Wm Radiger, of Kalamazoo, last May, in Chicago. It was the dying confession of Schance, who was a well-to-do bridge builder. He said: "It was in 1844 the crime of my life was committed. It has caused me untold suffering ever since. One dark night my partner, 'Sugar' Schultz and myself, robbed a barn in a suburb of Colverte, Prussia, of 100 bushels of rye. To throw off all suspicion of robbery, we returned to the barn and set it on fire. A strong wind was blowing, and soon, to our horror, 100 houses and stores were in flames. The village was burned to the ground. The suffering that night was horrible. Many mothers and children perished in the flames. Large rewards were offered for the arrest of the perpetrators of the deed; but we were never caught. As the people gathered at the fire we stole away through the woods. I immediately took a steamer for America, came to Chicago, and have been here ever since. My partner was a braver criminal than I. He remained, and is still living in Colverte, Prussia, where he is a wealthy merchant. Now I feel better, but be sure and not communicate this confession to the German officials." The confession was sworn to by Radiger before a justice and has been sent to the German Consul at Cincinnati.

LASHED TO THE PUMPS.

Fearful Suffering Endured by the Crew of a Sinking Schooner.

A Baltimore, Md., despatch says: This morning the schooner James A. Garfield arrived from Navassa with the shipwrecked crew of seven of the schooner Albert H. Cross, of Philadelphia and Newburyport, Mass. Capt. Henderson, of the Cross, tells a harrowing tale of shipwreck. The Cross left Charleston Nov. 15th, bound to Petersburg, Va., with 495 tons of phosphate rock. On November 17th they encountered a heavy gale, which lasted for several days. On the 21st she sprang a leak. The men got to the pumps, but the waves were rushing over the decks, which they swept clean. The men were lashed to the pumps, and were in that position until November 30th, when they were rescued by the Garfield. The men were completely exhausted and covered with salt water sores. The Cross sank in latitude 33.45, long. 73.40, two hours after her crew had been taken off.

TARIFF CHANGES.

Canadian Customs Rulings During the Last Two Months.

The following decisions were rendered by the Board of Customs at Ottawa during October and November:

Cotton seed bran, 20 per cent.
Cocoanut oilcake, 20 per cent
Galvanized wrought iron tubing over two inches diac., 30 per cent
Letter copying books, 35 per cent.
Parian busts or statuettes, 30 per cent.
Paper boxes embellished with chromos, etc., but without any printed matter, six cents per lb, and 20 per cent.
Pencil cases of all kinds, including gold, silver or plated, 25 per cent.
Suspensory bandages, as trusses, 25 per cent.
Scripture wall texts, not illustrated, 35 per cent; do., illustrated, 6c per lb. and 30 per cent.
Vases, glass, plain or fancy, 30 per cent.; do. china, 30 per cent; do. earthenware, 35 per cent.
Wool (no oils), dyed, 20 per cent

NOTE.—The items "vases" are not intended to include articles that should be classed as "table ware."

The defaulting clerk of the London Fair Association is in New York attending a medical college.

A DOMINIE'S WOES.

Persecuted into Matrimony by a Designing Widow.

LEAP YEAR PRIVILEGE EMBRACE.

The Groom Renounces the Bride at the Altar, but She Refuses to Give Him Up.

The New York World says the Rev. H. F. Auld, a young Episcopal clergyman of Morrisania, two years ago betrothed himself to Mrs. Helen Christie, a buxom widow. The clergyman's friends say she completely bewitched him, and he became her abject slave. The attachment lasted a year, when, on March 14th, 1887, according to Mr. Auld's friends, the widow, taking leap year by the forelock, proposed marriage. This was quite a shock to Mr. Auld, who had loved her only as a mother. She took him to St. Paul's Church, corner of One Hundred and Fortieth street and Third avenue, however, requesting the clergyman there to marry them. The reverend gentleman refused, on the ground that it was Lent. Mrs. Christie then proposed a solemn betrothal, which was willingly entered into by Mr. Auld, and a formal agreement was signed. Finally Mr. Auld, who was influenced by his mother, told Mrs. Christie he could never love her, or even respect her as a wife, but if she insisted he would marry her. He resigned his parish, made arrangements to go to another, and told her that on his departure the ceremony would be performed. Mrs. Christie felt that she was compromised and threatened legal proceedings if the marriage did not take place immediately. Mr. Auld still hesitating, Mrs. Christie appealed to Bishop Potter, who summoned the parties before him. After hearing the evidence the bishop wrote a letter to Mr. Auld, sympathizing with him, but telling him he was bound to keep his word and marry Mrs. Christie. Last Wednesday Mr. Auld, accompanied by a friend, repaired to the residence of the Rev. H. S. Smith, and the ceremony was performed. It was a most dramatic affair. Before the witnesses Mr. Auld solemnly renounced Mrs. Christie, saying: "I will let you be my wife only in name. I will never live with you. I will try and provide for you, but you must never darken my threshold."

Mrs. Christie was just as emphatic. "I love him still," she cried, "and I marry him simply for the love I bear him." The ceremony was performed and Mrs. Christie went back to her home and Mr. Auld rejoined his mother. They have never laid eyes on each other since their wedding day. Last night a reporter called on Mr. Auld. He is a young man, very delicate, and is afflicted with a constant twitching of the head. He was extremely nervous, and when the reporter stated his mission broke down completely. "I have tried so hard to do right," he almost cried. "There has been nothing wrong between Mrs. Christie and myself, and now I am ruined forever because I was weak and foolish. I will only make this statement: I engaged myself solemnly to Mrs. Christie and, according to my promise, I have married her. That is all I have to say about it." Mrs. Auld, the mother of the reverend gentleman, also declined to make a statement except to the effect that her son had been persecuted. "He has been followed by that designing woman until she married him. My poor boy. He thought every woman like his mother. She said she loved him, and now she makes public the engagement which she had promised to keep secret." Mr. Auld, in listening, was so much affected by the turn matters had taken that he began to weep. "There is nothing more for me to do but to die," he said. "My career is ruined. I can see the heading in the paper to-morrow, 'Another Minister Gone Wrong,' and I have been so innocent and tried to do so much to suppress the scandal." "How did the woman come to have such an influence over you?" asked the reporter. Mr. Auld and his mother both groaned in answer. A family consultation was then held and a friend was called in, but they would say no more.

NOW JUST DON'T.

A Short and Concise Catechism of What Not to Do.

Don't put R. S. V. P. on your present to your rich uncle.

Don't misspell the word "presence" in the invitations to your Christmas party.

Don't hang up more than three pairs of stockings if you are visiting friends in the country.

Don't eat two mince pies, a plum pudding, lobster salad and ice cream, and then complain that the climate does not agree with you.

Don't impersonate Santa Claus in a seal skin sacque, rubber boots and auburn side whiskers.

Don't give your guest who has overstayed his welcome a travelling bag.

Don't send the unreceipted bill for her present to your fiancee in mistake for a Christmas card.

Don't decline a present simply because the expressage or postage has not been prepaid.

Don't attribute your bonbon headache to the drum your enemy sent your son.

Don't borrow money from your friend to pay for his present.

Don't present your wife with a handsome mahogany cigar box; and

Don't expect your husband to be pleased if you give him an ivory-backed hand-mirror.

A Popular Song Writer.

Mr. Milton Wellings, author of "At the Ferry," "Some Day" and other popular songs, says he has no definite time for writing. He works when the steam is up, and this often in the evenings. But music does not nearly absorb his whole energy. He writes musical criticisms, dabbles in fiction and is a bit of a painter. He is also an athlete and hates the affectation of art. "That kind of hypocrisy covers a multitude of faults," he said. "I dislike verse, too," Wellings added vigorously. "Do you ask why?" He drew from a drawer a huge heap of manuscript, with which he explained he was every day inundated.

A special proverb—Man proposes, but woman mustn't.

OLD WORLD NEWS BY MAIL.

Latest from Ireland.

Reports received from Ireland record the partial failure of the potato crop.

Mrs. Malone, stated to be 105 years of age, died at Ennistymon, Clare, the other day.

The Land Commission has reduced the rents on the Kenmare estates at Killarney 50 per cent.

The construction of the Mitchelstown & Fermoy Railway is to be commenced immediately.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Laws has been conferred upon Rev. Hugh Hanna, D.D., of Belfast, by Galesville University, Wisconsin.

Mr. Rathbone, a Dublin gentleman, and a large number of merchants were cruelly hoaxed the other day. From early morning tons of coal were brought in rapid succession to the house of Mr. Rathbone, nearly all the coal merchants in the city having received orders. After these came funeral carriages, a hearse, furniture floats and vans. The thoroughfare was crowded. The victims of this stupid fooling are naturally greatly incensed.

Latest from Scotland.

Mr. Graham Murray has been appointed senior advocate-depute of Scotland.

Six hundred pounds has been subscribed to the fund for the erection of a Burns statue in Ayr.

Profs. Smith and Smeaton, of the New College, Edinburgh, complete this year the jubilee of their ministry.

On November 16th the members of Edinburgh Town Council presented Lady Clark, the wife of ex Provost Clark, with a diamond pendant.

Jessie King, one of the persons in custody in connection with the alleged child murders in Stockbridge, Edinburgh, has made a full confession of her guilt.

Dr. Ritchie, of Duns, Mr. Hogarth, of Stranraer, and Principal Morison are the only three remaining in service in Scotland of those who began their studies in the Secession Hall in 1834.

Rev. Dr. Gloag, of Galashiels, is to be nominated as Moderator of the Established Church Assembly of Scotland next year, and Rev. John Laird, Cupar-Fife, as Moderator of the Free Church.

Rev. Robert Thomson, Ladywell, Glasgow, is threatened with eviction from the Island of Inchcolm, of which he has been sub-tenant since the beginning of the present year. The Earl of Moray objects to him as a tenant.

Over 100 members of Stonehaven Free Church congregation have petitioned the Presbytery to establish a preaching station there, as they wish to sever their connection with the Rev. J. Robertson, whose preaching they consider "borders upon profanity and blasphemy, and fitted to bring the pulpit and its ministrations into contempt."

The ceremony of handing over the Wallace sword, which has lain in Dumbarton Castle for nearly six centuries, to the authorities of the National Wallace Monument on Abbey Craig took place in Stirling on the 17th ult. On behalf of the War Office, Colonel Nightingale, the commanding officer of the district, formally conveyed the weapon to the custodians of the monument, and afterwards Provost Yellowlees gave a public reception, at which Dr. Rogers gave a brief historical sketch of the sword, dealing particularly with the proofs of its genuineness.

"GOOD OLD VICTOR!"

How a Parrot's Salutation Led to a Swindler's Arrest.

Detectives obtain their hints and clues from many sources, but it is not often that they receive them through the instrumentality of parrots; yet this is just what has happened during the researches of M. Goron, the head of the Paris criminal department. This officer has been lately looking for the chief accountant of the "Catusse Band," a fellow named Victor Chevalier, and, going the other day into the rooms of a notorious receiver of stolen goods in Paris, he heard himself addressed in harsh tones as "Good old Victor; there you are!" This was enough for the detective, who, having silently satisfied himself that the loquacious bird was the property of the man for whom he was looking, proceeded to search the receiver's den for indications of a more substantial character.

After a long and minute investigation of the premises he found a letter from Victor to the receiver, in which epistle the robber announced that he was in Angers under the name of Felix Crozet. M. Goron immediately set out for that town, and arrested the owner of the too voluble parrot in the railway station.—Paris letter in London Telegram.

Mysterious Psychological Perceptions.

Prof. Edward Payson Thwing, M. D., Ph. D., for four years President of the Academy of Anthropology, New York, reports the four following: "The wife of Dr. W., a physician near Boston, had a dream or vision one night in which she distinctly saw her aunt. This lady resided several hundred miles away in a distant city. She appeared to be walking in the city, descending a hill toward a railway track. The dreamer saw the movement of her aunt as she approached the rails, and also that of a passing train, by which she was killed. A few days after a letter was received which narrated the death of the lady at the very place and under the very circumstances described.

The same person, at another time, woke in the morning with the conviction that a certain neighbor was dead, and so remarked to her husband, the physician. Neither of them had had any personal acquaintance with the individual. As they dressed and looked out of the window the first object seen was a crape on their neighbor's door. The lady had just passed away.

"The night that President Lincoln was murdered a neighbor of mine, writes a physician, declared that the President was killed by an assassin. It was several hours before the news reached the town.

"The wife of a New York clergyman made a similar statement just before the news arrived of the murder of President Garfield, and said that she saw him in a railway station surrounded by ladies and others."—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

shall never be able to call this girl my own, and have lost a noble heart."

It had become dark while we talked, though we had not noticed it. It had seemed to me that I heard wheels halt before the house and steps in the anteroom. Then all was still again. My friend was just going to his writing-table to fetch a light, when the door flew open and a flood of light streamed into the room. Was it a fairy scene that met my eyes, did our excited fantasies deceive us, or were we dreaming with eyes wide open? In the open doorway, carrying in her hand a little Christmas tree, ornamented with burning candles, stood Tenzile; in the other hand she held a letter.

I sprang to my feet, and Dr. Franzeen stood as though transfixed, with staring eyes, pale and trembling, with his hands raised as though to ward off an apparition.

At this moment an elderly woman, whom I recognized as the housekeeper of Mrs. Carlson, stepped from behind the girl, took from her the letter, and with the words, "From my mistress, for the Herr Doctor," laid it in Franzeen's hand.

He looked at the letter, and opened it as if in a dream. For a long time he read, nor seemed to know what he was reading. Again and again he read. His pale face took on some color, the light returned to his eyes, and sinking into a chair he wept aloud.

The beautiful girl looked with affright at this singular man, and trembled perceptibly.

I did not deem it an indiscretion to pick up and read the letter. It was from Mrs. Carlson.

DEARLY BELOVED FRIEND:—I have learned that you turn for happiness elsewhere than to me. My life-aim is your happiness; hence I have bought the girl that is to bring you this message to-day, in order that you may be reminded, on each return of the holy eve, that I have loved you truly deeply and sincerely, and that I have placed your happiness above my own. My only wish is that you may make the lovely being happy, and that you may be made happy in your choice. Tenzile will return with my servant to her former mistress, and will remain with her as your betrothed until the necessary formalities for the wedding have been arranged. FLORA CARLSON.

While I was reading the letter Dr. Franzeen had risen and now stood calmly before the beautiful slave.

"You know what is contained in this letter?" he quietly asked.

"Yes," answered the girl, without raising her eyes, but with blushes suffusing her cheeks.

"You are satisfied with the destination the European lady has in view for you?"

"My duty is to obey," Tenzile answered tremblingly.

"Do you follow duty's call in this case with love—with your heart?" Dr. Franzeen questioned further.

Tenzile raised her eyes to his for a moment, fully and calmly, and said:

"Why should I not? I shall be to you a faithful servant."

"Not servant—my wife you are to be. Know you that?"

"It has been told me," came from her full, fine lips.

"And does not your heart leap with joy at the thought?" questioned Dr. Franzeen; "do you not feel a nameless happiness because of this?"

"I am rejoiced," said the girl.

"And if you had to belong to another man, would that make you unhappy?" the young physician continued, slowly.

"Then I would serve him, as it is my duty to do."

"Gladly?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you would not be unhapdy if you could not belong to me?"

Tenzile smiled. "I would gladly see in you my future lord."

"You would not, however, feel unhappy, disconsolate, sad, if you could not belong to me?" persevered the young man.

"No," said Tenzile with the same smile.

The conversation had been carried on in the Turkish language. My friend now turned to me.

"The dream is over," he said: "I thought myself beloved. The girl belongs to another world than the one in which we live. She is a beautiful image, a beautiful plaything, but no wife for a Christian. Even if the letter and the mode of action of Mrs. Carlson had not already opened my eyes to a revelation, what nobility there may be in a woman, what she may be capable of, the purity of her love, the last few moments have torn from my eyes the veil that passion and intoxication of the senses wove over them. I go to throw myself at the feet of that woman, and to beg her forgiveness. This is the second time she has proved my saviour."

"Josepha," he continued, addressing the elderly companion of the girl, "do you go back to your mistress, conduct this pretty child to her, and tell her that I shall be with her in a few minutes to express my thanks."

Smiling sweetly, Tenzile took her leave and disappeared with the housekeeper. Darkness again fell upon the room.

"You will excuse me?" asked Dr. Franzeen; "I shall attempt to obtain forgiveness," he added simply.

"I know that you will find it."

We parted with a long pressure of the hands that said more than words could have expressed, and I returned to my lodgings.

I might have been at home an hour when I heard a waggon stop before the house, and in a few minutes Mrs. Carlson's little, gray-headed American servant stood before me with an invitation to come to the villa as quickly as possible, and to make use of the carriage she had sent.

I ran down to the carriage in such haste that the old fellow could scarcely keep up with me.

Stepping into the drawing-room I found Mrs. Carlson and Dr. Franzeen standing, hand in hand, with that bliss shining from their eyes that only such moments can bring forth; bliss such as probably no human twain experience a second time in this life. On a side table stood the Christmas tree that Tenzile had borne. The young girl had already returned to her former mistress.

How the reconciliation took place I never had a precise account. Dr. Franzeen merely hinted that he had said about the same thing to her that he had in his room to me—for that was all that at the moment he could think of. When he stepped into the lady's room and exclaimed, "Forgive me, forgive me! I have dreamed a hasheesh dream, but am now awake and see but you alone in this world" Mrs. Carlson fainted and lay senseless in his arms. At last she opened her eyes wide, looked deeply and gravely into his, slowly put her arms about his neck and pressed her lips to his.

In far-away Turkey there was a "Merry Christmas." And so may the coming holiday prove to each and every one of our readers!

SLAVES IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

Poor Girls Enticed From Their Homes and Sold.

An extensive female slave trade is still carried on in Constantinople, in spite of the consuls of the Christian powers. Hardly a week passes without the arrival of a white-haired courier, between 65 and 70 years old, accompanied by a convoy of young girls, mostly from poor families in Galicia, whom he has induced to come with him to the Turkish capital, under the promise of a "splendid" situation or a "rich marriage." The Austrian consular officials, as well as those of other Powers, have kept a wakeful eye upon this old scoundrel, and stopped him from landing his "wares" in Constantinople itself. It is now discovered that he takes them to a spot where they are out of reach of European law, Kawak, the Turkish quarantine station on the Bosphorus. Here they are unshipped, and sent ultimately to Constantinople by the land route to Bujukdere. Here not a soul is troubled about their deplorable fate, and their redemption from the horrors prepared for them is only possible through energetic foreign help. The "proprietor" takes them to a certain bourse, called the Casino, where his living wares are dealt with exactly as if they were dead matter or shares. The price for the "coarser wares," as they are brutally described, varies from $150 to $300. The price of the "finer wares" is higher, reaching the level sometimes of $1,200. They are bought for customers in Smyrna, Alexandria, Cairo and other places under Mohammedan rule. The "brokers" attempt to conceal the nature of their trade by deceptive advices; for instance, "expect three dozen silver spoons" (which is technical for the "finer wares;" or "we send five vessels of meal" (a medium quality;) or "eight sacks of potatoes" (the coarsest quality).

Cullings from Grip's Comic Almanac for '89

Is a roguish Irishman an arrah-nt rogue?

A female domestic is a woman out at hire. A lady in full dress at the opera is a woman out —— or, rather, in attire.

How sharper than a banana peel it is to have a sidewalk tobogganing child!

These days, give a man an invitation and he takes a smile.

One man can lead himself into the belief that his sidewalk needs cleaning; but it takes a policeman, a summons to appear, and a $2 fine to make him drink—the bitter dregs of remorse and rage.

"When the Leaves begin to Fall" is a touching ode—to the heart. "When the Bills begin to Fall Due" is a touching ode to the pocket.

Given no coal ashes on the sloping pavement or given no patent creepers! Find how soon the ambulance will get there.

There is one disadvantage in Canadian agriculture. You can't raise an ice palace that will keep over summer.

"Have I your implicit trust, Adeline Evangeline?" he asked anxiously. "Yes, George Algernon St. Albans," she responded. "Your perfect confidence?" "Aye." "Sure." "Then, say, girly, can I strike you for half a dollar to pay my washerwoman?"

The First of the Season.—"What's the matter, John? You look down in your luck." "No, not exactly; but a few minutes ago, up street, I was down on my back."

There are two phrases which grew from Canadian politics, and which are indelibly inscribed on the annals of Canadian newspaperdom. "The Brawling Breed of Bribers" was coined by Christopher Finlay Fraser, and "The Puling Policy of Prating Partizans" was evolved from the brain of the late James Fahey. There is still another, but there haint nothin' to it.

Mrs. Langtry's Toilet Set.

Probably the most unique set of silver in this country belongs to Mrs. Langtry; it numbers over 200 pieces, not one of which is modern, except the beautiful Venetian mirror, which is framed in silver lilies, and shows the monogram of the Lily herself just on top. Silver brushes that the Venetian ladies of old used for their golden locks are now in the possession of this latter-day beauty. Then there are curious boxes in which the old Hollanders kept their finest tobacco, and that now holds hair-pins or any of the little knick-knacks of a woman's toilet. Mirrors carved by famous silversmiths of long ago, and that reflects the faces of other happy and beautiful women, and jars in which they kept the powder that made their hair white, or the rouge that made their cheeks pink. Silver flasks that held the veritable aqua-toffana, now bottle very innocent drugs, and great perfume jugs that once knew mysterious Oriental sweets are now overflowing with wood violet. The silver tops to the cut-glass bottles were in the long ago the cases of watches; in those days the covering was elaborately carved in scenes of the chase, and the watch was a source of great pride to its owner. The candlesticks once lighted the way to a bridal in Ireland, or stood at the head of a coffin, and the great silver holder so elaborately carved, and in which rests a big blue pin-cushion, was once brought on the table with a wooden bowl in it, in which were smoking hot those strange new vegetables imported from Virginia to Ireland and known as potatoes. It has taken Mrs. Langtry eleven years to collect this silver, and, after all, when is a silver set complete?

Gems of Wisdom.

No comforter's head ever aches.—Italian Proverb.

Things promised are things due.—French Proverb.

He who is feared by many fears many.—German Proverb.

He that will, does more than he that can.—Portuguese Proverb.

There is no house without its hush! hush!—Spanish Proverb.

Let every one look to himself and no one will be lost.—Dutch Proverb.

No solitude is so solitary as that of unharmonious companionship.—Phelps.

FARM AND GARDEN.

A Prolific Animal.

Mr. Rufus Wickens, of Kimberley, has a 2-year-old sow which downs the record. Within eighteen months past she has given birth to, and raised, thirty-seven porkers. She is now caring for a litter of ten. The sow herself is black, and the pigs are pure white.—Flesherton (Grey Co.) Advance.

Don't Carry Apples in Bags.

When I was a small boy, my father said: "Remember, never to carry apples or potatoes in bags or sacks, if you do not want them bruised." I have always remembered this very important advice. After I became a man and began to understand the reason and philosophy of the wise caution, I perceived that when a bag is filled with apples and they are lifted and tumbled about, as bags of salt and grain are handled, a large portion of the apples will be bruised, for the reason that the sides of the bag (the bag itself) and the weight of the apples will operate with a leverage by way of bruising a few apples on one side, and then on the other, until many of the apples will be badly bruised. Then, when a bagful of apples may be stood on one end, almost the entire weight of the packet will rest on a few apples at the bottom, the sides of which will be bruised or crushed in, to the great damage of the fruit.

If we fill a bag with eggs and oats (as eggs are usually packed in a barrel) and attempt to handle the packet, it will be perceived at once that too much pressure will crush eggs in many parts of the package. Eggs are not shipped to market in sacks, for the simple reason that a bag or thickness of canvas is not sufficient to protect the eggs from injury. For the same reason, fruit and potatoes cannot be transported in sacks without being damaged more or less. Sweet potatoes are frequently transported in sacks, when they get so badly bruised that they decay. Then buyers wonder what can make their sweet potatoes decay so soon.

Importers of valuable crockery often sustain great losses in consequence of having it packed in large and limber crates made of small trees and branches of trees. When a crate of crockery is hoisted from a ship it bends and twists and yields in many ways, thus operating on much of the contents with a powerful leverage, sufficient to break and ruin half the contents of the package. If the crate is stiff, like a strong box or hogshead, very few pieces will be broken. Thus it is with fruit. If apples, or pears, or sweet potatoes are well packed in a strong barrel or box, they will escape all that damage which will inevitably ensue when such commodities are transported in bags.—E. S. Todd in Country Gentleman.

Weed Out the Stock.

The American Agriculturalist says: "Now is the time to get rid of the poorer animals. It will not pay to winter them, as better animals will give larger returns for shelter, care and feed. It is not economy to keep a poor animal through any season; but it is most extravagant to keep it through the winter. It is the height of folly in stock-raising to sell the best and keep the worst. True, the best bring the largest prices, but if you sell the best and keep the worst, soon your best will be no better than your worst is now, and your worst will be such that the more you have the poorer you will be. You, by this plan, constantly make your animals poorer, and as the stock raiser makes his animals poorer he makes himself poorer. If he keeps up the process, bankruptcy is as sure as fate. The opposite policy is the winning policy. Sell the poorest and retain the best. And sell enough of the poorer animals that you may buy a few better than the best you now have. This is making your animals constantly better and yourself richer. Soon your worst will bring as much as your best now. If you have not the pure-bred animals, sell enough scrubs or grades to buy an animal of each sex, pure-bred. Hold fast to the full-blooded produce, and to the highest grades. Almost before you are aware of it you will have only pure-bred animals. If once we start with pure-bred animals, the increase of breeding make us rich in flocks and herds of the best blood in what, when the goal is reached, seems a very short time.

Standing by the Jerseys.

I have little fear of the future, near or distant, of the American Jersey breeder. The most interesting feature of the present condition of the Jersey market, however, is the evident absorption by the farming and dairy interest of the large majority of the Jerseys sold to-day. They are going, just where breeders want them to go, into the hands of those who buy largely on their faith in the capacity and practical usefulness of the Jersey in the butter dairy. Of course breeders would like to get better prices as the reward of their intelligent efforts in breeding; yet there is no field which the legitimate breeder more confidently seeks for the sake of the Jersey's reputation than that of practical service in the dairy of the farmer. It would seem to be a work of supererogation to recount the merits of the Jersey at this late date; suffice it to say that unquestionably the Jersey will produce more butter on the same amount of feed than any other breed known. The Guerneseys come nearer than any others, but they have not been so carefully developed for superior production. Farmers may rely on the truth of this assertion. I know that the large udders of the Holsteins are very attractive. I have seen specimens of the breed that were very superb models in form, externally, of the milch cow; but let a farmer buy one of these thirty-quart cows, and place her alongside of a fifteen-quart Jersey for a competitive test, and I venture the assertion that the quantity of hay and grain necessary to enable the Jersey to produce twelve pounds of butter a week would, if fed to the Holstein, cause her yield to fall in three months to ten quarts, with a butter capacity of probably six pounds a week. Farmers must not lose sight of the fact that the most profitable butter cow is the one that will make a pound of butter at the lowest cost for feed. I once took three quarts of pure milk of a well-bred and splendidly formed Holstein and set it for cream. I also took a quart and a pint of Jersey milk, to which I added a like amount of water, and set the mixture for cream. The adulterated Jersey milk showed one-fifth more cream than the pure Holstein milk. If you have a market that does not regard the quality of milk, it may pay to keep Holsteins. In Connecticut and New Jersey it is not considered a safe operation to sell Holstein milk unless labelled skim milk, since the law requires that whole milk shall show in those States respectively 13 and 12 per cent. solids. There can be no question that for profitable production of butter the Jersey cannot be equalled, much less excelled, and so I am pleased to see farmers investing in Jerseys. I know of many instances of farmers buying high grade and pure Jerseys for the butter dairy, and I never knew of an instance of their being discarded when once thoroughly tried. On the other hand, I have heard them say they were worth as much again as the ordinary cow of the country for butter production. There never was a time when so good a grade or quality of Jerseys could be bought as to-day. In the past ten years the breeding community has been educated to appreciate the inestimable value of the bull in all breeding problems. Every breeder has striven to have as the leader of his herd the very best bull he could afford to buy, and with the use of such bulls, the offspring of comparatively poor cows have been, so to speak, graded up to a higher level of merit, and the average intrinsic value of Jerseys bred in this country in the past five years is probably 100 per cent. superior to that of animals bred ten or fifteen years ago. Hence it is a good time for farmers to buy. I know that in the practical test of actual performance in the dairy, the Jersey cow will not disappoint, while by the time that farmers shall have built up their herds to a fulness that seeks a market for their surplus stock, they will find a demand at prices that will soon reimburse them for their original outlay.—G. W. Parker in Country Gentleman.

A Scientist's Delusion.

I once asked Prof. Tyndall how he accounted for the spiritualistic belief of a certain eminent man of science. He replied: "That man's intellect is a loom. Give him his facts, he will vigorously weave them; but his discrimination as to what are facts is faulty, and he will sometimes weave rotten along with sound threads into his weft." Not long after a female medium—a favorite with these spirit scientists—was detected by two gentlemen of the British Museum. While the spirit was walking about the room under a dim light she was clutched by one and the other, striking a powerful light, revealed the form of the medium supposed to be securely bound with sealed knots in a cabinet. The facts were certified in the Times. They were admitted. But the scientific man whose judgment Dr. Tyndall questioned wrote a letter to the Times maintaining that the spirit, not being able to materialize that evening, had that evening utilized the medium's body without that medium's consciousness or knowledge. What wise spirits! To select for this exceptional performance the particular evening when two scientists were present with apparatus for bringing their medium into disgrace! Yet such was the degree to which emotional enthusiasm could smother the brain which, simultaneously with Darwin, discovered the law of evolution!—Open Court.

The Power of Ink.

"A small drop of ink, falling, like dew, upon a thoughts, proclaims that which makes thousands, perhaps millions, think," wrote Byron. The inspiration of his pen might give the dusky fluid such a far-reaching power, and we wish we were possessed of such an inspiration that we might, through a like medium, bring into such extended notice the matchless virtues of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, those tiny, sugar-coated granules which contain, in a concentrated form, the active principles of vegetable extracts that Dame Nature designed especially to promote a healthy action of the liver, stomach and bowels.

Beauty's Mecca.

Belle (third season, languidly)—Oh dear, I wish I had been born an English peeress.

Another Belle (first season)—Why, sweetest, because you are tired of trying to become one?—Life.

Poor Widow Bedott

She tried to write love poetry to the deacon, and could frame only—

Affection sore
Long time I bore.

Had the lone creature used Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription—the sure remedy for the weaknesses and peculiar ailments of her sex—she might have secured the deacon's favor by the cheerful character of her verses.

Comparative and Superlative.

And you say they all were drowned?"

"Yes, all but one woman—a dressmaker—who managed to grasp a floating spar and she held on till help came."

"Ah, I see. The survival of the fitter."

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

Death in the Kiss.

An Erie, Pa., despatch says: Mrs. William Savory, of Northeast, lies dying, a sacrifice to her love for a dead friend. Miss Stella Stinson had died of consumption, and when Mrs. Savory heard of her death she entered the room where the corpse lay and kissed the lifeless lips of her dead friend passionately. The undertaker who was temporarily absent from the room, had just saturated the face and lips of the dead girl with a poisonous liquid, and Mrs. Savory having absorbed the deadly poison, was stricken a few hours later, and her sufferings are extreme.

Desperation.

Miss Westend (confidentially)—Mr. Saphead proposed to me last night.

Rival Belle—Did he? When I refused him in the afternoon he said he was going to do something desperate.

A LONELY SINGER

Hurls Defiance to an Assembled Congregation—Pastor and Precentor Episode.

The members of the Carlton Street Presbyterian Church have almost unanimously taken the side of the pastor in regard to the precentorship, and yesterday the new singer, who is the choice of the congregation, was left in undisputed possession of his box. The only contretemps occurred during the morning services.

The second psalm given out by the minister was the 74th. He asked the congregation to sing the first three verses. Smoothly went the singing of the first two verses, and the third was sung in a tone indicative of its application to some of those present:

To these long lesclamations
Thy feet will do not tarry
But all the lies Thy foes have lone Within Thy sanctuary.

With this verse the singing should have ended, but there fell on the startled ears of the faithful few the shrill, clear voice of a lady singer, who took up the next two verses and sung:

Amidst Thy congregations
Thine enemies do roar
Their standards they set up for signs
Of triumph over me.

A man was famous, and was had
In estimation
According as he lifted up
His axe upon thee.

The congregation listened in mute astonishment, not a solitary voice joining the lonely singer. Having thus flung the axe at the heads of those she metaphorically wished to slay, all settled down quietly and listened to a good old-fashioned "effectual" calling discourse from Rev. Mr. Cleland, who had come in to express sympathy with the pastor and congregation, and was called on to address them.—Toronto Mail.

Don't You Know that you cannot afford to neglect that catarrh? Don't you know that it may lead to consumption, insanity, to death? Don't you know that it can be easily cured? Don't you know that while the thousand and one nostrums you have tried have utterly failed that Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is a certain cure? It has stood the test of years, and there are hundreds of thousands of grateful men and women in all parts of the country who can testify to its efficacy. All druggists.

The Secret of Their Unhappiness.

Edith—So you and Tom were finally married, Nell?

Nell—Yes; but we're not happy.

Edith—What? Not happy? Why how's that?

Nell—We didn't marry each other.

Time For Action.

Minister—I hope you are a good little boy, Bobby, and always mind your father?

Bobby—Yes, sir, I always do what he tells me when he begins to call me Robert.

Several years ago a coal mine in Japan took fire and forty or fifty miners were entombed. Recently the mouth of the pit was opened, and, on searching, the bodies of the victims were discovered. By the action of water they were converted into stone.

MARVELOUS

MEMORY

DISCOVERY.

Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.

Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detroit, 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,115 at Washington, 1,216 at Boston, large classes at Columbia Law students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, ecc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Pres. N.Y. State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from PROF LOISETTE 257 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

D C M L 30 88.

MERCHANTS, BUTCHERS AND TRADERS generally

We want a GOOD MAN in your locality to pick up

CALF SKINS

for us. Cash Furnished on satisfactory guaranty. Address, C. S. PAGE, Hyde Park, Vermont, U. S.

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U. S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement:

"We believe that to extent of right-weight raw materials consumed and shipped, Mr. Page holds the head of any competitor, and that his present business is the largest now done by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr. Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that he is to-day the largest dealer in this country, where in superlative degree, quantity is the test."

QUERY. If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

FOR SALE,

A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,

WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR

All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the

TIMES PRINTING CO.

HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

DUNN'S
BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

AT ITS OFFICE

Flesherton, Ont.

[illegible]

W. H. THURSTON,

Editor and Proprietor

CHRISTMAS TREE MARCH

[illegible]

Our Santa Claus rides.

Chorus

[illegible]

Our love he will always command
Hurrah for Santa Claus, long may he [illegible]
At his castle in Some Shereland

When Christmastime comes with its fun and glee,
Our hearts shall keep green as the [illegible]

[illegible]

Our Santa Claus laughs [illegible]

When we come before [illegible] all the [illegible] Christmas [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] will [illegible] That [illegible] of joy and merrymaking. [illegible] Eighteen hundred and [illegible] years [illegible] And [illegible] they saw the young child with Mary, his mother, and fell down and worshiped him; and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, frankincense and myrrh. That was the first Christmas, that was the first day of rejoicing at the birth of our Saviour, and the rejoicing was coupled with gifts. How the traditional custom has been preserved down the past ages until the present time! Who would care to do away with dear old Christmas—the one day of all the year that is held sacred by every Christian [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] The World [illegible] [illegible] they have turned upon it. The Mail will [illegible] Mr. H. A. M[illegible] [illegible] libel suit against [illegible] The World revels in sensation, and it, no doubt, [illegible] [illegible] several instances of [illegible] was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] happy unless he is libeling someone, casting insinuating slurs upon dancea officials and everything else that pertains to a manliness and gentlemanly manner which he has never arrived at. Although we have no sympathy with the Mail or Globe, yet it is nauseating to read the World's personal attacks upon gentlemen connected with both papers. It is hoped they may find a means of silencing this blatant braggadocio.

A rumor which appears to have gained considerable credence in official quarters, is to the effect that Stanley and Emin Pasha are prisoners in the hands of Osman Digna. Osman has forwarded a letter, which Stanley was the bearer of for Emin Bey, to Suakim, together with some cartridges similar to those which Stanley carried, announcing that he would deliver the prisoners provided he were left in undisputed possession of Southern Egypt. There are doubts as to the truthfulness of this report.

1888-1889 Illustrated.

The year 1888 is rapidly drawing to the [illegible] In this [illegible] the years all [illegible] in the same [illegible] It is a [illegible] they have. Each new year that enters upon the race of time gradually loses its grip, while we jump aboard the next and whirl along towards eternity. It is a habit we have of [illegible] there, [illegible] spectators of the [illegible] [illegible]

This year has been noteworthy in several particulars. A large number of [illegible] died. Some have been killed. Others have been retired without dying. Hon. Edward Blake, for instance, who interred himself [illegible] his law books once more. The country has grown considerably, too, during the past year. No less than twenty five immigrants have arrived from the United States all of them [illegible] and the heads of [illegible] [illegible] had triplets.

This reminds us that 1888 was leap year. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] fallen somewhat into [illegible] Only one instance has come under our observation. In that instance the man died under the mental strain. [illegible]

IN HIS LAST HOURS

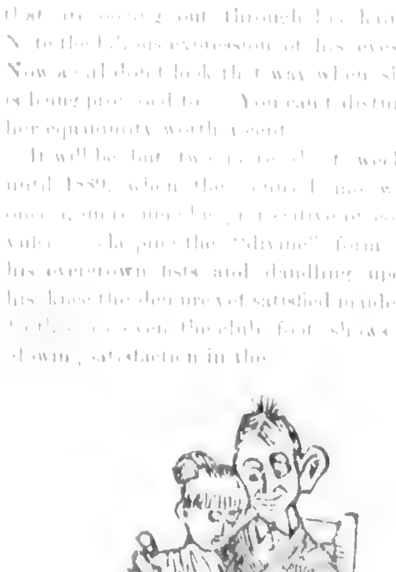
His dying words, it is said, were [illegible] His appearance [illegible] [illegible] situation, and the [illegible] [illegible] that are [illegible] out through his hair. Note the [illegible] expression of his eyes! Now we don't look that way when she is being proposed to. You can't disturb her equanimity worth a cent.

It will be but two or three short weeks until 1889, when the [illegible] [illegible] the "divine" form in his overgrown fists and dandling upon his knee the demure yet satisfied maiden [illegible] [illegible] satisfaction in the [illegible]



RETURN OF THE GENTLEMAN YEAR

An observer will see, by comparing our two illustrations, that the man's position in the first case is an unnatural one. This leap year business should be nipped in the sere and yellow leaf. What do you think about it, Bro. Mitchell of the Durham Chronicle?

Grip.

With the new year Grip enters upon its thirty second half yearly volume, a fact which speaks eloquently for the merits of this unique and favorite Canadian journal. No former attempt in the field of humorous journalism in Canada was ever successful, because in no former case was there the happy combination of elements essential to the success of such a venture. In the first place, an uncommon fertility of invention is required to keep a comic paper abreast of the times and this must be backed up by an artistic ability equal to the task of interpreting the happy thoughts evolved in a popular manner. [illegible] [illegible]

Inistioge.

The [illegible] in connection with the Methodist S. S. here will be held on Dec. 28th. The programme will consist of music, vocal and instrumental, readings, dialogues, and recitations. A grand time is expected as there has been great care taken in getting up the programme.

The Rev. J. W. M[illegible] [illegible] lecture here on Saturday [illegible] at seven o'clock in the evening, subject, "The man of the 20th century."

[illegible]

Manitoba.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr Editor. Perhaps your readers would like to read a few weather items, etc., direct from an old Ontarian, now a "drop, as it were, in the [illegible]" of this once Great Lone Land [illegible] which [illegible] about a quarter of a century ago.

[illegible]

THE WEATHER.

On October 18, our first snowstorm [illegible] for this season, weather mild and calm but as A. Z. described in [illegible] snowstorm in Ontario. "It came down in fat chunks of rags." Certainly I never saw larger "rags" (or flakes) in that Province. About six inches fell, and gradually disappeared day by day without a thaw, as is usually the case here. Since that time we have had several light "flurries," but much of the time ground bare, hard frozen, good wagoning, and weeks and weeks of Indian summer so common in this country, while unfortunate Ontarians were enjoying (?) snow, or nam. Yes, there have been some very cold days, and overcoats, etc., in good demand.

We can scarcely realize the fact that we are in the Northwest so far as actual winter is yet concerned. However there is unmistakeable evidence that

[illegible]

Well let him come, although a "cold hearted" visitor, much preferable to yellow fever and venomous reptiles of the south. I am thankful that Ontario's harvest was so good, and usual health and prosperity continues in that peaceful, progressive province. May "The Advance" share alike in the good things of this world, and its editor ever continue to point its readers to a "better country."

WM. PURDY.

Winnipeg, Dec. 5th, 1888.

P. S. This afternoon sufficient snow has again fallen to make it possible to use "runners," but "wheels" are whizzing "all the same."

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing, but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Sold by Druggists and Perfumers.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

NOTICE!

[illegible]

Auction Sale

OF VALUABLE

FARM PROPERTY

[illegible] County of Grey.

[illegible]

PUBLIC AUCTION

AT

THE [illegible] HOTEL

IN THE

VILLAGE OF EUGENIA

THURSDAY, THE 27th DAY OF DECEMBER, 1888,

At Twelve O'Clock Noon.

[illegible]

Terms of Sale

[illegible]

For further particulars, apply to

M. MURRICH, URQUHART & MacDONALD, Vendor's Solicitors, 13 York Chambers, Toronto

Municipal Notice.

[illegible]

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 50	to 5 50
Fall Wheat	$1 00	to 1 06
Spring Wheat	1 00	1 00
Barley	0 50	0 58
Oats	0 32	0 33
Peas	0 57	0 57
Butter	0 17	0 18
Eggs	0 18	0 18
Potatoes, bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 50	6 50
Hay per ton	8 00	10 00
[illegible]	1 00	1 50
[illegible]	0 50	1 00
[illegible]	0 05	0 05
[illegible]	0 9	0 00
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 36
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 00

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

[illegible]

Medical.

DR. CARTER.

M.C.P. & S. ONT.

PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.

[illegible]

J. G. [illegible] M.D.C.M.

[illegible]

Dental.

[illegible] DENTISTRY.

[illegible] L.D.S.

[illegible]

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST.

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month. Flesherton [illegible] the day following.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, LL.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer, &c.

[illegible]

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

DIVISION [illegible]

[illegible] LICENSES [illegible]

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Town and Farm Property.

[illegible] Flesherton

W. J. BELLAMY,

NOTARY,

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGENT, &c.

DEEDS, Mortgages, Leases, Wills [illegible]

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales [illegible] in any part of the County. Money to lend [illegible] rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please call before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing Eavetroughing and [illegible] everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts

WEEKLY EMPIRE

CANADA'S LEADING PAPER.

THE EMPIRE

WEEKLY EDITION

SUBSCRIPTION

WEEKLY EMPIRE PAYING ONE YEAR IN ADVANCE.

NOW $1 PER ANNUM.

Address THE EMPIRE, Toronto

$98 Sewing Machine FREE

FIRTH & CO., Box 740, Augusta, Maine.

For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON

On our way back to our hotel we passed [illegible] where James Watt, the inventor [illegible] and great part [illegible] in this neighborhood, coming [illegible]

[illegible] incidents and characters of the story which captivated our imagination many years ago were brought vividly to mind as we glided over its placid surface in the summer day. The wild grandeur and the savage splendor of the surrounding scenery at the stern end, the sightless beauty [illegible] was more impressive than the western

[illegible] who writes [illegible]

General News.

Osprey Mission.

Enlarged and Improved.

THE WEEK:

A Canadian Journal of Politics, Literature, Science and Art.

SUBSCRIPTION

$3.00 per Year. $1.00 for Four Months

Every number of every volume contains the choicest work of the most distinguished writers.

SPECIMEN COPIES

C. BLACKETT ROBINSON, PUBLISHER, 5 JORDON ST., TORONTO.

BEAR FOR SERVICE.

MR. Wm. CAMERON, Lot 35, Con 8, Artemesia.

Teacher Wanted!

[illegible]

Blacksmithing in all its Branches.

[illegible]

NOTICE!

[illegible]

STRAYED.

Came to the premises of the undersigned about the 6th of September, one [illegible] white. Owner can have the same on proving property and paying expenses

JOHN TYSON, Feversham P.O.

BARGAINS!

Martyrs to Headache

[illegible] Ayer's Sarsaparilla [illegible]

Permanent Relief.

Lizzie W. DeVeaux, 207 East Broadway, N. Y., writes: "I have been cured of Ayer's Sarsaparilla [illegible]

Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of Ayer, Mass., writes: "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I have [illegible]

James Garman, Esq., of Lowell, Mass., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully from Kidney Complaint, and was cursed by impure blood and biliousness. Was advised [illegible] Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Geneva Belanger, 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a severe affection of the kidneys. Every Spring also she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass. Price $1, six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

HEARD'S
Carriage Works,
FLESHERTON.

MANUFACTURERS OF

[illegible]

Flesherton Carriage Works.

FLESHERTON Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Go to the BEST

IT PAYS TO

Northern Business College OF OWEN SOUND

This Year's

MYRTLE

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

SEE

T & B

IN BRONZE OR FANCY PACKAGES

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S

TO THE FARMERS AND PUBLIC GENERALLY

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH

[illegible]

G.H. BLACKBURN.

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McDONNELL

NEW

FALL GOODS!

[illegible]

Prieeville.

BOOTS AND SHOES

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS

[illegible]

General Store, Priceville.

A. McKECHNIE.

FLOUR, FLOUR.

STONE

FLOUR!

[illegible]

NOTICE.

[illegible]

Farm for Sale

[illegible]

A. McKECHNIE, Maxwell P.O.

[illegible]

New Hardware Premises

Moore's Block, Durham St.

[illegible]

Came Astray

[illegible]

One Small Boy's Christmas.

The small boy looked at the Christmas tree,
And, straining his eager eyes to see,
Says he
"Now I wonder just what they have got for me.

"By Gee!
There's a bully old pair of nickelled skates,
The size of which clearly indicates
That they're meant for a boy of about my size—
If I get them I'll draw a prize.

"Then over there is a dandy drum,
Which I'm rather led to believe will come
My way, and a printing-press and type I see,
Which would be just about the thing for me.

"That clipper sled looks mighty fine,
And I shouldn't wonder if that were mine,
And I'm rather inclined to think, from the looks
Of things, that I'll get that box of books.

"And the shotgun up there behind the tree
I'm mighty sure is designed for me;
And the camera and the ba-e-ball bat
Are coming to me, I'll bet my hat."

BUT,

The camera went to another boy
And loaded him up with peaceful joy.
While the case of type and the printing press
Filled his cousin Tom with happiness;
And the nickelled skates, his brother Jim
Remarked, with a grin, belonged to him.
And the dandy drum and the clipper sled
Were both designed for his cousin Ned
But when the small boy sadly saw
The shotgun go he dropped his jaw,
And doleful, indeed, became his looks
When he lost his grip on the box of books,
While the thing that simply knocked him flat
Was the fact he missed the baseball bat.

AND

All that gladdened the small boy's life
Was a candy-bag and a new jack knife.

ENVOY:

To the boys who have read this jingle through
Let's hope that this small boy wasn't you!

Is Marriage a Failure?

Because the cake is not always light,
Nor the seasoned soup exactly right,
Because at the coffee some husbands rail
Tell me, friends—Does cooking fail?

Because sometimes our friends grow cold—
Full many a friendship's knell has tolled,
And its rosy hues grown ashy pale—
Listen again—Does friendship fail?

Because one mother is wicked or weak,
Though a child in vain should sympathy seek,
And home and children naught avail,
Answer me this—Does mother love fail?

"Why, no!" you say, "the cook is in fault,
Not enough soda or too much salt;
And trusty friends the false outweigh,
Neither cooking nor friendship fails," you say

"And mother-love is the land's one hope,
Naught with its grandeur and power can cope.
If one selfish mother you've found to day,
Still mother love does not fail," you say.

"Is marriage a failure?" now I ask,
The answer has proved a world-wide task,
But can we not find in marriage-marred lives
Selfish husbands, incompetent wives?

The husbands and wives are the failures, you see
Truly love-tuned hearts give harmony,
Two souls united, no dark secrets veiled,
Then who would ask, "Has marriage failed"

—Frances Burton Clark

TWO BEAUTIFUL WOMEN

A Christmas Story from the Land of the Harem.

It is a noteworthy fact that, in whatever distant country you may be placed, the return of Christmas always brings with it recollections of home and friends and happy Christmas cheer. Our hero found it so in dreamy Turkey.

Winter in Constantinople wears anything but a smiling face. It has nothing of the splendor of a northern climate, and lacks altogether the exalted stillness of snow-covered fields, creamy hills, and deeply buried forests. It has the character of an abortive spring that can scarcely resist the temptation to relapse into wet winter. But there are occasional intervals during which a mild, blue firmament covers the residence of the Sultans, the minarets and mosque-domes glitter and sparkle, and the waters of the Golden Horn ripple lovingly at the feet of evergreen hills, reflecting with dazzling effect the lovely blue overhead.

It was such a day, in the middle of December, 1879, while lounging in the reading-room of the German Club at Pera, that I met a former acquaintance, a young physician, of whom I had for some time lost sight, though I knew that he had not left Constantinople.

Dr. Otto Franzeen was an interesting man. Tall and slender of stature, his rosy face was remarkable for a pair of large, calm, brown eyes that contrasted surprisingly with his light-blonde hair and golden-blonde beard. But what characterized the man was the mystic calm of his manner and the paucity of his words. He spoke but little, went about alone, and his social relations with the foreign residents of the capital of the Ottoman empire were as limited as courtesy would permit.

This was the more singular, as Dr. Franzeen had, during his year's sojourn at Constantinople, acquired high repute among the foreign residents as a physician, without apparently any exertion on his own part, for he was smiled on by fortune in his efforts at cures; wherever he went sickness seemed to take its departure and health its place, so that people acquired a confidence in his ability that bordered on superstition. Of course, efforts were not lacking to allure the handsome young German, popular and money-making, and with such bright prospects, into the family circles, and especially into such as contained marriageable daughters. Clever and artistic traps were laid for him, and the daughters of millionaires, of whom there are not a few at Pera, sighed at him with but little effort at disguise. To this mixed society, on the border-land between Europe and Asia, Dr. Franzeen fulfilled all the demands of courtesy and good breeding—more than that, no prudent father, no scheming mother, no jovial brother, no lovely, lovable and rich daughter could lead him. The discharge of his social duties was simply the mechanical observance of unavoidable forms.

The young Dr. Franzeen seemed to live only for his profession and his lonely walks; but Love is a sharp-eyed god, or a blind one, according to circumstances, and it was reserved for the energy and slyness of the daughter of a Levantine banker, who was mortally in love with the blond doctor, to discover that he frequented the house of a young widow living in strict retirement, and that he had passed several very long evenings there. The lady, a native of Sweden, Mrs. Flora Carlson by name, was the possessor of a large fortune and was remarkably handsome; but she was all but hated by the Europeans because of the studied reserve which she maintained toward the society of Pera.

All this I had known of my countryman before we struck up an acquaintance. I saw him first in the reading-room in Pera, which he frequented, and we entered into conversation. The talk rambled through a variety of topics, but presently it became more personal.

"It is singular," he continued, after we had exchanged a few confidences, "that people here look on a man as though he were a child. They would guide each of my steps, and would absolutely lead me in the path to fortune and happiness. I am under surveillance by day and by night, and I believe the colony enters all my movements in a ledger. In this respect the Turks are different," he continued after a few seconds; "they call for my services, but as soon as I am out of their houses, I am dead as far as they are concerned."

"Then you also have practice among the Mahometans?" I asked, somewhat surprised, knowing that European doctors are only called to attend Turkish families in very exceptional cases, and then generally only very old men and such as have lived in Constantinople many years and are married.

"Yes," he replied, "I have more calls to Turks than to Europeans. My practice is extending with the former."

"No doubt a paying practice," I ventured.

"Very, but difficult," he replied in his uncommunicative manner; "the women I am expected to treat when covered by the veil, and that is impossible. I declare my inability to help them under such circumstances, and that is generally effective. With groans and sighs the veil is removed, and what it had hidden would in most cases better have remained covered."

"In most cases, but not in all?" I interrupted.

"No, not in all," he said pensively; "for the greatest beauty here I saw unveiled. She was a slave," he added, and into his eyes there came a peculiar light.

He fixed his eyes thoughtfully on the ground, and his slender, nervous hand played excitedly with a paper-cutter. The expression of his face had suddenly become so singular that I felt a great desire to hear more of that slave-girl. But from this time he relapsed into his wonted thoughtful silence. All my efforts to learn more failed.

After that meeting, weeks passed without my seeing the singular man again. Then we met again on several occasions, but I took care not to put any question to him or exhibit a desire to learn anything he did not volunteer to impart, and by degrees we became excellent acquaintances. But I myself knew absolutely nothing of my friend, except that he had been a practising physician in Berlin, had fought a duel and severely wounded his opponent, an officer, had fled to Greece and had then come here a year since.

One day Dr. Franzeen asked me whether I knew where he could obtain a Spinoza translated into German. I happened to have the volume he needed and gave him the book. After a few days he confided to me that the book was destined to be read by a lady, a highly cultivated widow, who now desired to form my acquaintance, and had commissioned him to present me to her.

In a house fitted up in the Pompeiian style, with the finest taste, though plainly and with a certain colorless severity, I found a magnificently formed woman, with an intellectual face and great black eyes—clear, dark, fiery and deep—that possessed rare powers of fascination. I envied my friend and feared for him at the same time, for this was a woman who might bring the most exquisite joy or the most exquisite pain to the man who falls within her magic sphere.

She greeted me simply and cordially. We talked on a wide variety of topics, and I admired the profound knowledge and the conversational powers she displayed. And withal she was truly womanly.

"I hate blue stockings," she remarked, "who only study in order to boast of their knowledge. As for me, I want to be able to analyze the phenomena of life, and to this end I need science and art. My past life, which was a glittering desert, and my present status, confirmed me in this predilection—I might say, they compel it. What else shall I do? How utilize my leisure? I have nothing to care for, and live isolated from all mankind, mostly by my own choice. Were I a woman who was loved and returned that love, then probably I would live only for my husband as wife and housekeeper, which I regard as the highest and noblest destiny of woman." And with these words she gave my friend a quick glance, full of fire.

My visit came to an end all too soon. I parted from this extraordinary woman with feelings of admiration, and the relations of my friend to her began to burden my heart. She loved him—but he? Silently he took his leave of her that evening, apparently lost in deep and heavy thought.

After that evening he disappeared, as was occasionally his custom. I met him nowhere, and even the widow failed to see him. That lady, it is true, answered my inquiries after our mutual friend with a calm voice and careless manner, but her face was more pale than usual, her eyes were surrounded by dark rings, and her features bore the expression of suffering. For a month I could not get sight of my friend. He developed a really wonderful talent to avoid meeting me, for he still went his professional rounds with regularity, but despite all my pains and artifices I failed to meet him either on the street or in places he was wont to frequent.

Nevertheless the air was full of rumors about him, one of which was to the effect that he was a frequent visitor at the house of a pacha's widow, and that he was infatuated with one of her slaves. Although the institution of slavery, and above all the slave trade, is officially abolished in Constantinople, in reality slavery exists to-day just as it did a hundred years since, but it must not show itself in public. For this there is good reason, since the Turkish household could not exist without female slaves. No Turkish woman, no Turkish girl, who would pass for respectable, may appear unveiled before a man; even the lord of the household must, when he enters the house, give the warning cry "Deudur!" (take care) that all women present, not his wives or daughters, may take refuge behind the veil and leave the house. Being thus encumbered they cannot perform the household work, hence the slave is a necessity, for she is a non-Mahometan—a mere thing—and may appear before any man without the veil. Should she rise to the dignity of a wife, she is at once invested with the veil, and she is thenceforward governed by the same moral and social code as the others.

The education of those slaves who are only luxuries constitutes a profession that is exercised chiefly by widows, but often also by the wives of high officials. The children are purchased from people of Caucasian blood; high prices are paid for a 5-year-old handsome and intelligent-looking girl; she receives a careful education and instruction in the languages, music and dancing, as well as in some of the arts, if she display any talent in that direction. Arrived at a proper age, the girl is sold into a rich and aristocratic family, in which the virtuous, highly educated, physically and intellectually developed girl occupies a most anomalous position. She waits upon visitors, entertains them, and is an article of luxury just as are, in our elegant drawing-rooms, the paintings of celebrated masters. Such a slave cannot be bought for less than $6,000. Not infrequently these young women marry men in high station, and some have even become the mothers of sultans.

Such a speculative educational institution was possessed by the widow of Essouf Pacha, and Dr. Franzeen had been selected by her as physician to the house. This was most unusual, but of five of her pupils who had lain prostrate with typhus fever, he had saved all. From that time the Turkish lady placed unlimited confidence in the young physician, and he paid regular visits in a house which otherwise was open only to the richest Mahometan buyers.

The rumor led me to think. Why did he hide himself from me? Why avoid the handsome widow, who, he must have known, loved him? There might be some truth in the rumor, although in one respect it must needs be false—one cannot court a slave. It is an impossibility for such a girl to follow the bent of her inclinations, for she is the property of her educator, and should she attempt flight the authorities would come to the aid of her owner, would find and return her to slavery, and should her lover and abductor be a foreigner whose legal punishment might cause diplomatic trouble, he would surely and silently disappear, never to be seen again. Hence there could be no thought of courtship in this case. But one way of getting possession of such a girl was open to a foreigner to buy her, and as he is not permitted to keep a slave or a mistress, to marry her.

I knew my friend to be without means, nor had he been able to accumulate much money doing his one year's sojourn in Pera. How then could he indulge such idle fancies? It is true Dr. Franzeen was a peculiar man, that I knew right well; but foolish he was not. In all his undertakings he had a clear, attainable end in view; and yet I was much disturbed by his conduct for the past few weeks.

One day—I was just reading my home-paper in the German club-room—a hand was laid upon my shoulder, and looking up I was surprised to see the lost one standing at my side. He looked thin and worn, and his attitude was less elastic than formerly.

"Shall we take a walk?" he asked in a somewhat tremulous voice.

I declared my willingness, and we took the turn to the old bridge. For some time he walked silently by my side and I followed his example, when presently he exclaimed, excitedly:

"You are well known in financial circles here, do you know any one who would loan me 15,000 francs for a year? I would like to borrow that sum and pay the usual interest."

"Then, after all, the rumor is correct?" I could not help saying.

"What rumor?" he asked excitedly.

"That you are in love with a slave-girl."

"And if it were so?"

"I thought you had other aims and ambitions."

"I had deceived myself," he replied without looking up, "I was blinded by the soul, the originality, the depth and the importance of the lady; I was fascinated by her individuality. But now a great passion has taken possession of the whole man in me—it is true love itself. I am infatuated with a charming being, full of youth and fragrance; a being like a May flower; the personification of youth; spring with all its spiritual and material charms. She is a slave-girl, it is true, a pupil of the widow of Essouf Pacha, but I am determined to buy this girl and make her my wife."

"Are you certain that your love is returned?" I asked.

"I fancy I can read love in her eyes—to speak of love I have as yet been unable, under the peculiar conditions that obtain in Turkish households. She casts down her eyes when I accost her, while the others look at me calmly; she blushes when I approach her, and her breathing is hurried; she trembles when I take her hand to feel her pulse, and she is always the first I see when I enter the house. If I discontinue my visits for a little while, she perceptibly revives on my return—that I have noticed."

"Have you, then, had an understanding with Mrs. Carlson?" I felt myself called upon to ask.

"That is impossible," he exclaimed excitedly; "what shall I tell her? What can I tell her? We are as good as betrothed. She is an extraordinary woman, remarkably handsome, rich, highly cultivated—but a certain something she lacked always; she never bewitched me, never drew me into such a delicious whirlpool of all my senses as does this quiet, youthful creature whom I have before my mind's eye wherever I am, who has taken possession of my entire being. With that lady I still possessed the power of thinking; here I am entirely without will."

"But as a man of honor you owe that lady an explanation," I ventured to remind him; "go bravely to Mrs. Carlson and tell her all."

"I cannot do it," he groaned.

"Then write her, at least."

"That would be cowardly; I could not bring myself to do it."

"Then you will come to grief, and you may besides bring ruin to two good, noble beings," said I, and parted in very bad humor from a man who could allow passion thus to unman him.

A few days after this meeting I received a letter from Mrs. Carlson, which ran as follows:

I am in need of a friendly service and have no one to whom I can apply for help. Your manner, your face inspire me with the courage to address you. Would you have the goodness to call on me at an early date? I rely on your knightliness.

FLORA CARLSON.

I hesitated not a moment to place myself at the disposition of the lady, took a carriage, and drove to her villa.

I found the beautiful widow looking yet more pale, and her eyes had a fixed, far-off expression, as though she had no concern with her immediate surroundings, but with something far away.

"Do not be surprised," said the lady, after she had thanked me for my readiness to serve her and my quick response to her call, "if I demand something unusual of you. Were it an ordinary matter I had not troubled you. You are the only friend of Dr. Franzeen, perhaps his confidant—then you know more than I can tell you. In that case you are also a dear confidant to me. I take that for granted, and in this capacity I invoke your good offices. Please"—and she made an heroic effort to maintain her composure, but her voice became almost inaudible—"go to the widow of Essouf Pacha and tell her you come as the messenger of Affarid Pacha—here is a card—and you wish to see Tenzile. You are a judge of men and women, I know. Observe the girl carefully, and report to me what you think of her appearance and how she impressed you. I need not tell you more," she concluded, giving utterance to the words with apparent effort; "I only wish to know how the girl looks, and have not the courage nor the strength to confront her."

This commission took me aghast. It seemed, then, she knew all. What was her object in sending me on this mission? Did she wish to become acquainted with her rival? How would that serve her? Did she desire to institute comparisons between that person and herself, and did she wish to be convinced of the possession of such superior charms on the side of the slave-girl, that the hope of successful rivalry would be vain; or did she hope that if the opposite were the case the man, charmed only by external appearances, would see his error and return to her? But the lady's character forbade her entertaining such thoughts or meditating such deeds. What, then, was her motive for this curious mission? Her feelings were too deeply involved for the gratification of ordinary curiosity; that was proved by the emotion and excitement she displayed when acquainting me with her wishes; still, she was a woman, and possibly these motives, connected, would guide her actions.

These thoughts ran through my brain while she was speaking to me.

"I shall endeavor to carry out your wishes," I replied, "though their fulfilment is not without difficulty, for one cannot well so describe another person that a third party shall see that person as she really is."

"You are a man and an artist," she replied, "and I shall hear the truth from you. With a woman, if she were the nicest judge of human nature in the world, and an artist besides, I should have my doubts. Beings of our sex judge only men rightly—at least as far as the effect—" She seemed to want to say something more, but broke off. "I can depend on you," she concluded abruptly.

Full of conflicting emotions, I returned to the city—to the Mahometan quarters.

The house of the Pacha's widow I found east of the Atmeidan, in one of the small side streets that branch out from that place; it differed in no respect from the rest of the Turkish houses—the same irregularly located windows with wooden bars, and the same red-painted oaken door, studded with great nails, with a massive knocker. Setting the latter in motion, the portal opened after some delay. I stepped into a small vestibule, which was partitioned in the middle by a wooden grating extending from floor to ceiling. Behind this wooden grating stood a black female servant, who demanded my business.

I explained to her my errand, and the negress disappeared. Presently she returned with a second, then came a third, and, finally an elderly Frenchwoman, evidently a governess. Then ensued a long parley. The four ambassadresses came and went. At last a lady in European costume, with yellow, Turkish face and sharp black eyes, appeared behind the grating, subjected me to a searching scrutiny from between the bars, heard my mention of the Pacha's name, which was on the card I carried, looked at the Turkish words written on the card, and retired, after saying a few, to me, unintelligible words to one of the black servants. The wooden grating opened, and beckoning me to follow, the old negress ascended a narrow, dark, stone stairway. I groped my way up the steps and again found myself before a wooden grating; this was opened by the negress with a key that hung from a steel chain around her neck, and crossing a grotesquely decorated dark hall, following on the heels of my black guide, I reached a large room, also dark. The negress went to a window, lifted a heavy curtain to admit light, and invited me, by a gesture, to wait there.

I now had leisure to look around in the large space. It was impressive in its baldness. The walls were painted in a bluish oil-color, upon which were sketched at regular distances gaudy birds of paradise, rocking themselves on chains of roses. On the walls hung a few oil paintings, portraits of the Sultan and of the German and Austrian Emperors; three quite modern Parisian sofas, a great piano, and an enormous, gayly colored paper lantern, suspended from the ceiling, completed the furniture of the room.

The Turkish lady presently returned, accompanied by the Frenchwoman, and introduced herself as the mistress of the house. She spoke very faulty French, and the governess was probably to act as interpreter. I signified to the widow that I could speak Turkish quite passably. She smiled pleasantly, scrutinized me still more critically out of her coal-black eyes, and pointed to a sofa opposite her.

"You wish to see Tenzile?" began the widow, when we were seated.

"On commission," I hastened to say.

"Affarid Pacha wishes you to paint her portrait for a European lady who is much interested in the excellent girl."

I was somewhat taken aback over this unexpected investment with the painter's skill—I am a sculptor—but quickly adapted myself to the situation, and said, "I believe such is the fact."

"Well," resumed the Turkish widow, "Affarid Pacha has opened negotiations with me for Tenzile, whom he has known since her childhood. He is, as you are aware, thrifty; the sum for reimbursement of the outlays for her education seems to him too large, and he cannot make up his mind. It is quite contrary to our customs to paint the portrait of a young lady unless it be destined for our most exalted lord, the Sultan. However, I will make a special exception in favor of Affarid Pacha and his clientess. You shall be allowed to paint Tenzile's portrait, but I cannot permit you to set foot in our house, be it for so ever brief a period, more than twice."

She made a sign to the Frenchwoman, who left the room and returned with a girl in Turkish dress.

"This is Tenzile," said the widow.

The girl was loveliness itself, the incorporation of youth and beauty. There was in her personality something that moved the heart, yet ravished the senses; a slender, neat, yet full figure—such a figure as only an ancient Greek sculptor would succeed in copying and displaying as the apotheosis of the loveliest budding womanhood. The curly, undulating golden-blonde hair; dreamy, great black eyes; the finely curved, gently sloping nose; the oval face, with the faintest suspicion of yellow, with the full, sweet mouth, together completed the singular witchery of her appearance.

I now realized how my friend could have become intoxicated by the breath of this child of a southern sun.

"The gentleman is to paint you, little daughter," explained the widow.

Tenzile made a graceful courtesy, and a lovely blush spread over her cheek.

"I am not very pretty," she began in good French; "I have a yellow face; my friends Serbe and Darie are much prettier."

Her voice was wonderfully elastic and sweet.

"The gentleman has a commission to paint you for a Frankish lady, Tenzile," the widow said; "he will only come twice, and you must, therefore, sit quite still," she added.

Tenzile bent her head in assent.

"It will not trouble you long," I said, addressing myself to the beautiful slave; "I shall only make a flying sketch to-day. However," I continued, turning to the widow again, "it is necessary that I should converse with the young lady, for thus the soul, which must speak out of the face, reveals itself to us, and I beg your consent to that end."

The Pacha's widow consented.

Taking out my notebook, which for the nonce served as a sketchbook, I sketched the outlines of the girl's face, meanwhile conversing with her on various topics. She showed a sharp intelligence and not uncommon knowledge, after the fashion of young, refined French women brought up in convents, and a childlike, affectionate heart. Me she observed thoughtfully and with curiosity. Her puzzled, earnest, innocent expression filled me with sadness, almost with pain. I could not bear to prolong the sitting. With deepest sympathy I took my leave from this girl, who, a creature of God like ourselves, was yet only a thing, with no control over her own fate—created to obey, unquestioning, the will of others.

I showed Mrs. Carlson—who, to judge from her expression, had waited for me impatiently—the sketch, and reported what I had seen, learned, felt and thought, as calmly, dispassionately, and objectively as possible. She remained speechless while I spoke, then suddenly caught my hand, bent over it, and kissed it before I could draw it away; hot tears were on it when I did; then burying her face in her handkerchief, she hurried from the room.

Sad at heart, I left the villa and walked home, wondering what was to come out of all this chaos.

I turned my steps toward the house of my friend. He was out; had left his lodgings but a few minutes before. But I found there a note addressed to me that was just to have been sent me; its contents suited my plans and purposes.

"'Dear friend," wrote Dr. Franzeen, "I feel very lonely. To-morrow will be Christmas; I hope you also have no engagement for the day. Shall we two forsaken ones spend the evening together in my quarters? I shall expect you if you do not at once decline the invitation."

The 24th of December proved to be a charming day; it is true the heavens were overcast, but through the enveloping fog there shone a gentle sunlight that invested everything with a dreamy aspect, the cupola-crowned houses of the great city, as well as the faded green hills and the gently murmuring waters.

I found my friend sitting at the piano, and was just in time to hear the last tones of a Beethoven sonata—he was a brilliant performer. Hearing me, he sprang up and greeted me, entirely unlike himself, with excitement and passionate warmth.

"If I had not that," and he pointed to his music, "I would have lost my reason ere this."

"Because you are parted from Flora?" I asked.

"Because I feel that I am acting irresponsibly toward that lady, and am facing an Oriental happiness—perhaps," replied, half-musingly, half-inquiringly.

"It is not yet too late to call a halt and atone for your fault," I put in.

"I cannot tear myself away from the dream of longing for that girl," he said with heavy breath; "it is only a dream; that I realize; for I shall be unable to raise the sum demanded in the short time left me, and I have found out, from the Pacha's widow herself, that various grandees of the city, among them Affarid Pacha, are suitors for the girl. She will be taken from me, my hopes and wishes are as naught, and yet I cannot give her up. But do you imagine," he continued painfully, "that the lady would hail me as a prodigal son? Then you have but a poor insight into her character; it is pure, refined and beaming like a diamond, but in ethical matter hard as that stone."

"The lady loves you," I asserted, "with the whole power of her noble, passionate soul."

"The less likely that she will lower herself by descending to my level."

"Do you believe you will be happy with the slave?" I now asked, involuntarily, in an earnest, weighty tone.

"If forever—that I do not know. But it would be an almost crushing happiness for years, and such years count an hundredfold," he replied passionately; "and you cannot count the greatest happiness by years; they are really only moments—continuous happiness would kill. But I

Standing Alone.

"The baby is standing all 'loney"
The children shout in their glee—
And father, and mother, and auntie
Must hurry, and come, and see.
So baby—the cute little darling!—
Is put through the wonderful feat,
And fondled, and kissed, and commended
For being so smart and sweet.

With the cunningest air of triumph
She stands in the midst of us all—
While the outstretched arm of her mother
Is ready to save a fall,
And whenever the little one totters
Ar und her is hastily thrown,
"'Tis very fine fun," thinks the baby—
"This frolic of standing alone!

Ah! many a time in the future
She'll long for the aid of that arm,
When the love and care of a mother
No longer can shield her from harm!
For oft when our need is the sorest,
There's no one to whom we can turn;
And standing alone is a lesson
'Tis hard for a woman to learn.

And often and over, my baby,
Before life's journey is done,
You will yearn in your hours of weakness
For something to lean upon.
When the props upon which you depend
Are taken away or overthrown,
You will find 'tis wearisome, baby—
So wearisome!—standing alone.

The Bachelor at the Play: Light on a Dark Subject.

I'm an unoffending bachelor, who likes a quiet time;
I hate a fuss made over me, and that is why I rhyme;
I go to see the drama and I have to doff my hat
When I sit me where the usher turns the chair from straight to flat.
I sit the act out, when the curtain with its rush of air
Comes down and chills my cranium, unhatted, bald or bare.
I get up and go out—these are rocky-bottom facts—
In order to put on my hat and wear it 'twixt the acts!
The women all around me and the one in front of me
Keep on their hats—their lofty hats—the stage I cannot see!
Their bonnets rise around me in a feathery parterre,
Their hanging-gardens block the view here, there and everywhere!
What can I do? I get up and I go out in a rage,
And there I meet some other men who couldn't see the stage.
We don our hats, condole a while—I'm giving you the facts—
And that is why we bachelors go out between the acts!

SHE WAS CONSOLABLE.

But the Traveller was Already Provided with a Wife.

Half a mile from the house I met Jeremiah, writes M. Quad in the Detroit Free Press. He was bareheaded, barefooted, coatless, vestless, and so freckled that it was hard to say what his natural complexion was. He rose up off a rock as I approached, made an awkward bow and said:

"Cribbins, stranger."

"Cribbins to you, my boy. And who may you be?"

"Jerry Watkins."

"Son of the widow, eh?"

"Yaas. Be you'n ne'un?"

"Yes."

"From the no'th?"

"Yes."

"Cum to see ma?"

"Yes; I'll stop for dinner."

"Glad on't. Gwine to hev' chicken. Ma sent me out to meet you'un."

"Many thanks to both of you."

"Say!" he continued, as he trotted along beside me, "I like you'un, you'un wears white shirts and clothes, and I'll jigger (bet) you'un knows roots from treetops. Hev' you'un cum to marry ma?"

I laughed, and he was much put out for a moment. Then he said:

"Wish you 'un would. Then I could hev a gun. If you 'un will I'll mind everything you say."

"Perhaps your mother does not want to marry again."

"Mugs! She'd marry you'un like lightning. Say! If you'un has her, you'un will git me a gun, won't you? Say! I saw a b'ar yesterday. Say! I know whar' I could shoot a powerful lot o' coons. Say! I'll speak to ma fur ye if you'un will promise the gun."

The widow was at the door to give me welcome. The second child, who was a 10-year-old girl, was barefooted and freckled and tow-headed, and the youngest one had on only a single garment, and was rolling in the dirt.

"Cum right in an' squat," said the widow as we shook hands. "Pete McCoy was saying last night that you were headed this way, and would stop. Ar' ye thirstable? May, jostle him over a glass of buttermilk. We'll cribbins (eat) in about an hour."

We talked about the weather, the state of the roads, etc., as she bustled around to get dinner, but pretty soon Jerry went out doors and called:

"Ma, ma, cum outer yere!"

"Jerry, you shet!" replied the mother.

"Ma, will you'un marry he'un?" continued Jerry.

"Now Jerry, if you don't stop yer guzzum I'll skin yer alive!" she exclaimed, as she stood in the door and flourished a skillet at him.

Jerry made off and sat down on a log, and the widow turned to me to explain:

"Don't pay no seriousness to he'un, sir, Jerry wants a new pop right bad, and I do say that I am dun tired of this yere gettin' along alone, but I'm not gwine to offer myself to anybody."

Just before dinner the oldest girl made friends with me, materially assisted by some candy, and she suddenly bawled out:

"Ma! ma gwine to marry him?"

"Now, Molly," chided the mother.

"Wish yer would," added the youngest, who went by the name of Nancy.

"Now, Nancy! While I do go fur to say he'un is the smartest looking stranger I've seen for a year, mabbe he'un don't think shucks of me."

I kept fighting shy of the main question, and by and by we sat down to dinner. The blessing had been scarcely asked when Jerry, who had made a tremendous effort to wash his face and comb his hair, looked up at his mother and asked:

"Has he'un asked you yit?"

"Jerry!" she chided.

"But don't he'un want yer?"

"Jerry!"

"But don't I want a new pap and a gun?" he loudly demanded.

"Don't serious him," she said to me as she helped me to the leg of a chicken. "While I will go fur to declare that I have 76 acres of land, 8 mewls, a cow, 32 hogs, 4 stacks of hay and $28 in cash, I've allus sorter disagreed with second marriages. They mayn't be happy."

"Your husband was a good man, I've heard," I replied.

"Yes. A pumpkin is good—good 'nuff fur a pumpkin. He knowed considerable, and thar' was considerable he never knowed. He was all goodness—too much of it. Never made a hundred dollars in his life."

"You must have been quite a business woman to have got along so well."

"You jigger! I kin turn a dollar as well as the best of 'em. While I will go fur to say second marriages are not allus happy the man who gits me won't git no sitter or complainer."

I managed to turn the subject for a while, but as soon as dinner was over Jerry took his mother into the other room for a consultation, and Molly came and sat down beside me and asked:

"Do you'un like ma?"

"Oh, yes."

"And she likes you. Wish you was my pap. Mebbe you will be by to-morrer."

I went out and sat down under a tree to smoke a cigar, and pretty soon Jerry came out. He had a business look over his face as he said:

"I've asked ma if she would hev ye."

"Have you? You are real kind."

"And she says she will."

"Indeed!"

"And now about that gun? When shall I get it?"

"Say, Jerry, did you ever have a dollar all at once?" I asked.

"Lor' no—nor two bits!"

"If I'll give you a big silver dollar will you let up on the gun until I come again?"

"Will I! Hoop snakes and bad fighters, but I will!"

I gave him the dollar, and he dashed through the house to show it to his sisters, and then started on a run to a neighbor's two miles away. When I returned to the house and said I must be going, I was met by such an avalanche of protests that I had to agree to stay until next day. That night I "sat up" with the Widow Watkins. I got around to it after awhile to state that I was living with my third, and had three sets of children numbering five in a set, and that I couldn't possibly see how I could make her my wife. I was very sorry, but helpless, and I hoped she would let me send her a new gingham dress from Salisbury.

"That's honest and straight," she said in reply. "While I will go fur to say I like yer looks, and I believe we could live happily together, if ye can't marry, why, ye can't. Ye would if ye could, wouldn't ye?"

"Quicker'n scat!"

"That's next to it, and I'll go fur to say that I'll wait five years on ye, and see how things turn. Mebbe I'll wait six, but I'll say five fur sartin. I'd as lief be a fourth as a second wife."

And she is waiting while Jerry writes that "guns hev got so cheapless that he kin git one fur $5."

Two Sides to a Girl.

Two sidedness is a visible peculiarity of the current belle. No matter how fair and square her disposition may be, her gowns have sides that do not match each other. These halved robes suggest those trick costumes that the double-voiced songstresses of the stage used to wear. With a dark, heavy side to turn to the audience when she sang in deep contralto, and a light side to expose during her high soprano warbling, she heightened the illusion. The coquette of to-day might keep two wooers simultaneously at her sides, and neither would afterward be able to confound her to the other by a description of her apparel. Even if it were evening, and her hands were gloved, one chap might swear truly that the hand he had fondled was pink, while the other might as correctly vow that the hand he had squeezed was drab. It is a freak of the more daring and eccentric girls to mismatch their gloves in that manner, making each hand harmonize in hue with its side of the toilet.

"Oh! I am glad to meet you," said a gallant but very near-sighted chap to one of a bevy of girls. "I think I was introduced to your sister a few minutes ago."

"It was to me that you were introduced," said the girl. Then, observing his doubt, she exclaimed: "You were on the lace-and-velvet side of me then, but you are on the satin-and-brocade side now," and she turned around to show him how like joined but dissimilar halves was her dress.

Hold Your Breath.

It is a fact not generally known, that if one holds his breath, wasps, bees and hornets can be handled with impunity. The skin becomes sting-proof, and holding the insect by the feet and giving her full liberty of action, you can see her drive her weapon against the impenetrable surface with a force that lifts her body with every stroke; but let the smallest quantity of air escape from the lungs and the sting will penetrate at once. I have never seen an exception to this in twenty-five years' observation. I have taught young ladies, with very delicate hands, to astonish their friends by the performance of this feat, and I saw one so severely stung as to require the services of a physician, through laughing at a witty remark of her sister, forgetting that laughing required breath. For a theory in explanation, I am led to believe that holding the breath partially closes the pores of the skin. My experiments in that direction have not been exact enough to be of any scientific value, but I am satisfied that it very sensibly affects the amount of insensible perspiration.—W. L. Wilder in Science.

His Curiosity Aroused.

"Keep away from that," said a restaurant keeper to an Irishman who was standing in front of a newly arrived box of turtles, holding his finger in evident pain. "What are you doing there anyhow?"

"I wor investigating."

"Investigating what?"

"I wor trying to see which was the head and which was the tail ov that baste over there in the corner ov the box."

"What did you want to know for?"

"I've a curiosity to know whether I've been bit or stung."—Merchant Traveller.

Mother—"Goodness me!" Is that Irene at the piano?" Little son—"Yes, ma.' "Well, go ask her what she is doing. If she is practising, she can keep on until the hour is up; but if she is playing, tell her to stop."

CURRENT TOPICS.

UPON the retirement of the President and Mrs. Cleveland from the White House there will be two ex-Presidents—Hayes and Cleveland—and five wives of ex-Presidents—Mrs. Tyler, Mrs. Polk, Mrs. Hayes, Mrs. Garfield and Mrs. Cleveland.

THE old form of "the," as in "Ye Merrie Englande," is often pronounced "ye" incorrectly by those who never heard that this form arose from the resemblance of the contracted form of "th" to Y. It was a form similar to the letter theta of the Greeks, embodying the consonant t and the aspirate.

ONE of the most successful advertisers a man who uniformly made advertising pay, had a practice of bargaining for a half-inch of blank space above the first line of his advertised announcements. It is truly remarkable how persistently an advertisement so set catches the eye which glances over the page where it appears.

LONDON'S famous preacher, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, says that he is always preparing his sermons, reading and thinking, but the specific preparation begins at 6 o'clock on Saturday evening. His great difficulty is to find a text, he having preached so many sermons in the course of his life. His published sermons fill 33 volumes and these he keeps on a shelf near hand so that he may look back and see that he does not repeat himself.

HORSES become indignant at seeing other animals abused. One of the most recent illustrations occurred near Birmingham, England. A horse and a goat were in the habit of grazing in the same field. A gang of young roughs amused themselves by throwing stones at the goat, and some of the most cowardly ruffians beat it with a stick. The horse raced to its rescue and seized one young rascal by the coat collar and flung him clear over the hedge into the road.

THE committee intrusted with the preliminary arrangements for the holding of the second Methodist Ecumenical Council reports satisfactory progress. A large meeting was recently held at the Mission House, London. There were present representatives from all the Methodist bodies in England. No definite plans will be adopted until the respective conferences have had an opportunity of considering the whole question. The Council meets in the United States in 1891.

IT has been stated that the enormous use of postal cards in the United States has had a seriously detrimental effect upon the manufacture of letter-paper and envelopes. The paper industry, it is said, loses from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 a year from this cause. The sum is doubtless greatly exaggerated; for the use of letter-paper has also increased with that of postal cards. But in Holyoke, Mass., 4,000,000 postal cards are produced daily, making a total production of 1,440,000,000 a year.

LORD ROSEBERY has announced his intention of printing and presenting to the Scottish Historical Society a volume of papers in his possession, entitled: "Lists of rebels transmitted to the Commissioners of Excise by the several Supervisors of Excise in Scotland, in obedience to a General Letter of the 7th of May, 1746." In these lists furnished to the Government there are more than 2,500 names of rebels, with descriptions of their rank and occupation, their place of abode, the value of their property, their acts of rebellion, etc. The lists are said to be very valuable.

THE Territory of Dakota, which will undoubtedly be the next division of the States to be received into the sisterhood, has a greater area than have New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia and Delaware put together. It measures 430 miles from its northern to its southern border, and extends 370 miles east and west. The whole area of Dakota is 149,100 square miles, although, as is well known, a considerable section of the territory consists of the "bad lands." Texas has an area of 265,780 square miles, and California comes next with an extent of 158,360 square miles.

"THE beauty of the White House for the next four years," says the New York World, will be Mrs. Russell Harrison, wife of the President-elect's only son. She is a young and blooming blonde, with magnificent hair and brilliant eyes. Her figure is superb, and she carries herself with a vast amount of grace and dignity. Miss Saunders was her maiden name. Russell Harrison, her husband, is a quiet, well-dressed man, exceedingly proud of his handsome wife. The young couple are not quite as straight-laced in their ideas as Benjamin Harrison and his wife, and may be able to add an atmosphere of modernity to the social life of the White House."

"STARTING from the idea," says Iron, that the hand varies sensibly in size with the amount of blood present in it at any moment, Professor Mosso, the Italian physiologist, has made some most interesting investigations. In his first experiments the hand was placed in a closed vessel of water, when the change in the circulation produced by the slightest action of the body or brain, the smallest thought or movement, was shown by a rise or fall in the liquid in the narrow neck of the vessel. With a large balance, on which the horizontal human body may be poised, he has found that one's thoughts may be literally weighed, and that even dreams, or the effect of a slight sound during slumber, turn the blood to the brain sufficiently to sink the balance of the head. The changing pulse even told him when a professional friend was reading Italian and when Greek, the greater effort for the latter duly affecting the blood flow.

Out of the Old Man's Barrel.

A young clergyman, receiving a visit from his rather clerical father, treated him to a rather long sermon at the Sunday morning service. "What did you think of my sermon this morning, father?" he asked his reverend parent at the dinner table on their return home. "Intolerably long, my son. I wouldn't blame any parishioner for going to sleep over such an infliction." "That's what I thought when you first preached it, father. I dug it up out of your barrel this morning."—Religious Herald.

J. H. Moss, of Coldwater, Mich., has raised 4,000 pounds of horse radish this year, and expects to raise five times as much next season. He runs a factory, where the job of grinding and bottling is peformed.

NUTRITIVE VALUE OF SNAILS.

A Delicacy Much Relished in Many European Countries.

Something like 90,000 pounds of snails are sent up daily to the Paris markets from the gardens of Poitou, Burgundy, Champagne and Provence, where they are specially reared for this purpose, the natural delicate flavor of their flesh being improved by feeding them on beds of aromatic herbs. It is not merely, however, as a delicacy that snails are so generally appreciated in France, says Prof. Goetegous in "Medecal Classics." They also take very high rank as a nutritious food, and from the time of the ancient Romans downward have been regarded as excellent in consumption and "weakness" of the chest. According to Payen they contain 70 per cent. of water, 16 per cent. of nitrogen, 1 per cent. of fat, 2 per cent. of salts and 5 per cent. of undetermined matter.

M. Charles Mene gives the following analysis of the edible snail, which is even more favorable: Water, 72.747; nitrogenous matter, 17.652; fatty substance, 1.125; non-nitrogenous, 6.300; salts, 3.176; nitrogen, 2.823. Dr. Ebrard, a French authority, who has made the snail his special study, declares that the weight of meat represented by the snails sold amounts to that found on cutting up a whole flock of calves and young heifers. He estimates the monthly consumption of snails in Paris at half a million. The market price of the great vineyard snail is from two francs fifty centimes to three francs fifty centimes per hundred, while those from the hedges, woods and forests bring only two francs to two francs fifty centimes. The proprietor of one snailery in the vicinity of Dijon is said to net over 7,000 francs annually.

The snail is reared and fattened with great care in some cantons in Switzerland as an article of luxury, and is exported in a pickled state. It is also eaten as a relish and nutritious article of food in Austria, Spain, Italy and in some sections of the United States. The Ashantees and other African tribes smoke them and eat them as daily food all the year round.

In Algeria, in the markets, large heaps of snails are sold by the bushel and the hundreds as an article of food. Vendors hawk them in the streets of Cairo. In modern Rome fresh gathered snails are hawked by women from door to door, and the housewives serve them either boiled in their shells, or stewed or fried in oil.

It is a common sight to see in an Italian city the people gathered around a number of baskets filled with snails, waiting for them to be thrown into a large iron pot suspended over a fire made between four stones. Herbs and love apples (tomatoes) are added, and when done the broth is retailed to the expectant bystanders. As the cook ladles out the savory concoction he or she gives utterance to trade cries.

Musical Nuisances.

Of all the social nuisances inflicted on suffering humanity the musical fiend is perhaps the most obnoxious to sensitive natures. He is the more objectionable, because he cannot be well avoided, he requires no foil, like that inveterate bore, the irrepressible retailer of stale jokes, but will sit by himself and disseminate all round him, as it were, unconsciously, the annoying influence of his personality.

One of the worst specimens of the class is the man who beats time with his foot or head during the performance of any composition, whether it happens to be a waltz or a Wagner opera. He has a worthy counterpart in the man who "hums the tune." Another horror is the obliging individual one meets in social circles who is wildly anxious to turn the leaves for the pianist, but being utterly unable to follow the player invariably does so at the wrong moment and occasionally drops a loose page on the floor, which he picks up and replaces upside down.

There is another specimen of the genus, who insists on learning the name of the piece played, only to receive an incorrect answer from his neighbor. Who does not positively loathe the man that in the dead silence which follows the performance of a song by an amateur of moderate powers, audibly remarks that he heard Patti, Nilsson or Campanini (as the case may be) sing that song most exquisitely.

Then there is the gentleman who is great on plagiarisms and always discerning them where they do not exist—the amateur composer who invents tunes, plays them with one finger, or whistles them and gets "one of those professional fellows to write them down."

Perhaps, however, he has a gift of improvising on the piano, although, as he tells you, he does not know a note of music. In such cases, escape from the room while he is absorbed in his task, is the only remedy. Another trying example of his kind is the explanatory demon, who tells his friend in an audible undertone all about the composition in course of performance, his statements being so utterly wide of the mark as to make one entertain murderous thoughts.

At the risk of being considered ungallant, it may also be stated that those ladies who persistently fan themselves without regard for the rhythm of the music, maintaining one unyielding metronomic tempo, innocently cause a great deal of distress to musicians of nervous temperament. It may be urged in palliation of the offences of these good people that their intentions are good, although their realization are the cause of much suffering to others.

An Interesting Child.

Brown—I want to tell you about my little boy. He

Jones—Excuse me, my dear fellow, but I've got to catch that 4.10 train and Brown—He is the most ordinary child in existence. Never said a bright thing in his life and is remarkably backward for his age.

(They drink together.)

The Eager-Miller Case.

The investigation into the charges of County Registrar Eager against Judge Miller, of the County of Halton, will be commenced at Milton on the 20th inst. before Deputy Attorney-General Johnston, the commissioner.

Mr. Dolliver—So you want to marry my daughter? Have you any means of existence? Ponsonby—At present, none, but I have brilliant prospects. Mr. Dolliver—I dare say, but suppose I don't die for a good many years, what's going to become of you then?"

ADULATION CLOYS.

Too Much Love is Sure to Awaken a Contemptuous Return.

The idolized almost always despises the idolator, and as frequently shows the contempt he—sometimes she—feels. The adoring wife, who follows every word of her husband and makes herself as plastic as the amœba—who lives only in his smiles, and who breaks down into tears when he frowns, she makes a lovely picture in fiction, and Medora will never want a Conrad to admire her—hypothetically. In reality Conrad would have wearied of her before the week was out, and he would not have scrupled to show what he felt. And when the two natures come together in natural life, as they do sometimes, and the gelatinous, protoplastic, adoring wife, invertebrate and weak-willed, spends her days in mental adoration of her husband, the chances are that husband's mood toward her is one of distaste and contempt, and that utter weariness of the soul which comes from the constant reflection of one's own humor.

So with women. When they find a man foolish and weak-kneed enough to be always in an attitude of adoration before them they feel for him only scorn and that cruelty of tyranny which is the fitting portion for slaves—according to the creed of the slave-owner. They make him suffer in proportion to his love. His folly and want of reserve are matched by their hardness in letting him feel the effect on themselves. The state of both is pitiable—as pitiable as that when the wife is the little dove who fawns on the hand of the master who spurns, and whose self-respect is lost in her adoration.

All this applies to all forms of love—not only to that between husband and wife or between lovers. It applies equally to parents and children—to the mother who loves her children beyond reason, and therefore beyond their own good; to the father who is "Lear," with too certainly "Lear's" fatal fortune of ingratitude; to the daughter who makes a bad wife because she is too fond a daughter; to the son who makes a bad husband because too fond a son. How many married homes have been wrecked on this rock!—when the wife cannot tear herself from her mother and the husband sacrifices his wife to his mother. The wisdom of reserve. What a bit of true wisdom it is! Without it how the lights flare and the dust flies!—London Spectator.

UNDER A TROPICAL SUN.

A South Pacific Coral Reef Transformed to an Inhabited Island.

A most remarkable growth of coral islands, showing the short time required to transform reefs in the dense salt water of the Pacific Ocean to large bodies of land, is reported by Captain Delap, of the American ship Yorktown, which touched at Boston Island in March last. The Yorktown has just arrived at Sandy Hook with a large cargo of general merchandise, and Captain Delap made close and careful observation, not only of the island but of the natives also. The first visit to the island was made by Captain Duperry, a Boston explorer, in 1824. He named the island after his native city. While there he made an accurate survey of the island, as well as the outlying reefs, over which the sea made a clean breach at times. The largest island was without vegetation or life, and has been so marked on all navigators charts. When the Yorktown approached the islands the vessel was hove to, and in a short time was surrounded by copper-colored natives of a friendly disposition, who brought with them such fruit as was common to the islands. Instead of reefs, as had been seen by Captain Duperry, there were thirteen islands surrounding a salt water lagoon, densely covered with vegetation, and all inhabited. The group was called Ebon Island, and was three miles long having grown at least a mile in half a century. Three Germans were reported to have recently arrived there from New Zealand. With the exception of the latter visitors, who were probably shipwrecked sailors, and Captain Delap, no white men are known to have visited those islands since they were first discovered.

To-day's Varieties.

The petition against the return of Mr. Edwards Liberal in Russell has been withdrawn.

The Scotch terrier Fly, which is Mr Bright's special pet, has not left him since he has been ill. He lies day and night beside his bed.

Yesterday the Ontario Government were asked by a deputation from the Anti-Poverty Society to favor a $600 exemption on dwelling houses.

Hronek, the anarchist of Chicago, who has just been sentenced to twelve years in State Prison, when asked in court if he believed in a God, replied: "I have never seen him."

The largest continuous sleeping-car service in the world is that on the Santa Fe system, which runs through sleepers from San Diego, Cal., to Chicago, a distance of 2,311 miles.

It was reported in London, Ont., yesterday that O. & M. Bixel & Son, Strathroy brewers, having taken umbrage at statements made by Rev. Wm. McDonagh in a Scott Act sermon preached in the Front Street Church on Sunday, had taken proceedings against the reverend gentleman for slander, claiming $5,000 damages.

Intending litigants would do well to remember the famous "Jones County Calf Case" from Iowa, which is now for the fifth time to be taken to the Supreme Court. This case was begun in 1877 and the calves involved were valued at $45. Already the litigation over the matter has cost plaintiffs and defendants $20,000, and he end is not yet.

The Diphtheria Epidemic.

The latest information received by Dr. Bryce, Secretary Provincial Board of Health, from Powassan, Ont., and the vicinity of North Bay shows that diphtheria is increasing. Several deaths have occurred during the past few days. Dr. Lehman, Inspector of the Provincial Board of Health, will report on the necessity of a local Board of Health for the district.

The G. T. R. double track between Brockville and Gananoque was put in use on Friday from 4 o'clock.

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having nice clearances difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined silver steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and try this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you. Another line I would particularly call your attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

Artemesia Council.

Council met in the Town Hall on Saturday, Dec. 15. Members all present. Minutes of last meeting read and confirmed. Reports of road commissioners of wards Nos. 2 and 4 were presented. Bylaw No. 446 for the purpose of appointing deputy returning officers, was introduced and passed.

Moved by Messrs. W. Sharp and McArthur, that George Wright be refunded three dollars and fifty cents for statute labor performed on lot 187, 188, 189, 190, third west. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. J. Boland and W. Sharp, that Geo. Pritchard be allowed his bill for repairing scrapers of $1.75, as payment in full for the old stove formerly used in the Town Hall. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and John Boland that Andrew Dingwall be refunded 26 cents, being an overcharge in taxes; also that Alex. McCabe be refunded $2.80, as an overcharge in taxes, all for the year 1888. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and Boland that the Clerk be instructed to write to the Minister of Education respecting the taxes between school sections No. 6 and 7, Glenelg and Artemesia, and 6 Artemesia. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and Sharp, that Chas. Ryan be refunded three dollars for statute labor performed on lots 2 and 3, con. 8, Artemesia. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Boland and Kearns, that Edward O'Brien be refunded the sum of $2 taxes on lots 135 and 136, Second Range East, T. and S. road, said lots being over assessed. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Boland and McArthur, that Chas. Johnson be paid $0.57½ for Artemesia's proportion of [illegible] Nelson's line, Artemesia and Egremont. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Sharp and McArthur, that Wm. Legg be refunded ten dollars on his half property on account of the loss by sheep killed by him. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Sharp and Cairns, that T. J. Stinson be paid $10 for cleaning ponds and filling in ditch with stone on the Sideroad between gravel road. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Boland and Cairns, that Mrs. Jos. Sturgeon be refunded [illegible]. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and W. Sharp, that the account of J. Boland be [illegible] to $3, for letting and inspecting [illegible]. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Boland and Cairns, that Mr. H. Cairns be paid $1 for [illegible] $1.60. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Sharp and Boland, that John Rose be refunded [illegible] certificates, per [illegible]. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. [illegible] Sharp, that [illegible] be paid [illegible] Treasurer's [illegible] Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Sharp and McArthur, that Wm. Legg be paid for [illegible] on 180 sidewood, $1.50; and for [illegible] on 40 sidewood, $1.50. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and Boland, that the thanks of this Council be tendered to Dr. Clarke for the efficient and impartial manner in which he has presided over this Council as reeve for the present year. Carried.

Are you made miserable by indigestion, constipation, dizziness, loss of appetite, yellow skin? Shiloh's Vitalizer is a positive cure.

$85 Solid Gold Watch Sold for $100, until lately Best $85 watch in the world Perfect timekeeper. Warranted. Heavy Solid Gold Hunting Cases. Both ladies' and gents' sizes, with works and cases of equal value. One Person in each locality can secure one free, together with our large and valuable line of Household Samples. These samples, as well as the watch, we send Free, and after you have kept them in your home for 3 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property. Those who write at once can be sure of receiving the Watch and Samples. We pay all express, freight, etc. Address Stinson & Co., Box 813, Portland, Maine. FREE

SALESMEN WANTED for the New England Nurseries, established over 50 years. The old reliable nursery. Men with push, energy, good habits and clean character always succeed. We can give you good pay and steady work. Write for terms to CHASE BROTHERS' COMPANY, Nurserymen, Colborne, Ont.

Mr. H. A. Massey has entered a criminal libel suit against The World.

A Large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR

AT

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Felted Stockings, Overs and Rubbers, Mens' and Boys' Long Boots.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be obtained.

MRS. BULMER.

FLESHERTON

A Positive Cure. ✝ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 9

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

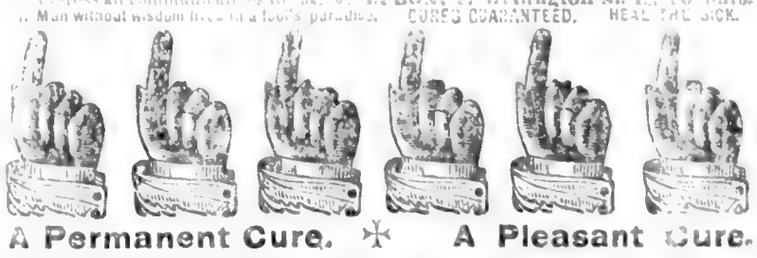
Mary of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

CURES the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

We are taken down from the effects of abuse with finding No. 8 a radical cure for [illegible]

[illegible] Want of energy, nervousness, want of purpose, dread of society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, gloominess, loss of memory, excitability of temper, [illegible] weakness, [illegible] the results of self-abuse or maturbation, [illegible] loss of [illegible] palpitation of the heart, hysteric fits, impaired digestion, trembling of the hands, dizziness, drowsiness, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible evil, of [illegible] nervously acquired. In short, the spring of vital force has become lost, every function [illegible] Scientific writers and the experience of [illegible] the effects of self-abuse the great majority of cases I treat [illegible] under these notices. If you are incompetent for the duties of [illegible] No. 8 will give you [illegible] Internally from early [illegible] Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation. Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 27 Wellington St. E., for [illegible] Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.



A Permanent Cure. ✝ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, and Bowels.

They invigorate when Prostrate to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the Aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equal.

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London,

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☞ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 391. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, DEC 27, 1888. W. H. THURSTON, XMAS, XMAS!

—CALL AT—

Russell's Noted Jewelery Store, Flesherton,

Will convince everyone that th

GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, CLOCKS, CHAINS, BROOCHES, BARPINS, EARRINGS,

Silverware, Spectacles, Fancy Toilet Sets, Christmas Cards, Razors, Knives, etc.
Is the finest and cheapest in this section of the Country.

WE CAN AND WILL GIVE YOU

BARGAINS

A Ladies fine GOLD AMERICAN WATCH for $26.00 worth $33.00. Gents' fine GOLD from $35.00 to 50.00 worth from $40. to $60.

Big discount for cash

from NOW to 1st JAN. 1889 on all goods. Do not fail to call: it will pay you; and always take your watch and clock repairs to RUSSELL'S, Flesherton, perfect JOB.

—CALL AT—

RICHARDSON'S Drug Store

AND SEE HIS STOCK OF GOODS SUITABLE FOR

Xmas and New Year's PRESENTS

BEFORE YOU PURCHASE ELSEWHERE. HE HAS THE

LARGEST ASSORTEMENT IN TOWN,

—BOTH—

Useful and Ornamental.

Albums, Satchels, Purses, Cards, Books, Toys, Sweets, etc.

OVER 500 LBS. OF SWEETS JUST IN.

A merry Christmas

and a Happy New Year to ALL.

W.u. RICHARDSON.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

A Happy New Year.

Look out for the eclipse on Monday next.

Remedy for

Rev Mr Shaw, of T

every other night of the M

here a week from Sunday

M

Sunday

Be

entertainment to-morrow

I

or Salt

Furniture Warerooms

The Collingwood papers, with Sound Tones and Streetsville Review, published creditable Christmas numbers last week

Smith's Cough and Consumption Cure is sold by us on a guarantee. It cures Consumption

All letters intended for the clerk of the to Josiah Gamey, Maxwell, not Thos Gamey as inadvertantly printed in the Sure

Salve Plaster Price 25 cents

Remember the Methodist Sunday School anniversary in the evening, New Years Day. Mr Armstrong has with the

some well known and talented gentlemen

Presentation

esteemed M. Richardson, Esq., and Mrs Richardson, by the Choristers and Congregation of Dr Clark's Church, on the occasion of Mr. R.'s and Mrs Richardson's departure for Toronto

We

Artemesia to and Arts Association of the Ontario Veterinary College examination to Congratulate

Mr E. S. K

and will be found under the usual with the presidency of East Garafraxa Society for the year. He has been by a w

Resulted in Death.

Mrs. Steward, who was confined to a bed of weakness as is being mentioned a few weeks ago, has been suffering severe attacks of which finally resulted in death on Saturday last. The deceased was buried on Sunday

A Close Call.

On Monday last Mr. Wm. Taylor, who lives on the 8th concession, had an accident that nearly cost him his life. While splitting wood for a sawing bee, through some mishap an axe was buried by mistake in Mr. Taylor's left leg, cutting the tendon and inflicting an ugly

The brethern of Victoria L. O. L. No. 244, held their thirty-ninth annual meeting on Tuesday evening, Dec. 18, of which the following brethern were elected officers for the ensuing year: James Best, W. M.; W. J. Henderson, D. M.; Samuel Sheardown, Chaplain; T. J. Stinson, R. Sec.; J. C. Blakely, Treasurer; W. Sharp, D. C.; F. A. Blakely Sec. Committee, J. Lyons, Geo. Ludlow, Joseph Watson, D. A. Stinson, and E. Lomas.

Wood wanted at this office immediately. Those who can do so will confer a favor by bringing it in this week.

T M

A year Ago

Years Ago that A

to matrimonial matters

Messrs Mr Douglas, Mr A Mc and Mr Thos Gamey. The have fought a business in municipal battles

Maxwell together in another Brotherly love Yes business for himself at that point for two years, and speaks very highly of the prospects of the Sault as a future business center. Mr Bates confidently expects a have granted to

Years for the purpose of building a

R W C Bates Knights of

Presbytery N

Orange Hall, Markdale, Dec 26th, when and others were

Sir Kt Jas Bigelow, W

Wm Bradley, D P

M Mackie Co

Sir Kt

Sir Kt

Sir Kt Richard

Acton Tyler

The Markdale

improvements. Last week Mr a gasoline engine

which he has

Dr Wright's Hotel

New Year's

was on Dr Wright's

Mr Stephens

Wednesday

the

Mr Bates

Toronto, and Thos. Bates, of the Sault are spending holidays with their mother here.

Christmas Visitors.

Mr W

returned to

Master J. Fields, of the Streetsville Review, and his respects to Flesherton

Mr

Legard, of Toronto, is home for a few days

Mr Webster, teacher in the Collegiate Institute, Owen Sound, was visiting at Mr. M. Richardson's and sang with the choristers Monday evening.

Mr Joe Gordon, Elora, was visiting his brother's family.

Mr. J. T. Wright, of St. Louis, is visiting with his father Mr. Thorp Wright.

Mr. Watkins, of Toronto, is visiting with his son-in-law, Rev. J. W. Shilton.

Mr. Stewart Bates and Miss Bates, of Toronto, and Thos. Bates, of the Sault are spending holidays with their mother here.

Sorrow and Joy.

Christmas Carols.

at twelve carols. The night was dark, wet and is to ugly

everything

SACRIFICE SALE

TILL JAN. 1st, 1889.

25 PER CENT

WATCHES and CLOCKS

ONE SIXTH

SILVERWARE

JEWELRY, SPEX, ETC.

Markdale is the only place this Section to get

CLOSE COMPETITION PRICES.

It will pay you to

as the largest stock to

CALL THIS MONTH

If you before,

AND

Test This Statement!

that I have a very fine stock at

Bed Rock Prices!

Discounts considered. Fine repairing receives general attention.

JEWELER and OPTICIAN,
MARKDALE, ONT

Elopement.

On Christmas Eve there was a ball,
And I was not invited
I did not know the host at all,
And felt in no way slighted.
I went—I guess I had to go,
And heard the music's beat,
And caught the quiver of the floor
Beneath the dancers' feet
While a song I know
Said "Over the snow,
Over the snow and away"
There's sun on and sun
For scant six to be done
Before the break of the day"

The moonlight fell as cold as snow
On that great front of granite,
A minute seemed to pass so slow
A life-time could not span it
But, after all the sunny eyes,
Brighter than moonlit stone,
And in the house of all the roses
I saw (so happy) one
And then her carriage [illegible]
My lady's dapple-grays
I know (was it?) [illegible]
Her father second in place
And I on the last stone step she
And her eyes were level there
Over [illegible]
Have you seen one so fair

She stepped toward the carriage door
And then a sudden flutter
The footman, her father were
But she was in my keeping
And upon her upturned face
At the door I kept her feet
Stroke [illegible]

And up [illegible]
And [illegible]
The [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

MY LADY TONGUE.

By Amelia [illegible], Author of "The Quick and the Dead."

People used to say it was almost a duty for Colonel Henry Merriweather Page to marry a second time. A motherless boy might do well enough, but when it came to a girl growing up altogether among darkeys and men it was absolutely blood-curdling. The poor child was really dressed in a manner that was almost indecent, and it had even been said (there the informant generally put an impressive hand in a one-buttoned lisle-thread glove upon the arm of the person to be enlightened) that she actually used bad language—in fact, swore, as she heard her father do.

It was perfectly true that she rarely put in an appearance at church, and when she did participate in the hebdominal devotions of Brownsville parish, she was wont to clatter up the central aisle in a short and gatherless habit, which was extremely shocking to the taste of the congregation. She wore boots, moreover, and it was rumored a spur on occasions. Her greatest offense, probably, was her mode of dressing her hair, or rather of leaving it to dress itself. She had a small, shapely head clasped closely from brow to throat by heavy red-brown curls.

Colonel Page's pew was the most conspicuous in the pretty sandstone church, and the aspect of his daughter's handsome neck exposed in all its ingenuous frontery of a Sabbath, was a never-ending source of displeasure to the critical Brownsvillians.

Had not St. Paul expressed himself clearly, not to say strongly, on this very subject? Was not a woman's pretty almost as surely to be measured by the length of her hair, as the age of a horse told by the length of his upper lip? Could a young lady dye the face not to dye—tradition, but of the scripture, not the fashion, and yet be [illegible] The rector's wife [illegible] state carry all to [illegible] with M. Page upon the very [illegible]

[illegible] forty minutes, and at last he [illegible] entered, it was not [illegible] heavy, tan-colored padnamy, with a black [illegible] and pepper barege, trimmed with [illegible] buttons, as was then decent—things, but shades of that godly woman's choice. Colonel Henry Merriweather Page's blue flannel waist, and dirt-besprent skirt pinned up about her [illegible] trousers, hips, and muddy boots that left apparent impressions on the [illegible] of the drawing-room.

When Miss Nelson [illegible] dextrous manœuvring, had [illegible] tion, by what she considered a masterstroke, up to the mount [illegible] ion, Miss Page had replied merely by [illegible] a slight brown head through the [illegible] locks and saying:

"Why do I wear it this way? Oh! I like it, and dad likes it, and Dick," then, with a sudden oblique glance of her bright red-brown eyes, "I shall always wear it so, even when I am married."

"You seem to have no doubt on that score," the rector's wife had replied, in a voice which was dryer than the smile that accompanied it. Mrs. Nelson had what might be termed a well-irrigated mouth. "Pray, is it to be soon?"

Miss Page had laughed at this, flinging one blue-flannel arm over the chair in which she sat sideways, and Mrs. Nelson had shuddered both at the laugh and gesture, which she found unpleasantly in keeping with their owner's cropped locks.

"Dear me no! Good lack, no! I should think [illegible] the [illegible] had replied heartily. "I haven't [illegible] ideal, but, of course, he'll turn [illegible] they always [illegible] Old maids are [illegible] cidents."

"Accidents" the rector's wife had exclaimed, in a tone which I am unable to describe.

She held up the gray cotton gloves, ornamented with wrist tassels, these last sharing in the good lady's agitation. Their frisky bobbings developed a kittenish desire in Miss Page to seize and secure them. How delightful it would have been to observe the face of their wearer, had she done so.

Miss Page did not always control herself so well as on this occasion, however. She yielded to her inclinations without stint, not infrequently.

One of these events took place not long after the visit of the rector's wife, and that was when the rector's son proposed to her.

This gentleman was a pretty little personage, with the physique of a tolerably well-sculptured snow man. His orange-colored hair surmounted his orange colored ears with a pinion-like stiffness, which suggested the idea of a pair of Mercury-like heel wings having sprouted in the wrong place. He had orange-colored eyebrows, above little dark blue eyes, like raisins set into his pudding face, and his orange colored beard grew one way on one side of his face, and another way on the other, as though its owner were standing in a perpetual draught.

But neither a man's personal appearance, nor the fact of his being a rector's son, can have any appreciable effect upon his love affairs (so far as he himself is concerned). Thus it chanced that Timotheus Nelson became enamored of the hoydenish Miss Page, and proposed to her. It was bad enough until he got down on his knees. Judith could not stand that, and so down she went on her knees also, just opposite him, and said, as well as she could for laughing:

"Please get up."

You may be sure he did so with alacrity. He did more—he got up metaphorically as well, and remained from that time in a standing position.

He admitted that very night what he could never be persuaded to even so much as listen to before, namely, that for young women to apply scissors to their hair is as unseemly as a like application is meritorious in young men. He confided to his mother that he had once met Miss Page riding along upon the highway, and that she was whistling. He went so far as to state that with her mouth in that unfeminine position, he considered her positively plain, and concluded by stating that flaxen hair worn in demure bands on either side of a flaxen countenance was a sight at once refreshing and ennobling, after having looked for any length of time upon crisp brown curls, and a face that changed as often as an autumn sunset.

Mr. Timotheus Nelson had a cousin Lucy, who answered exactly to the flaxen ideal, and it was soon after made her Mrs. Timotheus Nelson. He took a certain pride in presenting her to Miss Page, and in listening afterward to her shocked exclamations in regard to the much discussed curls.

It was about this time that by something of a coincidence, a cousin of Judith also made his appearance in the neighborhood. He came unexpectedly, and met her just outside of Carylon gates, leading her horse Hautboy, who had gone lame all of a sudden.

She was rather a strange figure, tall and slight, and with as few curves as a growing lad. Her habit, which, in these days of galoon and gathers, was really noticeable for its lack of voluminousness, was gathered up almost to her knees, disclosing russet-leather boots, stained crimson for half their length by the scarlet sand. Her billy-cock hat was pushed back on her brown crest, and a sparkle of mud ornamented her left cheek like a fantastic patch!

Boughton did not in the least recognize her. He had not seen her since the days of white frocks and blue shoes and socks, when her hair had been a pretty tan color, and one of her front teeth missing.

He hesitated a moment, and then reined up and asked if he was or was not mistaken in thinking the gate to the left the one which led into the Carylon farm. She nodded and said that it was. Then he saw that her horse was lame, and, jumping down, asked if he could not assist her. She thanked him, and said no, that she thought could not, and that unless after the manner I have [illegible] to [illegible] of the [illegible], said carelessly:

"Are you really going to Carylon [illegible] course?"

"Decidedly," he had answered gravely. "I am Boughton."

Then it was that the culpable but conventional [illegible] of [illegible] explo[illegible] with [illegible] Hor[illegible] your [illegible] shall be forced out with [illegible] Cousin Phil, [illegible] not [illegible] Phil.

Here she did, with a bow, the [illegible] of her [illegible] the entrance of [illegible] gates, [illegible] identity must be established, at the same time inquiring her own.

"Why, I'm Judith!" she announced, reining out her hand to him with Host[illegible] bridle-rein yet over her arm. "I'm Judith Page, Cousin Phil. You don't look as [illegible] to."

"No?" said Cousin Phil, smiling [illegible] d, perhaps not unconscious of a hand[illegible] he mustache clipped [illegible] Tiger fash[illegible], across his upper lip, and of a [illegible] general impression of appearance which he had left with them when they last parted.

"No, no—not a bit," said Judith, bending a little away from him, while still keeping a friendly grasp on his hands, and eyeing him from the crown of his smart Parisian hat (there were Anglo maniacs in those days, but they were the exceptions and not the rule) to the toes of his patent leather boots.

"Not a bit," she repeated, earnestly.

"Why, in what way?" said Boughton.

"You're—you're well, you're such a dandy," replied candid Judith. "However can you wiggle your toes in such boots? Gad! it makes mine ache to look at 'em."

This made twice that she had used that somewhat extraordinary form of expression. Besides, Philip did not exactly enjoy being called a dandy.

"You have changed, too," he remarked.

"Me?" said Judith. "Oh! do you tell me? How?"

"Well, for one thing," said Boughton, lowly, "you—or didn't I swear when I last saw you."

It is impossible to imagine the effect that her placid reception of this scathing remark had upon him.

"Didn't I," she said serenely, still holding his hands. "I must have been very young. Yes, I was. I remember all about it now. You used to make me dolls out of radishes, and cut turnips into flowers for me. Oh, yes, and you taught me to fish with a crooked pin."

"You have become a fisher of men by now, I suppose," said Boughton, with an attempt at wit, which, however, left his cousin as unruffled as ever.

"Oh, dear, no," she assured him. "They fish for me! And mostly with crooked pins, I must admit!" she ended, with a laugh. "How tall and straight you are, cousin. I do believe I could walk under your arm. Let's try."

Philip held out his arm obediently, and she made the attempt, but her eyes were blinded against his coat sleeve.

"I know ever so much a better way to use my arm than that," said Boughton, suddenly possessed of a devil, and he let his arm drop to her shoulders, held her so, and kissed her.

She did not burst into tears, and raise her riding whip, and give him a smart blow across the lips, or rail at him like the little shrew he believed her to be. When she saw what was about to happen, she merely drew in her pretty lips to a hard white line over her teeth, and on that hard white line fell Mr. Philip Boughton's kiss. It was certainly nothing at all like what he had supposed it would be. Neither was her conduct. She stood quietly, looking at him squarely in the eyes, and drawing on a little further her dog skin gauntlets.

"Er—you have mistaken your way after all," she remarked finally.

"How?" he said, feeling somewhat curious and extremely uncomfortable.

She still looked quietly at him, while settling her cuffs and pulling forward the billy-cock hat.

"Er—you have behaved like a beast when you should have behaved like a gentleman," she replied, almost sulkily.

"Good afternoon." And she turned about in the other direction and walked off with her lame horse.

He had no one but himself to thank for all this, but that did not in the least mitigate his violent indignation. To be called first a "dandy," and then a "beast," in less than twenty minutes, by a very pretty young woman, is not calculated to add to one's enjoyment even of an Albermarle scene in the flush of a November sunset. And, by George! if one wasn't to kiss one's cousin, who was one to kiss?

Boughton was actually more furious than he remembered to have been in the whole course of his life.

As for Judith—well, I really do not know how to write concerning Judith's state of mind. It may perhaps be most concisely expressed by saying that, had she been in the place of her Jewish namesake, and Boughton in the sandals of Holofernes, she would have secured much hair with decided feeling of satisfaction.

Judith had never been kissed, and had had a charming and romantic fancy that the man who married her should be the only man to kiss her. Now Boughton had dashed this pretty ideal to bits, and broken the charm, and polluted—yes, polluted, Miss Page told herself with violence, her so long cherished lips. His moustache had scratched her nose, and whether one turns one's lips in over one's teeth or not, a kiss is a kiss, and she would be quits with him.

Judith's face was decidedly wicked as she made this last announcement, and there was ever so much more red than brown in her wide-open eyes.

Boughton in the meantime proceeded to Carylon, where he got a genuine Virginian welcome from Judith's father, who was his second cousin, and not his uncle. He was also regaled with a mysterious drink, which consisted of lemon peel and brandy and nutmeg, and several other ingredients, and which tasted very delicious, and which his host called "Colonel Page's own."

"Colonel Page's own" put Phil in a somewhat better temper, and he was disposed, after his second tumbler, to smile to himself over his little cousin's impetuosity, and went so far as to concoct a speech which he would make to her after dinner, and which ran to the effect that any one would be not only content but anxious to play the part of beast to such a beauty. During these meditations the colonel was telling him everything that happened to everybody in the neighborhood for the last twelve years.

"And, pah! sir," he ended, "but you should see my lass! Judy, you know. An outlandish beauty, Boston! The colonel's nickname for Phil, from that young [illegible] pet cat [illegible] "Lud, sir! [illegible] estate of [illegible] A. [illegible] of Life[illegible] [illegible] has [illegible] You never saw such an instance of [illegible] own, [illegible] case in the case of that girl and it [illegible] mistress, sir. Phil—a [illegible], look here. It makes her hopping mad to say it, but you [illegible] boy, [illegible] a young [illegible] ps. It breaks my heart, sir, it [illegible] k's my heart!"

The colonel rubbing [illegible] f his upper lip with his [illegible] and pursed up his lips as if to [illegible] but suddenly turned [illegible] pokesake.

"And the way that [illegible] is positively pathetic, [illegible] on my [illegible] To hear her talk, you'd think he was the smartest, bravest, prick-at-well-the-boy's-never-been-tested, that's a fact! I've hopes of him, yes, hopes of him!" said the colonel, who wouldn't have even made the foregoing admission had it not been for that extra glassful of the mysterious beverage, drunk in Boughton's honor.

Boughton all this while was [illegible] wondering if Judith would give [illegible] chance to make his graceful speech by appearing at dinner.

The colonel, who was a mighty hunter and sportsman generally, always dined late at this season of the year. He employed an overseer, and spent most of October and November in fox hunting. So it came to pass that they dined as a rule by candle light.

Phil spent a round hour in making himself presentable. He was a well looking young fellow, with long, clean limbs, and a curiously haughty pose of head. His hair was as abundant and waved much after the fashion of Judith's. Perhaps his most delightful feature was his mouth—well curved and parting a little one sidedly over uneven and very white teeth. His valet-de-sage had followed him in the care of his body servant, and he issued from his room finally, as deliciously and fragrantly fresh as it is only given to fair men to appear.

When he entered the drawing-room he found, a little to his surprise, that Judith was there already, engaged in the startlingly feminine employment of knotting. Boughton only saw that her foot, in its bronze slipper and silk stocking, was very slender—slenderer than he had ever seen, in fact—with an instep under which the young man was convinced he could have rolled a good-sized marble.

She had on a nice little frock of some creamy stuff, that fell about her, guiltless of crinoline, and a string of blue Persian beads around her throat.

The colonel was revolving slowly before the fire, with parted coat tails, and at the same time rocking backward and forward on his toes.

Boughton paused in the hall some time to watch them. They made such a pleasant picture in the wedded light of the wax candles and leaping fire. Beyond them was the handsome dusk of the oak-paneled room, with its high, carved furniture and big French mirrors.

As he entered, he saw that in one of these mirrors was another Judith, and another, and another, and another, stretching, like the kings in "Macbeth," to the crack of doom, for all he could tell. And they were all knotting, and all had delicate feet in bronze slippers, and wore blue beads, and not one of them looked up at him, although the colonel came boisterously forward and hauled him in by both hands, and bade his lass give greeting to her cousin Phil.

Quoth she:

"Yes, dad, dear, that's all right; we have met already. My ball, dad, darling; you are stamping all over it. Thanks," as Phil handed it to her.

Now the colonel was a good deal, as he would express it, "discomboberated." He said "Hey? what's that?" and looked from one to the other, and let go of his coat-tails in sheer amazement.

But as Mistress Judith maintained unbroken silence, and appeared absorbed in her knitting, Boughton was at the pains of explaining that he had met his cousin on the high-road, and how they had mutually recognized each other.

As he made these remarks he caught himself watching the subject of them out of the tail of his eye, and fell, moreover, into a strange fancy which likened the slim foot in the gray silk-meshes to an iridescent beetle caught in a somewhat bulky spider's web. Her hair was just about the color of her shoe, he observed a little redder, perhaps—and a bow of blue ribbon fluttered over her fair bosom like a butterfly.

The colonel laughed a good deal, and he had the rare accomplishment, or rather faculty, of laughing well. He was as handsome as his daughter, in a more regular way, and wore his thick, riotously curling hair in a queue. He had broad chestnut eyebrows, that met above his nose, which had a pert little but aristocratic ripple in it, and his mouth was set between two longish, curving dimples, like a pleasant sentence between two brackets. He had a deep cleft in his chin, which was sometimes more or less leveled with shaving powder, and he wore knee buckles of brilliants, and a stock and ruffles.

The colonel was a believer in the good old times, clamored for the retention of stage coaches, and always travelled in his private carriage. He took snuff, and treated himself to a pinch now, while slyly observing the hero and heroine of the adventure just related. He had his suspicions, had the colonel, that there had been a tow-row of some kind between the two, and he also noticed the Glengarry bow, and the beads, and the bronze shoes.

The colonel was a closer observer than people generally gave him credit for, and he recollected that Judith did not generally wear her bronze shoes to dinner, neither the blue bow, nor the beads. He was also aware of the fact that Phil Boughton was an extremely dashing looking youngster, and that the damosel in the chimney corner had announced her intention many years ago of "marrying her Phil." This was at the time of the missing tooth, and radish dolls, and fishing with crooked pins, etc.

It gave the colonel quite a comfortable and perfectly natural glow to think that Boughton's father was wealthy, and their old place one of the handsomest in Virginia. Also he recalled with satisfaction the fact that only two years ago Master Phil himself had graduated with honors at the L. L. of Ecoles des Ponts et Chaussees in Paris. A very good thing it would be, the colonel told himself, and perhaps they would remain with him at Carylon for some years—until, in fact—Here the colonel, who had been getting sober and sharper, sighed rather heavily.

Then Judith's love lap for the first time, but not at Boughton.

"Why do you sigh, dad, dear?" she said quickly.

"Oh, I reckon I'm hungry," said the colonel, with delightful prevarication. "I'm going to carry 'em up."

Exit the colonel.

As he left the room Boughton's heart resumed its normal, this time not a fat black tom-cat, but a fox-terrier, and leaped to her.

"Last [illegible] Here was [illegible] opportunity for that [illegible] and [illegible] to give it to [illegible] Heaven's sake [illegible] at what she was making. She replied to each with [illegible] making a [illegible] duck.

"Oh, [illegible] Dear," said Boughton. "Here at the [illegible] now, isn't it? Do you remember when I [illegible] you to come [illegible] how you used to go sailing about and [illegible] on everything, and never mind it a bit, and how poor Dick used to wobble and fall when it [illegible] a cropper?"

"Dick skates extremely well," said Miss Page, with [illegible] dignity. "Far better than I do." She rose after releasing her foot from the gray web, and began winding her silk about the long wooden skewer with which she had been working. "I have a few things to attend to before dinner. Pray excuse me," she said, finally, turning to him, and then left the room without further ceremony.

Boughton sank down into the little satin-puffed chair, which was yet warm with embracing her, and began pondering many things in his heart. He was just beginning to think that perhaps he had behaved like a beast after all, and owed her an apology, when a solemn voice at the door said:

"Dinner am served, sah."

Turning, he saw that this voice proceeded from a person inextricably tangled with his childhood's experiences. It was none other than Uncle Eden, the major domo of Carylon—an individual as black of hue as he was white of teeth and soul, for Uncle Eden had "got 'ligion" at the age of 10. He was so black as to be the possessor of a bloom like that on a damson, and had a pale pink scar down one cheek, which gave his skin the appearance of black satin having ripped over a rose-colored lining.

He hesitated a moment when he saw Phil, and then burst into a deep chuckle as his whilom tormentor started forward and took him by both hands.

"Uncle Eden," said he, "you don't look a day older than you did twelve years ago."

"Don' I, Marse Phil? Bless yo' ha'at! 'Cept fur yo' whiskerers, I'd dun b'en know yuh time I sot eyes on yuh. Lor'! it don' seem a day since I was yerkin yuh out er dat ar tub uv soft-soap whar yuh wuz a fishin' fur Miss Judy's shoe, she don' drap in it. Yuh sut'n'y is looking peart. Hi! dar—dat's de Cun'l—good-by 'till bime-by."

The dinner was a success. When is dinner not a success with hungry folks? There was a green goose with gooseberry sauce. Boughton had not tasted a green goose for twelve years. He thought French dishes fade and commonplace beside it. And after dinner he had another glass of "Colonel Page's own."

The next day there was to be a fox-hunt. They were to start at 6 o'clock sharp, the colonel told them, and Phil was to ride the colonel's favorite, "Trumpeter," as "Hautboy" was lame, and Judith preferred a great sun-colored brute, rejoicing in the name of "Eyebrows"—why, no one ever knew, as the gallant steed certainly possessed none. He had a blazed face and a sullen eye, and enough daylight under him to have illuminated St. Peter's every coign of disadvantage. But Boughton found that his rider had a way of pulling him along that told somehow, and the great raw beast jumped like a grasshopper.

It was a pretty sight as they rode out the next morning. The sun was just rising behind a zone of dull gray clouds. Beryl-green and topaz-yellow met with the softness of a kiss in mid-heaven, and the moon, wan, as though with much watching, crept down behind the naked acacia trees to the left. Over the brown lawn there was a light powdering of snow, and there was a keen wind abroad, together with much rustling of withered grass and trees.

They had some hot coffee, which Judith poured out for them, and the remains of the green goose, and then they set out at a huntsman's jog for the meet.

Judith had plenty to do in attending to Eyebrows, who was disposed to coquette with every dead leaf that blew across his way, and Trumpeter was sufficient of a handful to keep Boughton's mind completely upon himself.

"Ah, there's the music!" called the colonel at last over his shoulder. "Keep his head, Judy. He'd bolt in a minute if he thought he could."

They could hear the yow-yowing of the hounds now, fitfully borne toward them and away by the fluctuating wind.

"Once," said Judith, beginning to speak all of a sudden, "a friend brought a German baron—ever such a swell he was—to see dad. He stopped at Carylon about a week, and dad, of course, took him out hunting. You know dad can never resist calling any one's attention to the hounds when they're giving tongue. He says he's far better able to appreciate such harmonies than Beethoven or Mozart. Well, we had gotten just about here, and dad—dear dad!—shall I ever forget his face?—said: 'There, sir! don't you ever hear such music in your life, sir?' 'Vere—vere?' said the baron, eagerly, twisting all about in his saddle and hobbling on to his horse's mane. 'Vat musick? I can't hear no musick ver tose tam tawgs.'"

"Ha! ha! ha!" thundered Phil, who was equally delighted with this anecdote and the sudden breaking of the ice between them.

"Judith," he began, and leaned over with his hand on her pummel.

He was just about to make his meditated apology when they were joined by some people, and he sat erect again in a tolerable hurry.

They had a long day of it. No less than three foxes were started, and the pace being young, and not so well trained as the heart of the master could desire, broke abominably. Then, when they finally settled down to work, reynard took to a drain, and was given up in despair. The fourth fox, however, gave them a capital forty minutes, but got them into the mountains finally, and they killed him over fifteen miles from Carylon.

[illegible]

SIFTING FOR FORTUNES.

Queer Sights at Westerly—Atlantic City Beach.

A raw summer [illegible] of brine was flayed against the shore [illegible] walks at Atlantic City yesterday. The [illegible]-strewed beach was full of sightseers. There was a curious [illegible] with the trip of one of the yachts to-day. The party was arrived by Capt. Will Gale in [illegible] vasant Alert. The [illegible] spoke a trim looking schooner off shore and the captain inquired after the people in Atlantic City. In the conversation that followed it was found that the schooner was no other than the Robert Morgan, which was blown high and dry on Sloop Ledge during the terrible storm of 1851, and upon which balls and parties were held all of the following season.

A small army of sand sifters were at work on the beach. Their outfit consisted of sieve, a shovel and a tin box. They dug the sand from around the posts on which the board walk had been laid. After reaching a depth of about two feet the sifters ran the sand through their sieve. Frequently their efforts were rewarded by finds of precious stones and jewellery.

To a curious visitor one of the sifters exhibited his treasure. It comprised diamond pins, a plain gold ring, a dollar gold piece, and a number of smaller coins. He had made a lucky hit in the morning, and was about $150 better off. He said there were cases where $500 had been recovered from the sand in a day, but that many days were often spent without recovering a dollar's worth. The action of the sea washes all particles around the posts along the beach, and the hundreds of dollars worth of jewellery and money lost by the summer crowds are gathered in by these patient toilers during the cold months.

Philadelphia Record.

The Wish-Bone

She. "There, it's yours. Now wish, but mind, you mustn't tell your wish or it will never come true."

He (tenderly). "But may I not tell you?"

She. "Oh dear no."

He (pathetically). "It never can come true unless I do tell you."

She (shyly). "Well, then, in such an exceptional case as yours, perhaps you had better tell me."

The Uncertainties of Life

Patient (to young physician). "You say, doctor, that I am well now, and that no further danger is to be expected?" Physician. "I apprehend none, sir; but life is uncertain." Patient. "Perhaps I had better pay your bill now." Physician. "Well, yes, sir, it might be as well, as I have said life is very uncertain."

Life is history, not poetry. It consists of little things, rarely illuminated by flashes of great heroism, broken by great dangers or demanding great exertions.

The Prussian blue dye was discovered by Diesbach, at Berlin, in 1710.

A Letter to Santa Klaus.

[illegible]

—Mrs. M. L. [illegible], in Detroit Free Press.

LEADEN WATER PIPES.

English Chemists Say They Are the Cause of Wholesale Poisoning.

Were some daring novelists, hungering after originality, to depict a country whose rulers allowed the many to be poisoned wholesale for enrichment of the few, he would surely be charged with absurdity. Yet there is such a country, and its name happens to be England. Let not any Gladstonite, however, prick up his extensive ears in expectations of a startling revelation that Lord Salisbury and W. H. Smith had entered into a conspiracy to murder the people. The evil is of far longer standing than the lifetime of the present Government; it apparently began when the community first learned the convenience of having water laid in their houses instead of dipping it out of wells or brooks. Leaden water pipes were introduced, at all events, a long time ago, and where they still linger wholesale poisoning goes on merrily as ever. Thus at Pudsey, a little time back, some sixty or seventy citizens were suddenly placed [illegible] by a mysterious malady which appeared to derive its origin from the water supply. Samples of the drinking water were accordingly forwarded to a firm of analytical chemists at Leeds, who at once detected the presence of lead in quantities distinctly injurious to health. Having obtained this information, the local board prosecuted further inquiry with the result of establishing the facts that all the sufferers lived at some distance from the mains. The theory is, therefore, that the water while lying all night in the leaden pipes connecting the houses with the mains becomes impregnated with the metal, and the Chairman advised the householders [illegible] water for a time [illegible] before supply [illegible]

Orange B[illegible]

The custom of wearing orange [illegible] at weddings [illegible] with us [illegible] female fashions [illegible] the latter country [illegible] is said to have [illegible] origin. There is, however, an old Spanish legend which gives a different account of its introduction. According to this, soon after the importation of the orange tree [illegible] the Moors [illegible] of Europe.

[illegible]

A Nine-year-old Girl Official.

The city of Trenton can claim the brightest and youngest city officer in the State. Miss Hattie Owens, very cute and clever for a girl of 9, has been made second assistant city clerk and can now be seen on days at certain hours filing away in their proper order the official documents in the city clerk's office. When Colonel Owens, the city clerk, took possession of his new quarters the public documents appeared to be considerably disarranged, and, on complaining, he found a cheerful volunteer in the person of his young daughter, Miss Hattie, who is very small, but smart and methodical. She was assigned the work of reassorting, and is doing it well. She is rather annoyed on account of being a girl and announces that, as second assistant clerk, she desires to be called "Harry," and as such she is saluted by all the city officials. Miss Harry Owens is a pretty girl of pleasant address, and with the manner of one twice her age.—Trenton Times.

Somebody Get a Gimlet.

An inventive American from the Missouri region has taken out a patent at Washington for "stilts for horses." It is to revolutionize plowing round on the hillsides, for, however steep the ascent may be, this genius thinks that the animal will be enabled to preform its task in comfort when its legs are enabled by art to stand upon a level. The patent has really been granted to him, and it is said that he is considering further momentous discoveries of equal assistance to mankind.—[illegible] Echo.

George Frederick Watts, the English royal academician, has gone to Brighton, where he has fitted up a studio, and hopes to finish his "Court of Death," upon which he has been at work for many years.

When the little Princess of the Netherlands, now a mere child, becomes Queen of Holland she will be one of the wealthiest sovereigns in Europe. The civil list of Holland is remarkably large, amounting to $15,000,000 a year.

Mrs. Lucinda Ruggles died at Dodgeville, Wis., a few days ago, and she was buried in a coffin made from a walnut tree which her husband had felled forty years ago and stored away to make lumber for his own and his wife's coffins.

NAMES OF STATES.

Where They Come From and How They Were Made.

Maine was so called as early as 1623, from Maine in France, of which Henrietta Maria, Queen of England, was at that time proprietor. Popular name, Lumber or Pine Tree State.

New Hampshire was the name given to the territory conveyed by the Plymouth Company to Capt. John Mason, by patent, Nov. 7th, 1629, with reference to the patentee, who was Governor at Portsmouth, in Hampshire, England. Popular name, the Granite State.

Vermont was so called by the inhabitants in their declaration of independence, Jan 16th, 1777, from the French verd mont, the green mountain. Popular name, Green Mountain State.

Massachusetts was so called from Massachusetts Bay, and that from the Massachusetts tribe of Indians in the neighborhood of Boston. The tribe is thought to have derived its name from the Blue Hills of Milton. "I have learnt," said Roger Williams, "that the Massachusetts were so called from the Blue Hills." Popular name, the Bay State.

Rhode Island was so called in 1664, in reference to the Island of Rhodes, in the Mediterranean. Popular name, Little Rhody.

Connecticut was so called from the Indian name of its principal river. Connecticut is a Mocheakannew word, signifying long river. Popular name, the Nutmeg or Freestone State.

New York was so called in 1664, in reference to the Duke of York and Albany, to whom this territory was granted by the King of England. Popular name, Empire or Excelsior State.

New Jersey was so called in 1664, from the Island of Jersey, on the coast of France, the residence of Sir George Carteret, to whom the territory was granted.

Pennsylvania was so called in 1681, after William Penn. Popular name, the Keystone State.

Delaware was so called in 1703, from Delaware Bay, on which it lies, and which received its name from Lord De la Ware, who died in this bay. Popular name, the Blue Hen or Diamond State.

Maryland was so called in honor of Henrietta Maria, Queen of Charles I, in his patent to Lord Baltimore [illegible]

[illegible]

State.

Arkansas was so called [illegible] principal [illegible] Bear State.

[illegible] was so called by Juan [illegible] 1572, because it was discovered on Easter Sunday, in Spanish, Pascua Florida.

Wisconsin was so called from its principal river. [illegible]

Iowa was so called from its principal river. [illegible] Indian name, meaning the sleepy ones. Popular name, the Hawkeye State.

Minnesota is also an Indian word meaning whitish water.

California, a Spanish word [illegible] from an ancient [illegible] Popular name, the Golden State.

Texas, a Spanish word, applied to the republic. Popular name, the Lone Star State.

Kansas is an Indian name [illegible] the [illegible]

Emma Abbott in Church.

Emma Abbott sang "Nearer My God to Thee" in Trinity Church, San Francisco, on Sunday last and thrilled the congregation. The [illegible] musical editor describes it this way: "Suddenly, like the notes of a startled bird, rang Miss Abbott's sweet voice from the fashionable stillness. People cocked their ears and sat motionless as the melody rolled along among the gilded stars of the ceiling. It was 'Nearer, My God, to Thee,' but it was not the well known melody of the old-fashioned church among the fragrant pines. There was more operatic lace and ribbon to the air. It expressed tender, trustful feeling in the piano passages, while in the crescendos and fortissimos the sentiment was of joy mingled with the passionate cries of love triumphant. A vocal solo with so much feeling in it is very rarely heard in churches from the regular choir, and a glow of delighted surprise overspread the faces of the listeners. She finished with a joyous burst, and a murmur arose from the congregation."

Rough.

Upson Downes—Say, Kirby, where's that silk umbrella I loaned you?

Kerby Stone—I found it was my own, so I kept it.

Upson Downs—Jove! Is that so? And here I have been dodging Old Hyson the last three weeks, thinking it was his!

ANOTHER SINGING MOUSE

Captured in the Dining-Room of a Kingston Man.

Mr. George Smith, of No. 2 Vaughn terrace, has become the fortunate possessor of a veritable singing mouse, which was captured in his dining room in this city, says the Kingston, Ont., Whig. Attention was first drawn to it by low musical sounds which issued from behind the buffet on the previous day, and after a careful reconnaissance and some dexterity it was driven into a paper bag which one of the ladies held—one of those few ladies who are not afraid of mice—while another manipulated a long prod in the space behind the buffet. Mr. Smith and a gentleman friend meanwhile stood courageously at a distance watching the proceedings. Subsequently the little creature was securely placed in a nice cage, and proved to be much like any other small mouse in appearance, except that it was thin and its tail unusually long, like some itinerant street monkeys who perform because they are hungry. Quite likely he came to Smith's, where he knew he could get food, and undertook to pay his footing by a musical performance. He was quite tame from the start and went at the cake and cheese without timidity almost as soon as they were placed before him, and afterward sang with almost the same abandon as when at liberty, though the intervals of silence were longer. Before he was caught he kept up his music for fifteen minutes at a time without cessation. He has a melodious, but modulated voice, and his utterance is a rhapsody of chirps and trills more or less varied and not at all monotonous like some parts of the song of a canary. Really he is a charming pet. He has an artificial nest in his cage, in which he hides or lies down at his pleasure, and his capers are quite amusing.

SPIRIT HANDS AT WORK.

Mysterious Disappearance of Articles from a Haunted Spot in England.

One night about fifty years ago a brutal murder was done at a lonely place on the highroad between Warwick and Stratford-upon-Avon, writes a London correspondent. The next morning [illegible]

[illegible]

A farmer in [illegible] Mass., [illegible] the polls to vote at the last election. [illegible] Democrat [illegible] the Republican ticket [illegible] was accepted [illegible] to the polls and deposited a clear Republican vote.

Cremation [illegible] slowly winning its way [illegible] At a congress of [illegible] advocates [illegible] it was reported [illegible] the course of [illegible] session that there [illegible] about [illegible] furnaces in [illegible] to [illegible] are in the United States [illegible] and one [illegible] completed in France.

[illegible] Patti as Juliet.

[illegible]

[illegible] in the old Greek style and fastened at the waist with a girdle. It was in this that Romeo saw her as he poured forth his song of love in the chamber scene. In the final act Juliet was stretched out in the white shroud of the tomb.

The Three Months' Depression.

Business man—"What? No money from the collections? I sent you out with a whole cartload of bills this morning."

Collector—"I couldn't find any of the arties at home."

"Eh? Where were they?"

"All out buying Christmas presents."

"I see. Too late! Too late! Put the bills away and start out with them again next March."

THE ROBESPIERRE BALL GOWN.

Description of the Latest Worth Creation.

The evening dress, intended for dinner or reception wear, is a real Robespierre ball gown, or the version of such a gown for this winter's wear by Worth. The under skirt and front breadth are of rich white and gold broche. The coat and train are of ruby colored velvet. The short jacket fronts have double revers. The inner rever is of white and gold broche, superimposed upon one of velvet. The [illegible] kerchief is a three-cornered point of fine Brussels lace crossed [illegible] a surplice over the chest, passing under the [illegible] wrinkled broad sash belt of soft red [illegible] and falling in a cascade below the same on the left side. The other figure represents the popular version of the directoire redingote. It is not very short waisted and the sleeves are only slightly fulled in at the armhole. It is of dark green plush, the fur black astrachan. The buttons are of green tinted mother of pearl inclosed in a gold rim, and covered with filigree figures in gold. The bonnet represents what they are wearing in Paris and London at present as directoire pokes, but they are not much like the bonnets that were worn in Paris during the [illegible] that followed the period when the guillotine was doing its work cutting off the heads of the pretty and graceful women who wore bonnets and head dresses of a much more exaggerated type, nor are they like the bonnets worn here at present, even by the fashionable few. Here women continue to wear the small pokes, toques, fanchons, capotes, turbans and round hats that are the favorite wear of the women all over the country. Whether they will be induced by midwinter to adopt the big bonnets and large, imposing hats that are [illegible] directoire and empire fashions remains to be seen.

KISSES BY PHONOGRAPH.

Many New Marvels Concerning the S[illegible] Writer.

[illegible]

[illegible] for Lemons

[illegible]

[illegible] Try it and see whether I am right.

Far From Consistent

Mrs. [illegible]sbergh (as the plover is picked up)—"Clarence, I think you are the most brutal, unfeeling, hardened wretch I ever knew! The idea of shooting that poor little inoffensive bird, and, er—ahem—er—er—which side of my hat would you put the wings on?"

A MOTHER'S CRY IN COURT.

"You—You—You Shall Not Kill My Boy."

"This was a cruel murder," said Judge Murphy.

McNulty [illegible] grew more agitated.

"It was unjustifiable and deliberately committed," the Judge continued. "You gave him not a moment's warning, not a chance to make peace with his Maker, not a moment for a single prayer."

Judge Murphy's tones were clear and cold. Perhaps he suppressed any emotion [illegible] scene, but if so he failed.

[illegible] remains," he said, "and that is to pronounce judgment on you. It is ordered that you be given into the custody of the sheriff to be imprisoned in the county jail until the day set for your execution, and that then you—"

The mother was on her feet. McNulty [illegible] his mother clutched the table and trembled. His wife cried softly, and the baby wailed plaintively.

"—Be hanged by the neck—"

"Oh God! My boy [illegible]"

She flung her arms around the condemned man's neck. A deputy sheriff gently drew her away.

"—Until you are dead." A wild shriek rang out, and the hopeless look of agony stood in the mother's eye.

"You—you—you shall not kill my boy," she sobbed. "[illegible] to me. Oh, Johnnie, my child, are you going to leave your old mother?"

"Order in the court." The court [illegible] adjourned yet," cried Judge Murphy.

McNulty stooped and kissed his mother. The tears filled his eyes, but he said nothing and gradually the blood receded from his face, leaving it deathly pale.—San Francisco [illegible]

To-day's Canadian [illegible]

Berlin municipal [illegible] will be in the evening.

The Lutheran Synod has sent Rev. F. [illegible], their President, to [illegible] to form a German congregation [illegible]

The Ottawa river is [illegible] between [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Real Husbands.

[illegible]

He Didn't Bounce.

[illegible]

Another [illegible]gement.

[illegible]

[illegible] Himself Away

[illegible]

An Exp[illegible]

[illegible] me what teaches the [illegible]

J. W. Watt, who has [illegible] the boots [illegible] for [illegible] Coal Oil Johnny, the speculator [illegible] operator, now [illegible] wells which gave "Johnny" [illegible] the millions he threw away in riotous living, to [illegible] in the workhouse.

A daughter of Dr. Gatling, famous for his Gatling guns, was recently married to Hugh O. Pentecost, the preacher.

The steamer Stanley, ordered for the winter service between Picton and Prince Edward Island, arrived at Picton yesterday.

Francis Darwin, a son of the late Charles Darwin, has been made university reader [in] botany at Cambridge, Eng.

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIBTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1.50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, DEC. 27 1888.

Just notice the manner in which they pay off church debts in Brampton: "In answer to the appeal of the pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Church, Rev. J. Philp, M.A., for $12,000 towards the extinction of the floating debt as a Christmas thank-offering to God, the congregation put upon the plate the grand sum of $13,911, an amount unequalled by any church in the Dominion at one collection."

Late accounts from Africa, which are considered authentic, inform us that Stanley is safe on the Aruwhimi river, a branch of the great Congo. The telegram states that Emin Bey is with him. Still, it is thought probable that Emin may be in the hands of Osman Digna. Stanley is not out of danger himself, but it is an accepted fact that he has not been made captive.

The Manitoba railway case which was lately tried in Ottawa has been decided in favor of the Manitoba Government. This means that the court has decided that the Manitoba people had a legal right to build their railway and cross the C.P.R., too. Mr. VanHorne intimates that he will continue the fight; but providing the Dominion Government grants a charter, which has been applied for, Mr. VanHorne will consider himself knocked out and will retire from the field. Mr. V.H. is a good fighter, but he fights against fate in this instance.

The letter from Mr. Thos. Kells, in another column, announces that one of the two days' meetings of the Farmers' Institute will be held in Flesherton. The array of talent provided for the occasion ought to draw an immense audience from the surrounding country. Matters of vital importance to farmers will be discussed. We will have something to say on the matter of Farmers' Institutes next week. In the meantime decide that it is very much to your interest to be present.

General News.

Mr. Ogilvie, the missing explorer has at last been heard from, at Victoria, N. W. T.

Owen Sound carried the by law on Friday loaning the Polson Iron Works Co. to the amount of $15,000

Another woman of low character has been found murdered on a street in one of the London suburbs, but she appears to have been strangled

Dr. Tanner, the excitable member for Cork, got himself suspended by the House of Commons Friday night by calling Secretary Balfour a coward and a liar.

The steamer Liet Erickson was burned near Seattle on Monday, and seven lives were lost.

George Sexsmith was killed by an explosion at the ammonia works, Front street Toronto Tuesday

A Zanzibar despatch to The London Telegraph says that all reports from that point regarding the meeting of Stanley and Emin Bay are untrustworthy.

The Mississippi steamer John H. Hanna was burned near Plaquemine, La., early Tuesday morning, and about 30 of her passengers and crew were either burned or drowned.

Advices coming by the way of Zanzibar state that Stanley was at Bonyale, on the Aruwhimi, on August 17th last, after having been with Emin Pasha, and that he was about to leave to join Emin Despatches from St. Thomas, on the west coast, say that Stanley and Emin are now together on the Aruwhimi.

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the head, How they may be cured at your home. Post free 34. Address Dr. NICHOLSON, 30, St. John Street, Montreal.

Festive Christmas Time.

The Christmas festivities are once more a thing of the past. The Christmas tree is laid away—so is the plum pudding, goose and turkey. It was a dull, dreary Christmas, from an elementary point of view. A green Christmas, a muddy Christmas, and a poor business season it has been. But it was Christmas, nevertheless, and we all enjoyed it. Entertainments throughout the country were numerous. There were tea-meetings, Christmas tree socials, etc. We had the pleasure of attending one of the latter at Union Church, Euphrasia, on Christmas evening, which was one of the most enjoyable of its kind, given by the Sunday School. The two trees fairly groaned under their burdens. Speeches, recitations and a "candle-lecture" by Rev. Mr. Madden made up a rich bill of fare. They know how to "do things" at Union.

TEA AT EUGENIA.

A teameeting was held at Eugenia on Christmas eve, with a view to liquidating the debt contracted in bricking, roofing and otherwise improving the Methodist Church at that place. Rev. Mr. Shilton gave a solid, practical address. J. M. Thurston, of Kimberley gave a short address, and Rev. Mr. Buggin, of Markdale, contributed very largely to the pleasure by his pithy, humorous and interesting remarks. The proceeds of this meeting were about $55, which will set the Eugenia church upon its feet, as it were. Kimberley choir furnished the musical part of the program. Muddy roads prevented a large number from turning out who otherwise would have done so.

ANNIVERSARY IN FLESHERTON.

The only entertainment given in Flesherton was the anniversary services in the Presbyterian Church. The entertainment was most enjoyable, the children furnishing a greater part of the program. A well loaded Christmas tree shed its fruit to the intense enjoyment of a large number of little folk. A cantata, "The Prince of David," was beautifully rendered by the children. This was under the leadership of Mr. J. G. Russell, and reflected much credit upon that gentleman. Besides the cantata there were solos, readings, recitations and dialogues. Among the solos that sung by little Reta Damude was especially fascinating. The clear little childish voice was sweet and true. She was cheered with a regular storm of applause. Little Miss Annie Thompson also sang very sweetly. The proceeds amounted to over fifty dollars.

Victoria Loyal orange lodge No. 144. The brethren of Loyal orange lodge, No. 544, meet in their lodge room on Tuesday, Dec. 18, to celebrate their 38th annual meeting, for the purpose of electing their officers for the ensuming year, when the following brethren were duty elected to their various offices. James Best, Worshipfull Master; William J. Henderson, Deputy Master; Samuel Sheredown, Chaplain; James Thompson, Recording Secretary; John Wright, Financial Secretary; Joseph Blakely, Treasurer; William Sharp, Director of ceremonies; Thomas Blackely, Lecturer; Committee, John Lyons, George Ludlow, Joseph Watson, David A. Stinson, Edward Lomas, Thomas Wauchob, Tyler.

The officers elect were duty installed, and a very pleasant time was spent and all brethern present partook of a grand supper prepared by the Lodge

Manitoba.

From our own Correspondent.

WINTER HAS COME.

According to present appearances since writing you, Mr. Editor, on the 5th inst., Indian summer has to give way to King Winter at last. Sleighing is quite good now, only about four inches of snow, yet as serviceable on this smooth, level, hard frozen ground, as four times four, on uncommon surface, or "in mud." The weather is not very cold. I never in all my previous years, saw such a variety of "furs" worn by human beings. Much of it is very handsome. It is almost a pleasure to have winter come, where men, women, and children, can so well protect themselves against Jack Frost. The people are generally joyous, and courageous, not that shrinking, dreading of the cold here, as in some distant parts of "our" Dominion, where a damper atmosphere prevails, or in the south, in the winter season, where people experience such a heart-searching chilliness, taking all the energy and spirit out of them, as does the intense heat of summer. There is in Manitoba, and this whole Northwest, so much Indian summer, and continuous moon, and star light, that the winters do not seem very long, also, such a great variety of birds remain. Permit me to change an old stanza to suit the case.

SUNSHINE,

Dear birds, your bower is green, or white!
Throughout the changing year,
Your plumage warm, your spirits light,
You have no sorrow in your song.
(Your stay with us is none too long.)
Few clouded skies to fear.

Again I say to Ontarians, and those farther east, if you are doing middling well stay where you are, if not, come this way, but,

DON'T LEAVE CANADA.

A Temperance mayor was elected yesterday for this city. The "women folks" now have a vote, and they used it "for all that it is worth," with happy result. No doubt, the earnest, faithful, encouraging sermons of the Rev's Crossly and Hunter arousdd the citizens to greater zeal, and activity. "Woman, last at the cross, first at the sepulchre, first to proclaim a risen Saviour," may yet be first to stamp out intemperance from the land.

WM. PURDY.

Winnipeg, Dec. 12, 1888.

Farmers' Institutes.

To the Editor of The Advance

DEAR SIR—The time is close at hand for holding meetings of the various Farmers' Institues throughout this province, two of which are to be held in our own electoral district, one at Markdale on the 11th of January, the other at Flesherton on the day following

Before sitting down to write you on this matter I had intended to explain to you the object Farmers' Institutes have in view, something of what they have already accomplished, and the great good likely to re ult in the future from the united action of the agriculturalists of this province. But believing that in order to do so I would require too much space in your valuable paper, I shall therefore content myself by sending you a copy of reports and proceedings of the Permanent Central Farmers' Institute of Ontario for the past two sessions, and I think after you carefully peruse the same you will think with me that Farmers' Institutes are very important associations, and that they have a great future ahead of them in advancing the great interests of agricultural communities and the country generally. And as many very important subjects affecting the interests of our people are to be discussed at the coming meetings, I sincerely hope there will be a very large attendance of all classes, especially of farmers. I think I can assure all parties that the program will be highly interesting throughout. The speakers are as follows: Professor Thos. Shaw, and Professor Simpson; likewise J. Mason, M. P. for South Grey; Dr. Sproule, M. P. for East Grey; Dr. Landerkin, M P. for South Grey; D. Creighton, M. P. P. for North Grey; John Blythe, M. P. P. South Grey; Professors T. B. White, and D J. Hunter, both of Loree, and many other local gentlemen will be invited to take part in the proceedings. The first day's meetings will commence at 12 o'clock noon, at Markdale. An evening meeting at the same place 6.30 p.m.

Second day's proceedings will be held at Flesherton, day following, commencing at 10 a.m. and 2 o'clock p.m. Evening meeting at the same place, to commence at 6.30 p.m.

Every effort is being put forth by the managing committee to make the evening meetings particularly interesting. The very best of music will be on hand, and very interesting speeches will be delivered by prominent gentlemen and a special invitation is hereby tendered to the ladies

Further notice will be given.

Wishing you the compliments of the season, I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly

THOS. KELLS, President, C. G. F. I.

Singhampton.

It is our painful duty to announce the sudden death of Mrs. Wm. Pearson, of this place, after a very short and calm illness. A great sympathy is felt for Mr Pearson and his family in their sad bereavement. She led a christian life, and died in the beauty of holiness, and will rise again at the glorious resurrection.

Our neighbor John is suffering from rheumatism of the heart, but I trust will soon be restored to his usual good health.

Glad to learn that Mrs A McLean is fast recovering, and Sandy begins to feel very jolly over it.

J R will be in the field this coming year for councilman. He will hurt Joe, but Quaker or no Quaker he will poll a big vote. I think him a very suitable man for the position. He also intends to erect a large building on the corner lot opposite Mr. Stinson's, to down that of Davy's.

Mr. Joseph Metker is causing some agitation among our framers by asking tenders for the erection of a large barn.

Mr. Fred Roome, of Maxwell, left for Oregon with Messrs. Milnie and Kerr. We wish them all good success.

Mrs. Jane Chapman was buried on Monday in the Badjero's cemetery

FAIR PLAY.

The Children's Invitation.

TO THE NEW YEAR

Come, Happy New Year don't you see,
We've had our Christmas gifts and glee
Yes, and we have had Thanksgiving Day
We ate, we sang, were thankful, gay,
Kind old year now, is almost gone,
We thank him 'cause he stayed so long,
And gave us food, and clothes, and home,
While some poor children's forced to roam,
And without father, mother dear,
The world to them seems dark and drear.
But, Happy New Year, when you come,
We hope you'll bring them friends at home
We'll all be good, yes, every day,
And min I what Pa and Mamma say.
Old year good bye, you need not fear,
Come quickly come, Happy New Year

WM. PURDY

Winnipeg, Dec 26th, 1888

Married.

BLYTHE-WHITE.—At the Manse, Flesherton, on the 28th ult., by Rev. T Watson, Mr. George Blythe of Potaskie, Michigan, to Miss Jennie White, of Artemesia.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 50	to 5 50
Fall Wheat	0 95	1 06
Spring Wheat	0 96	1 00
Barley	0 45	0 55
Oats	0 32	0 34
Peas	0 55	0 58
Butter	0 17	0 17
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 40	7 00
Hay per ton	10 00	11 00
Hides	3 50	4 00
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 8	0 09
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 06

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies.

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

does sell." Prepared by

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1, six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

308 Sewing-Machine FREE

In order to establish the name in a parts to introduce our machines in new localities where we have no agents, we will send free to one person in each locality, the very best sewing-machine made in the world, with all the attachments. We will also send free a complete line of our costly and valuable art samples. In return we ask that you show what we send to those who may call at your home, and after 3 months all shall become your own property. This grand machine is made after the Singer patents, which have run out, before patents run out is sold for $60, with the attachments, and now sells for $30. Best, strongest, most useful machine in the world. All is free. No capital required. Plain, brief instructions given. Those who write to us at once can secure free the best sewing-machine in the world, and the finest line of works of high art ever shown together in America. TRUE & CO., Box 740, Augusta, Maine.

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts. [illegible] Scotia and Dominion Banks

Medical.

DR. CARTER.

M.C.P. & S., ONT.

PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.

FLESHERTON

Office, Strain's Block. Residence J. G. Russell's

J. G. Hutton, M.D.C.M.

Member of the [illegible] Surgeons, Ontario

Office [illegible] or Atkinson's Hotel

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.

[illegible] Graduate of the

[illegible] FLESHERTON [illegible]

[illegible] HEAD OFFICE TORONTO

J. P. MARSHALL.

L. D. S., DENTIST,

Visits Markdale [illegible] Wednesday

Flesherton every [illegible]

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer,

[illegible]

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor [illegible]

MR. FROST will be [illegible] Thursdays and Fridays

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, C. GRAY

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER, &c. [illegible] and sale of lands. Appraisements and [illegible] most reasonable terms. Issuer of MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Farm or City Property.

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton

W. J. BELLAMY,

[illegible] CLERK ARTEMESIA.

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT., &c.

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES [illegible] and properly executed. Insurance effected in first class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on short notice. Auction Sales attended to [illegible] County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavestroughing, and in fact every thing in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND
A FULL SUPPLY OF CASKETS
—AND—BURIAL CASES, ETC.

A GOOD HEARSE IN CONNECTION

Christmas
1888.

Flesherton Furniture WAREROOMS.

SPECIAL ATTRACTIONS FOR THE HOLIDAY TRADE.

—A—

Nice Selection

Reeds and Rattan goods consisting of Gents', Ladies' and Misses' chairs, work baskets, [illegible], etchmatic Easels, nests, etc.

See these goods and enquire prices when you are selecting your

CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

We have some very handsome
—AND—

Lowpriced
PARLOR and BEDROOM
SUITES.

Bedsteads, Mattresses and Bed Springs.

CHEAPER THAN EVER.

All Kinds
OF REPAIRING
—AND—
PICTURE FRAMING
PROMPTLY DONE.

All goods carefully packed and delivered a reasonable distance.

Auction Sale
OF VALUABLE
FARM PROPERTY
Situate in the Township of Artemesia in the County of Grey

Under and by virtue of a power of sale contained in a certain Indenture of Mortgage which will be produced at time of sale, there will be offered for sale by

PUBLIC AUCTION
AT THE SAIEJOHN HOTEL
IN THE
VILLAGE OF EUGENIA
IN THE COUNTY OF GREY ON

THURSDAY, THE 27th DAY OF DECEMBER, 1888,
At Twelve O'Clock Noon.

All and singular that certain parcel or tract of land and premises situate, lying and being in the Township of Artemesia, in the County of Grey, and Province of Ontario, containing by admeasurement one hundred and two acres, more or less, being composed of [illegible] in the Township of Artemesia aforesaid, and which said lot is supposed to contain one hundred and two acres, more or less.

Terms of Sale

For further particulars, apply to
M. McEACHEN, Q.C., HART & McLENNAN,
Solicitors for Vendor.

Dated this 27th day of November, 1888.

Enlarged and Improved.
THE WEEK:

C. BLACKETT ROBINSON.
PUBLISHER, 5 JORDON ST., TORONTO.

BOAR FOR SERVICE.

MR. Wm. CAMERON, Lot 35, Con 8, Artemesia.

Teacher Wanted!

[illegible] Teacher Wanted for [illegible] Section No. [illegible] Artemesia. Duties to commence after the Christmas holidays. Apply stating salary to

[illegible]
Secretary.

NOTICE!

STRAYED.

NOTICE!

Municipal Notice.

I hereby give notice as follows:

THOS. GAMEY.

BARGAINS!

Lumber will be taken in exchange. Apply to
J. W. ARMSTRONG
Flesherton.

Dec 27th 1888

December Sessions.

[illegible] Tuesday.

Eaton v. Smith—An action for [illegible] Argued [illegible] plaintiff.

McDuffy v. C. P. R.—Plaintiff lives in Glenelg township, and has for neighbors Mr. Campbell and Mr. Beaton. The C. P. R. crosses the three farms. Plaintiff alleged that the part of the three farms which lay back of the railway track had been fenced in and used by the three owners as a common pasture that on the 4th of July last the railway fence in the Beaton farm was burnt, and that on the 25th of July one of plaintiff's colts was killed by a passing train that the value of the colt was $80 or $100. Action dismissed.

Owen v. O'Neagl was discussed on Wednesday afternoon. The prisoner was arrested, and the indictment charged him with breaking into Clarke Price's store at Heathcote Center and with the larceny [illegible] He [illegible] County [illegible] after which the [illegible] and did [illegible] a very strong chain of evidence [illegible]

Heathcote.

Monthly Fairs.

Proseville Monday [illegible]

FREE $25 Solid Gold Watch FREE
Value $100. Cases are [illegible] Best $50 watch in the world. Perfect timekeeper. Will be carried Heavy [illegible] and gold cases, with [illegible] and also [illegible] cases, [illegible] One Person in each locality can secure one free, together with an elegant and valuable line of Household Samples. These samples, as well as the watch, we send Free, and after you have kept them in your home for 3 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property. Those who write at once can be sure of receiving the Watch and Samples. We pay all express freight, etc. Address Quinton & Co., Box 618, Portland, Maine.

[illegible] CURED by Sutherland's Cure. Warranted cured by Sutherland's Cure. We guarantee

HEARD'S
Carriage Works,
FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

FLESHERTON Implement Agency!

It Pays To

J. G. CARSON

Northern Business College,
OF OWEN SOUND.

NEW
FALL GOODS!

General Store,
Priceville.

BOOTS AND SHOES

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

Tea, Sugars and General Groceries

General Store, Priceville.
A. McCABE.

FLOUR, FLOUR,
STONE
FLOUR!

MR. P. LOUCKS

NOTICE.

[illegible]

Farm for Sale

[illegible] Containing 150 acres [illegible] stables [illegible] new frame house [illegible] stone foundation. This is a magnificent property. Possession immediately. For terms etc. apply to

A. McEACHNIE, Maxwell P.O.

This Year's
MYRTLE
SMOKING TOBACCO
FINER THAN EVER.

See
T & B
in bronze on
EACH PLUG and PACKAGE

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

IT IS AT BLACKB[illegible]

[illegible] BUSINESS AS GEN' RALLY

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH.

G. H. BLACKB[illegible]

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL,
GENERAL
Dealers in fr[illegible] meats, [illegible]

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only $4 per hundred.

New Hard [illegible]
Parlor

Moore's Block, Durham St.

SALESMEN WANTED [illegible]
Write for terms to CHASE BROS. NURSERY [illegible]

KISS AND EMBRACE.

A United States Politician Proposes that Cousin Canada Shall Marry Cousin Jonathan.

RESOLUTION ON POLITICAL UNION.

A Washington despatch says: Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio, has introduced for reference the following joint resolution authorizing the President to negotiate with regard to the unity and assimilation with the United States of the Dominion of Canada, or of one or more of the Provinces thereof:

"Whereas, the citizens of the Dominion of Canada are one with us in race, lineage, history and tradition; and whereas, the resources of the two countries supplement each other and the arteries of commerce, both natural and artificial, are so interlocked and mutually dependent upon each other that they ought to constitute a single system to be one and inseparable; and whereas, the commercial relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada are and have been strained and unnaturally cramped and in a measure paralysed owing to the inability of the two Governments to establish such a system of international trade and commerce between them as is essential to meet the requirements of the situation; and whereas, the conditions and relations before referred to, as also the geography of the two countries, suggest the impossibility of a just and permanent settlement of the controversies pertaining to the fisheries, boundary and transcontinental trade except by a blending of efforts and interests under one governmental system, and point logically to the necessity and probability of a unity and assimilation between the two nations under one Government.

"Whereas, also, the bonds of sympathy resulting from kinship, race, language, tradition and substantial identity of governmental systems, together with a community of interests based upon commerce and its aids and agencies, are of such a character that such union and assimilation is being discussed and favorably considered by citizens of both nations, and inasmuch as it is believed that its early consummation would be of great advantage to all the citizens and subjects of the two countries, provided the same can be attained in a manner consistent alike with the honor and dignity of the United States and Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada.

"Therefore, with a view to aid in the consummation of what is [illegible] gested, be it resolved by the Senate [illegible] House of Representatives of [illegible] States, in Congress assembled, [illegible] President be, and [illegible] empowered to invite [illegible] the assimilation [illegible] people of the Dominion of [illegible] and the United States under [illegible] Government, such unity and assimilation to [illegible] upon the [illegible] several Provinces of the Dominion, or any one of them, into the Union of States upon terms of equality with the several States now composing the Union, and the assumption by the United States of the total indebtedness of the Dominion of Canada, or a just proportion thereof, [illegible] other equitable terms and [illegible] justice to the [illegible] demand.

"And resolved [illegible] to such negotiations [illegible] the appointment of [illegible] the Government of Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada [illegible] the wisdom and expediency [illegible] justing all controversies and differences which now [illegible] the two Governments, growing out of the fisheries or otherwise, by [illegible] tion as is herein foregoing stated, either as to the whole or any Province or several Provinces of the said Dominion, such negotiations to be conducted with a due regard to the amicable relations which obtain between Great Britain and the United States and the obligat[illegible]"

Gossip of the Dominion.

Kingston Medical College [illegible] 21st for the holidays.

Dufferin County [illegible] estimate the real estate at [illegible]

Three new [illegible] are [illegible] to be in full blast in Montreal.

Collingwood harbor [illegible] earlier than for years past.

Montreal has decided to [illegible] up barber shops and photograph galleries on Sunday.

Over five miles of the roadbed of the C. P. R. west of London are ready for the r[illegible].

The by-law making it compulsory for the Ingersoll Chief of Police to do detective work for the Scott Act has been repealed.

The death rate of [illegible] at present is enormous, among [illegible] people especially. Quite a number of cases of typhoid and scarlet fever and diphtheria are reported.

Luke Coulter, a brakesman on the N. & N. W. Division of the Grand Trunk, had his hand badly crushed at Bradford this week while coupling cars.

Mr. T. H. McGuirl, commercial master in the Collingwood Collegiate Institute, has been appointed commercial and drawing master in the Ottawa Normal School.

Mr. A. F. Ames, B.A., formerly mathematical master of the St. Thomas Collegiate Institute, is now Principal of the Riverdale High School, Ill.

At a meeting of the congregation of Dumfries Street Presbyterian Church, Paris, on Thursday afternoon, at which the Rev. Dr. Cochrane presided, Rev. Edward Cockburn, M. A., of Uxbridge, was unanimously elected to the pastoral charge of the congregation.

Taking Time by the Forelock.

"I say, gents," remarked a seedy man to a party, "I ain't no bum. I don't want no rum, I don't wan't nothin' to eat, and I don't want no bed." "Well," said one of the gentlemen, "what is it you want?" "I want," said the man, "money enough to buy a snow shovel." The money was contributed by the "gents," and the seedy man was seen twenty minutes later buying "snow shovels" in a schooner house at Fifth and Vine. Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

Do not bathe the baby either in the hour just preceding or following a meal.

INSIGNIFICANT NIAGARA

As Compared With the 2,000 Feet Fall of the Grand in Labrador.

A Quebec despatch says: Marvellous stories are related by the few Montagnais and Nascopee Indians who have penetrated far into the interior of Labrador respecting a cataract beneath whose terrific leap Niagara pales into insignificance. But one white man has ever seen these falls, and the Indians' ideas of measurement and distances are so imperfect that even where their stories agree it is exceedingly difficult to deduct from them anything like reliable data. An expedition lately undertaken by Randle F. Holme, F. R. G. S., and H. Duff, fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, to explore the interior of Labrador and investigate these falls, unfortunately failed in its object, the explorers having been misled by erroneous calculations as to distances and the exact location of the cataract, and compelled to return in consequence of running short of provisions. They got so near to the object of their expedition, however, that they were enabled, from the general configuration of the country, to form what must be a tolerably correct estimate as to both the location and magnitude of the cataract. This estimate agrees with the description of the Grand Falls furnished by Maclean, who visited them in 1839, and whose further progress into the interior was stopped by them. He gives the width of the river immediately above the falls at 1,500 feet, but says that the cataract itself is not more than 150 feet across. The height of the falls he estimates at 2,000 feet. This estimate is endorsed by a half-breed named Kennedy, met by Messrs. Holme and Duff in the interior, and who, thirty years before, was in charge of Fort Nascopee on Lake Petchikapon. One of the chief difficulties encountered by explorers desirous of reaching the falls is the obstinate refusal of the Labrador Indians to approach them. They believe them to be haunted, and think it impossible to look upon them and live. Kennedy was conducted to them by an old Indian named Louis over the Fire, who, being an Iroquois, does not share the superstitious belief of the Montagnais and Nascopees. Messrs. Holme and Duff were principally misled by the erroneous estimates and calculations as to distances [illegible]

[illegible]

AN OWL INDEED.

A Wounded Monster that Ate Mr. Orlando Seamons' Ducks.

A Parish (N.Y.) despatch says: [illegible] weeks ago Orlando Seamons, a farmer living here, found a duck in his barnyard dead and partly eaten. He thought the slayer was a coon, and so he borrowed a steel trap of his neighbor, George Thayer, and set it near the remains of the duck. The next morning the trap and duck were both gone. Seamons got Thayer's coon dog and tried to run the track, but the dog [illegible] around and lay down with an expression of contempt on his countenance. Nothing further was seen until a week ago, when Thayer found a duck torn to pieces under the shed in his barnyard. Thayer is an old trapper and hunter, and he did not take any stock in the coon theory. After dark the next night he set a trap near the remains of the duck. The next morning the trap was still set, but the duck had been dragged to one side and more was eaten off it. He then set three traps about the duck, and early next morning he had the culprit, an enormous old owl. He had got one toe in one of the traps Thayer had set, and upon the other foot was a trap—the one lent Seamons with the chain broken. The owl was also caught in another of the traps set by Thayer, so that he was held by three traps, and they were none too much. His toes were as large as a man's finger, and the trap on his leg, which would break a muskrat's leg, had not broken the skin. His wings measure six feet from tip to tip, and his head is twice as large as the Sun's office cat's. He had not been bothered to carry a steel trap for five weeks and earn a living besides. Mr. Thayer has him chained up in a barn, and is feeding him upon all the delicacies of the season.

The following incident occurred at the battle of Bull Run. In the heat of the action an officer, who has since become prominent and well known throughout the country, was then in command of a brigade on the right of the line. While riding over the field he discovered a soldier concealed in a hole in the ground, which was of just sufficient dimensions to afford him shelter. The general rode up to him, inquired as to his regiment, and ordered him to join it at once. The man looked him full in the face, placed a thumb upon his nose and replied: "Oh, no, you don't, old fellow. You want this hole for yourself."

We are not made happy by saying we received more presents than we did.

MARRIED IN HER MIND.

Mrs. Helen C. Field Weds Mr. Windsor but He Doesn't Know It—She Had "Manifestations" at Midnight.

A Wichita, Kan., despatch says: A strange case of delusion, real or pretended, was brought to light in the Probate Court to-day, when Mrs. Helen C. Field was tried as to her sanity at the instigation of Perry Windsor, a prominent society man and manager of a leading loan and mortgage company here, to whom Mrs. Field imagines that she is married.

Mrs. Field's mother testified that during last June and July her daughter had been very sick and acted very queerly. She then insisted that she was engaged to Mr. Windsor, and one day went to his place of business and on her return told her mother that they were to be married that afternoon.

"HE COMETH NOT," SHE SAID.

Mrs. Field dressed herself in a white dress and stood on the front porch that afternoon awaiting the coming of the groom. Mr. Windsor did not appear, of course, but she continued to dress herself in the same fashion for two days, and then her mother went to Mr. Windsor and asked him if he intended wedding her widowed daughter. The gentleman said he had no such intention. He added that he had been receiving anonymous letters and postal cards and also little packages of flowers, etc., from Mrs. Field, containing allusions to certain matters of which he had no knowledge, and that he wanted it stopped. It was then that Mrs. Field's mother concluded that her daughter was insane, and going home she told her what Mr. Windsor said, and advised her daughter to drop the matter. Mrs. Field seemed to give up the idea.

Nothing strange was noticed in her manner from July until about six weeks ago, when she again began to talk of signs and manifestations and connected Mr. Windsor's name with them. She would watch the window for a passing buggy, and on seeing the one containing her supposed lover would say:

"There is another sign. The marriage will now soon be consummated."

[illegible]

About this time she also began to talk of the Church and said she would not allow her lover to come between her and her God, as she thought he wished to. She would dress in her best and go to church at 10 or 11 o'clock at night and sit there, and on returning home would say a portion of the marriage ceremony had been performed.

Last Sunday night she went to church and sat some time. On returning she said part of the marriage ceremony had been performed and that in a few days it would end. Last Wednesday [illegible] she went [illegible]. She soon returned [illegible] said that the matter would be settled this week.

[illegible] she made another trip. On two different Sundays she dressed and awaited her lover to be married.

Mr. Windsor, the plaintiff, said that he met Mrs. Field about two years ago in a business way. Shortly afterward he began to get anonymous postal cards and letters, which considerably annoyed him. [illegible] letters and packages [illegible] with Mrs. Field's name [illegible] he had no [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] letters received. Mr. Windsor [illegible] wrote to Mrs. Field to [illegible], and after her mother had [illegible] under letters [illegible] stop.

About that time he was informed that there was a blackmailing scheme being worked by Mrs. Field, and he was asked if he was engaged to her. He, of course, said no. His idea was that the blackmailing theory was correct, and he took precautions accordingly.

Some of Mrs. Field's letters and notes were produced in court. One was a card giving Mr. Windsor free passage over the [illegible] Street Railway," and signed "Helen C. Field, Manager."

[illegible]

A letter written last spring said that she understood from "manifestations" that he was too ill to come to his office, but that if he would call on her it would be all right and she would waive formalities with pleasure.

About ten days ago he received her photograph, and three days ago he returned it by request. He had not spoken to her since last summer, and he never noticed her on the street. He had never spoken to her of marriage.

Mrs. Helen C. Field, when put on the stand, said the whole affair was all a mistake," and that she had misunderstood the [illegible]

The jury brought in a verdict of "not sane."

Personal Points.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, although now an octogenarian, is in excellent health and just as bright and witty as he ever was.

Lord Sherbrooke, better known as Robert Lowe, the English statesman, is reputed to be worth $10,000,000. He began life as a college tutor.

The announcement is made of the engagement of Miss Pritchard, a former Boston girl, to Baron Von Schroeder, an officer of the Imperial Guard of Berlin.

Waldemere, the famous Bridgeport residence of P. T. Barnum, has been sold, and will be turned into a summer hotel. Mr. Barnum will, however, continue to reside in Bridgeport.

Sam Small describes those members of the church whose practices do not correspond with their professions as the pillar-shams of the church. Such people are not necessary to bolster up a cause.

Mr. David Loevi, of New York, named his infant son Benjamin Harrison and received this neat note from the President elect: "Let me express the hope that the way in life of the child may be pleasant and that the name which has been assigned without his consent may at least not impede his success in life."

Sir Morell Mackenzie's oratorical feat at Edinburgh last week almost surpassed the recent performance of Lord Salisbury. Within 40 hours he delivered three lectures and managed to attend two receptions and one large dinner party.

A QUEER WILL

Which Has Been Broken in Favor of Relatives.

The intentions of many testators have been rendered nugatory, less by any informality in the manner in which their wills were drawn than by the essentially fantastic and impracticable nature of the bequests themselves—bequests to which, in the interests of public policy or of social propriety, it was found inexpedient to give legal sanction. To this last category must now be added the provisions of the will made by the late Rev. William Wight, of the Arab's Tent, Chiselhurst, Eng., which was finally adjudicated upon by Mr. Justice Chitty. The deceased cleric had given instructions for the endowment of a female college of a certainly novel and not unattractive kind, since its object was to train ladies for the important duties of wives, house mistresses and mothers. Woman, the reverend gentleman proceeded didactically to observe, should be something more useful and more noble than a doll, a butterfly or a plaything for her husband. To carry out his generous aspirations the eccentric Mr. Wight propounded a scheme two of the features of which were that the young ladies who were to be trained to become exemplary wives, housemistresses, and mothers should rise very early and resort to salutary, the but not always convenient use of the cold bath. He further provided for quarterly conversaziones at this hymeneal college, and directed that two-thirds of the invitations should be sent to single gentlemen. He also directed that his remains should be buried in his garden, next to the grave of a dog named Labrador, for which animal he seems to have entertained a peculiar affection. The court, however, held these bequests to be illegal, and Mr. Justice Chitty made an order for the distribution of the property among the next of kin. Of the thorough impracticability of the plans laid down by the well meaning but eccentric testator there can be no reasonable doubt. Long ago the poet told us of ladies who at their demise left their wealth to endow a "college or a cat," and it would have been quite feasible for Rev. Mr. Wight to bequeath the whole of his property, had he so chosen, to the Royal Holloway College or to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. As it is, the will which has been upset will remain only as a monument of futile generosity and misdirected anxiety to do good.

A TOUGH'S END.

Supposed to Have Shot Himself—His "Honorable" Career.

A last Friday night's Amherstburg despatch says: A shooting affair occurred near Gordon Post office in Anderdon, on Wednesday, which resulted in such injuries to Vincent McQuade, a well known tough, as will result in his death. About 9 o'clock, when all but himself were absent from the house, a report was heard, and when friends rushed in they found McQuade lying in the doorway leading from the dining room to the kitchen, with a horrible wound in the head, from which blood flowed very freely, while a double barrelled shotgun lay at his feet. The wound is eight inches long by four inches wide, extending backward from about an inch above the left eyebrow, and there is a break of about the size of a silver dollar in the skull. The doctors state that the patient may live a few days though his death will assuredly result. It is not known whether it was an accident or suicide, or if any other person had any hand in the affair. The gun must have been near his face when the shot was fired, as traces of powder were [illegible] on his face. A portion of the charge of shot lodged in the ceiling. At last reports the patient still hovered between life and death. McQuade was an adopted child of Patrick McQuade, having been taken from the church steps when an infant, and is about 25 years of age. He had borne a hard name for many years past, being almost continually in trouble with somebody, and he has been repeatedly before the courts. At the time of the affair his wife and her father were in a lawyer's office here, getting out an information for his arrest, he having that morning fearfully abused his wife, who is a good looking woman whom he married in Detroit. Her father, Thos. Beaty, lately from Virginia, was then endeavoring to secure McQuade's arrest for enticing his daughter from her home, she being under 16 years of age, for which the Dominion statutes provide a penalty of fourteen years' imprisonment. A few days ago McQuade and his stepfather had a dispute, when he threatened to shoot the old man, but the old man got the drop on him first, the ball cutting his clothing in its course. Last week McQuade also had an ear split in two by a razor in the hands of a colored man with whom he was fighting.

A Plea for Sleep.

Dr. C. Pollock, in the Chautauquan: A healthy baby for the first two years or so spends most of its time in sleep. After that a baby should have at least two hours of sleep in the forenoon and one hour in the afternoon, and it is quite possible to teach almost any infant to adopt this as a regular habit. Even to the age of four or five years a child should have one hour of sleep, or at least rest in bed, before its dinner, and it should be put to bed at 6 or 7 in the evening and left undisturbed for twelve or fourteen hours. Up to the fifteenth year most young people require ten hours, and till the twentieth year nine hours. After that age every one finds out how much he or she requires, though, as a general rule, at least six or eight hours are necessary. Eight hours' sleep will prevent more nervous derangements in women than any medicine can cure. During growth there must be ample sleep if the brain is to develop to its full extent, and the more nervous, excitable or precocious a child is, the longer sleep should it get if its intellectual progress is not to come to a premature standstill, or its life be cut short at an early age.

The Blindness of Love.

"Is love blind?" asked little Johnny, as Merritt and his sister came into the room, looking very innocent.

"Yes, my dear," replied his mother.

"If that's so," persisted the young fiend. "How could Mr. Merritt see when Cora got under the mistletoe?" And she called him her love, too.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN.

Father vs. Mother—Habits of Father—Difference in Religious Belief.

An interesting case—re Dickson—was decided by Mr. Justice Street at Osgoode Hall on Tuesday. One Arthur Dickson applied for a habeas corpus with a view of obtaining an order to have his two infant children, who were under the age of 5 and 3 respectively, delivered to him by their mother, his wife. The learned Judge was satisfied from the affidavits that the applicant was a man of drunken habits, that he had on more than one occasion beaten his wife, that she was justified in leaving him on account of his ill-treatment, and that his habits and conversation rendered him unfit to have the charge of the children. He was not satisfied that there were not faults on the part of the wife also, but said that she at all events was a moral and sober woman. The father said that if the children were given to him he would place them under the care of his mother and sister; but the mother and sister said they were neither able nor willing to take charge of them. On the other hand, the mother of the children was living with her own mother, who said that she was able and willing to maintain them, and the judge thought they were in good hands where they were, and well clothed and properly fed and cared for. "Having regard to the welfare of these infants," said Judge Street, "and to the conduct of the parents, I think that the mother should have their custody for the present. * * * It is urged that the father has a right to have the children brought up as Presbyterians, and that their mother and her mother are both members of the Salvation Army. A perusal of the evidence leads me to the conclusion that as between the religious training to be at present expected from the father and that of the Salvation Army, I should choose the latter. When the children are older, the father may have a right to raise this question again; but at present it does not appear to be a pressing one, owing to the tender age of the children."

MISS CARRIE F. JUDD'S SPINE.

She Tells the Christian Workers at Chicago How the Lord Healed It.

The Christian Workers of Chicago held their annual gathering last week in the First Methodist Church. Rev. John Morrow, of Pittsburg, presided at both the morning and afternoon sessions. An address was made by Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, who told how simple faith in Jesus Christ had restored her to health and strength. She related in her address, and afterward in detail to the reporter, the story of her illness. At the age of 15 she was stricken with a nervous malady. Her spine became affected. At the end of a few months she was obliged to take to her bed. She was helpless and confined to the bed for two years. She wasted away until she weighed only 85 pounds. By the power of prayer she had been restored to health and strength in a single night. Miss Judd, as she stood upon the platform, presented an appearance of robust and vigorous womanhood. She had never had a return of her trouble and had no fear that she ever would.

The afternoon session was opened with a testimony meeting, at which several told of having been cured of a variety of afflictions through their faith in Jesus Christ. One young man had been relieved in a single night of a [illegible] of spinal [illegible] and was a firm believer in the power of Christ to heal from all sin and disease.

Miss Judd then read a number of passages from the Scripture, in which it was plainly stated that by prayer and praise to God and an abiding faith in the truth of His promises all evils and illness that flesh is heir to can be removed. She said that once since her wonderful cure she had fallen and severely injured her knee, but that when she had said "Dear Lord, please make it well," she [illegible] firmly and constantly [illegible] been once removed.

Mrs. Shaw, the Whistler.

In conversation with a friend of Mrs. Shaw a correspondent learned that an observation of the lady's palate discloses a long, narrow, tube like vault, a peculiarity shared by all prominent vocalists. Her naturally long, slender waist developing into a bust, chest and shoulders of charming symmetry affords exceptional capacity for sustained and easy breathing. She has a quick ear for the intricacies of sound and reads readily at sight, and finds that what is once learned she never forgets. She experienced at first that difficulty so troublesome to the player upon brass instruments the flabby embouchure. Her chest, from bust to throat and shoulder to shoulder, has become wonderfully developed, and is unusually firm to the touch. She cannot whistle on an empty stomach, nor bear the least constriction about the waist, yet without a corset she could not whistle at all. Her throat must be loosely dressed, and she finds considerable increase in the fulness of neck. One advantage Mrs. Shaw shares with no whistler, amateur or professional, is that of looking at her very best while she whistles. Her face remains absolutely free from contortion, grimace or wrinkles. She says she has a sensation as of "grasping the notes" when she takes them on her lips. She needs fresh, cool air to do her best, and only becomes wearied in close, heated rooms.

Undertaker Wanted.

Wanted—In Indian territory, an undertaker. Must be able to kill his man before burying him. Wesley Barnett, a desperado, is now cooped up with a strong party in the Creek Nation and has a coffin made, which he keeps in his room in anticipation of his death. He has issued a defiance to the United States authorities, announcing that his coffin is ready, if he is killed, and daring the officers to come and put him in.—Sunnyside.

A curious incident in deer hunting is vouched for by a sportsman lately returned from the Maine woods. A party of hunters in a sledge on Lake Molunous saw ahead of them a large deer. Immediately there was a race over the ice, the sledge speeding across the lake at a rate impossible to the hunted animal. Suddenly the sledge met an obstacle and stopped. It was the deer, which had not only been overtaken but had been impaled upon one of the runners of the sledge. Its further capture was an easy matter.

My Girl.

A little corner with its crib,
A little mug, a spoon, a bib,
A little tooth so pearly white
A little rubber ring to bite

[illegible] little plate all lettered round
[illegible] little rattle to resound.
A [illegible] creeping—see! she stands!
A little step 'twixt outstretched hands.

A little doll with flaxen hair
A little willow rocking chair
A little dress of richest hue
A little pair of gaiters blue

A little school day after day
A little schoolma'am to obey
A little study—soon 'tis past—
A little graduate at last

A little muff for winter weather
A little jockey hat and feather
A little sack with funny pockets
A little chain, a ring and lockets

[illegible]

Content.

[illegible]

When.

[illegible]

TOUCHING WORDS.

The Empress Frederick on the Life and Death of Her Husband.

The following is a part of the letter written by the Empress Frederick which is published as an introduction to the memorial volume of her husband, prepared by Rennell Rodd:

"As you knew him in sunny days when he was the picture of life and health, as well as in the last sad year when that life was overshadowed by illness, I thought none would be better able than you to undertake the task of writing a short biography [illegible] which may make his name better known to the English [illegible] for whom he had so great a love, admiration and veneration, and which [illegible] and so [illegible] sympathetic [illegible]. I feel sure that the life of a [illegible] noble man must be interesting to [illegible] example so bright and pure can only do good.

"Those in humble ways [illegible] denied many of [illegible] by the rich, to whose lot [illegible] things of [illegible] imagine that the [illegible] bear great struggles [illegible] and tears are only for them. These [illegible] differently [illegible] borne with such patience and duty so cheerfully performed while sickness was undermining the strength of the strong man, they will be able to enter in some degree into the depths of regret and disappointment felt by a ruler who loved his people at being unable to carry out the long cherished plans for their welfare that he had so much at heart; they will [illegible] with admiration at the courage with which, when the shades of death were hanging over his path, he strode steadfastly along to the end.

"Grief and pain come alike to all; broken hearts are to be found in palaces as well as in cottages, and the bond of brotherhood seems strongest when love and pity unite all hearts, and reverence for what is good lifts up our souls. May this little history of the good and useful life of the Emperor Frederick appeal to the hearts of those who read it, and be as it were a greeting from him to his fellow sufferers in the hospital, to whom I so earnestly desire to do a small service; and to which you have so kindly promised to devote your pen. Yours sincerely, Victoria."

The Kansas Small Boy.

When Chaplain McCabe was in Kansas on a tour endeavoring to raise $1,000,000 for missions, a little boy heard his appeal and thinking of the large sum he had to raise, determined to help him. The first chance he had early in the week he gathered a basketful of chestnuts, which he sold for 5 cents. He sent this to Mr. McCabe with the note: "If you want any more let me know."—Christian Inquirer.

Answer, Noah.

Bright Boy—Mr. Withers, was every living thing except what went into the ark drowned in the flood?

Mr. Withers—Yes, everything.

Bright Boy—Fishes?

Beet Juice and Beauty.

Certain young women in Old Hurley use beet juice to heighten the charms of their complexions.—Kingston N.Y. Freeman.

A kingfisher attacked a black blass near Orlando, Fla. The bird sank its talons into the bass, intending to carry the fish off, but the task was too great, and, as the bird could not free itself, the bass found little trouble in drowning it.

CURRENT TOPICS.

It is announced that there are 20,000 professional criminals in New York city.

Snow drifts are three feet deep in Monroe County, Pa., while we, in the Niagara Peninsula, are enjoying Indian summer. But our Yankee neighbors continue to label the Dominion "snow bound Canada."

The west front of St. Albans Cathedral, England, presents what is said to be a unique specimen of ecclesiastical art—the head of an angel with whiskers. The angel is the counterfeit presentment of the late Lord Grimthorpe.

A [illegible] has been appointed professor of woodcarving in a western college. "Her first labors," says some droll person in the Baltimore American, "should be to teach the young ladies how to sharpen a lead-pencil."

Robert Smith, inventor of the railroad ticket, has just died in England. In the early days of British railroading receipts were given for travelling fares. Smith, then a railroad employee at Birmingham, hit upon the idea of the ticket.

There is a bronze group of a lioness and her cubs in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, that is an object of terror to every horse driven near it, so realistic is the sculptor's work. Last week it caused six runaways, and the Park Commissioners have, therefore, ordered its removal.

[illegible] physicians are endeavoring to induce her to depart from her present mournful seclusion and to mingle to some extent in the world. Queen Victoria and Princess Beatrice [illegible] easily [illegible].

A London correspondent tells [illegible] the [illegible] persons who play leading parts in the Parnell [illegible] chief [illegible] Sir James Hannen, [illegible] chief defendant, Mr. Parnell, are both virtually vegetarians. Mr. Parnell has to avoid meat largely, and [illegible] at luncheon time is a glass of hot lemonade.

It is too apt to be the case that when well-to-do folks have made a Christmas offering to Saint Charity their consciences are quieted for the rest of the year. Not so with good Rebecca Roberts [illegible] of New York who, [illegible] a little while ago, left a half-million dollars to be used in giving poor women and children an outing when midsummer sunbeams beat the housetops.

[illegible] the famous elephant now at Cincinnati, is as bad as he is big. He has killed [illegible] keepers [illegible] and Sullivan, and now though he weighs [illegible] pounds and is worth [illegible] a pound, he himself is to be killed. The Robinsons are said to have decided to shock him to death by an electric current as thick and strong as a lightning stroke.

"How can I become a good mechanic?" [illegible] says: "The watchword of advance is, think. Think in all times and places. Remember that one hour's earnest thought upon a subject on which you have been reading is worth ten extra hours of reading upon it. The mechanic who will persistently study and think of his business will not drown. He will certainly come to the front even though he were confined in the walls of a prison."

[illegible]

[illegible] in the United States [illegible] half of bread.

[illegible] says the New York [illegible] eight or ten colored physicians who [illegible] a good practice in their profession [illegible] colored race, for several of them have a profitable [illegible] patients and at least one of them is a favorite with wealthy white [illegible]. Most of them are graduates of [illegible] medical schools and they find that their white professional brethren are perfectly willing to hold consultations with them in [illegible] cases.

Mrs. [illegible] formerly of Chicago, and [illegible] of the murdered millionaire, Snell, has taken herself to New York for the winter with her maids and her children. She says that people have no idea of the annoyances to which she and her mother have been subjected since the tragedy. They have been beset by detectives anxious to hunt down the murderer, and have received no fewer than 90,000 begging letters from all parts of the world.

Verestchagin, the Russian painter, when presented to the art students of the Normal College in New York the other day, said: "Young ladies, you are indeed very charming, and, in accordance to one of our Russian customs, I would like to salute you all individually. But since I cannot, I will kiss Professor [illegible] instead, and he will give you the kiss in my place," and suiting the action to the word, he turned to the blushing and dignified professor and, with a hand on each shoulder, imprinted a resounding smack on his cheek.

Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone are thus pictured by the London Daily News as they appeared on the platform on the occasion of their recent visit to Birmingham. Both were in evening dress, she charmingly attired in crimson silk, black lace and diamonds, and carrying a swansdown fan. Mr. Gladstone, with the customary camelia in his coat, "his dress shirt open at the neck for strong oratorical efforts," and the way of his white tie thus made easy for its customary journey to the side of the neck in the course of his coming oration.

Since "Robert Elsmere" has become so famous a novel, it may be interesting to know the Harpers' copy readers unanimously condemned the book when it was offered that house for publication. They objected to it both because of its length and because, being in sense a religious novel, it demonstrated no new principle, and whether it was intended as a commentary and justification of Matthew Arnold or not, it merely illustrated a fact in intellectual and moral life that had been sufficiently illustrated already and was well recognized.

In anticipation of the proposed utilization of a large part of the sewage of Paris by irrigation on the fields of Asnieres, a commission appointed by the French Senate recently visited the irrigation fields at Berlin. These are now in working order and furnish the most extensive example of sewage purification by irrigation in the world. Berlin now contains more than thirteen hundred thousand inhabitants, having trebled in population in the last twenty years. In the [illegible] tricts the cesspool is still used [illegible] whole of the closely built portion of the city, containing [illegible] thoroughly sewered, and all waste [illegible] from this part of the population are [illegible] by water to the pumping stations [illegible] which they are distributed to the irrigation fields.

On a street car [illegible] was a [illegible] bowed to the popular [illegible] and yellow covered copy of [illegible]—that [illegible]

[illegible]

ROYALTY'S LIBERAL [illegible]

[illegible] New Housekeeper [illegible] Looks Forward [illegible]

[illegible] presents [illegible] are [illegible] generous [illegible] and [illegible] the Royal [illegible] the Queen is to [illegible] Crown Prince of Austria [illegible] and other personages are likely to be [illegible] Her Majesty's guests. There will be [illegible] the visit of the Emperor William either at [illegible] or early in July. The [illegible] trouble and [illegible] which the arrival of royal guests from abroad always involves are, however, compensated by the presents they distribute and the scale upon which these are dispensed by a wealthy sovereign may be judged from the fact that when the late Emperor Nicholas visited the Queen at Windsor in 1844 he left £1,000 for the servants at the castle and also gave £500 and a parure of diamonds worth £1,000 to the then housekeeper, and twelve gold snuff boxes, with his portrait set in diamonds, to the lords, grooms and equerries in waiting.

Not Too Tame.

[illegible] able excitement was created in Rich[illegible], Eng., lately. At first it was rumored that a lion had escaped from a [illegible] which was stationed in the market place, then it was rumored that a child had been worried by a lion, and there was quite a panic, it being the market day. The real facts were soon revealed when Mr. Robert Chandler was seen carrying in his arms the apparently lifeless body of his little daughter Alice. The child's face was covered with blood and its eyes appeared to be coming out of their sockets. It seems the child had been taken into the show by an elder sister, who was carrying her in her arms. As they were passing the lion's cage a man stumbled against them, and the ferocious beast took advantage by suddenly seizing the child's face in its claws, then made an effort to reach it with its mouth. Some men rushed to the rescue, but not before the child's face and [illegible] were frightfully torn. She lives, but is in a very precarious state.

A force of 100 men is employed upon the Canadian Ship Canal at the Soo, surveying the site of the canal and clearing it for the actual digging, which occurs next spring.

The Pope says that he thinks the good health he has enjoyed for the past 20 years is due to the regularity with which he has lived.

A DREAM OF WILD BEES.

A Bit by Olive Schreiner—Ralph Iron.

A mother sat alone at an open window. Through it came the voices of the children as they played under the acacia trees and the breath of the hot afternoon air. In and out of the room flew the bees, the wild bees, with their legs yellow with pollen, going to and from the acacia trees, droning all the while. She sat on a low chair before the table and darned. She took her work from the great basket that stood before her on the table: some lay on her knee and half covered the book that rested there. She watched the needle go in and out; and the dreary hum of the bees and the noises of the children's voices became a confused murmur in her ears as she worked slowly and more slowly. Then the bees, the long-bodied wasp-like fellows who make no honey, flew closer and closer to her head, droning. Then she grew more and more drowsy, and she laid her hand, with the stocking over it, on the edge of the table and leaned her head upon it. And [illegible]

[illegible] grew more and more dreamy [illegible] came [illegible] far, now near [illegible] then she did [illegible]

[illegible] for her sleeping babe. Bent forward and resting there with the bees [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] stay! [illegible] many [illegible] More [illegible] own [illegible] response [illegible]

"He shall succeed [illegible]"

He said: "He [illegible] runs with others [illegible] before him. For [illegible] to him and stra[illegible] him and he must wait and listen. And this shall be the strongest [illegible] across the burning sands where to [illegible] there is only the desert's waste, he sees a blue sea. On that [illegible] always, and the water is [illegible] as burning amethyst, and the foam is white on the shore. A great land rises from it and [illegible] shall see upon the mountain [illegible]"

The mother said [illegible]
And he sm[illegible]
She said [illegible]
And he said: "Who is real [illegible]"
And she looked up between his [illegible] closed eyelids, and said: "Truth."
And he leaned forward and laid his [illegible] upon the sleeper and whispered [illegible] singing [illegible] shall be thy reward: that the ideal [illegible] be real to thee."

The mother slept on heavily and [illegible] brain picture vanished [illegible] world.

Time-tried, Truely Tested.

Tried for years, severely tested and still growing in popular favor and use, is the record enjoyed by Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, the little sugar-coated laxative granules, sold by druggists, antibilious and cathartic.

Rebecca E. Robertson, recently dead in New York, left half a million to provide a free brief summer outing for poor people of that city.

TERRIBLE RAVAGES OF DIPHTHERIA.

Dr. Lehmann Returns From His Trip With [illegible]

Dr. Lehmann, who visited the [illegible] Bay, Ont., district for the Provincial Board of Health to ascertain the extent and cause of the [illegible] of diphtheria which has been [illegible] there, has returned to Toronto. In the [illegible] Bay district he found [illegible] cases [illegible] and four deaths [illegible] Bay he returned [illegible] and from there travelled [illegible] French River. Through [illegible] diphtheria prevailed [illegible] cases were reported and [illegible] occurred so far as could [illegible] medical attendance [illegible] districts. There is a [illegible] and one at French River [illegible] but there are none [illegible] causes of the disease were [illegible] pure drinking water and bad sanitary arrangements. The settlers [illegible] wells only a few feet in depth [illegible] ground and were not very particular as to how they disposed of refuse. [illegible] well drained the soakage [illegible] sage. So sparsely settled are [illegible] that no local Board of Health [illegible] organized. Lately, however, the ravages of the disease have abated. At [illegible] eighteen cases have so far been [illegible] [illegible] deaths. [illegible] the towns [illegible] [illegible] that company has control [illegible] sanitary arrangements of the [illegible] [illegible] and supply medical [illegible] [illegible] warning for the [illegible] very careless.

[illegible] Wise—For Sharp Eyes

[illegible] and hard-aught [illegible] Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery [illegible] sands have been [illegible] otherwise would now be [illegible] For all liver [illegible] lung diseases [illegible] specific.

His First Financial Lesson.

[illegible] I want to buy [illegible] to the candy store. [illegible] offer the man a liberal sum [illegible] for the [illegible] of the candy, [illegible] of stock, sell one-half [illegible] parties pay the man his money, [illegible] will have [illegible] the store. See?

[illegible]

Little Leaves of Soap

[illegible]

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.
Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.
[illegible]

SALESMEN [illegible]
Wages $[illegible] per day [illegible] Centennial Manufacturing Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

FOR SALE,

A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine.

WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR

TIMES PRINTING CO.
HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

[illegible]
BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

Saws! Saws!

Cross-Cut Cross-Cut

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having five gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined siller steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you Another line I would particularly call yonr attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

The editor of the Meaford Monitor has taken the C. P. R. agency for Meaford.

Meaford Mirror :—A dressed hog sold by Mr. E. Chapel, of St. Vincent, to Mr. D. Smith this week weighed 480 lbs.

Mt. Forest Confederate ;—A sad accident occurred on Wednesday the 12th, in Proton. Mr. John Harvey and his hired man was chopping in the bush, when a lodged tree fell on Mr. Harvey and killed him almost instantly. He is an old settler and was a quiet and inoffensive man. He was buried on Friday, the 14th, at Mount Forest Cemetery.

Hanover Post :—On Monday the case of The Singer Sewing Machine Co. vs. Zimmerman was tried before Justice Proctor and dismissed. The defendant, who lives in Neustadt, got a sewing machine from plaintiffs, giving in exchange an old machine, $12 cash and a lien note for some thirty odd dollars. Not being able to meet the demands of the plaintiffs, and the machine not being on the premises, defendant was brought before the J. P. The machine was subsequently procured which the representatives of the company can get by giving up the lien note a document they have not seen since it was issued nor know anything about. V. Lang defended the case.

Durham Chronicle :—At an early hour last Friday a sensational little episode occured at the corner of Garafraxa and Lampton streets and which attracted quite a crowd of early risers and travellers. The centre of the scene was a young man of about thirty, a middle aged woman, his mother, and her daughter a little girl about 12 or 14 years of age. The trio stood beside a sleigh which was headed toward the station with the object of conveying them there in time for the first train. The little girl wouldn't go, not a bit of it. Her mother coaxed her in vain, and persuasion failing tried force but the child clung desparately to the sleigh box and screamed with a vehemence that left no mistake as to her repugnance, "I won't go, I'll die first." She didn't go nor did she die, but broke away from her mother and running up Lampton street was taken in charge by another of her brothers, who had came into town, as it so happened, with a passenger for the train, and was by him taken off to his home where she now is. The key to the situation is this : The woman parted from her husband some years since and moved down country where she is now living. She wants her daughter to live with her, but the child won't, preferring to remain with her father and brothers.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. Alex Nevin is rushing business in the swamp this winter, taking out ties and sawlogs and rails and other things too numerous to mention. He was down below all summer until the cold weather set in, and then like the wild geese he turned his head towards a warmer climate and never stopped until he reached his own cabin in the bush.

Mr Hugh McLean is taking out timber for a barn he is going to build in the spring. That is right, Hughy, build a house next and then bring her home.

Red Sandy had a big wood bee a short time ago and he got a heap of wood cut. The boys worked hard, for they expected a good time at night and they got it too, thanks to Mr. Latham, fiddler, and L. Frook, caller off.

Mr. W. Blakeston is going on a visit to his brother who lives in Michigan. He is going to make good use of the Christmas holidays. We wish him a pleasant trip and a safe return.

Mrs. Alex Ferguson, of Dakota, is over visiting her many friends here, all of whom were very happy to see her. She gives a glowing account of the far west.

Mr John and T. Ferguson intend spending the greater part of this winter in the bush, as they have quite a number of jobs of wood at 23 cents per cord, but they dont split nor pile it. They are all right.

Mr. Editor, I suppose you would like to know what locality this batch of items came from, or, in short, where Balsam Valley is. It is about three miles south of Priceville, and half a mile from Muddy Valley. It is not much of a place yet ; it is not marked by any magnificent domes or spires, not even a small tombstone, but never mind, it will grow.

OBEN

You can have the Toronto daily World and Advance one year for only $2.50 A daily and a weekly for only $2 50 ! Think of it !

A large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

—AT—

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Fulled Stockings, Overshoes and Rubbers. Mens' and Boys' Long Boots, At prices to suit the times.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,

FLESHERTON.

A Positive Cure. ✢ A Painless Cure.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

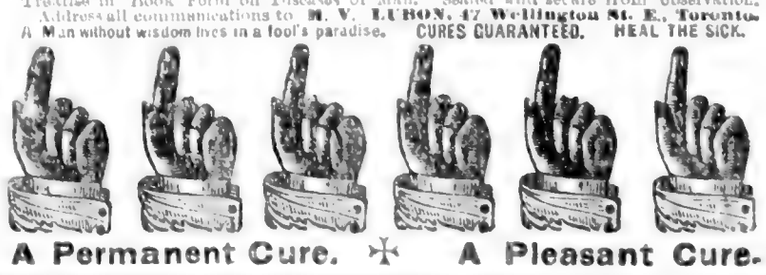
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, seminal weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, imnutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation. Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.



A Permanent Cure. ✢ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equal

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London,

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☞ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR"—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 392. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, JAN. 3, 1889. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR

CALL AT

RICHARDSON'S Drug Store

AND SEE HIS STOCK OF GOODS SUITABLE FOR

Xmas and New Year's

PRESENTS

BEFORE YOU PURCHASE ELSEWHERE. HE HAS THE

LARGEST ASSORTEMENT IN TOWN,

—BOTH—

Useful and Ornamental.

Albums. Satchels, Purses, Cards, Books, Toys, Sweets, etc.

OVER 500 LBS. OF SWEETS JUST IN.

A merry Christmas

and a Happy New Year to ALL.

Wm. RICHARDSON.

The Publishing and Patent Offices of the Scientific American.

Perhaps some of our readers have visited the extensive offices of the Scientific American, at 361 Broadway, New York, but many have not, and to such the following account may be of interest. A correspondent who recenty had the pleasure informs us that he was greatly surprised at the magnitude of the establishment. It suggested to his mind an enormous insurance company or banking house. At the main office, which is principally devoted to the patent business—forming as it does so important a part of the establishment—may be seen the members of the firm and their able corps of examiners. Ready access to the principals is afforded to every one; and here may be seen inventors from all parts of the country showing their models and drawings, and explaining their inventions. The models left by inventors form a large and interesting collection, and are kept in a room by themselves. The large corps of draughtsmen who prepare the patent drawings are for the most part experienced mechanics, electricians, or engineers, some of them having been connected with the U. S. Patent Office. Most of the correspondence is carried on by type writers, and this necessitates a seperate department, where a number of experienced female type writers and stenographers are constantly employed. The dark room, where the photographs of the patent drawings are copied, and where the photographs for the architectural department are developed, is also on this floor. On the floor above may be found the editorial rooms, compositors' and subscription room, and the engravers' department.

The Architectural Department occupies the top floor, and here may be seen the manager of this department, and also a number of draughtsmen at work preparing the plans and general designs for the Architect and Builder editor of the Scientific American, which is published monthly, and has attained a widespread circulation. The printing of the papers is carried on in a seperate building. At the entrance of the main office, which alone occupied a floor space of 60 by 165 feet, may be seen one of Prof. Draper's remarkable recording barometer which was built specially for the Scientific American, it is a remarkably fine and sensitive as well as a very expensive instrument.

Some idea may be had of the extent of the business done at the office of the Scientific American when we state that over one hundred persons are employed by Munn & Co. on their several publications and in their extensive patent departments.

General News.

Several business places in Deloraine Man., were burned on Thursday night.

W. H. Webb was hanged at Brandon Friday, for the murder of his wife.

It is feared that the mind of Rev. A. Thomas, pastor of the Carleton street Presbyterian church, Toronto, has given way.

Joshua Fraser who was once a Presbyterian minister, was burned to death in a hotel at Sharbot Lake Friday morning.

Mr. Thos. Heming, brother-in-law of the late Hon. George Brown, has died at Florence, Italy. Mrs. Heming died only fifteen days ago.

Dr. Mallory has been appointed registrar of East Northumberland, Mr. James H. Coyne registrar of Elgin, and Mr. James Smith sheriff of Welland.

Mr. Gladstone completed his 79th year on Saturday.

A Montreal coppersmith named Benson Sunday morning shot his wife dead and wounded her alleged paramour.

Bradford, England, is excited over the murder and mutilation of a boy after the Whitechapel fashion. A milkman is in custody accused of the crime.

$98 Sewing-Machine FREE

To at once establish trade in all parts, by placing our machines and goods where the people can see them, we will send free to one person in each locality, the very best sewing-machine made in the world, with all the attachments. We will also send free a complete line of our costly and valuable art samples. In return we ask that you show what we send, to those who may call at your home, and after 3 months all shall become your own property. This grand machine is made after the Singer patents, which have run out: before patents run out it sold for $98, with the attachments, and now sells for $50. Best, strongest, most useful machine in the world. All is free. No capital required. Plain, brief instructions given. Those who write to us at once can secure free the best sewing-machine in the world, and the finest line of works of high art ever shown together in America. TRUE & CO., Box 710, Augusta, Maine.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Fair day next Monday

Squire Fields furnished good skating in the rink on New Year's Day.

Why will you cough when Shiloh's cure will give immediate relief. Price 10 cts., 50 cts., and $1. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Did you see the good flannel that's selling at the Flesherton factory for 28 cts.

Rev. Mr. Shaw, of Toronto, will preach in the Methodist Church on Sunday, morning and evening.

Mr. R. H. Henderson, of the C. P. R. insurance agency, has been enlivening the village with his presence during the last few days.

We direct attention to the article by "Canadian" on annexation. It is well written, convincing and eloquent. The proper ring is there.

We have been a little late in publishing last week and this, owing to an extra rush of job work and the holidays, but feel sure our readers will gladly give us a day's grace at this festive season.

Messrs. John Lyons, Wm. Lucas, W. A. Brown, E. Rutledge, Jas. Mercer and Wm. McLaughry were appointed school trustees for Markdale last week.

This section of country is highly favored. Although we had a green—or rather muddy—Christmas, there was very good sleighing for New Years, while other people not twenty miles away scraped along on bare ground.

We are indebted to W. F. Doll, Esq., of Winnipeg, for a copy of the Christmas Sun. It is a highly entertaining publication, but is simply a reproduction of [illegible] Night Christmas number with [illegible] advertisements thrown in. Thanks, friend Doll.

For dyspepsia and liver complaint you have a printed guarantee on every bottle of Shiloh's vitalizer. It never fails to cure. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Mr. N. Campbell, of Markdale, lost a child 3 years old, on Sunday last, which was buried in the Flesherton cemetery on Wednesday. Mr. Campbell was a resident of this place for some years, and has been extremely unfortunate in the rising of his family, having lost three.

The attention of our readers is directed to the advertisement of Munn & Co., patent solicitors, in another column. Their name is familiar to patentees throughout the country. In connection with the publication of the Scientific American for the past forty years, they have prepared applications for more than one hundred thousand inventions, [illegible] of a character [illegible] extensive.

A Meeting of the Durham Chronic [illegible] held on Christmas [illegible] Hotel, and had to [illegible] this issue of this paper from [illegible] paper was not behind time, and quite up to the standard. Bro. Mitchell is what we would call a flexible editor. He can bend his steps to any point of the compass and, like James Gordon Bennett, direct affairs at home. We are extremely sorry that he was taken ill in this manner, as it deterred him from criticising our artistic work. We look for his decision this week.

At the annual meeting of L. O. L. No. 1085, Feversham, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Bros. James Elliott, W. M.; Ira Perigo, D. M.; Andrew McGirr, Chap.; Samuel Colquet, Fin.-Sec.; R. Kernaghan Treas.; C. Edwart, D. of C.; S. T. McGirr, Lect; J. Speers, T. Parks, R. Ottwell, A. Somberger, A. Hollinghead, Committee.

Shiloh's catarrh remedy—a positive cure for catarrh, diptheria and canker-mouth. For sale at the Medical Hall,

We would welcome [illegible] immediately. Those who can do so will confer a favor by bringing it in this week.

Personal

Mr. R. W. Hollinger, of Toronto, has been up visiting his uncle, Mr. James Woodburn, of Glenfield Village, Eugenia. Being an old resident of Eugenia, and quite a favorite, he has spent a pleasant time among his many friends. His brother Tom, Clerk in Mr. Trimble's store, Flesherton, went down to Toronto to spend New Years with his mother and brother. Bob endorses the opinion of many others that there is no place for having a good time like Eugenia, each one vieing with the other to make it pleasant for their visiting friends.

Mr. Thos. Clayton, of Toronto, has been spending Christmas and New Year's holidays in Flesherton. He returned to Toronto on Wednesday.

Mr. Burton Trotter, of Manitoulin Island, is visiting his uncle, Wm. Strain, Esq.

Miss Addie Armstrong is visiting at Hamilton.

Miss Dannade, who has been on a prolonged visit to friends in Welland, returned home on Saturday last. We extend the hand of welcome.

Mr. Wm. Carson, and Miss Sarah Carson, both of Meaford Road, have just returned home after spending their Christmas holidays with friends in Barrie.

Shiloh's cure will immediately relieve croup, whooping cough and bronchitis. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Artemesia Nominations.

It is a settled fact that there will be no election in this municipality. At the nomination on Monday last, all the old council was re-elected by acclamation, a thing which speaks very highly for the gentlemen composing the council of Artemsia township. It is something which they may look back upon with pride, as being almost without a precedent here. We tender congratulations to the council, one and all, upon this evidence of the satisfaction which their endeavors for the furtherance of the township's welfare has given. The following gentlemen will accordingly compose our council board for another year:

REEVE.

W. S. Christoe, M. D., nominated by R. Lever and C. W. Bellamy.

COUNCILLORS.

Ward, No. 1.—John McArthur, by John Hazard and T. McArthur.

Ward, No. 2.—John B. Boland, by T. Kells and W. McLaughrey.

Ward, No. 3.—Wm. Sharp, by John Wilkinson and Geo. Whitten.

Ward, No. 4. [illegible] Carnis, H. Ford and J.

Sudden Death.

Mrs. Margaret Williams, an old lady 74 years of age, living near Instrogo, died very suddenly on Sunday last. She retired on Saturday evening in her usual health, and on Sunday passed peacefully away, in accordance with a desire she had often expressed that she might not die of a lingering illness. According to her desire, she was buried yesterday in the cemetery at Holland Center.

Auction Sales.

An auction sale of household property will be held in Flesherton on Monday, Jan. 7, (fair-day), in Dr. Christoe's block. Thomas Duncan, Proprietor. R. J. Sproule, auctioneer.

A credit auction sale will be held on lot 25, con. 4, Osprey, the premises of Mr. Jas. Rehill, on Thursday, January 10th, when a large amount of farm stock, implements, etc., will be offered. Terms: All sums of $5 and under, cash; over that amount twelve months credit. Eight per cent. off for cash. J. W. Morrow, auctioneer.

The Rev. Geo. H. Thayer, of Barbon, Ind., says: "Both myself and my wife owe our lives to Shiloh's Consumption Cure. For sale at the Medical Hall.

A Quick Return.

Another instance of the benefits derived from fraternal insurance societies was lately shown in the case of the late Mrs. J. G. Russell. Mr. Russell has requested us to thank the authorities of the Royal Templars of Temperance for their gratifying promptness in satisfying the claim against them for one thousand dollars held on Mrs. Russell's life, a check for which sum was received by Mr. Russell, in trust for his son, Richard W. Russell, within ten days after the order had been issued.

Ayer's Almanac 1889, published by Dr. J. C. Ayer and Co., Lowell, Mass., comes to us in the shape of a new pocket-volume of [illegible] hundred pages, being made up of [illegible] editions exclusively for the benefit of [illegible] many lands. A score or more [illegible] are addressed in their own languages in this volume, and could they all be heard clamoring together for Ayer's Pills what a Babel would break forth! Ayer's Almanac, in its familiar yellow cover, has long been known as the most accurate and reliable of its kind; and if any one is ignorant of the superior merits of Ayer's medicines, and suffers in consequence, it is not the fault of this enterprising firm, who scatter their "leaves" by the million for the healing of the nations. Ask your druggist for Ayer's Almanac.

Birth.

FLESHER—On Dec. 22 [illegible] W. H. Flesher of a son.

DEAFNESS CURE. A [illegible] Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the Head, How they may be Cured at your own Home. Post free 2d. Address Dr. Nicholson, 30 St. John Street, Montreal.

SACRIFICE SALE

TILL JAN. 1st, 1889.

16⅔ PER CENT. off all sales of WATCHES and CLOCKS! or ONE SIXTH off marked price.

20 per cent. off RINGS, CHAINS, SILVERWARE, MUSICAL GOODS do. do.

25 per cent off general lines

JEWELRY, SPEX, ETC.

[illegible] only place [illegible]

CALL EARLY

[illegible] CL[illegible]

It will pay you to [illegible] can not [illegible] from at [illegible]

CALL THIS MO[illegible]

If you never have b[illegible]

—AND—

Test This State[illegible]ent!

that I have a very fine [illegible]k at Bed Rock P[illegible]es!

Discounts considered. [illegible]e repairing receives [illegible] attention.

W. A. BR[illegible]

JEWELER and OPTIC[illegible]

MARKDALE, [illegible]

MY LADY TONGUE.

By Amelie Rives, Author of "The Quick or the Dead."

They had ridden about twelve miles, when Boughton began with some astonishment to listen to the tremendous beating of his mount's heart.

"Just hear this beast," said he to Judith. "I hope he's not going to die. I never heard a brute's heart go like this."

"What is it?" she said, reining up.

All her brown curls were in her eyes with the wind, and the weird light from the weather-glim full on her golden horse and his trappings. She was perfectly beautiful, Phil thought, or, what is so much better, imperfectly beautiful.

She laughed a little when he told her what alarmed him, but looked worried.

"Dad's miles ahead by this time," she said. "That isn't Trumpeter's heart. It's his dia—dia—oh! I never can say it. He's foundered, you know. Get down, and let's look at him."

She was off horse in an instant, and Phil beside her.

"Poor old beastie," she said, slapping Trumpeter's crest coaxingly. "I say, Phil, do you know how to bleed a horse? In the neck vein, you know. You don't. Dear me! Well, then, I'll have to try. Give me your knife. Don't say you haven't one. Gad! how he's breathing. Thank goodness, you have one! Now, come on! help me."

With Boughton's assistance she cut the bars of Trumpeter's palate, and as well as she could got the best part of her own and her cousin's whiskey-flask down the poor brute's throat.

Boughton was a good deal impressed, at the same time that he was provoked at being shown up in all his flagrant ignorance of the ills that horse-flesh is heir to.

They had a tiresome walk the rest of the way, for Judith would not remount Eyebrows, and poor Trumpeter, emulating his name behind them, was anything but a cheerful companion.

How Phil did wish that he had been able to spring from the foundered horse, all the time having a full cognizance of what ailed him—have whipped out his knife and bled him, and administered the whiskey, all without a word from Judith. And how he fumed over that idiotic speech about Trumpeter's heart. He thought Judith must have a contempt for him.

And, to tell the truth, she did. She blushed to think that some of the neighbors might have been with them, and heard her cousin's remarks, and seen the helpless way in which he stood about, while she righted things as best she could. Her eyes were still a good deal more red than brown whenever she allowed her thoughts to dwell upon him.

That night, as he came into the drawing-room just before dinner, he found Judith in the arms of a slim young man in a very elaborate costume—or rather, if the truth must be told, the slim young man was in the arms of Judith, who appeared to be alternately laughing and wiping her eyes as best she could on the lapel of his coat.

As Boughton came in, however, she stood erect and put up her hand to her curls, which were a good deal rumpled. Her eyes were brown as rain-washed autumn leaves now. No red in them whatever.

"Dick, your cousin, Philip Boughton," she said, speaking pretty coolly. And Boughton found himself in possession of the slim young man's hand.

"Er—glad to see you—er, just from Paris? Cold here, isn't it?" said the boy, languidly.

He was only a boy, after all, with a face something like Judith's seen in a spoon, and the same red-brown curls. His eyes, however, were a pale gray.

"No; I am from start to finish," said Boughton, gravely.

"Eh?" said Dick.

He did not laugh, neither did Judith. She scratched the chin of the black kitten in the Toby-collar, and looked gravely at Boughton between its ears.

"Oh, I see" said the boy, finally. "Been out hunting. Deuce of a time you had, Judy here tells me. Horse foundered. Awful nuisance, having one's horse foundered. Do you like hunting?"

"I haven't done much of it," said Philip, honestly, wishing devoutly that he had. He had eyes keen to look with as well as to look at, and saw the little downward clip of the girl's mouth, as she went on cosseting the little kitten.

"I've done a lot of it in my day," pursued Dick, laughingly. "And I must say it rather bores me."

"Oh, does it?" said Boughton. "It doesn't seem to bore your sister."

"Nothing bores Judy," Master Dick assured him in the same languid tone. "I tell her to wait until she's grown up."

"She's a bit more 'grown up, than you now, isn't she?" said Boughton, dryly.

"How do you mean?" Dick asked, allowing his eyes to open themselves, as it were, in despite of his own will, while Judith stopped scratching the kitten's chin, and looked a good deal astonished.

"Why, as you stand there together, I'm quite sure she's a good inch taller," said Boughton, calmly, with one hand in his pocket and the other meditatively at his moustache. "Yes, a good inch, I should say," he repeated.

Dick flushed, but Judith grew positively scarlet. The intense blush seemed to spread into her very eyes, and they reddened ominously.

"You are entirely mistaken," she said, in the small, still voice which is generally supposed to be monopolized by conscience. "Richard is a half inch taller than myself. We were measured only last June."

"Perhaps you have grown since June," suggested Boughton, quite unmoved.

"Not in grace, eh, Judy?" put in the boy, good-naturedly coming to the rescue. "You've got her in a perfect temper, cousin Phil."

"How can you speak so, Dick!" cried Judith, turning upon him, and dropping the kitten, which fell with a furry bounce upon the polished floor. "I see that you have even less consideration than before you went away. And, besides, you know very well that you are a half inch taller than I am."

"Suppose we test it," said Boughton, who somewhat felt an unaccountable pleasure in exasperating her. Perhaps he was reveling in the delight of taking the superior pose in his turn. "Here's a good back to measure with. If you will stand back to back with your brother——"

All the blush was in her eyes now. Her face had grown quite pale.

"You are insulting," she said, with her teeth shut, and walked out of the room.

This was a great deal more than Boughton had expected. He stood staring after her with the book still in his hand, and then opened it blankly and looked in it as if for an explanation. It was a volume of Miss Hannah Moore's private devotions, and so he closed it and replaced it on the little table whence he had taken it.

"Don't you mind her," said Dick, easily. "She's always twice as sweet after one of her tantrums."

This seemed in truth to be the case. She came in to dinner as suave as May, and took her seat beside Philip with a smile.

"How cross do you think I am?" she said, leaning toward him, and making a cushion for her round chin with her palms, her elbows being on the table.

"I am afraid I was very provoking," he said, eagerly. "I am sorry; will you forgive me?"

She said nothing, but went on smiling, so he took his forgiveness for granted, and partook of more green goose with a light heart.

Now it was very dangerous to take anything for granted with this young lady, especially when there were little sparks of vermilion in her eyes, as there were to-night. But Phil could not possibly have known this; the smile she bestowed upon him was so enchanting that he did not look higher, and so noticed nothing peculiar about the eyes.

Dick was to stop over until Monday, and the next day all three went out for a walk. This ramble happened to be very eventful. I may as well state that there occurred the time-honored episode with the bull, but Boughton neither transfixed the infuriated animal with a pitchfork, nor leveled it with a well aimed blow from his muscular fist.

It happened this way. They were passing through what was then known at Carylon as the "Mill Meadow," when a peculiar kind of rumbling noise attracted their attention. Dick was the first to look back.

"Good heaven's! Judy," said he, "it's Priddie's bull."

"Is it?" said Judith, losing color for an instant, and following the direction of his eyes. "Yes, it is, and not a fence within two hundred yards. Oh! what are we to do?"

"I tell you," said Boughton, straightening himself and feeling an abominable clutch in the hollow between his ribs, "run as hard as you can, while Dick and I—— Why, where is Dick?" he said, blankly.

"I'm—going—for—Priddie!" came back in broken bits over the shoulder of the flying youth. "He can—manage—him!"

Boughton said nothing. He turned again to Judith.

"That's all right. Run, now, as fast as you can, and I can easily keep him off with stones until Priddie comes."

"And leave you here for that brute to gore and trample?" said Judith, bristling in a moment. "I see myself!" she added, with fine scorn

All this time the bull was making a tremendous tow-row, and using one of his horns as a plow-share. He was coming nearer, too. They could see his little red eyes distinctly.

"Judith, I beg of you," said Boughton, giving her a not too gentle push.

"Well, I will," she said, suddenly.

She lifted her walking-skirt, and with a quick gesture, slipped off the red balmoral petticoat which she wore underneath. This she took in her hand and started off at a long, even run, before Boughton well realized what she was about to do. When she was within fifty yards of his bullship, she gave a view hallo which did more credit to her lungs than the occasion, and flourished the red skirt in the air.

Boughton's heart did actually stand still. He gave a dragging breath, got the best of his horror, which was inclined to make him week-kneed, and started off after the girl.

But the brute was before him, thundering on at a great lumbering pace, only stopping now and then to plow the ground with that ugly left horn of his.

Away went this modern Europa, in the direction of the nearest fence. Half way between it and her pursuer she dropped the red petticoat, and this his eminence tarried awhile to toss and worry and mix with the red clay.

Boughton had an awful fancy which he had no time fortunately to countenance. He seemed to see Judith being trampled and mangled in the same fashion as her pretty skirt, by those brute feet and horns. But thank, Heaven! it was only the next instant that she reached the fence and literally rolled over into the next field.

Then, for the first time looking back, she saw him.

"Get over! Get ov—er!—quick!" she called, in what voice remained to her. "If he sees you he will—kill you—oh!——' This as Boughton just managed to put the rails of the old snake fence between himself and the bull, who rushed alongside bellowing like a bovine demon, with his tail an exact reproduction of Hogarth's line of beauty.

"The—straw—stacks," Judith panted, as Boughton reached her. "He may—tear—that—fence—all—to—bits!"

He took her hand, and they ran together to a group of straw stacks some ten yards away, up which they scrambled together, loosening avalanches of straw, and slipping several times before gaining the top.

Once there, Judith cast herself down, making a little hollow of her two arms, into which she thrust her face. She was shaking from head to foot, not trembling, but wrenched with a convulsive movement, which went to Boughton's already not too calm heart.

He leaned over and put his arm about her as she lay, and then, as she did not pull away or remonstrate verbally, he ventured to rest his other hand on the red-brown curls. Something in their soft, almost living clasp upon his fingers went through his veins strangely.

"Judith," he said in a voice that he did not himself quite recognize. Then he cleared his throat and said it over again—"Judith," and then "darling!"

That roused Judith better than sal-volatile or a pail of ice water would have done. She sat up, and a little away from him, and said:

"There comes Priddie—and Dick."

Priddie, armed with a pitchfork, was running with all his might, and Dick, in the far background, was running also, but with very little of his. He had made at least thrice the time when he went for Priddie.

Then the bull was secured, and marched off meekly, with a prong of the pitchfork through the ring in his nose, and the whildom pedestrians also betook themselves dinnerward.

The colonel swore extensively when he heard about it all, and called Priddie some very ugly names, which gave the soul of Boughton infinite comfort. He vowed, moreover, that he would not rest in his four-post bed untill that bull was made into beef.

"And gad! if I wouldn't like to make that —— fool eat every square inch of him!" he ended, thunderously, fisting the table until the spoons and glasses gave tongue shrilly.

Boughton did not see Judith alone after that for more than a week. It was within ten days of Christmas, and she was endlessly occupied about something or other.

But she found time, however, to give him plenty of smiles and gay words in passing. And he had sent to New York for something which he knew that she very much wanted, so that altogether, though tantalizing, it was not very unpleasant. Phillip, moreover, was rather anxious to find out whether he was only deeply smitten, or very much in love, and he thus found time to discuss that momentous question with his inner man—that individual who is always such a loose or tight fit for his outer representative.

Of course the colonel had insisted upon his remaining until Christmas; and he was to hang up his stocking, of course—ha! ha!

And there should be some young folks, and bonfires, and what not. Also, there were some sleighs sent up from Richmond, and the place was literally resonant with the voices of expectant nigs, big and little.

On Christmas eve, however, Boughton managed to find her alone, although Dick had arrived, and she seemed busier than ever.

He was going along the corridor to his room, when he caught a glimpse of her through the half-open door of a little paneled room, which she called her "Tea Caddy." She was standing on the grey deer-skin rug before the fire, in the cream-white frock he liked, and wearing the identical blue beads and bow which he remembered so well. Her feet were sunk out of sight in the thick fur, but he fancied that she also sported the bronze shoes.

There was a glisten in her eyes which Boughton did not think was all firelight, and she clinked the beads of her necklace hurriedly together.

"Do let me come in," he said, pushing the door further open.

She looked up vaguely, as though from a dream, and said, "Certainly." So in he went, shutting the door behind him. It was a pretty room, with much blue chintz on windows and furniture, and many hunting traps about. There were two old chairs on either side of the fireplace, which could have held six Judiths apiece, and in one of these she now placed herself, still keeping her hand on the beads at her throat.

Boughton sat down on the rug at her feet, Turk-fashion, and took his crossed ankles into a capable grasp.

"I never saw half such a pretty room," he remarked, looking about him. "It's you, Judith, all over again."

"Is it?" she said, still in that absent fashion; and then added, with a sort of laugh: "Yes, it is rather blue."

"What? Are you blue?" Boughton asked, convinced now that the glisten was not due to the firelight. "On Christmas Eve, too? That will not do the least in the world. What's wrong?"

She tossed herself back into the open arms of the big chair with a petulant gesture.

"Everything!" she cried—"Everything!"

Boughton sat a moment gazing steadily to the fire.

"Judith," he said, at last, "can't you tell me, dear? I might help you, you know?"

"You couldn't! you couldn't!" she said, still vehemently knitting her chestnut brows, which in that position was absurdly like her father's. "Nobody can. I can't myself. Oh! dear!"

It is impossible to express the rebellion condensed into that one "Oh! dear." The room seemed to reverberate with it.

Boughton could think of absolutely nothing to say just then, so he edged along toward her over the deerskin rug, until he could rest his arm on the arm of her chair.

"Tell me," he urged. "Do, Judith. One can never tell. Perhaps I may be the very one to help you."

But she said "No," very curtly, and stared over his head into the fire.

Presently, however, she burst forth again:

"Was there ever such a wild place as the University of Virginia, do you think?" she cried.

At that, "Oh!" said Phil to himself. Dick had of course been getting into trouble, and had cast his burden upon his sister's plucky little shoulders, after his usual brave fashion.

"I don't know much about it, you know," he made answer. "What has Dick been telling you?"

She looked at him a little sharply.

"Why do you think Dick has been telling me anything?" she asked, in a rather careful voice.

"How else should you know?" Boughton said, easily. "But of course don't tell me unless you wish."

Suddenly she leaned forward, setting one hand back down in the other as they rested on her knees. Her necklace swung forward from her bending throat, and the fire-light cast dainty, circular shadows from its beads upon the snowy white of her neck.

"Yes, I will tell you," she said, suddenly. "Dick is in debt—that old, old story to sisters—for how much do you suppose?"

"I don't know," said Boughton, stupidly.

He was not thinking in the least of Dick just then. He was wondering how many of those little soft round shadows there were on her white breast, and whether he could count them if he tried.

"Well, then—for eight—do you hear?—for eight—thousand—dollars."

"That's not so very bad," said Boughton, reassuringly. "We can pull him through."

"'We?'" said the girl, haughtily, on the defensive at once. "Who do you mean by 'we?'"

All at once he got his arms about her. She felt his breath in her hair, on her throat.

"Who should I mean but you and I—you and I—you and I?" he went on repeating, in a sort of intoxication. "Judith—kiss me!"

"Kiss you?" she said, "kiss you?"

She was absolutely rigid with fury. Was ever man so blind as Boughton?—so deaf, one might say. He leaned forward and kissed the pretty blue bow, and the space of white flesh encircled by the blue beads. He looked up and would have kissed her lips, but was stopped by the furious light in her eyes. He started back and freed her in a moment.

"This is the second time," she said, with shut teeth, as he remembered her once before to have spoken—"the second time that you have behaved like a beast to me."

"Judith!" he said.

"Yes—a beast!" she said, biting down on the word, as it were, with her sharp little teeth.

"Judith," he said again, "take care—take care!"

"Take care!" she repeated. "Take care of what? Of the womanhood that you don't respect? There! Your lips have touched them, they are vile!

She jerked at the blue necklace with a sharp movement which broke it, and the pretty beads went rolling this way and that over the fur rug and the polished floor.

The kitten in the Toby-collar pursued one into a distant corner, and thought the episode gotten up for her especial benefit. One or two rolled down into Judith's bodice, and felt very cold and disagreeable, but she was too much wrought up just then to think of physical discomfort.

She stood opening and shutting her hands in a sort of helpless gesture of rage.

"How dare you treat me so?" she said, breathlessly. "How dare you?—dare you?—dare you?"

He was on his feet, of course, by this time, and stood facing her with his head well up, and his hands well down in his pockets, an extremely angry man. The lover was quite taken up by indignation.

"How dare you treat me so?" he returned, with rather ominous quietness. "Do you think it is very—er—ladylike to call people 'beasts?'"

"'Ladylike!'" panted poor Judith, who for the time being could not resist echoing him. "Ladylike!" she cried again.

"Ladylike—the Devil!" she said for a third time, bringing down her teeth with a vicious little snap over the terrible word.

Boughton was actually livid.

"Pardon me," he said, bowing and turning on his heel. "Good evening." But as he reached the door he wheeled around and came back to her. "Judith," he said, in a voice that she did not at all find familiar. "I meant to ask you just now to be my wife. Of course I leave at once. I will concoct some story to tell your father and Dick. Good-by."

He went without so much as touching her hand and closed the door, opening it again, however, to thrust a little mat out of the way. He did not again look over in her direction. Then he went finally.

And she stood staring at the closed door, thinking in a vague way that it was Christmas Eve, and that she had better ring for her maid to gather together the scattered beads—and that Boughton had gone, and that she had lost her temper and forgotten herself utterly.

There was a rigorous wind a-romp in the narrow hallways and the locust trees without, and in a distant corner the kitten was still scrabbling about with one of the fallen beads. It was quite still save for these noises, and the sound of the wood fire, which was busily "treading snow."

She stood there until the room seemed receding in a golden haze, and then she turned stiffly, and, stooping down, began to pick up the blue beads from the floor. The kitten, seeing her kneeling, scampered up, expecting a frolic. She lifted the pretty little brute to her white breast, and held it thus while she went on in her laborious search.

* * * * *

Judith did not see Phil again until three years afterward, when she was 21, and the civil war had broken out in all its horrors. He was a colonel on General ——'s staff, and happened to be encamped near Charlottesville, and Colonel Page asked himself and the general to dinner. The latter declined for some reason or other, but, much to Judith's amazement, Boughton came.

She watched him dismount from his horse, looking through her closed window blinds, and her heart emulated the action of poor Trumpeter's diaphragm on the memorable occasion three years ago. She saw that he had broadened a great deal and was browner—very much browner—in fact, quite dingy as to complexion, and that his undress uniform was abominably shabby.

Then she turned slowly away and went down stairs. She had thought a good deal over her toilet, laying out the four gowns in her possession on her narrow bed. Among them was the creamy one with the little blue bow at the bodice. She was as slender as ever, and could have worn it very well, but she tossed it aside decidedly. She finally clad herself in a gray serge, which had originally been a vivid pink, and belonged to one of her great aunts. A rosy tinge was still discernible here and there in the folds, after the fashion of that in a gray cloud at sunset. She put on a little tucker of old lace, which, alack, had been "done up" with bluing, but there were no bows, nor beads, nor bronze shoes this time. As for herself, she looked precisely the same as she had done three years ago, save that there was rarely any red nowadays in the brown of her eyes.

She went down slowly, coming to a halt on each shallow stair of the oak staircase. She was not at all sure of her reception. Would he stare grimly, and be very icy to her? Or would he merely ignore her? Or would he indulge in covert sarcasms, that only she could understand?

She made up her mind at last, however, and turning the knob of the drawing-room door, entered abruptly and noiselessly.

The colonel was established in his red-leathern half-way house, with his gouty foot on a stool, and Boughton sat astride of one of the various spindle-legged chairs, with his arms resting on its back, and his chin on his arms. He got up when Judith entered, and came forward to meet her, holding out both hands.

"Well, my Lady Tongue," said he, with the smile she remembered.

There was not a trace of bitterness, of sarcasm, of coldness in his voice. It was absolutely natural, if a trifle mischievous, and somehow this perverse young woman wished that it had been either one of the other three, rather than what it was. She found spirit enough at her command, however, to answer saucily:

"Well, Sir Oracle!"

He still held her hands, and looked down at her.

"You haven't changed the least," he said, presently. "Er—that is—have you?"

"No," she said, with all her old curtness this time, resenting the still very decided mischief in his tone.

"I don't know that I'm sorry," he said, gravely, and then the colonel called to him, and he turned away to answer.

They saw him very often during the next fortnight. He was always riding down at unexpected moments, and stopping in to dinner or tea. It is true that his conversation was chiefly with the colonel concerning war matters, and what had been, and what was to come, etc.

Dick had just joined Boughton's regiment, and the Colonel was as anxious to know all about him as though he had been in several engagements, whereas he had not been in any. He came jingling down with Boughton one day, in all the pride of his new trappings, flushed and really looking quite gallant. Judith had still the advantage of that half inch, but the boy was sturdier than at seventeen, and carried himself very well.

They arrived about sundown, and the Colonel, being confined to his room by a very sharp attack of gout, they had some chocolate in Judith's "Tea Caddy." The hard times of sweet-potato coffee and blackberry-leaf tea had not yet chanced, and Judith's chocolate was above praise.

Boughton cast a rather curious look about the room as he sat down, and Judith handed him one of the wide, shallow cups that he remembered. It was all just the same, all except the kitten in the Toby-collar, who was now a sedate matron with two children, who had each inherited a Toby-collar, as much like their parent's as possible.

Boughton took one upon his knee, and Dick captured the other, while Judith ministered to their mamma, with bits of cake soaked in the chocolate.

"I say," remarked Dick, suddenly, "by ——! if it isn't only a week from Christmas. Do you remember the way you trotted off and left us on Christmas Eve three years ago, Cousin Phil? You do, don't you, Judy?"

Judith said, "Oh! yes," that she remembered, of course.

Boughton, who was smoking one of the colonel's old Cabanas, lazily stroked the paw of the kitten on his knee with the unoccupied fingers of his cigar hand. Judith thought she detected a smile—the wraith of a smile behind the smoke haze. She drew herself up, and a very haughty look came over her clear, firelit features.

"Assuredly I remember it," said Boughton, all of a sudden, when Dick, who was busily engaged in tormenting his kitten by pulling its Toby-collar half over its ears, had forgotten that he had put the question.

"I should think I did," he went on. "The thermometer was only 15 above zero, and the waggon got stalled in a snow-drift before we were half-way to the station."

Judith again waxed perceptibly taller. She would have added two or three cubits to her stature if she could have done so. She told herself that she hated her cousin Philip Boughton very much indeed.

"Well, Jude certainly made a lovely present out of you, anyway," laughed Dick. "And I must say she appreciated it. I don't believe it's been off of her arm for the last three years."

Boughton could not repress a quick look in Judith's direction. She was making a fire screen out of one of her long hands, and he could not see her expression for the shadows from her fingers. But by-and-by, when Dick went out for something or other, he pitched his cigar into the fire, and went over beside her.

(To be Continued).

Another Trifle.

"Send it, mum?"

"Oh, dear, no! Most of the things we had sent last year came along about a week after Christmas. My husband will carry it."

"But isn't he rather heavily loaded, mum?"

"Not a bit of it. He says he carries a millstone round his neck down town, and I'm sure these little things won't bother him much. Here, Sammy—another trifle."

He Wanted to Copy.

Mrs. Jason—"Jehiel, I've had the awfulest scare. I opened the door and found the worst looking tramp I ever saw, Why, I couldn't say a word for ten minutes." Mr. Jason—"Do you know which way he went? I would like to get his make-up if it had that effect."—Terre Haute Express.

Words Could Express It Painfully Well.

Young Borrowe (who has been accommodated with a small loan—gushingly)—Oh, my friend, words cannot express the extent of my obligation to you for this kindly action!

Old Van Loan—Eh? Yes they can. Just sit down here and make a little thirty-day note.

The Proper Title.

In the Boudoir.—Radiant young wife (arrayed for the reception)—You solemn old boy! Don't you like my new dress?

Bearish old husband (critically, through his eye-glass)—H'm—well—I like it for the honesty of its title. It is decidedly a nude dress.

Lost Illusion.

"What, is everybody wicked, mamma dear?" "Yes, Bertie." "Are you wicked yourself, mamma, dear?" "Not so good as I ought to be!" "And—the police?"—London Punch.

Large quantities of lambs and sheep are being shipped from Elmira, Ont., to Buffalo.

Teacher—Tommy may tell us what shape the world is. Tommy—It is round. Teacher—How do you know it is round? Tommy—'Cause you told me yourself. Teacher—Yes; but my telling you the world is round doesn't make it round. How do I know it's round? Tommy—I s'pose somebody told you.

It Could Not Happen Now.

Ere country ways had turned to street,
And long ere we were born,
A lad and lass would chance to meet,
And often she'd neglect her task,
The willows bowed to nudge the brook,
The cowslips nodded gay,
And he would look and she would look,
And both would look away.
Yet each—and this is so absurd—
Would dream about the other,
And she would never breathe a word
To that good dame, her mother,
Our girls are wiser now.
'Twas very quaint, 'twas very strange,
Extremely strange you must allow.
Dear me! how modes and customs change;
It could not happen now.

Next day that idle, naughty lass
Would rearrange her hair,
And ponder long before the glass
Which bow she ought to wear:
"Why do you blush like that?"
And seldom care to chat,
And make her mother frown and ask:
"Why do you blush like that?"
And now she'd haunt with footsteps slow
That mead with cowslips yellow,
Down which she'd met a week ago
That stupid, staring fellow.
Our girls are wiser now.
'Twas very quaint, 'twas very strange,
Extremely strange, you must allow,
Dear me! how modes and customs change!
It could not happen now.

And as for him, that foolish lad,
He'd hardly close an eye,
And look so woe-begone and sad
He'd make his mother cry.
"He goes," she'd say, "from bad to worse,
My boy, so blithe and brave.
Last night I found him writing verse
About a lonely grave!"
And, lo! next day her nerves he'd shock
With laugh and song and caper;
And there!—she'd find a golden lock
Wrapped up in tissue paper.
Our boys are wiser now.
'Twas very quaint, 'twas very strange,
Extremely strange, you must allow.
Dear me! how modes and customs change!
It could not happen now.

—F. Langbridge in Good Words.

Her Christmas Gift.

A woman stood on weary feet,
Sifting an ash-barrel in the street,
And to her skirts clung, chattering,
A little, tousled, merry thing.

"To-morrow Christmas gifts will come;
I know, dear Granny, we'll have some."
She answered not. Heart sick and sore,
She picked the refuse o'er and o'er.

She would not speak the bitter thought—
"To such as us Christ cometh not."
She paused to wipe her lashes free;
It gave her eyes new youth to see.

A doll!—a black, discarded thing,
But yet a doll! With hand trembling,
The eager woman snatched the prize
And hid it from the baby's eyes.

"To-morrow Christmas gifts will come;
I know, dear Granny, we'll have some."
"Ah! darling, may you never doubt;
Christ will not let you do without."

Dear Little Alice.

Dear little Alice—may her joys increase—
Awoke one night, and near the mantel piece
Beheld Old Santa Claus, with bag and box,
Quite busily engaged in filling socks.
Delightedly she lifted up her voice—
That childish treble made his heart rejoice—
And said: "Dear Santa, I have waited long
To talk to you, and have I then done wrong?"
"Not so," the saint of Christmas said and smiled,
While a soft radiance fell upon the child.
"Not so; for those alone my face may see
Who very good and noble strive to be.
Speak then, my child; what is thy quest with me?"
Then answered Alice, "I cannot forget,
Dear Santa Claus, a little girl I met,
Ragged and homeless and with eyes so sad
That my poor heart has never since been glad.
Take them to her, dear Santa Claus, I pray,
All the rare things you brought for me to day;
Take them to her brighten her eyes of blue,
And say these presents came from me and you."
Then sleep quite overcame the little maid;
Back on the pillow her round cheek was laid,
Old Santa vanished; but an angel fair
Bent softly down and kissed her golden hair.

The Christmas Tree.

O,
the Christmas tree
so bright and green, awaits Old Santa Claus and the chim ney place all swept and clean gapes wide its ponderous jaws.
The little stockings are all hung up, and baby's just makes four. Won't Old Santa Claus be surprised when he finds there is one more!
There's an elegant place up in the tree to hang Johnny's gun and a place for May and one for Kate to leave their dolls upon. But for little baby blue eyes a lower branch he must choose
Where she may reach and find the place he's hung her first new shoes. Turn down the light a little, now, so, Old Santa Claus can see. And baby and all must go to bed and be as good as can be, and to-morrow morn get up early, after a long night's sleep,
and come softly down to the Xmas tree
and see

Who will get the first peep.

Dolly, Isn't Christmas Jolly?

Dolly, isn't Christmas jolly?
Don't you wish 'twould stay all year?
It is always Christmas, Dolly,
Where you came from? Tell me, dear!
Did you live with good Kris Kringle
In his home so far away?
Are you glad or sorry, Dolly,
That you're here with me to-day?

Dolly, isn't Christmas jol'y?
Oh, if you could only talk—
It seems too funny that you can't,
When you can laugh and cry and walk
I'll try awful hard to teach you
If you'll only fellow me;
I think you could learn a little—
Come now, just say A B C!

Dolly, isn't Christmas jolly?
Oh, if you could only eat!
I have lots of nuts and candy
And plum-pudding awful sweet!
I think you could eat a little—
Just a little—if you'd try;
Would you like some candy, Dolly,
And some fruit cake and some pie?

Dolly, isn't Christmas jolly
And don't you glad that Santa Claus
Put you in my stocking? I am,
And I think that you are, cause
You do seem so awful happy,
Do you love me Dolly dear?
Oh, ain't Christmas awfully jolly?
Don't you wish 'twould stay all year?

Juvenile Joy.

Benevolent Old Gent—"How my heart bounds when I see the happy faces of childhood at this joyous Christmas season. Note the beaming smile of the little boy now approaching. Heaven itself seems to have illuminated those little features. I will speak to him. One moment, little boy. Why are you so happy?"

Little Boy (grinning)—"Ma got mad and panked me with her new four dollar hair brush and—she broke it."

IN TWO HALVES.

THE FIRST HALF.

Wet and dreary. It is mid-winter; the scene is Kirklington, on the London & North-western; the time a quarter to 11; just after the night mail had flashed through without stopping—bound for Liverpool and the north. The railway officials are collecting, preparatory to going off duty for the night.

"Where's Dan?" asked one of the crowd upon the platform.

"I saw him in the hut just after the quarter to 11 went through. Can't have come to any harm, surely?"

"No; he said he'd seen something drop from the train, and he went down the line to pick it up."

And Dan had picked up something. It was a basket, a common white wicker basket, with a lid fastened down by a string. What did it contain? Dirty clothes? What?

A baby—a child half a dozen weeks old, no more.

"Where did you come across it?" asked one.

"Lying on the line, just where it fell. Perhaps it didn't fall, perhaps it was chucked out. What matter? I've got it, and got to look after it, that's enough for me!"

The little mite's linen was white and of fine material, but lay upon an old shawl and a few bits of dirty flannel. All they found was a dilapidated purse, a common snap bag purse of faded brown leather. Inside was a brass thimble, a pawn ticket and the half of a Bank of England note of £100.

* * * * * * *

A new parson—Harrold Treffry—had come lately to Kirklington.

He is now paying a round of parochial visits, accompanied by an old college chum, who is spending Christmas with him.

"Yonder," said Treffry, pointing to a thin thread of smoke which rose from some gaunt trees into the sullen wintry air, "yonder is the house—if, indeed, it deserves so grand a name—the hovel, rather, of one whose case is the hardest of all the hard ones in my parish. This man is a mere hedger and ditcher, one who works for any master, most often for the railway, but who is never certain of a job all the year around. He has a swarm of young children, and has just lost his wife. He is absolutely prostrated; aghast probably at his utter incapacity to do his duty by his motherless little ones. I wonder whether you could rouse him. If you could only get him to make a sign, or cry, or laugh, or to take the smallest interest in common affairs. Jack, I believe you're the very man. You might get at him through the children—that marvelous hanky panky of yours, those surprising tricks; a child takes to you naturally at once. Try and make friends with these. Perhaps when the father sees them interested and amused he may warm a little, speak, perhaps approve, perhaps smile, and in the end give in. Jack, will you try?"

Jack Newbiggin was by profession a conveyancer, but nature had intended him for a new Houdin, or a wizard of the north. He was more than half a professional by the time he was full grown. In addition to the quick eye and facile wrist, he had the rarer gifts of the suave manner and the face of brass. He had even studied mesmerism and clairvoyance, and could upon occasion surprise his audience considerably by his power.

They entered the miserable dwelling together. The children—eight of them—were all skirmishing over the floor, except one, a child of 6 or 7, a bright-eyed, exceedingly beautiful boy, the least—were not nature's vagaries well known—likely to be born among and belong to such surroundings, who stood between the legs of the man himself, who had his back to the visitors, and was crouching low over the scanty fire.

The man turned his head for a moment, gave a blank stare, then an imperceptible nod, and once more he glowered down upon the fire.

"Here, little ones, do you see this gentleman? He is a conjurer. Know what a conjurer is, Tommy?" catching up a mite of 4 or 5 from the floor. "No, not you; nor you, Sarah; nor you, Jakey"—and he ran through all their names.

They had now ceased their gambols and were staring hard at their visitors—the moment was propitious; Jack Newbiggin began. He had fortunately filled his pockets with nuts, oranges and cakes before leaving the parsonage, so he had half his apparatus ready in hand.

The pretty boy had very soon left the father at the fire and had come over to join in the fun, going back, however, to exhibit his share of the spoil and describe voluminously what had occurred. This and the repeated shouts of laughter seemed to produce some impression on him. Presently he looked over his shoulder and said—but without animation:

"It is very good of you, sir, surely; very good for you to take so kindly to the little chicks. It does them good to laugh a bit, but it ain't much as they've had to make 'em lately."

"It is good for all of us now and again, I take it," said Jack, desisting and going toward him, the children gradually collecting in a far off corner and comparing notes.

"You can't laugh, sir, if your heart's heavy; if you do it can be only a sham."

While he was speaking he had taken the Bible from the shelf, and resuming his seat began to turn the leaves over.

"I'm an untaught, rough countryman, sir, but I have heard tell that these strange things you do are only tricks; ain't it so?"

Here was indeed a hopeful symptom. He was roused then to take some interest in what had occurred.

"All tricks, of course; it all comes of practice," said Jack, as he proceeded to explain some of the simple processes, hoping to enchain the man's attention.

"That's what I thought, sir, or I'd have given you a job to do. I've been in want of a real conjurer for many a long day, and nothing less'll do. See here, sir," he said, as he took a small, carefully folded paper from between the leaves of the Bible, "do you see this?"

It was half a Bank of England note for £100.

"How, sir, could any conjurer help me to the other half?"

"How did you come by it?" asked Jack at once.

"I'll tell you, sir; short as I can make it. Conjurer or no conjurer, you've got a kindly heart, and I'm main sure that you'll help if you can."

Dan then described how he had picked up the basket from the 10.45 Liverpool express.

"There was the linen; I've kept it. See here; all marked quite pretty and proper, with lace round the edges, as though its mother loved to make the little one smart."

Jack examined the linen; it bore a monogram and crest. The first he made out to mean H. L. M., and the crest was plainly two hammers crossed, and the motto, "I strike"—not a common crest—and he never remembered to have seen it before.

And that was all?

"'Cept the bank note. That was in a poor old purse with a pawn ticket and a thimble. I kept them all."

Like a true detective Jack examined every article minutely. The purse bore the name Hester Corrigan, in rude letters inside, and the pawn ticket was out in the same name.

THE SECOND HALF.

When Jack Newbiggin got back to the parsonage he found that his host had accepted an invitation for them both to dine at the "big house," as it was called, the country seat of the squire of the parish.

"I have been fighting your battles all day," began Mrs. Sitwell, the hostess, when seated at dinner next to Jack.

"Was it necessary? I should have thought myself too insignificant."

"They were talking at lunch of your wonderful tricks in conjuring, and one said that the skill might prove inconvenient—when you played cards for instance."

"A charitable imputation; with whom did it originate?"

"Sir Lewis Mallaby."

"Please point him out to me."

He was shown a grave, scowling face upon the right of the hostess—a face like a mask, surface rough and wrinkled, through which the eyes shone with a baleful light, like corpse candles in a sepulchre.

Jack let his companion chatter on. It was his habit to get all the information possible about any company in which he found himself, for his own purpose as a clairvoyant, and when Mrs. Sitwell flagged he plied her with artless questions, and led her on from one person to another, making mental notes to serve him hereafter. It is thus by careful and laborious preparations that many of the strange and seemingly mysterious facts of the clairvoyant conjurer are performed.

When the whole party were assembled in the drawing-room after dinner a chorus of voices, headed by that of the hostess, summoned Jack to his work. There appeared to be only one dissentient, Sir Lewis Mallaby, who not only did not trouble himself to back up the invitation, but when the performance was actually begun was at no pains to conceal his contempt and disgust.

The conjurer made the conventional plum pudding in a hat, fired wedding rings into quartern loaves, did all manner of card tricks, knife tricks, pistol tricks, and juggled on conscientiously right through his repertory. There was never a smile on Sir Lewis' face; he sneered unmistakably. Finally, with an ostentation that savored of rudeness, he took out his watch, a great gold repeater, looked at it and unmistakably yawned.

Jack hungered for that watch directly he saw it. Perhaps through it he might make its owner uncomfortable, if only for a moment. But how to get it into his hands? He asked for a watch—a dozen were offered. No, none of these would do. It must be a good watch—a repeater.

Sir Lewis Mallaby's was the only one in the room, and he at first distinctly refused to lend it. But so many earnest entreaties were addressed to him, the hostess leading the attack, that he could not in common courtesy continue to refuse.

With something like a growl he took his watch off the chain and handed it to Jack Newbiggin.

A curious, old-fashioned watch it was, which would have gladdened the heart of a watch collector—all jewelled and enameled, adorned with crest and inscription—an heirloom, which had probably been in the Mallaby family for years. Jack looked over it curiously, meditatively; then, suddenly raising his eyes, he stared intently into Sir Lewis Mallaby's face and almost as quickly dropped them again.

"This is far too valuable," he said courteously, "too much of a treasure, to be risked in any conjuring trick. An ordinary modern watch I might replace, but not a work of art like this."

And he handed it back to Sir Lewis, who received it with ill-concealed satisfaction. He was as much pleased, probably, as Jack's expression of possible failure in the proposed trick as at the recovery of his property.

Another watch, however, was pounded into a jelly and brought out whole from a cabinet in an adjoining room.

"Oh, but it is too preposterous," Sir Lewis Mallaby was heard to say, quite angrily. The continued applause profoundly disgusted him. "This is the merest charlatanism. It must be put an end to. It is the commonest imposture. These are things which he has coached up in advance. Let him be tried with something which upon the face of it he cannot have learned beforehand by artificial means."

"Try him, Sir Lewis; try him yourself," cried several voices.

"I scarcely like to lend myself to such folly or encourage so pitiable an exhibition."

But he seemed to be conscious that further protest would be in Jack's favor, so he said: "Can you tell what I have in this pocket?" He touched the left breast of his coat

"A pocket-book."

"Bah! Every one carries a pocket-book in his pocket."

"But do you?" asked several of the by-standers, all of whom were growing deeply interested in this strange duel.

Sir Lewis Mallaby confessed that he did, and produced it—an ordinary morocco leather purse and pocket-book, all in one.

"Are you prepared to go on?" said the baronet, haughtily, to Jack.

"Certainly."

"What does this pocket-book contain?"

"Evidence."

"Evidence of what?"

"Of facts that must, sooner or later, come to light."

"What ridiculous nonsense! I give you my word that this pocket-book contains nothing—absolutely nothing—but a Bank of England note for £100."

"Stay!" said Jack Newbiggin, facing him abruptly, and speaking in a voice of thunder. "It is not so—you know it—it is only the half!"

And as he spoke he took the pocketbook from the hands of the really stupified baronet, and exhibited for inspection—the half of a Bank of England note for £100.

There was much applause at this harmless and successful denouement of what threatened at one stage to lead to altercation, perhaps to a quarrel. But Jack Newbiggin was not satisfied.

"As you have dared me to do my worst," said he, "listen now to what I have to say. Not only did I know that was only the half of a note, but I know where the other half is to be found."

"So much the better for me," said the baronet, with an effort to appear humorous.

"That other half was given to—shall I say, Sir Lewis?"

Sir Lewis nodded indifferently.

"It was given to one Hester Corrigan, an old nurse, six years ago."

"Silence! Say no more," cried Sir Lewis in horror.

Sir Lewis had been a younger son; the eldest inherited the family title, but died early, leaving his widow to give him a posthumous heir, the title remaining in abeyance until time showed whether the infant was a boy or a girl. It proved to be a boy, whereupon Lewis Mallaby, who had the first information of the fact, put upon execution a nefarious project which he had carefully concocted in advance. A girl was obtained in a foundling hospital and substituted by Lady Mallaby's nurse, who was in Lewis' pay, for the newly-born son and heir. This son and heir was handed over to another accomplice, Hester Corrigan, who was bribed with £100, half down, in the shape of a half note, the other half to be paid when she announced her safe arrival in Texas with the stolen child. It occurred to Mrs. Corrigan in her transit between London and Liverpool that though £100 would be acceptable on her arrival the child would only be an incumbrance. She therefore threw the basket containing him out of the window, forgetting that in it she had deposited her purse.

It was the watch borrowed from Sir Lewis Mallaby which first aroused Jack's suspicions. It bore the same crest—two hammers crossed, with the motto, "I strike," which was marked upon the linen of the child that Dan Blockitt picked up at Kirklington station. The initial of the name Mallaby coincided with the monogram H. L. M. From these facts and what we have been told by Mrs. Sitwell, Jack rapidly drew his conclusions and made a bold shot, which hit the mark, as we have seen.

Lewis Mallaby's confession, combined with that of Mrs. Corrigan, who was found by the police, soon reinstated the rightful heir, and Dan Blockitt in after years had no reason to regret the generosity which had prompted him to give the little foundling the shelter of his rude home.

The Way Girls Do It.

"Oh, Kitty! I've something the best to tell you!"

"No?"

"Oh, but I have, though!"

"Do tell me, quick!"

"You'll never lisp it to any one?"

"No, indeed!"

"I wouldn't have you breathe it for the world!"

"Oh, I won't"

"Not to any one, remember."

"No—hope to die if I do."

"Well, then—oh, it seems so funny!"

"Oh, do hurry up and tell me."

"I'm afraid you'll tell."

"Oh, indeed, indeed, I won't."

"I'd never forgive you if you did."

"Well, but I won't!"

"He might not like it, you know."

"Who's he?"

"Oh, I forgot! How foolish I am!"

"Are you ever going to tell me?"

"Yes; yes—I said to myself right away that I'd tell you anyhow."

"Well, do, then."

"Well, then—oh, you will be awfully surprised!"

"Oh, do hurry and tell."

"Well—I—I'm engaged!"

"No?"

"Yes!"

"Well, who to?"

"To Charlie Lawson."

"Why—Lol—Brigham!"

"I am!"

"Tee, hee, hee!"

"Isn't it funny?"

"Why, you old darling!"

"Don't you congratulate me?"

"Of course, I do. Charlie's perfectly lovely. I'm awfully glad for you both."

"Oh, thanks!"—Detroit Free Press.

An Episodical Beauty.

Mabel—"I didn't see you at Edith's party last night, Maud."

Maud—"Dear, no; I couldn't go. And I heard somebody say you were just too pretty for anything, dear. I do wish I could have been there to see how you looked. Were you at all natural?"

A Trusted Friend.

Popinjay—I see Bigsby hangs around your store a good share of the time. I suppose he is getting to be your tried and trusted friend?

Blobson—Yes, he is my trusted friend and by and by, if he doesn't pay up, he will be my tried friend.

Unequal Warfare.

She (five feet, eleven)—I can't listen to another word!

He (five feet, five)—Do, do hear me! I may not be large, but I have a large heart ——!"

She—Oh, do go and love somebody of your own size.

Sir Edward Clarke, the present Attorney-General of England, began life as a clerk in his father's grocery store in London. He then entered the civil service, but left it to study law.

A St. Louis sportsman recently procured in Oregon a trophy that is one of the greatest curiosities of its kind in the world. It consists of a large and perfect pair of caribou antlers which are entirely covered with a fine, close growth of hair.

THE "DOLLPHONES."

Mr. Edison's Wonderful Toy for Nice Little Girls.

Dolls That Sing "Rock-a-By-Baby"—They Can Talk in Any Language—Dogs That Bark and Cats That Ask for Milk—Repeating a "Simple Sentence."

Children all over the world will before long have reason to bless the name of Thos. A. Edison, for that wizard has just perfected a toy the like of which was never dreamed of by them even on Christmas Eve. In Mr. Edison's laboratory at Orange, N. J., there are numbers of dolls which speak as naturally as any human being. They are not like the old mechanical toys which by one's pressing their diaphragm squeak forth "mamma" and "papa," but they talk naturally and well, and repeat long sentences.

They are called the Edison talking dolls, although Mr. Edison coined a new name for them yesterday, in speaking of them to the Evening Sun representative. He called them "Dollphones." The talking dolls have engaged the inventor's attention off and on for the last two years, but it is only within a few weeks that they have been perfected. Now nothing remains but to manufacture them in large quantities and ship them to all civilized countries, so that at the proper time children, not only in America, but also in Europe, and even in far off Russia, will be able to possess dollies that in their owners' native language can talk to them.

EXHIBITION OF THEIR POWERS.

In a little room in the second story of the great laboratory at Orange were a dozen or so of the dolls yesterday in various stages of manufacture. Some of them were dressed and ready to entertain company, while others, while they could speak, did so, strange to say, without the use of their heads. Mr. Edison picked up one of the dolls, whose golden, curly hair and pink cheeks were lovely in their perfection, and whose light blue eyes stared in mild surprise at the reporter, and winding her up by inserting a clock key in the small of her back, handed her to the reporter. He then pressed a spring, and the doll, still looking at the reporter, said in a plaintive tone: "I love you, mamma; I love you dearly, mamma, but I am tired and sleepy now. Please put me in my little bed."

Another doll baby, who was musically inclined, sang in a sweet, childish treble, "Rock-a-by baby on the tree top" all the way through with good expression, and without a false note. She sang it quite loudly, too, so that any one could have heard her across a moderate-sized room. Still another sang a pretty little German song, but as the reporter did not understand German, he is unable to tell what the song was about.

"I have only lately succeeded in bringing this toy to a state of perfection," said the inventor, as he lovingly stroked the curly pate of one of his little talkers.

Mr. Edison permitted the Evening Sun man to talk to one of the doll phonographs. To thoroughly test it the reporter repeated this simple sentence:

"Eliminate space which is ascription of a perfect mathematical reason for a co-existing plurality, and all thought is resolved into a synthetic unit, which finds for its ultimate habitat the bosom of the great Logos."

Contrary to his expectations, the phonograph didn't break nor leave the room of its own accord, but instead repeated the sentence accurately.

HOW THEY ARE CONSTRUCTED.

"The phonographs," said the inventor, "which are used in these dolls are practically as perfect in their articulation and loudness of tone as the larger ones. They are on the same principle as my original phonograph, but whereas that weighed about 75 pounds, and cost from $75 to $80, these weigh only about a pound and a half apiece, and will be retailed at from $3 to $7, including a handsome doll. The great difficulty has been to train girls to talk with sufficient distinctness to the phonographs, but that we are now overcoming."

The little phonograph which, with its accompanying clockwork, is placed in each of the toys is the perfection of delicate mechanism, but at the same time is so strongly made and so durable that it will last as long if not longer than the doll itself. The cylinder which receives phonographic impressions is made of tin, and is consequently very durable. With ordinarily careful handling it will repeat a sentence thousands of times, and the last repetition will be as perfect as the first. The main difficulty has been in inventing machinery to make the doll phonograph so exact in its working that the cylinders may be interchangeable, and new cylinders with new sentences be substituted for the old ones at any time. So if a child should get tired of hearing its doll repeating over and over again the same sentence, for a trifling sum, probably less than $1, we can supply a new cylinder with any sentence and in any voice that the purchaser may desire.

The cylinders were in reality bands of metal about two and a half inches in diameter, about one-eighth of an inch in thickness, and half an inch wide. The surface before it received the impression of the phonographic needle was perfectly smooth, but after being talked to was full of minute depressions, some of them so light and delicate as to be scarcely visible to the naked eye. The mechanism of the clockwork to which they are attached for use in the speaking dolls is too delicate and intricate for examination here. Attached to it is a governor like that on a steam engine, which prevents the doll from talking too fast, and so running the words into each other. So loudly and distinctly do these wonderful dolls talk that Mr. Edison informed the reporter he had listened to one talking over a long distance telephone from Boston to New York city. The doll talked with the telephone in Boston and was heard quite plainly in this city. Indeed, the telephone rather tended to soften and improve the tone.

But Mr. Edison has not confined himself to speaking dolls. The company will also manufacture dogs that bark and ask plaintively for meat; cats that mew and call in unmistakable tones for milk; horses that neigh and express a wish to be fed upon oats; cows that moo and boast of their milk giving qualities, and roosters that crow as naturally as the real, live article. —Evening Sun.

THE ADVANCE.

Published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1.50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, JAN. 3 1889.

EAST GREY FARMERS' INSTITUTE.

The East Grey Farmers' Institute, which meets in Markdale on Jan. 11, Flesherton on the 12th, promises the most interesting ever held there. The questions to be treated by the various talented and well-known speakers, are questions which every one should be important for farmers to study and investigate in this progressive age, otherwise they cannot compete successfully with those who do study and understand them.

The Institute was inaugurated in Ontario, under government, in 1886, with the object of assisting and encouraging farmers to form themselves together into a mutual improvement society, and thus "further their own interests and encourage and foster education in relation to their calling." This embraces many branches, some of which may be mentioned:

To encourage the growth of an improved class of stock.

To foster the cheese and butter interests.

To afford protection from all encroachments that may come from other interests of the commonwealth.

To conserve and secure the just rights of farmers in their relation to legislators, corporations and individual monopolies, etc.

The objects are many and the benefits manifold. If for no other object, the last one named would be sufficient to demand an organization of this kind. In these days, in all business centres, each trade and calling has its own protective association to combat the aggressive individuals who otherwise would grow wealthy by a system of oppression. The farmer has not until lately, had a weapon of this kind placed in his hand. He has it now, and if he uses it not, it will be, literally, his own funeral. The farmer must study his own interests in every possible manner, learn the most economical methods, study the question from a scientific standpoint, and develop a more methodical manner of carrying on his calling, or he will find himself behind in the march of progress. Within the past few years only, science and invention have made remarkable strides in the direction of agriculture, with the result of having cheapened the cost of production. The farmer who does not take advantage of this by a personal attention is in the same position as the woman who would not buy a sewing machine when they were first introduced because she could now afford to hire her sewing done.

Let us witness a rousing turnout of farmers on this occasion.

For program, etc., see posters.

The nominations for Osprey on Monday were, for Reeve, Mr. Douglas, Mr. McGirr and Mr. Thomas Gamey. We have not received a list of the nominations for councillors.

Mr. Thos. A. Blakely, of Flesherton, has secured the agency for the well known firm of A. Harris, Son & Co., Brantford, whose farming implements have won a world wide reputation. Parties desirous of purchasing reapers, mowers, land rollers, gang plows, for next season's operations would do well to interview Mr. Blakely.

Methodist S. S. Anniversary.

As regularly as the seasons come around there has been for many years one season particularly interesting to a great number of the young people of Flesherton, and old too, for that matter. We refer to the anniversary of the Methodist Church Sunday School. It is something which has always been looked forward to with great interest, from the fact that it is the largest Sunday school in town, and the wonderfully painstaking training which has characterised the affair in past years. In this respect this season's anniversary was fully up to the mark of excellence, in fact it was surpassingly good. The attendance was about 600. The children had been carefully drilled for weeks by their long-time superintendent, Mr. Armstrong, and showed the result on Tuesday evening by an astonishing freeness from nervousness and shyness so common to children of tender years. The program was long and interesting. Little toddlers scarcely four years of age recited and sung, while as yet they had scarcely lost their baby tongue, and did it remarkably well. The recitations were interspersed with singing by the school, which also showed a perfect training that must have required much patience and perseverance on the part of Mr. Armstrong. Miss Bella Christoe, in her usual excellent manner, presided at the organ. The Secretary read the following report of the school for the past year:

On coming before you on another anniversary day we are thankful to God that we can report progress in our school work. We have on our roll names over 200 names and are enrolled for present year attendance of 175. The attendance of teachers during the year was 516, giving an average of ten per Sabbath. The attendance of officers was 252, or an average of 4 per Sabbath. Number of verses committed to memory during the year, by the girls 10,171, and by the boys, 3,589, giving a majority in favor of the girls of 6,185 verses, and an average of 25 per Sabbath. The pupils who committed to memory the most verses were, among the boys, Charles W. Smith; and the girls, E. Cullen, Charlie Richardson, Edwin Large, Lena Legg and Lorn Wright attended school every session in the year. It carries us sadness to refer to the death of one of our pupils, Nelson Keeler, who at our last anniversary gave promise of living a useful life. We have been visited by 237 persons, and extend a cordial welcome to all who will favor us with a visit to our school. We enter upon the New Year full of hope and trust, by the blessing of God, that our school may advance in the future as it has in the past, and wishing you all a happy and prosperous New Year.

F. J. SULLIVAN, Sec.

The librarian's report showed that the number of volumns in the library is about 500. A large addition was made at the commencement of the year, and additions are constantly being made as they are required. The large number of books exchanged show how the scholars are interested in them. About 2500 books have been exchanged during the year, and now, at the close of the year every one is accounted for.

The Sabbath School papers have been regularly distributed every Sabbath that the school has been open, the number distributed being as follows: Copies Northern Messenger, 2430; Pleasant Hours, 156; Home and School, 1560; Sunbeam, 1300; S. S. Banners, 216; Quarterlies, 250, Catechisms, 100; total, 7116.

The second portion of the program consisted of a cantata, entitled "Santa Claus." The singing was exceedingly good and some of the costumes very fine, notably that of Mr. A. R. Fawcett, who came all the way from Streetsville to render the part of Winter, which he had taken some years ago when the cantata was given here. This costume was very "cool" and appropriate. Mr. Ed. Richardson represented Santa Claus, and counterfeited Santa to perfection. The seasons were represented by Misses Lena Large, Lou Armstrong, Tennie and Annie Richardson. Their signing was sweet and their parts well rendered. In fact the singing all through was thoroughly good.

The church was filled to its utmost capacity, and many were obliged to stand.

It was announced that the proceeds amounted to $90, which is in advance of anything of the kind known in Flesherton before.

Every body did ample justice to the many good things provided in the basement by fair hands and willing waiters.

It is with regret we learn that Mr. Armstrong, for many years superintendent of the school, has tendered his resignation. He leaves the school in a most flourishing condition, and with the regret of his pupils. We have not learned as yet who his successor will be.

Little Bertie Barnhouse and Ethel Trimble, recitation and song, were the pets of the evening.

The school, at the beginning of the year, has now the substantial sum of $115 to operate upon.

Flesherton Station.

From our own Correspondent.

Business at the Station for the past few weeks has been quite lively. With good prices for grain and pork, with Mr. James McMullen on the market, the farmers are making a general rush in with their grain. Mr. Johnston Little, blacksmith, is doing a business second to none in this part of the country in the line of repairing and horseshoeing, and also turns out some new work.

Our active and energetic friend, Mr. Cook, has just completed one of the best seasons for farmers for some years, in buying anything they had to dispose of in the line of cattle, sheep or pigs. He is now taking a little breathing time, for a few days, but will soon be driving to business again. Never say die, Rob.

Our station agent, Mr. Hogg, will be accorded to this part of the country, and our genial and obliging station agent, Mr. McGill, will shortly remove to Orangeville. Pity he says he is not likely to stay there. You know very well what I mean.

Mr. Hogg, our postmaster and general storekeeper, is doing a lively trade, and is just as pleasant as ever.

Our old time-honored friend, Mr. Woods, is still to the front, and for prices and good goods won't be beaten.

The concert that came off here in the school house was all that could be desired as far as the program of the evening was concerned. The children, each and all of them, showed that they received careful and efficient training at the hands of their teacher, Miss Bail, in the many pieces they took part in. Special mention might be made of the little girls who took part in the piece called "Autumn's Queen." It was received with great applause. The musical treat that McMullen Brothers gave on their violin, With Mrs. Irvine, of Markdale, presiding at the organ, was received with good effect. They were encored time and again. Dr. Hutton and Miss Wright, of Priceville, gave several pieces, which had a marked effect on the audience. Dr. Hutton has a rich and well cultured voice, and seems to have a musical talent of no mean order, and Miss Wright is just at home at the instrument. A reading by Mrs. Wilson was well received. Much credit is due to Miss Bail and Miss Woods for the untiring effort in regard to the entertainment to make it a success. I may also state that Miss Woods, on behalf of the children, presented to Miss Ball a handsome gift in appreciation of her service and the deep interest she had taken in the school for the past year. Mr. Thos. Granger presided at the concert with his usual good grace, but somewhat more poetical in his remarks.

Wishing you all a happy new year.

NED.

Are you made miserable by indigestion, constipation, dizziness, loss of appetite, yellow skin? Shiloh's Vitalizer is a positive cure. For Sale at the Medical Hall.

A nasal injector free with each bottle of Shiloh's catarrh remedy. Price 50 ct. For sale at the Medical Hall.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 50	to 5 50
Fall Wheat	0 5	to 1 00
Spring Wheat	0 96	1 00
Barley	0 45	0 55
Oats	0 32	0 38
Peas	0 55	0 58
Butter	0 17	0 17
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 40	7 00
Hay per ton	10 00	10 00
Hides	3 50	4 00
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 8	0 0
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 0

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

A. HARRIS SON & Co. BRANTFORD

The Brantford Light Steel Binder,

BRANTFORD REAPER.

Brantford Front Cut Mower.

BRANTFORD REAR CUT MOWER

THE BEAVER COMBINED SEEDER and DRILL.

The Mason Improved Sulky Rake.

JHONSTONS IMPROVED ONE HORSE CULTIVATOR

LAND ROLLERS, GANG PLOWS,
NARROW PLOWS,
SCUFFLERS,
CULTIVATORS,
TOOTH CUTTERS,
GRAIN CRUSHERS, &c.

For sale by

THOS. A. BLAKELY.
Flesherton.

PRICE'S BAKING

A. WATSON!

Desires to inform the public that he can furnish

CAKES AND PIES

To Order.

ALWAYS ON HAND

I visit Flesherton twice a week, on TUESDAYS and THURSDAYS with a full supply of goods

DROP A CARD IF YOU DESIRE ME TO CALL.

WEDDING and FANCY cakes a specialty.

A. WATSON,
Priceville.

OWEN SOUND COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.

RE-OPENS MONDAY, JAN. 7th

The Best Equipped School in the Province

A staff of seven specialists

RECORD, 1888.

ALL the pupils of the Institute who tried the University Examination were successful. Four passed the Examinations of the first year, two obtaining honors and one a proficiency scholarship. Four matriculated, three with honors. The candidates from this school at the Departmental Examination received a larger number of Teachers' Certificates than did those of any other school in the Province. Five received First Class; thirty-three, Second Class, and thirty two, Third Class. At the Art School Examination the students of the Institute obtained three hundred proficiency certificates, the largest number received by the pupils of any one institute. One pupil tried the Primary Examination of the Law Society and succeeded.

For further information apply to

F. W. MERCHANT, Principal. D. R. DOBIE, Sec. of Board.

CAUTION.

ALL PERSONS are hereby cautioned against negotiating a note for ten dollars drawn in favor of John Foster, given by one Abraham Scott, dated April 18, 1888, due in six months from date, made payable at Heath Head Post office, as I have not received value for the same, said note having been lost.

JOHN FOSTER,
Proton station P.O.

THE BEST IS CHEAPEST.

Farmer's Advocate & Home Magazine

Every farmer should read the leading and only independent publication devoted to his business. Thousands say there is none equal to it, and no dollar ever handed from the farm returns so much good. It treats on all branches connected with the farm, and is highly prized by the ladies and children. It has saved hundreds a farmer from the loss of his farm; it has saved the farmers millions of dollars by checking the introduction and spread of contagious stock diseases; it has increased the receipts from our cereals by millions of dollars. Commended by City and County Councils and Agricultural Societies. Agents wanted. Sample copies free. Price $1 per annum. Address FARMER'S ADVOCATE OFFICE, London, Canada.

BARGAINS!

A horse, new cutter, and double sleigh, for sale. Lumber will be taken in exchange. Apply to J. C. ARMSTRONG, Flesherton.

Dec. 7th, 1888.

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts, 2nd door North of Richardson & Co's.

Medical.

DR. CARTER.

M.C.P. & S., ONT.

PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.

FLESHERTON.

Office, Strain's block. Residence J. G. Russel's

J. G. Hutton, M.D.C.M.

Member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Ontario.

Enquire at office one door east of Grange's Athelstan Hotel.

Priceville, Nov. 15, '88.

Dentistry.

DR. DENTON.

DENTAL SURGEON.

Will be at Flesherton

[illegible]

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office, Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER, C.B.R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent to purchase and sale of lands. Appraiser for C.L.C. Co. and F.P.B. & S. Society. Money to loan at most reasonable terms. ISSUER OF MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Town or Farm Property,

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton

W. J. BELLAMY,

DEP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT., &c.

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance effected in first class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any part of the County. Money to loan on low rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please call rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavetroughing and [illegible] everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts

"The Week, one of the ablest papers on the continent." -Descriptive America.

Enlarged and Improved.

THE WEEK:

A Canadian Journal of Politics, Literature, Science and Arts.

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY.

$3.00 per Year. $1.00 for Four Months

The Week has entered upon its sixth year of publication, greatly enlarged and improved in every respect, rendering it still more worthy the cordial support of every one interested in the maintenance of a first-class literary journal.

The independence in politics and criticism which has characterised The Week ever since its first issue will be rigidly maintained; and unceasing efforts will be made to improve its literary character and increase its value and attractiveness as a journal for the cultured home. Many new and able writers are now, or have promised to become, contributors to its columns, and the constant aim of the publisher will be to make The Week fully equal to the best literary journals in Britain and the United States.

As heretofore, Prof. Goldwin Smith will, from time to time, contribute articles. London, Paris, Washington and Montreal letters from accomplished correspondents will appear at regular intervals. Special Ottawa letters will appear during the sessions of Parliament.

The Week, in its enlarged form, will be the same size as "Harper's Weekly," and the largest paper of its class on the continent.

SEND FOR FREE SAMPLE COPY.

C. BLACKETT ROBINSON, PUBLISHER, 5 JORDON ST., TORONTO.

BARBER SERVICE.

[illegible] CAMERON, Lot 35, Con 8, Artemesia.

NOTICE!

[illegible]

NOTICE!

[illegible]

SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN ESTABLISHED 1845

is the oldest and most popular scientific and mechanical paper published and has the largest circulation of any paper of its class in the world. Fully illustrated. Best class of Wood Engravings. Published weekly. Send for specimen copy. Price $3 a year. Four months' trial, $1. MUNN & CO., PUBLISHERS, 361 Broadway, N.Y.

ARCHITECTS & BUILDERS Edition of Scientific American.

A great success. Each issue contains colored lithographic plates of country and city residences or public buildings. Numerous engravings and full plans and specifications for the use of such as contemplate building. Price $2.50 a year, 25 cts. a copy. MUNN & CO., PUBLISHERS.

PATENTS may be secured by applying to MUNN & Co., who have had over 40 years' experience and have made over 100,000 applications for American and Foreign patents. Send for Handbook. Correspondence strictly confidential.

TRADE MARKS.

In case your mark is not registered in the Patent Office, apply to MUNN & Co., and procure immediate protection. Send for Handbook.

COPYRIGHTS for books, charts, maps, etc., quickly procured. Address

MUNN & CO., Patent Solicitors.

GENERAL OFFICE: 361 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Why You Feel

so weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

"It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

does sell." Prepared by

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1; six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

For Merrie England.

BY W. RICHARDSON.

As we approach the eastern extremity the fairer features of the lake appear. From its southern shore rises Ben Venue, not the loftiest but certainly one of the most picturesque mountains in Great Britain. Scott thus describes it:

High on the south huge Ben Venue
Down to the lake in masses threw,
Crags, knolls and mounds confusedly hurled,
The fragments of an earlier world.

Midway in the lake is a rocky islet, thickly covered with trees, called Ellen's Isle, which the genius of Scott has invested with charms far in excess of its natural beauties. As our little steamboat came close into the shore under the shadow of its trees, we peered into the dense wood for a pathway to the retreat of the heroic Ellen Douglas, but in vain.

'Twas all so close with copse wood bound,
Nor track nor pathway might declare
That human foot frequented there.

Apart from the creatures of Scott, this little island has a certain interest; as the ancient asylum of the women and children of the clan McAlpine, or McGregor, when their homes were ravaged by their numerous enemies, and was always used by the freebooters of the clan to conceal the stolen cattle they had driven off in their plundering raids. Passing the islet, we were soon at the landing place, where we found coaches waiting to convey us to the famed pass of Trossachs to Callander, ten miles distant from the [illegible].

After leaving the lake we entered the narrow defile known as the Trossachs Pass extending about a mile eastward. Formerly the entrance from the [illegible] was [illegible] by a narrow [illegible] path formed "The Ladders," [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] supplemented by ropes, [illegible] of trees. [illegible] has been cut through the rock into the narrow vale with its barriers of rugged mountains, piled up rocks and hanging copses of rowan, birch, hawthorn, and oak, all inextricably blended and mingled together with a [illegible] which seems chaotic, yet with such variety of color and form, and a general air of savage majesty and grandeur [illegible] of awe and mystery. I am tempted to quote a few lines from Sir Walter Scott's fine description of this spot, and refer your readers for the full pen picture found in "The Lady of the Lake."

[illegible]

Emerging from the pass our cavalcade stopped for refreshment at the Trossachs Hotel, a stately turreted edifice built on the mountain side, overlooking Loch Achray. The hotel looks like a mediæval mansion, and is not out of harmony with the magnificent features of the scene. Before it is spread the Loch, a minature of beauty; it measures but a mile in length and scarcely a mile in breadth. At its western extremity there is a small but graceful gothic church, and the picture is closed in by the huge form of Ben Venue, 2,800 ft. high. We climbed the mountain side to take in all the beauty of the landscape on the margin of the lake. Near the chapel is a level meadow, the famous gathering place of the clans when hastily summoned to arms by cross of yew, which had first been charred at [illegible] and then quenched in the blood of a [illegible].

[illegible]

We [illegible] Loch Vennachar, at the eastern end of which we [illegible] [illegible] as the scene of the fight between Roderick Dhu and Fitz James. On our left we saw [illegible] presented as the first tarrying place of the messenger of the fiery cross.

[illegible]
And peep [illegible] massive [illegible]
Half [illegible] in the copse so green

Following the course of the stream which flows from Vennachar, which, mingling its waters with another stream of about equal volume, forms the river Leith. A few miles brought us to Callander, which has been designated the "prettiest of Highland villages." It is like a watcher at the opening of the glens, and is at this season crowded with tourists. Looking westward up the long crooked street of whitewashed houses and beyond, we saw Royal Ben Ledi, clothed in imperial purple. The sun was just setting behind his mighty form raying up far into heaven the spokes of splendor, like a halo round his head.

I have heard and read of Highland hospitality. In Callendar it is exemplified in charging the Sassenachs four times the value of what he gets.

Travelling by railway from Callander to Stirling, we catch a passing glance at Doune and its historic castle, and also of the famous old cathedral pile at Dunblaine. What musical names suggestive of such fine old Scotch ballads as "Charming Sweet Bessie, the Flower of Dunblaine."

Our train sped over the battle-field of Sherriff Muir, where in Nov. 1715, the Government troops, led by Argyle, came in conflict with the Highlanders, adherents of James the Chevalier, and where, as the old ballad says.

There's some say that we wan,
An' some say that they wan,
Some say that nane wan at a man.

Passing the bridge of Allan, I looked out in the direction we were travelling and caught sight of "Stirling's Noble Rock," surmounted with the [illegible]

[illegible]

To the Ed[illegible]

Sir,—In a la[illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] the greatest, grandest, and noblest nation on the face of the earth. Does "Progress" know what constitutes greatness, grandness and nobility as applied to a whole nation? If not, we will tell him. It is the being possessed of all those nobler traits of character as a nation which you lack, Mr. Progress, as a loyal citizen. A nation is good, sir, according as she achieves glorious victories or gains historic fame. A nation is grand and noble according as her Government approaches the Christian ideal of perfection and according as her people as a nation conform to the laws of God and his Christ is found in the individual. Has the U. S. achieved any great feats that will compare favorably with those of Canada, much less with those of Old England? Has she a history emblazoned with fame? Has she shown grandness or nobility in her treatment of the Indian? Was it in her dastardly invasion of our territory in 1812, was it her action in connection with the "Fenian Raid" of '66? Is it in her desecration of the Sabbath? Is it in the laxity of her civil code? Enough! The blood of our slaughtered defenders answers NO. What then makes her great, grand and noble? Echoes answer, What.

Now Sir, what would be the results, suppose we had annexation tomorrow? We would sink into [illegible]; we would [illegible] our identity; we would cease to be a people. Generation after generation would [illegible] with our masters. When the screaming eagle would spread her wings to cover her offspring, we [illegible] on the fence and [illegible] we were protected by the "British Lion." What satisfaction [illegible] Canada like a tadpole in an ocean [illegible] whose [illegible] No, sir, Progress, we as a people are not hankering after annexation. If you are [illegible] over and annex [illegible] Canada. You are [illegible] are like a [illegible] neither good [illegible] We would recommend to your [illegible] attention the following quotation from Edmund Burke: "My endeavour was to [illegible] liberty for the [illegible] country in which I was born, [illegible] with [illegible] every right, every privilege, every franchise, in this my adopted my dearer, [illegible] comprehensive country."

Yours,

CANANDIAN.

HEARD'S Carriage Works, FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

FLESHERTON Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

[illegible] this opportunity [illegible] many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on [illegible] opposite [illegible] Flesherton. [illegible]

[illegible]

Go to THE BEST

It Pays To

AND THAT IS THE

Northern Business College, OF OWEN SOUND.

[illegible]

MYRTLE [illegible] SMOKING TOBACCO

See T & B in bronze on EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

NEW FALL GOODS!

Central Store, [illegible]

Priceville,

[illegible]

BOOTS AND SHOES.

[illegible]

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

[illegible] Come and [illegible]

Central Store, Priceville.

A. McCABE.

FLOUR, FLOUR, STONE FLOUR!

MR. P. LOUCKS

[illegible]

NOTICE.

SHINGLES constan[illegible] cheap. Just put in [illegible] New Chopping Mill; now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B. SLOAN, Eugenia

Farm for Sale

The subscriber offers for sale that valuable property on the 4th line, Osprey, better known as [illegible] containing 125 acres. 90 cleared and 60 under cultivation, the remainder pasture and meadow. New frame barn, stone foundation; stables, etc., new frame house, cellar, and stone foundation. This is a magnificent property. Possession immediately. For terms, etc., apply to

A. McKECHNIE, Maxwell P. O.

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

[illegible]

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S.

[illegible]

TO THE FARMERS AND PUBLIC GENERALLY

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH!

[illegible]

The peoples faithful servant,

G. H. BLACKBURN.

Remember the place. Next [illegible]

Flesherton Meat Market!

BLAKELY & McCONNELL.

PURVEYORS TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Dealers in fresh and cured meats, sausage (our own make), lard, bologna, etc.

FISH, FOWLS, and GAME, in their season.

A. 1 BEEF, only [illegible] per hundred.

Call and ascertain prices, [illegible] you buy or not.

New Hair Dressing Parlor.

MR. W. J. NELSON, [illegible] new barber shop and [illegible]

Moore's Block, Durham St.

is prepared to atten[illegible] would invite patronage. Hair cutting, shaving, [illegible] all done in the highest style of [illegible]

W. J. NELSON

SALESMEN WANTED for the New England Nurseries, established over [illegible] The old reliable nursery. Men with [illegible] good habits and clean character [illegible] We can give you good pay and [illegible] Write for terms to CHASE BROTH[ERS] [COM]PANY, Nurserymen, Colborne.

WHIPPED THEM AGAIN.

Digna Defeated by "Black Men" and Egyptians.

THE LOSS AND THE PRISONERS.

A London cable says: A despatch from Suakim says a feature of the fighting yesterday was the determined rush upon the trenches by the blacks and Egyptians. The Dervishes fought with the utmost bravery, a great many of them dying in the trenches. The charge of the Hussars is also especially mentioned. When the Dervish cavalry saw them coming they dismounted from their horses and planted their spears in the ground, but these proved no obstruction to the Hussars, who swept down upon the Dervish horsemen like an avalanche, cut through their ranks and left half of them dead upon the ground. The Hussars then re-formed and charged the remaining Dervishes, who fled. A large portion of the rebel force was not engaged in to day's fighting, being absent camping at Handoub and the wells beyond that place. It is believed the rebels will be reinforced and make an attempt soon to retake their lost position.

A despatch to the Times from Suakim says: The prisoners say they believe that all the mounted gunners were killed. All tell the same story of privation and cruelty at the hands of the Mahdi and Osman Digna. None of them wished to fight, but were forced to do so or persuaded to fight by promises of loot at Suakim and other rewards. The trenches were bare. They found no food, clothing or money, but only Snider rifles and cartridges. The prisoners know nothing of the reported capture of Emin, or of the fall of the Equatorial Provinces. The natives assert that Handoub would fall at the first approach of our troops. The Government ought not to lose this chance. The task is an easy one, as there is not the slightest sign of any gathering of the local tribes.

An official despatch from Gen. Grenfell, dated Suakim, 11.25 a.m., says: The enemy's loss was 400. The Hussars are still pursuing the Arabs; the trenches are nearly filled and two temporary redoubts are being built. The joint forces are entrenched. They will bivouac on the field to-night, the naval detachment with the machine guns remaining in the trenches. I have sent the man-of-war Starling and all the available steamers to anchor off Handoub in order to prevent a force from Handoub coming upon us. During the action the Dervishes were so badly punished that we expect to have a quiet night.

Afternoon—The Hussars who followed the fleeing Arabs have returned. They chased the enemy to within four miles of Handoub. They were still running.

Three zarebas and a stockade were built over filled trenches and manned by four Soudanese battalions and British soldiers. The space between them and the water forts was occupied by a battalion of horse artillery. The Emir of Trinkitat is a prisoner. He is wounded. Osman Digna's nephew and twelve Dervishes have been captured. All were wounded. Serious complaints are made concerning the quality of the sabres and revolvers furnished to the troops. Several cavalrymen returned with broken sabres, and in many instances their revolvers became clogged and were rendered useless.

Lord Salisbury, in his Scarborough speech, said the Ministry had no intention of entangling the country in a new Soudan expedition, but they could not abandon Suakim. The English, Egyptian and Turkish Ministries were unanimously of opinion that Suakim must not be abandoned. Lord Salisbury continued: "As long as the Khedive desires it we shall maintain the Red Sea ports. We are bound under the promise made by Mr. Gladstone's Government to do so. A British statesman's first duty is to prevent foreigners from thinking that every change of Government must necessarily mean the changing of our foreign policy. It would be madness to surrender Suakim when we are on the eve of suppressing slavery, because the final struggle with the slave dealers must be fought upon the Red Sea. By the Treaty of Paris we are bound to uphold the integrity of the Sultan's Empire."

Herr Dilthy, the director of the German East Africa Company, has returned from Zanzibar. He denied that the company is responsible for the rising in East Africa, which he attributes to the slave dealers. He regards the assumption of Imperial sovereignty in East Africa as an imperative necessity.

Murdered in the Streets of London.

A London cable says: The body of a woman, whose name is unknown, was found yesterday morning in the streets of Poplar, in the suburbs of London. An empty phial lay alongside the body, and the impression first formed was that the woman had committed suicide. At the coroner's inquest to-day, however, the physicians who examined the body testified that there were no signs of poison in the stomach, and declared their belief that the woman had been murdered by strangulation. They said the condition of the body justified this belief, and in addition to that there was a mark on the woman's neck, which showed that a small cord had been tied tightly around it. The woman was of low character. When the body was found it was still warm. It was lying in an open thoroughfare, and there is no possibility that the woman could have taken her own life. Some persons believe her murderer is identical with the Whitechapel fiend, who, they think, has adopted a new method of disposing of his victims.

The Vanderbilt Style.

Family Man—What is the rent of this house?

Renting Agent—What salary are you getting a month?

Family Man—One hundred and ten dollars.

Renting Agent—Well, that will be the rent.—St. Paul Pioneer.

Didn't Want to See Her.

Bobby—"Come and play with me Johnny.

Johnny—"I can't."

Bobby—"Go and ask your mother."

Johnny—"No, I won't; she's been looking for me all morning."

Women distrust men too much in general and not enough in particular.—Commerson.

BOB WINTON'S FORTUNE.

Romantic Story of the Scapegrace Son of a Rich Scotch Lord.

HE DROVE A CAR IN JERSEY CITY.

A New York despatch says: A Jersey City street car conductor has blossomed out as a full-fledged heir apparent to an English earldom. Something more than a year ago a young man of about 25 years appeared in fashionable circles in Brooklyn. He was known as Bob Winton. He was remarkably handsome and seemed to have sufficient means to live in good style. He immediately became a favorite among marriageable girls and their mammas, and it is said that some lacerated hearts still smart from the effects of the wounds he inflicted. Rumor had it that the young man belonged to an honorable English family and that his coming to America was the result of a family unpleasantness.

The handsome Briton attended the horse races and won considerable sums. Then he became addicted to cards. At first he was lucky, then fortune frowned, he ran short of money and began to dissipate. One night he visited New York with some companions. In an uptown resort he became involved in a dispute with some rough fellows, was assaulted and badly used up. His companions escaped from the place and the Englishman was not seen in Brooklyn again. It appears that he was removed from the gambling house where the row occurred, to a hospital, from which he emerged a week later without a cent in his purse and his pulse still weak. Feeling keenly his position, and ashamed, in his battered and dilapidated state, to return to his former quarters, he concluded to seek new fields. Accordingly, he crossed over to Jersey city and secured a position as conductor on the Montgomery street railroad. He assumed the name of Bob Hunter. He seemed much sobered by his experiences, and stuck manfully to his work. He was sociable, and became a favorite among the employees.

A while ago "Bob Hunter" again disappeared, but in his room at a cheap boarding house have been found letters which explain his identity and the cause of his eccentric movements.

It appears that "Bob Winton" is none other than the eldest son and heir of Archibald William Montgomery, the Earl of Eglinton and Winton, whose elegant country seat, Eglinton Castle, is situated at Irvine, in Ayrshire. The young Baron, although a scion of one of the oldest and noblest English families, was a scapegrace himself, and although heir to all the vast estates of the united families of the Eglintons and Wintons, was the black sheep of the flock. His follies led to exile and his appearance in New York. His return to England was due to the receipt of a letter of forgiveness from his father.

WHO OWNS THE TIMES?

An Important Question in the Times Parnell Scotch Case.

A London cable says: In the case of Mr. Parnell against the London Times, the court yesterday considered the proofs of the validity of the arrestments which had been made by the plaintiff. Two Edinburgh advertising agents testified that the plaintiff had arrested small sums which they owed the Times. Neither witness knew who the proprietors of the Times were. Their remittances were made to Mr. Wright, one of the proprietors. Mr. Hayman, representing the registrar of newspapers at Somerset House, proved that Mr. Walter was now the registered proprietor of the Times in behalf of himself and others, the Times' solicitors having written that there would be great difficulty in registering the names of all whom the Act might construe as proprietors, because some of the proprietors were minors, some were married women, and some resided abroad. They also said that in many cases the interest held was very small.

Mr. Walter testified that he had given no authority to register him as the proprietor, but he had expressed willingness to act as registered proprietor. He did not have a list of the proprietors. His own interest in the Times was one-sixteenth and a half of the offices. The printing business was his. Mr. Soames, the Times' solicitor, said there were a hundred proprietors of the Times.

The court adjourned to enable the solicitor to produce a list of the proprietors.

HE IS DRIVING MULES.

Prosaic Sequel to One of the Most Romantic of Recent Elopements.

A few weeks ago the Chicago papers contained accounts of the elopement of Miss Roach, the 19-year-old daughter of a millionaire capitalist of that city, with a young clerk named Cunningham. The young lady, it seems, was a society belle, and the marriage created the usual nine-day gossip in a large circle of friends and acquaintances. After the marriage the young couple came to Kansas City, and for a few days boarded at a leading hotel.

Their money running out and no remittances coming from the wealthy but irate father, Cunningham was forced to seek work. All the work he could find to do was as a street-car driver, and he is now swinging the whip over a pair of metropolitan mules, and his little wife is keeping house in a humble home on Charlotte street.—Kansas City corr. Chicago Tribune.

The Horrors of War.

An old officer tells of a gruesome experience on the field of Champigny after the battle. Seeing one of the gravediggers pushing a body into a trench, which he proceeded to fill up, he called to him that life did not seem extinct. "Nonsense," was the reply, "you evidently are not accustomed to this sort of thing. If we were to listen to them, there never would be a single one buried."—Courier des Etats Unis.

Just Like Him.

He—You don't mean to say you've got another new hat! Where's the one I bought you last week?

She (much surprised)—Why, my dear, Mrs. Parkins has one just like it!

He (staggered)—Oh, ah! (Is left trying to understand.)

In mediæval times it was the public crier who went abroad enumerating the goods that a certain merchant had for sale.

WHOLESALE MALPRACTICE.

The Social Sore Which a Chicago Reporter Has Laid Bare.

A Chicago despatch says: The Times has created an immense sensation by its exposure of the length to which malpractice is carried on by doctors and midwives. A reporter of that paper engaged a young woman to go with him to many doctors and midwives. He represented himself as brother of the girl and anxious to save the family from exposure of the consequences of her misconduct. A great number of the persons called upon consented to perform a criminal operation, stating there was no danger in it, that they had performed hundreds such operations, that they would provide a place for the girl to stay at and would entirely avoid publicity. The reporter so arranged it that both he and the girl heard from every person called upon some part of the answer sufficient to proceed upon. The Times is now publishing the names and addresses of the doctors and midwives called upon, with an exact report of their answers. In some cases the physicians refused to have anything to do with the case. In others they refused, but sent the girl to other doctors, who, they said, would take the case. So far the Times has published the names and addresses of twenty-two doctors and midwives who agreed to undertake the job, and of five who would not. From statements alleged to have been made by two of the doctors a maternity hospital on Calumet avenue near Thirtieth street, and described as an institution in which clergymen and physicians are interested, is a place where malpractice is systematically carried on. The Chicago Medico-Legal Association and the Chicago Medical Society have written to the Times commending its course, and signifying their intention of bringing all the guilty persons to justice. The Times promises still further disclosures.

A CANADIAN DOCTOR

Mysteriously Murdered in Detroit on Tuesday Evening.

A last (Wednesday) night's Detroit despatch says: Dr. Alfred E. Ecroyd came to Detroit from Mount Forest, Ont., with his wife and three children, in 1883, and located at 282 Third street. Last evening he was found dead in front of his house, stretched out on the sidewalk. Neighbors discovered the body, alarmed the household, notified Coroner Lansing, and sent for Dr. J. B. Kennedy. Arriving at the house, Dr. Kennedy and the coroner carefully examined the body and found fresh contusions on the back part of the head, partially concealed by his hair. These wounds or bruises are such as may have been made by a sandbag or some kind of a blunt instrument, but not such as would result from a fall. About a month ago the doctor was sandbagged and robbed of a gold watch and $40 in money, but last night when found nothing on his person apparently had been disturbed or taken. A careful investigation of the immediate surroundings disclosed the fact that the doctor's footsteps could be traced in the snow leading towards his house, while larger ones were found coming from a passageway and finally mingling with the doctor's. Dr. Ecroyd was a graduate of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, London. He belonged to an old and aristocratic family, and is said to have brothers in Montreal and London who occupy high stations in life. There is a mystery connected with his sudden demise, which it is hoped and believed will soon be unravelled.

MARRYING A CHILD.

A Girl of Thirteen Cajoled Into Marriage With a Man of Twenty-Four.

A Lyons (N. Y.) telegram says: A few days ago intense surprise was manifested when it was learned that Anna Davenport, 13 years of age, was married to Mr. McCarthy, 24 years old. It is to-day charged that Mrs. McCarthy, the mother of the bridegroom, exerted undue influence over the child to bring about the marriage. She has been arrested. Rev. A. H. Stearns, who performed the ceremony, is 70 years old and in very poor health. He makes the following statement: "I was sent for to come immediately to Mr. Shears'. Upon arriving there I at first declined to marry them, as I thought the girl too young; but Mrs. McCarthy assured me that Anna was 16 years old and that they must be married, that it was necessary they should be, that Miss Davenport's family demanded it, and so I married them, although it seemed very queer to me that her parents should not be present." It is binted that when the question of Mrs. McCarthy's undue influence comes to be investigated a sensational story will be evolved.

A Disgrace to Humanity.

A Boston despatch says: The most scandalous episode in the long history of Harvard University is the terrible disgrace that yesterday fell upon Prof. Henry Preble, assistant professor of Greek and Latin, who was discovered in the act of committing a nameless crime upon a young boy. Developments proved that such practices had long been the habit of the distinguished and heretofore highly-honored scholar. Details are impossible. The discovery, resulting from the depraved man's own carelessness, was a tremendous shock, not only to the faculty, but the entire city of Cambridge, where the news spread rapidly. There was no time for explanation given the disgraced man. He was not even allowed to resign, for Prof. Eliot ascertaining the truthfulness of the report, gave him only two hours to leave the University grounds. Prof. Preble has taken refuge with his family, who are doing their utmost to hush the disgraceful affair up.

He Was Fond of Dogs.

An English lady travelling in a Paris railroad car carried a pet dog in her lap. A French dandy beside her began to caress the dog. "Well, sir," said she snappishly, "I must say that you do appear to be very fond of dogs!"

"Madame," said he, "I learned to love them during the siege, and since that time I scarcely ever eat anything else!"

Mr. W. C. McLeod, of Woodstock, put $215 in his bank book and started down to the bank to deposite it. When he reached the bank he found only $15 and is now puzzled to know what become of the other $200.

ON THE NATURE OF SLANG.

Where Some of the Commonest Expressions Originated and How They Have Been Preserved.

What is slang? The first answer to this would be: "Something vulgar," something to be avoided, something of the vocabulary of the prize-ring, the bar-room and the stable. But that is not all of slang. It may be the "giving of nicknames to things" and ideas, but it is after all a genuine and an influential branch of speech. Some one defines it as one of the "feeders of what may be called a standard language," which, with little scruple, adopts and adapts the words it happens to want, but whether from technical terms or from a love of fun, it is entitled to be treated with respect, like any other working dialect. Slang is a condensation, the jelly of speech, says the Mail and Express, and it develops itself, curiously enough, along with the general laws of language. Thus it is of great use to the student.

Our common language, our mother tongue, is a great bond, but not so great as is that familiar misuse to which we sometimes put it when we freight it with our epithets and smiles. The public is no bad judge of any humor, yet it sometimes adopts a senseless bit of chaff, or a poor contemporary of the "meatier" slang, such catch words as "walker," "Whoa, Emma," and the infinitely silly chestnut being examples, Chestnut, as an equivalent for a stale joke, has become very stale itself—in fact, moldy. There are the failures, the abuses of the noble art of slang. It used to be a habit of etymologists, when a word became troublesome, to altar it a little, so as to put sense into it.

Perhaps the best exponent of useful slang was the adoption of the word contraband as expressing a fugitive negro. Gen. Butler is to be accredited with the discovery that "contraband of war" applied to a runaway negro; therefore he gave a new word to the language. The necessity of the occasion produced the word, and a contraband is a synonym for a colored man at Washington to this day.

Many of the English words of the last century came from the gypsies. Thus kidnap comes from the napping or stealing of a kid, gypsy for child. When we talk, therefore, of kidnapping an old gentleman for his money, we mistake the etymology of the work, unless he is in his second childhood. One sometimes travels far to find out the meaning of a word. No one thinks he is speaking Italian when he says he "has made a fiasco." Yet it is the Italian for flask. Why does it mean failure then? Because the glass blowers of Murrano, trying to make a piece of window or mirror-glass, and failing in the attempt, merely blew or made a common flask, or "fiasco," with the bit of glass. So with fresco, which simply means fresh. The paint must be put on for a fresco when the lime is fresh. Fresco painting is fresh painting.

The common slang word "mash" is from a beautiful gypsy word, "mafado," which means "to charm by the eyes." These vagabonds by the wayside are responsible for much beauty as well as dirt. The word "loafer" comes from the German "land laufer"—a vagabond, an unsettled roamer over the country.

Why should a man be called a spoon? Why spoony when he is making love? Simply because he is a "loeffel," which also means spoon. The idiom is also Swiss-German, "Liebe macht loeffel holz aus manchen jungen Knaben stolz"—"Love turns many a proud lad into wood to make a spoon of him." The word boss comes from the low Dutch. The word boss means master. "A rum chap" is simply a gypsy lad; it has no relation to the product of the still. A far-famed beverage, which inebriates more frequently that it cheers, has not to answer for the phrase "he's a rum un to look at.' It simply means he is a manly man. Certainly, it is not by literary dignity that we have to measure language in these days, and yet it is curious how many slang terms are from the most classic sources. To "nigg at whist" means to renig, that is Saxon for deny. Pal is a brother, and "conk" for nose comes from the sprouting fountain, the concha of the Romans. "Pow-wow" comes from the Indians. It is curious we Americans have no more of this hereditary language of the red Indian tribes.

A few years ago a wit declared that his antagonist was not "worth a tinker's execration," which was thought very funny, until some other wit exclaimed: "What is a tinker's dam? It has nothing to do with swearing. It is merely the dam or stoppage, made of flour and water, with which the tinker stops the gap he is mending, until the tin or the pewter has cooled." When this bread pill is thrown away it is a very worthless piece of dough. Hence its name and fame. It has passed into a proverb for worthlessness. It is much harder to trace the origin of a proverb, or to find out a quotation, than to follow up a word, because both are frequently quoted wrong. For instance, the "goose hangs high" is entirely wrong. It should be: "For everything is lovely when the goose whangs high," meaning that if the geese flying south utter their peculiar "whang," then the weather is sure to be fine.

As for quotations, many people sought lately for the familiar "Praise from Sir Hubert," and could not find it. The true phrase is "Approbation from Sir Hubert Stanley is praise indeed," the line coming from "A Cure for the Heartache," the well-known old play.

The time of Spain's glory as a sea-faring and all-conquering nation is brought back to us in words redolent of the Gold Coast and of the Spanish main. "Boxing the compass" comes from the Spanish "boxar," "boxear," to sail round, to call at all points. Calaboose, a prison; picaroon, a pirate palaver, to talk, are all Spanish. The latter comes from the noble Spanish "palabra," meaning a word. The good dictionary word "vamp" was at first, on the contrary, a slang word, being rubbing up of old hats and shoes. Now, from being a cobbler's word, it has become a classic, and we talk of revamping the language.

It would seem a natural way of accounting for a slang word that it came through the interchange of money. Thus, "I do not care a rap," or a stiver, recalls two old Dutch coins. The word "dollar" is hard to account for. No one seems to know whence it came. It is probably Spanish.

The French argot is probably the richest, most peculiar and perfect language of slang known to civilized men. Those who have read Victor Hugo's novels have felt the need of Francisque-Michel's "Etudes de Philologie comparree sur l'Argot" to understand half of that wonderful book.

Demijohn comes from the Arabic damaghan; itself taken from the Persian glass-making town of Demaghan. How it got twisted into its present shape must be referred to that well-known elementary process of language, or that English habit of calling words as they are not spelled, which seems a part of the language.

Slang usually increases its store of words by formation at home, by the necessity of the case, by the happy inspiration of some humorist, who has found the fitting phrase, or by adoption from abroad. There are, however, words which come at night, spring out of the ground, as it were, which cannot be traced. Thus "dude," meaning a dandy, has no appreciable derivation. Like Topsy, it growed.

Slang, like other dialects, comes from the common people. A slang dictionary is not very pretty reading. It is primitive, to say the least, but slang is effective when it takes ready-made words and adapts them skilfully to new ideas. It is especially witty in the mouth of a refined person who uses the language of factories and stables and kitchens and shops, of prize fighters and artisans, philologically, with a sense, not only of its primitive meaning, but of its possibly funny application. American humor as developed by Mark Twain, Bill Nye, Bret Harte, and a thousand newspaper writers, is rich in this rollicking swagger of strange words, reminding one of old Stefano and Trinculo, in "The Tempest," "witty in their cups."

OFTEN SO.

The Man who Wants to Growl will not be Long Without an Excuse.

He was a large, elderly man, with an expression of discontent in his face, and when the porter had deposited his travelling bag in a section of the sleeping car the elderly man looked around at the ventilators, then critically at his neighbor across the aisle, and then he said to the porter:

"Where do we stop for supper?"

"Dining-car on the train, sir," was the answer.

"Is hey; what time is supper ready?"

"It is being served now, sir."

"Is hey—h-m; what time do we get to Albany?"

"Nine-fifty."

"Connect there with the train from Boston?"

"Yes, sir."

"Wait long?"

"No, sir; only ten minutes."

"H-m; what time do we get to Buffalo?"

"Six-fifteen to-morrow morning."

"What time does the next train leave Buffalo for Cleveland after we get there?"

"Six-forty, sir."

The elderly man looked over his spectacles at the porter for a moment and then said:

"Want my ticket?"

"No, sir; the conductor will take it by and by."

"H'm—does that Cleveland train pass through Dunkirk?"

"Yes, sir."

"What time?"

"Six forty-three."

"How big a town is Dunkirk?"

"About 10,000 inhabitants, sir."

The elderly man seemed to be annoyed about something, and as the dialogue continued he became more so. He eyed the porter again and asked:

"What time does the train reach Erie?"

"Three minutes past 8, sir."

"How much bigger is Erie than Dunkirk?"

"About four times, sir."

This concluded the interview. The porter walked away and the elderly gentleman sat down, but he didn't seem to feel easy. He glared at the passengers across the aisles, then he took off his overcoat, sat down and commenced reading the evening paper, but threw it aside almost immediately, and rising again walked gloomily to the back end of the car and looked out of the window. Then he went back to his seat and sat there sullenly until the porter came that way again, when he said:

"See here, young man, if I take that 6.40 train from Buffalo to-morrow morning what connection can I make at Chicago for a northwestern train that stops at Kenosha, Wis.?"

"I don't know, sir."

The elderly man eyed the porter fiercely for a moment through his spectacles, then over them, and then he said sarcastically:

"You don't know!"

"No, sir. You see——"

"I see, yes I see, you don't know! When a passenger asks you a civil question—you don't know. Great scott! Why don't the railroad companies hire wooden dummies and save expense? Say, do you know beans when you see 'em? Do you know when it's night? Why don't you travel around with your eyes open? Say, why don't you—just one day? I would if I was you!" And as the porter went quietly about his business the elderly man took up his newspaper again. He seemed to feel more contented after that.—Detroit Free Press.

Circumstances Were Against It.

Proprietor of Cafe—Come, James, let's close up and go home.

James—'Fraid we can't, sir.

Proprietor of Cafe—Why?

James—That party in room 4 has just begun to sing "We Won't Go Home Until Morning."—Jewish Messenger.

Why Tumblers Were So Called.

They were originally round bowls about the size of a large orange. When one of these bowls was empty, if placed upon the table, mouth downwards, so cunningly was it balanced, it flew back into its proper position, as if asking to be filled again.

Fashions on Rotten Row, London.

The severe and perfect style which has always characterized the dress of men and women riding in the Row is passing out. For women the tall hat and perfectly fitting dark habit and plain linen collar and cuffs have been succeeded by conical and soft Tyrolese hats, sometimes even decorated with ribbons and feathers, and also gray tweed caps and other styles. A well-dressed man on horseback is rare.

John and Percilly.

(James Whitcomb Riley in Christmas Judg

We got up a church-doin's
  Last Christmas eve—
Kind o' dimonstration
  At I rally believe
Give more satisfaction,
  Take it up and down,
Than any show or entertainment
  Ever come to town.

Railly it was a theatre—
  That's what it was!
But bein' in the church, you know,
  We had a "Santy Claus"—
So's to git the old folks
  To patternize, you see,
And back up the institution
  Kind o' morally.

School teacher writ the thing—
  (Was a friend o' mine)
Got it out o' Longfeller's
  Pome "Evangeline,"
Er som'ers, 'bout the Puritans—
  Anyway, the part
John Alden fell to me—
  And had it all by heart.

Clairey was Percilly,
  (School teacher 'lowed
Me and her could act them two Best of all the crowd)—
Then blame ef he didn't
  Git her pap, 'y jing!
To take the part o' Santy Claus
  To wind up the thing;

Law! the fun o' practisun!
  Was a week er two
Me and Clairey didn't have Nothin' else to do!—
Kep' us jes' a-meetin' round,
  Kind o' here and there,
Ever' night, rehearsin' like,
  And gaddin' ever'where!

Game was wuth the candle, though,
  Christmas eve at last
Boiled around—and 'tendance jes'
  Couldn't be su'passed—
Neighbors from the country
  Come from Clay and Rush—
Yes, and 'crost the country line,
  Clean from Puckerbrush.

You see, the way the play run,
  Me a-actin' John,
And Clairey, mind! Percilly—
  There was sparkin' goin' on!
Play it all so natchural;
  And it tuck so well,
Even old man Santy Claus
  Had to stomp and yell!

So by the time his turn come
  Fer to take the floor,
It was nearly 12 o'clock—
  "Lacks a leetle more!"
That's what I whispered
  To Clairey, and she said
Somepin' in a whisper back,
  And laughed and shuck her head.

Meetin'-house jes' trembled
  As Old Santy went Round amongst the children,
  With ther peppermint
And sassafrac and wintergreen
  Candy, "and a ball
O' popcorn," the preacher 'nounced,
  "Free fer each and all."

Schoolteacher suddently
  Whispered in my ear,
"Guess I got you!—Christmas gift!"
  Christmas is here!"
I gave him a gold pen
  And case to hold the thing—
And Clairey whispered "Christmas gift!"
  And I gave her a ring.

"And now," I says, "jes' watch me!
  'Christmas gifts,'" says I;
"I'm a-goin' to git one—Santy's comin' by!"
Then I rech and grabbed him;
  And, as you'll infer,
'Course I got the old man's,
  And he gimme her!

A QUEEN'S HOUSEHOLD.

Victoria's Great Establishment and Her Army of Retainers.

Queen Victoria's household has nearly a thousand officers, subordinates and attendants. The lord steward is at the head of all with a salary of $10,000 a year. All officers and servants, except those connected with the Queen's chamber, stable and chapel, are subject to his orders. The active duties of this officer are performed by the master of the household, who gets $5,790 a year. The lord treasurer ranks next to the lord steward and acts for him in case he is absent, while to assist him he has the comptroller of the household, who likewise does nothing. The board of green cloth, composed of the four above named officials, adjudicate on offences committed in certain parts of the palace, and has clerks and secretary. The clerk of the kitchen and his clerks keep accounts, check goods, and give orders to tradespeople. There is a chief and many cooks, a head of the confectionery department, of the "ower" or linen department, a chief butler, table deckers, men in charge of the plate, pantry and of the coal, and lamp lighters and dispensers of alms. The lord steward is judge of the court of marshalsea, with power to dispense justice among the Queen's domestic servants, and the court has a knight marshal. The lord chamberlain gets $10,000 a year and, with the vice chamberlain, superintends all the officers and servants of the Queen's chambers, except the bed chambers, these being under the groom of the state, as well as the officers of the wardrobe. The keeper of Her Majesty's privy purse is her financial secretary at a salary of $10,000. There are the mistress of the robes, the groom of the robes, ladies of the bed chamber, maids of honor, bed chamber women, lords in waiting, grooms in waiting, gentlemen ushers of the privy chamber, daily waiters, quarterly waiters, grooms of the privy chambers, grooms of the great chamber, and gentlemen of the privy chamber. The marshal of ceremonies must have an absolute knowledge of court etiquette.

The official places of many of them call for no performance of duty, because with the change of customs the duties have become obsolete. The master of the tennis court does nothing. There are a master of the house, burgomaster, keeper of the swans, and hundreds of assistants to the officers mentioned. All this looks like keeping house under difficulties, says a writer in "Good Housekeeping," and Queen Victoria ought to be well paid for it.

A Horrible Discovery.

Mrs. Westend—"I am greatly disappointed in that Mrs. Newcomer. I was in hopes they would be nice neighbors, but I see they are not people of refinement; they are extremely, inexcusably vulgar."

Miss Westend—"Why, ma, you said only a few moments ago that you had not yet seen one of the family."

"No, I have not; but I just caught a glimpse of their coachman, and I was shocked, positively shocked. They—allow—him—to—wear—a—mustache."

Miss E. R. Rice, of near Albany, Mo., was married to James Shepherd, of Santa Clara county, Cal., at St. Joseph, Mo., last week. The cooing was by letter and neither saw the other till a few days before the wedding. Shepherd is reported to be a millionaire.

A BABY INCUBATOR.

The First Patient Doing Remarkably Well—Fear of a Relapse.

Ward's Island was shaken from centre to circumference yesterday afternoon. It was not an earthquake, but for practical effect it might as well have been. The centre of the catastropne was the Emigrant Hospital. In one of the rooms stood a solid-looking box three feet square and four feet deep. It had a lid, and in the lid was set a large pane of glass. A fine-looking man, evidently a physician, was gazing through the glass with intense anxiety, amounting fairly to agony, depicted on his face. He stood motionless. The box was perforated at the top with holes, and warm air, 75 degrees by the thermometer, percolated through them. The box was divided into two parts by a horizontal partition. Below the partition was a square sheet-iron box filled with water. Two tubes entered the small tank from the side. They connected with a cylindrical tin box under which stood a spirit lamp. The lamp heated the water in the cylinder and the hot water ran through the upper tube into the sheet-iron tank and the colder water in the bottom of the tank ran out into the cylinder and thus kept up a circulation of warm water into the tank. The heat from the water rose into the upper compartment of the square box and thus kept up an equable temperature of 75 degrees.

On the partition dividing the large box was a miniature bed, soft and comfortable. And on the bed lay a minute human being 14 inches long, with a girth of 12 inches, a head as large as a cat's of medium size and feet and ankles small in proportion. This was a baby, and the man gazing at the baby was Dr. A. M. Thomas. "Only asleep, after all," he finally exclaimed, as he broke the silence and heaved a sigh of relief. "I really feared she was having a relapse."

The baby was Edith Eleanor McLean, and she was born early in September last. Her mother, Agnes McLean, came to the city from Glasgow late in August; was so ill that she had to be taken to the Emigrant Hospital, and there gave birth to the baby, which at that time weighed but two pounds seven ounces, was a foot long and hardly three inches in diameter at the waist. It was thought that the manikin could not live, but Dr. Thomas, who had taken a special interest in such minute mortals, and who had already had a "hatching cradle," as he calls it, put into process of manufacture, had utilized this means of incubation, as it were, to sustain the life of the child by a proper temperature and gradually lead it on to assimilated vitality. The box, with its two compartments, with its cylinder attachment, spirit lamp and hot water, was the invention of Professor Tarnier, of Paris, whose plan of saving such weaklings as little Edith Dr. Thomas had resolved to give a trial. The temperature at first was 90 degrees, now reduced to 75 degrees. The spirit lamp got away with the degrees for a moment yesterday, and a rumor is current that the upheaval on Ward's Island was due to Dr. Thomas' momentary fear that the natural sleep of his charge was a dangerous lethargy.—New York Press.

SIGNIFICANT FLOWERS.

French Women Troubled About Bouquets They Carry.

Parisian dames and damsels have been rather exercised in their minds of late by an important difficulty in the matter of the flowers with which they either adorn themselves or carry as bouquets, says a correspondent. Fashion has decreed that during the ensuing season flowers will be more a la mode than ever. These innocent ornaments, either in their natural state or as imitated from nature's handiwork by the adroit and artistic fabricator of artificial blooms and sprays who abounds in the city on the Seine, have of late attained an alarming political symbolism and significance. The old conventional "language of flowers" seems to have had its day, and a new treatise or dictionary on the verbal meaning of the product of the garden and conservatory will soon have to be compiled. Quelles fleurs porter? "What flowers are we to wear?" is now the question asked by many Parisiennes of their friends, their milliners, of their favorite artists. The violet has long been the symbol of the Imperialists; the carnation is the emblem of M. Boulanger, and the cornflower is the new Prussian kaiserblume, more correctly kornblume. The rose has been adopted by the Comtesse de Paris, while difficulties have ever arisen here regarding the trefoil, which reminds people of the Irish shamrock and the moonlighters; and finally the primrose, which is the emblem of another league. The latest solution of the great floral difficulty has been offered by a practical lady who advises people to patronize no particular flower, but to carry bouquets composed of heterogeneous horticultural specimens—a proceeding which would obviate political or diplomatic conflicts.

It Catches Them.

Tourist—"Any good hotels round here?"
Hayseed—"Never heard of any!"
"Any hunting or fishing?"
"No, siree!"
"Nice scenery, I suppose?"
"Naw!"
"How about mosquitos and malaria?"
"The woods are full of 'em."
"How do you live round here?"
"Same as other folks."
"Yes! but what industries have you ot to support the place?"
"Summer boarders!"
"For heaven's sake, what brings them here?"
"Printer's ink, Mister, printer's ink!"

A Chance for a Sore Tongue.

Mrs. Poots—What are you looking so glum about?

Poots—Oh, there's a confoundedly tender spot on my tongue from resting against a broken tooth.

"Humph! You're always grunting about something. Funny I never have anything like that the matter with my tongue."

"Nothing funny about it. Your tongue is never at rest."

The freedom of the city of London will be conferred upon the Marquis of Dufferin in recognition of his "distinguished services to his country as a statesman, administrator and diplomatist."

CURRENT TOPICS.

ALL Hayti may be said to be ruled by the cocomacaque. It is a jointed stick about three feet long, of heavy, unbreakable wood, and is carried by the officers of the absurd Haytian army.

A PECULIARLY novel etter has just been sent by an inhabitant of Bath, England, to a friend at Trowbridge. It was written in shorthand on the back of a postage stamp, the address being in ordinary writing. The missive was dropped into the letter box at the General Post Office and was duly delivered at its destination.

A GENTLEMAN recently home from Europe has given us some memoranda of English as she is wrote on the Continent. In a hotel at Vienna was this notice: "Dejuners, diners, supers und a la carte zu jeder Tagesziet, a tontes heures, every time." Over a money changer's office in Salzburg: "Buying and sale of all sorts of Inlandish and outlandish moneys here.'

DO NOT err in clothing; all wool but all light is the rule for health. Exercise and a very well ventilated bed-room will give refreshing sleep, and this latter will speedily restore even the most debilitated system. But remember it must be a natural sleep versus that produced by narcotics.

THE Queen is the "nearest heir living to the Crown of Scotland;" it is as the lineal descendant of James VI. through his granddaughter Elizabeth, who married a German Prince, that Queen Victoria sits on the throne.

THE tendency of the better usage now is to ignore distinctions of sex in such designations. There seems to be a growing preference for "author" rather than "authoress;" "sculptor" is easier and more natural than "sculptress," and some go even so far as to prefer "actor," even when applied to women.

RECENT elections in England and Wales have placed medical men at the head of the municipal government in the towns of Hull, Bath, Marlborough, Wolverhampton, Liskeard, Morpeth, Godalming, Congleton, Calne, New Romney and Yeovil.

PUNDITA RAMABAI, the Hindoo woman who came to the United States and Canada two years ago to raise money to build a college for the education of Indian women, has returned to her home with upwards of $80,000. She was accompanied by Dr. Emma B. Ryder, who will have charge of the women's hospital connected with the college, and will lecture in the regular college course.

IT is stated that there are more ducks in Chi than in all the world outside of it They are kept on every farm, on the private roa s and on all the lakes, rivers and smaller streams. There are many boats on each of which as many as 2,000 are kept. Their eggs constitute one of the most important articles of food. They are hatched in establishments fitted up for the purpose. Some of them turn out as many as 50,000 young ducks every year. Salted and smoked ducks are sold in all the towns, and many of them are exported to countries where Chinamen reside.

Long hair is the newest fad among men. It is said that Henry Irving set the fashion in England, the swells followed closely, and now the New York dudes are using all manner of hair-growers to coax out their own capillary covering, so that with their cape coats they may be English to the last degree. Clean-shaven cheeks are also necessary to the dude who would be finished in the true Irving mold. By the way, this new style is hardly a la Prince of Wales, principally because Albert Edward has little or no hair to let grow, and then again he insists on wearing a full beard.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL, ex-Attorney-General and leading counsel for Mr. Parnell, has a well-known trick of driving a point home to a jury which is inimitable by any other advocate. He begins to lead up to it with his right hand in his tail pocket, under his gown. Then he extracts a snuffbox, transfers it to his left hand, opens it, takes a pinch between the finger and thumb of his right, and with the box still in his left hand, and the pinch still in transit, he makes his point unerringly, so that it reaches his hearers' minds at the precise moment at which the pinch reaches its destination. Then with an inimitable flourish of a red and yellow bandana the oratorical effort is complete. But to be properly appreciated it must be seen.

WHAT will happen next? We are now assured by a medical authority that "plain living" is a fallacy. It is asserted that the stomach never performs its duty so effectually as when called to act upon a variety of food, provided of course that the food is well cooked. The popular opinion now is that a dinner consisting of three or four varieties of solid food is more easily digested than the meal which is confined to one sort only. The old-fashioned dinner of a single joint and a simply made pudding is pronounced to be a fruitful source of indigestion. On this subject Dr. George H. Taylor says in the Sanitary Era: "Ready-digested and easily digested foods are the abominations of dietetics; they prevent normal incitation of the digestive organs, necessary for normal secretions; they encourage a false notion that nutrition can be assured without reference to expenditure or to providing any use for nutritive material, and thus are liable to cause unnatural, irregular, unmanageable increase of the unstable ingredients of the organism, which react injuriously upon the digestive secretions, especially those of the liver. The prevalent recourse to these presumably enforced methods of nutrition are, in short, a violent and abnormal reaction against the former prevalent reign of physic, depletents, and so-called alteratives. These old methods actually provide modes of disposing of unused nutritive supplies, although they be morbid modes."

Looking a Gift Horse in the Mouth.

Clara's sister—"Oh, this must be Arthur's present!"

Clara—"Open it quick! I'm so afraid it won't be from Tiffany."

Clara's sister—"Well, is it!"

Clara (critically)—"Yes, so it is. It isn't a case, though; only a box. That's awfully shabby!"

Clara's sister—"But see what's inside A lovely necklace!"

Clara (coldly,—"I don't call that very lovely. A last year's design, not half as rich as Polly Thurston's. I think Arthur was very skimpy indeed."—Christmas Number of Life.

SANTA CLAUS GAME.

But the Object of His Visit Was Not to Bring Presents.

Gabriel Barton was an editor. After years of patient toil and continuous self-denial he had succeeded in amassing as large a competency of boys and girls as you could expect to find in a monogamic community.

Yet Gabriel was not content. Instead of being thankful for the blessings with which his family board was surrounded three times a day, he pined for other boons which he did not possess. He yearned ever for gold—that insiduous canker that gnaws the soul beyond reparation, and leaves a dark, indelible stain on the proudest escutcheons.

"Gold, gold! I must have gold!" he cried incessantly.

His strange demeanor was the occasion of grievous perplexity to his wife, for Estelle Barton was a simple, unaffected woman, ill acquainted with the selfish nature and ways of the cold world.

"But why, dear husband," she asked, "why clamor for the unattainable? Be satisfied with what we have—'tis humble, I know, but so long as our nine children are in good health, and so long as the water tax is not due, we surely shall not perish. Prithee, be content."

But alas, Estelle Barton's wise words weighed naught with Gabriel. Ceaselessly he yearned for debasing lucre, and his morbid appetite made him thin and pale, and brought a faltering into his gait and a tremulousness into his voice.

One bitter, cold Christmas eve little Eugenia Barton, the 9-year-old daughter, and the senior child of the family, asked, pleadingly, "Papa, do you not know what day to-morrow is?"

Gazing into the depths of the child's innocent blue eyes, Mr. Barton said, "How came you to know, child, that my note fell due to-morrow?"

"Nay, papa," interposed Eugenia, "I did not know it. But surely you cannot have forgotten it. To-morrow is Christmas—Christmas, papa! our gladdest, merriest day in all the year!"

A far-off look came into Mr. Barton's lack-lustre eyes.

"Well?" he uttered, inquiringly.

"Tell me, papa," cried Eugenia, "tell me will Santa Claus come this year?"

"I think I can safely say that, unless he intends to break his record, he will not," replied Mr. Barton promptly.

"Alas!" sighed Eugenia; and with this she hung her beautiful golden head.

Mr. Barton regretted that he had cast a gloom over the child's hopes. He sough to explain his seeming harshness.

"Why should Santa Claus come?" he asked, bitterly. "Haven't the neighbors got through lending us what we need? Where in all this great and heartless city can we expect to borrow anything to hang up?"

"True," said Eugenia, "I had not thought of that. Forgive me, dear papa, if in my puerile heedlessness I have caused you pain."

That night Eugenia sobbed herself to sleep on the sofa with a volume of old files tucked around her shivering form. How long she slept we will not presume to say. But the golden sunbeams of the early Christmas morn were dancing through the window frames and floating o'er the hardwood floor when she awoke. A man stood before her—a man clad in habiliments of fur. Eugenia uttered a cry of joy.

"Santa Claus!" she cried.

The man smiled pleasantly with that part of his personality that was exposed to the rigorous temperature of the editor's home.

"Oh, Santa Claus!" said Eugenia. "I knew you would come; we've been waiting for you year after year until the rest had given you up, but I—I knew you would come!"

Again the exposed surface of the fur-clad stranger wrinkled into a smile.

"Thank you for coming," continued Eugenia. "I knew that my faith in you would be rewarded. So tell me, dear Santa Claus, what gifts—what wealth of beauteous things—have you brought to pour out into our grateful laps at last?"

The strange, fur-clad figure stood still a moment as if dazed; then drew a bit of coin from the mysterious depths of his shaggy robe and tossed it to the anxious child.

"There's a nickel for you, little 'un," he said, as his tone betokened a kindly heart. "But, bless you, I'm not Santa Claus. I'm a constable!"

"One Foot in the Grave."

How often do we hear the above said of some poor pilgrim o'er life's thorny path, whose tottering step, pallid face, unnatural glitter of the eye and hacking cough, and its accompanying involuntary pressure of the hand over the lungs, the seat of the dread disease—consumption—that causes the remark? Too frequently, alas! and in the interests of such unfortunates this is penned, to assure them that their steps need tend no longer toward that narrow receptacle that awaits all—that is, until life's allotted space is covered—from any such cause, for the scientific researches of Dr. R. V. Pierce, resulting in the "Golden Medical Discovery," have wrested from Nature a remedy which never fails to cure this scourge of our race (which is really nothing more nor less than Scrofula of the Lungs), if taken in time. Druggists sell it.

Figures That He Liked.

"Have you a good head for figures?

"No, but I have a good eye for them," and he gazed admiringly at a neat one flitting by in a handsome Newmarket.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching an stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form which often bleed and ulcerate, becomin very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It equally efficacious in curing all Ski Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

Clearing Up the Difficulty.

Eddie—And did Santa Claus really bring that big rocking-horse down the chimney?

Mamma—I suppose so, Eddie. That's what they say.

Eddie (eyeing the stove pipe)—Good gracious, mamma! How it must have grown since it came down!

A SEASONABLE BET.

A Man Who Knew All About It Finds Himself Left.

"Christmas and New Year's do not come on the same day of the week this year," remarked a solemn man at the bar of a city hotel.

"I guess you are mistaken, stranger," retorted a young fellow who had just emptied a bottle of blue label.

"No, sir; I am not."

"But I insist that you are."

"I am not a betting man," drawled the solemn man, as he wiped a tear out of his left eye, "but I'll wager you a bottle of the widow that I am right."

"That Christmas and New Year's do not come on the same day of the week this year?"

"Certainly."

"Well, I'll cover your wager," chirped the young fellow, smiling at the bar-keeper. "Now prove to me that you are correct."

"Got a calendar?"

"No."

"Well, never mind. I can prove the truth of my statement with or without an almanac."

"Go ahead; I'm getting thirsty."

"Well, my dear young friend," began the solemn man, "you see Christmas and New Year's, which are only a week apart, occur in different years, and not on the same day of the week this year. Come now, order the wine; I'm in a hurry. The gag is a fresh one, and I must make time if I expect to find any more sturgeons to-day."

For Ladies Only.

Ladies—why is it, that when your husband or your children are ill, you consult the best physician at once, care for them day and night, wear yourself out with sleepless watching, and never begrudge the heaviest doctor's bill, if only the dear ones are restored to health; while day after day, week after week, you endure that dull pain in your back—that terrible "dragging-down" sensation—and do absolutely nothing to effect a cure? In a few years you will be a helpless invalid, and soon your broken-hearted husband and motherless children will follow you to the grave. Perhaps delicacy prevents you consulting a physician—but even this is not necessary. Poor sufferer, tell your husband how miserably you feel—perhaps you never did—and ask him to stop to-night and get you a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It has cured thousands of women suffering from weakness and complaints peculiar to your sex.

Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures when every other so called remedy fails.

The most successful song writer of the day is said to be Will S. Hays, who has for many years been the river editor of a Louisville newspaper. He first became popularly known from his "Write Me a Letter from Home."

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.
Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.
Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detro 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington 1,216 at Boston, large classes of Columbia's students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn,, Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Prin. N.Y State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y

DON'T DO IT

SALESMEN We wish a few men to sell our goods by sample to the wholesale and retail trade. Largest manufacturers in our line. Enclose 2-cent stamp. Wages $3 per day. Permanent position. No postals answered. Money advanced for wages, advertising, etc. Centennial Manufacturing Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

MERCHANTS, BUTCHERS AND TRADERS generally
We want a GOOD MAN in your locality to pick up
CALF SKINS
for us. Cash Furnished on satisfactory guaranty Address, C. S. PAGE, Hyde Park, Vermont, U. S

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in the country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in is specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

DUNN'S
BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

FOR SALE,
A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,
WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR
All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the
TIMES PRINTING CO.
HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

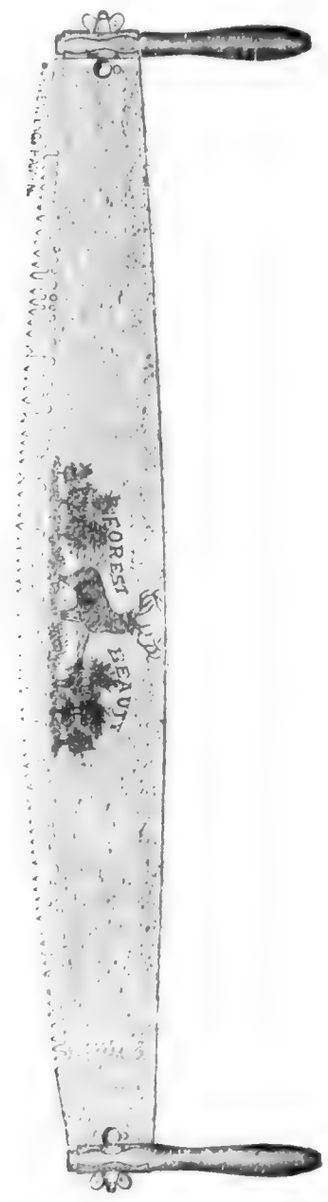
Saws! Saws!



Cross-Cut Saws! Cross-Cut Saws!

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having nve gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined siller steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you Another line I would particularly call yonr attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

Shelburne Free Press: The Manitoulin Guide says "that a man in the township of Burpee, who had a fight with a bear, succeeded in getting hold of the bear's hind legs and kicked his brains out against a tree." This story reminds us of one that Tom Bowers, of Mulmur, tells about his hunting scrapes in the days gone by. Tom discovered a run-away at the base of a high ridge of land and from the tracks he learned the deer were frequently on this path. So he started his dogs and then secreted himself behind a big tree close to the run-away. In a few minutes a large deer came sailing past and Tom grabbed it by the heels and held on. Every jump the deer made Tom said his feet described a semi-circle among the tops of the little cedars. Perseverance did the business, for after holding on to the deer for two miles, Tom was master of the situation. We don't vouch for the truth of this story. If you don't believe it ask Tom.

A huge bear was shot near the marsh in Luther last week, and when being dressed a pint flask of rye whiskey was found in its stomach. The bottle was tightly corked, and now the question is how did the bottle get there? Some are of the opinion that the bear must have swallowed and digested the original owner of the flask, who carried the whiskey in his pocket. This theory must be dismissed, as, if true, there would be buttons, jackknives, clay-pipe and other indigestible articles found along with the whiskey bottle. Our informant is a person of veracity or we would consider the whole story a hoax.—[Arthur Enterprise.

Chesley Enterprise:—On Sunday last constable Briggs of Tara arrived in Chesley and had a warrant sworn out for the arrest of John B. Allen of Chesley on the charge of having stolen a horse in Wiarton. He also brought with him a warrant for the arrest of a man named Curry as the principal offender. The horse had been hired from a livery man in Wiarton, driven to Chesley and put into one of the stables. Allen claims to have had nothing to do with the hiring of the horse, and says he was only taking a ride with Curry. The trial was held in Tara on Monday, when it came out that Currie had gone around Wiarton distributing printed circulars representing himself as being an agent of some of the Toronto papers for which he was soliciting subscriptions. He had hired a horse and rig to drive to Chesley, and on his way overtook Allen, to whom he offered a ride. Before reaching Tara, they stopped opposite a farm house and Allen held the horse while Currie went into the stable and stole a saddle. Further on they traded the harness with a man named Hyndman and got $2 to boot. Hyndman lost the money but got the experience so that in the deal he came out about even. After having the full particulars the magistrate committed Currie but honorably acquitted Allen.

Late Saturday night or early Sunday morning, Mr. M. A. H. Pidgays store, Chesley, was broken into and about six hundred dollars' worth of goods were stolen, consisting of horse clothes, oysters for sale on counter, axes and [illegible] Lamb; especially a large lot of men's overcoats, very much under value. About one hundred dollars' worth of silverware and silk handkerchiefs. Entrance into the building was effected by opening up a window in the storehouse and then removing the lock off the door leading to the store. No trace of the goods or the thieves has been found so far.

Monthly Fairs.

Orangeville—The second Thursday in each month.
Dundalk—Tuesday before Orangeville.
Flesherton—Monday before Orangeville.
Markdale—Saturday before Orangeville.
Durham—Third Tuesday in each month.
Chatsworth—Monday before Durham.
Holland Center—Saturday before Chatsworth.
Priceville—Second to before Durham.
Hanover—Monday before Durham.

Municipal Notice.

Notice is hereby given that all letters designed for the township Clerk and Township Registrar of the Township of Osprey, should be addressed to the undersigned.

JOSIAH GAMEY,
Maxwell, Dec. 15th, 1888.

$85 Solid Gold Watch Free. Sold for $100, until lately Best $85 watch in the world. Perfect timekeeper. Warranted. Heavy Solid Gold Hunting Cases. Both ladies' and gents' sizes, with works and cases of equal value. One Person in each locality can secure one free, together with our large and valuable line of Household Samples. These samples, as well as the watch, we send Free, and after you have kept them in your home for 3 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property. Those who write at once can be sure of receiving the Watch and Samples. We pay all express, freight, etc. Address Gibson & Co., Box 413, Portland, Maine.

A large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

—AT—

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Fulled Stockings, Overshoes, and Rubbers. Mens' and Boys' Long Boots. At prices to suit the times.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,
FLESHERTON.

A Positive Cure. ✝ A Painless Cure.

FACES FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

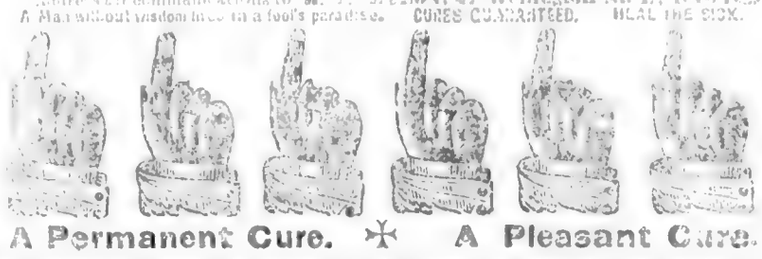
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, lumbago, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendence of us no asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of such vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, true manly dignity and vitality, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Celebrated Book For Men on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation. Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 42 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.



A Permanent Cure. ✝ A Pleasant Cure.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT.

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equal.

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London,

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☞ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

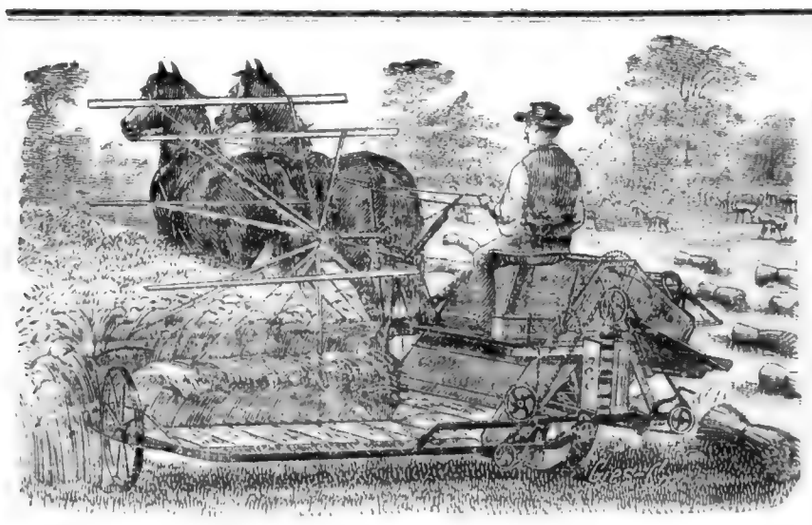
Jan. 10 1889

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 393. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, JAN. 10, 1889. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.



A. Harris Son & Co., BRANTFORD.

The Brantford Light Steel Binder, Brantford Reaper, Brantford front cut Mower, Brantford rear cut Mower,
THE BEAVER COMBINED SEEDER and DRILL, THE MASON IMPROVED SULKY RAKE, JOHNSTON'S IMPROVED ONE HORSE CULTIVATOR, LAND ROLLERS, GANG PLOWS, SCUFFLERS, CULTIVATORS, ROOT CUTTERS, GRAIN CRUSHERS, ETC.

FOR SALE BY

THOS. A. BLAKELY,

FLESHERTON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. Neil McDonal, at the townline, is going to erect a large frame barn next spring. Allen McKechnie hewed the timber for it. It will be a great improvement on the old log barn that stands there now.

Mr. Alex. Nevin is going to build an addition to his house; as he expects an addition to his family he means to be prepared.

Mr. Aaron Ernest makes it his business to call daily at the lighthouse to pay his respects to the proprietor. The citizens of Muddy Valley will not be surprised should a wedding come off there very soon.

Donald McDougald had a large woodbee the day before New Year. He supplied the boys with lots of fire-water, which the majority of them appreciated very much, himself included. They had a lively time at the dance that night and each Bonnie Laddie went home New Year's morning feeling light headed and heavy footed.

Mr. Moore, the hay presser, has been making hay a very scarce article in this settlement. He has bought of J. McNelty $200 worth; J. Campbell, $177 worth, and D. McCormack over $100 worth, and a large quantity from Mr. Hinks, B. Paton, J. Knox and Mr. Golden, where they are now pressing.

Mr. W. Stuart sold by public auction his farmstock and implements. He had a goodly share of the hot liquid there and the most of his stock went at a good figure. Mr. P. Ferguson bought his full bred blood colt, sired by that noted horse, Goldfinder, formerly owned by A. Hannah, Flesherton Station. Somebody else near by would like to have him but not being a good judge of horse flesh he refused to bid.

Mr. W. Blakestone has returned from Michigan, where he was spending his Xmas holidays. If was not that he is engaged to teach school for another year we think he would have stayed there as he was very much taken up with the country. He spent a couple of nights along with the roughs and toughs of both countries, in a lumbering camp. He says people in the lumberwoods are not half so disorderly as peoples here imagine they are.

Miss Mary Booth, of Toronto, was up spending a few days with her friend, Christina McDonal, of Proton. She has returned home again.

Mr. John Alcorn and wife are away visiting friends below Harriston. James Alcorn accompanied them. Dame rumor says he is in search of a wife. We wish him success.

It seem everybody has their own peculiar idea about the way to spend the first day of the year, as nearly every individual in this locality spent it in a different manner.

Some went to Sacket's corners, others went to Priceville and had a few drinks, Campbell drew hay to the station, the Bachelor in the bush went out to the old man in Durham, and to cap the climax D. Ferguson spent it killing pigs.

Mr. Editor, I wish you and all the rest of the Fleshertonians A happy New Year.

OBEN.

P. S. Enclosed please find one dollar for a years subscription to your paper.

[The last item is extremely interesting. Many thanks.—ED. ADVANCE.]

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

The annual tea-meeting in connection with the Sabbath School was held earlier than usual the present season, but owing to the bad state of the roads was poorly attended. The entertainment consisted of the usual tea and cakes and dialogues, recitations, etc., and a short address by Rev. Mr. Shilton.

The second annual Xmas tree entertainment came off in the school house the Friday evening before Christmas, and was a decided success. The past teacher, Miss Ford, deserves great credit for the successful manner in which the pupils rendered their several parts.

Mr. R. Graham was re-elected school trustee at the annual meeting.

Mr. D. Johnson has sold his farm on the 11th and bought 50 acres from Mr. R. Shaw.

Mr. D. Walker is leaving the Meaford Road and going to live on the 9th line of Euphrasia, on a farm that he has purchased from Mr. J. Boland.

Mr. John Warling's family has been increased by the advent of a young daughter.

A debating club has been organized in the school house and meets on Friday evenings.

Kimberley.

Our anniversary and tea-meeting on New Year's evening, was the grandest affair of its kind ever held here. Our little church was crowded to its fullest capacity with a happy company. Speeches were given by Rev. Mr. Madden of Heathcote, Rev. Mr. Sanderson of Walter's Falls, Mr. Hammond and Mr. Hall. Mr. W. Dinwoody gave a recitation in his well known and effective style. The Kimberly choir was in good form and rendered some most excellent music. In fact the excellence of their singing was a matter of general comment. Our popular Reeve, Mr. Thomas Gilray, did graceful honor to the chair. The Messrs. Cook and Falls, of Rocklyn, gave some excellent solos on the mouth organ. At the close of the entertainment it was announced that $44.20 had been taken at the door, and $134 in subscriptions, making a grand total of $178.20. How is that for our enterprising village, Mr. Editor!

For lame back, side or chest, use Shiloh's Porous Plaster. Price 25 cents. For sale at the Medical Hall.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Mr. Thos. Duncan held a sale of his personal effects on Monday. He will remove to Toronto.

The cattle fair on Monday was very poorly attended. Less than a dozen animals were offered.

Mr. J. G. Keefer of the Forest Free Press will accept thanks for a handsome illuminated carrier boy's address.

Will you suffer with Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint? Shiloh's Vitalizer is guaranteed to cure you. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Mr. W. J. Nelson, Flesherton's new barber, visits Priceville every Friday. We commend him to the good people of that town.

Catarrh cured, health and sweet breath secured, by Shiloh's Catarrh Remedy. Price 50 cents. Nasal Injector free. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Remember the Farmers' Institute meeting on Saturday next in Flesherton. Friday in Markdale.

Mr. Wm. Strain has given up the agency of Vicker's express. This company have withdrawn their service along the C. P. R.

That hacking cough can be so quickly cured by Shiloh's Cure. We guarantee it. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Owing to absence in Toronto Mr. Richardson has been unable to give us his usual interesting letter. We substitute thefore a short original story.

Mr. Thos. Garret, of Glen Huron, for five years a resident of Flesherton, paid us a visit on Thursday. Mr. Garret founded the Flesherton cheese factory, and now carries on the same line of business at Glen Huron.

In giving our report last week of the Flesherton Sunday School anniversary we should have mentioned that Miss Edith Richardson accompanied the singers in the Cantata upon the organ. Miss Richardson's playing was extremely good.

The annual meeting of East Grey Agricultural Society, will be held in the town hall, Flesherton, on Wednesday, Jan. 16th, at 1 o'clock, p. m., for the election of officers, receiving reports, and general business. All are invited to be present.

Mr. J. G. Anderson has disposed of his Markdale business and will now devote his whole energies to the building up of his Flesherton trade. Heretofore several Fleshertonians felt a little jealous of J. G's frequent visits to Markdale, but now that he has fully decided to throw over his Markdale love, this will cease, and we forgive him his flirtation with foreigners. Call and test his prices.

There was a funny fracas ventilated before J. W. Armstrong, J. P., on Saturday last. Mr. Thos. Betts accused Albert Partridge of assault. There was a young lady in the case, and our worthy magistrate appears to have thought that a young lady is well worth quarelling over but not worth going to law about. At all events he dismissed the case.

At a late meeting of the Royal Templars of Temperance, it was moved by Bro. W. H. Thurston, seconded by Bro. Robt. Keefer, and unanimously resolved that we, the members of Fountain Council, No. 146, while keenly feeling our loss in the removal by death of Sister Russell, a charter member of this lodge, and beloved wife of Bro. J. G. Russell, Knowing his loss to be infinitely greater, would extend to him our profound sympathy, and would earnestly pray that God, who has allowed for our sister the day temporal to widen into the day eternal, may sustain our brother in his severe trial, and enable him "Ever to lean on Staff and Rod, and follow—meet at home with God."

Read D. McTavishe's new advertisement, and be sure and order your cutters and sleighs from him.

Notice should have been given last week of an orange soiree at Kells' Corners. It was a case of oversight on our part for which we are extremely sorry. The affair came off last evening. The result will be given next week.

An Interesting Case.

A case of much interest to people in this vicinity, and to merchants all over the Dominion, was tried at the Assize Court in Toronto, before Justice Rose, last Friday and Saturday. Mr. M. Richardson, of Flesherton, on January 15 last, purchased goods in Toronto, Montreal and Hamilton and shipped them to Flesherton by the C. P. R. While the goods were in the freight shed at Flesherton the building was destroyed by fire. Mr. Richardson sought to make the company responsible for his goods, which were valued at $682.41, of which $211.46 has been paid. The company contended that after having delivered the goods at the Flesherton station they were not liable for them. On Tuesday Judge Rose delivered a lengthy decision in favor of defendants.

Missionary Services.

Rev. John Shaw, of Toronto, preached missionary sermons in the Methodist Church on Sunday to large audiences. Mr. Shaw, though scarcely what you would call a powerful orator, is one of the most earnest, convincing and successful of Methodist ministers. He is overflowing with new and original ideas, and no one can listen to his impressive words without receiving new food for thought. The collections and subscriptions amounted to $105. Rev. Mr. Shilton at both services read statistics showing work done during the past year by the Missionary society.

Priceville's New Church.

The new Presbyterian Church at Priceville, which has been in course of erection during the past summer, was formally opened on Sunday last by Principal Cavan of Knox College, who preached morning and evening, to very large congregations. The new church is a model of beauty; though a little on the small scale, to overcome which difficulty a gallery has been erected, capable of holding about eighty persons. The building of this church has been engineered so successfully that it starts out in the good cause almost wholly free from debt, although costing some $3,000. Sunday morning's collection netted the handsome amount of $75, and with the evening offering would make fully $100. The Priceville Presbyterians are worthy of sincere congratulation upon the possession of this neat house of worship and its satisfactory financial standing.

TEA-MEETING.

On Tuesday evening a tea was held in the church, when a very large gathering was present. Over thirty Fleshertonians took advantage of the magnificent sleighing and paid their sister village a New Year's call. It was pleasant to witness the justifiable pride with which Priceville Presbyterians regard their new church. It is a pretty church, and well finished. It is not quite free from debt, as above noted, but so nearly is it that a few months will probably wipe out all indebtedness. The speakers on Tuesday evening were Rev. Mr. Watson, of Flesherton, Rev. Mr. McLeod, the pastor; Rev. Mr. Morrison, of Cedarville; Mr. Dugal McLean, Mr. McCormick and Mr. McCuaig, chairman of the building committee. Mrs. Gray, of Normandy, and Miss McKinnon sang solos. The efficient choir under leadership of Mr. McLeod, rendered several pieces very satisfactorily. Wm. Ferguson, Esq., occupied the chair. At the door $118.05 were taken.

Dundalk Herald:—Mr. Jas. Agnew caught a large wild cat on Tuesday. He has it still alive. This is the second one he has caught inside of a week.

The 16th anniversary of the Priceville Sabbath School will be held in the new Presbyterian Church, Priceville, Wednesday, Jan. 16, when an excellant program will be provided consisting of readings, recitations, dialogues and good music by the choir and children. Also adresses by resident clergymen and others. Refreshments will be served. Program to commence at 8 p.m. Admission: Adults 25cts. children not members of the school 10cts.

Victoria Loyal Orange Lodge, No. 244, met in their lodge room on Tuesday, the 18th of December, to celebrate their 38th annual meeting for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year, when the following brethren were duly elected to their various offices: James Best, Worshipful Master; William John Henderson, Deputy Master; Samuel Sheardown, Chaplain; Thomas James Stinson, Recording Secretary; John Wright, Financial Secretary; Joseph Blakely, Treasurer; William Sharp, Director of Ceremonies; Thomas A. Blakely, Lecturer. Committee, John Lyons first, George Ludlow second, Joseph Watson third, David A. Stinson fourth, Edward Lomas fifth, Thomas Wauchob, Tyler.

The officers elect were duly installed and a very pleasant time was spent, when all brethern present partook of a grand supper prepared by the lodge.

Married.

HILL—WOOD.—On New Year's day, at the residence of the bride's father, by the Rev. J. Walker Shilton, B. A., Mr. Thomas Hill of Collingwood Township to Bella, youngest daughter of David Wood, Esq., of Artemesia.

MUIR—BROWN.—At the residence of the brides father, Priceville, on Wednesday, Jan. 9, by the Rev. Mr. McLeod Mr. Alexander Muir to Miss Esth Brown.

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in head. How they may be cured at your home. Post free 3d.—Address Dr. NICHOLSON, John Street, Montreal

SACRIFICE SALE,

TILL JAN. 1st, 1889.

16⅔ PER CENT. off all sales of WATCHES and CLOCKS! or ONE SIXTH off marked price.

20 per cent. off RINGS, CHAINS, SILVERWARE, MUSICAL GOODS ditto.

25 per cent off general lines in JEWELRY, SPEX, ETC.

Markdale is the only place in this section where you can get CLOSE COMPETITION

It will pay you to drive [illegible] can find a [illegible] from a [illegible]

CALL THIS MONTH!

If you never have before,

—AND—

Test This Statement!

that I have [illegible]

FOR SALE,

1 12-Horse Power and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power

THE GOVERNOR

JEWELER [illegible] Can be seen at office of the MARKDALE PRINTING CO.

MARKDALE, ONTARIO.

EXTREME NORTHWESTERN CANADA.

Explorer Ogilvie's Researches in the Yukon and Mackenzie River Districts.

A Winnipeg despatch says: William Ogilvie, D L.S., who has been engaged since 1887 in exploring in extreme Northwestern Canada, arrived at Calgary yesterday via Lac la Biche and Victoria. The route pursued by the party was from the Pacific coast up Chilcat Inlet by steamer, over the Taing Pass to Lake Lyndeman on Lewis River, a large branch of the Yukon, and down the Lewis River by canoes to the international boundary line. It had always been supposed that the Lewis was the main stream of the Yukon, but the Hootilenqua, which joins the Lewis from the east, about 200 miles from the coast, is the main stream proper. The party went into winter camp on the Yukon, near the international boundary, in the latter part of September. The greatest cold was in February, when the thermometer registered 57° below zero. Camp was struck on March 4th, when the party descended the Yukon 35 miles, to where a small creek runs in. They ascended this to the head through a pass in the Nehaunie range of mountains to the head-waters of the Porcupine River, another of the principal branches of the Yukon. This pass is 3,200 feet above sea-level The Porcupine was descended twenty miles, when on April 10th camp was made until the ice broke in the spring, which was on May 18th. The average depth of snow during the winter was about three feet. The Porcupine was descended to its confluence with Bell's River, coming in from the east. This was ascended to a pass in the Rockies about eight and a half miles long, with nothing to prevent a first-class railway being built through it. From the east end of the pass a small mountain stream was followed to its junction with the Peel River, flowing into the Mackenzie. On this stream coal of good quality and an abundant outcrop of asbestos were seen. The distance from the foot of the Rockies to where they entered the Peel was seventeen miles in a straight line. The total distance travelled from the Yukon at the boundary to the Peel River was 318 miles, crossing two mountain ranges, one in winter and one in summer. McConnell's geological survey party was met at the Peel. The ascent of the Mackenzie was begun on January 27th, and the survey continued until it combined at Chippewayan with the survey of the Peace and Athabasca Rivers, made by Mr. Ogilvie in 1886. A distance of 1,417 miles was covered. The only real obstacle to navigation in this distance was the rapids at Fort Smith. Wheat and barley are grown every summer at Fort Providence, in north latitude 61. A sample of wheat grown there was brought out and makes good flour. Mining is carried on on the Yukon and tributaries and pays during three months of the year. Forty-mile Creek, the scene of the gold excitement of 1887, unites with the Yukon about forty-one miles from the boundary. Twenty-three miles of this creek is in Canada. Mr. Ogilvie and his party left Edmonton for Calgary by team on Christmas Day.

FROM THE FAR WEST.

A Woman Foully Murdered—Tracklaying on the Portage Extension—Other Notes.

Archbishop Tache left for Montreal yesterday.

Crossley and Hunter, the evangelists, passed through the city for the east yesterday.

Mr. Ogilvie, D. L. S., left Edmonton for Winnipeg and the east yesterday. The party enjoyed excellent health, but was delayed by ice for five weeks at Chippewayan. It was also delayed one week on the Mackenzie River by bad weather and another two weeks on the salmon stream by increased work over what was estimated. Mr. Ogilvie found that the Mackenzie River was 200 miles longer than was reported.

Fire at the Walrond ranch, near MacLeod, destroyed several buildings and about 40 tons of hay.

A. J. Hoffield left Holland, a small village on the southwestern branch, yesterday at noon for his home, near Norquay, carrying liquor. His wife and three small children ran away on his appearance. He drove on to Norquay and returned home this morning with neighbors to find his wife lying forty feet from the door, dead, with her face fearfully mutilated. He says he only struck her with his hand. The Christmas dinner stood on the table as prepared, untouched. Hoffield has been placed in custody at Holland.

Mr. Kendricks, chief engineer for the Northern Pacific Railway, arrived in this city this evening. It is understood that he will look into the question of pushing the work on the Portage extension this winter.

Fun for the Bear.

A Chicago despatch says: City Treasurer Plautz has had some exciting adventures with a bear and a monkey which he won in a raffle. He endeavored in vain to induce the Park Commissioner to take the bear off his hands and then gave it to his brother.

The brother enjoyed the society of the animal twenty-four hours, and in that time the brute ripped up a carpet, pulled some furniture in pieces and hugged his new keeper almost to death. Yesterday the bear was returned to the City Treasurer without thanks.

In an hour he had forced his way out of the shed where he was confined, and began to make free with Mr. Plautz's little boy. He tore every shred of clothing from the terrified youngster and then held him up to the keen December wind. Mr. Plautz rescued his son with some difficulty and now keeps the bear in a cellar.

No More Theatricals in New York Hangings.

...riff (to condemned mur-...hair. Say your pray-...it. The electrician ...

... Won't there be no ...?"

...m step up the gal-...

... chance for me to ...e game?"

...ght here."

... Oh, my! I—I wish I ...

... "a duck of a bonnet" ...so much bill to it.

A SHIPWRE...

Sad Story of Suff...

A Halifax despatch ... of Tremont, Me., master of the schooner Montezuma, of Calais, Me., has arrived at Yarmouth with three of his crew and details of the loss of his vessel as follows: The schooner was of 78 tons and 38 years old, and owned by Boardman Bros. and the Eatons, of Calais. She left Calais on December 8th with lumber for Boston. On the 14th she left Machias for Boston, and soon after, during a heavy north-northwest wind, she was struck by a heavy sea, which carried away the only boat. The vessel began to leak badly, and the deck load, being frozen, could not be thrown overboard. The men were driven from the cabin. All their fresh water became salt, and they had to hang their provisions to the main boom, which got under water. For seven days the only food the crew had was a quarter of fresh beef only partially cooked, and the only water was a little caught in a bucket during a rain shower. The captain and two men had their feet badly frozen by the intense cold. On the second day of the storm the stern was washed away, with the rudder and hawsers, and the sea washed through the deck-house. On the 18th the head stays gave way and both masts went overboard. On the 21st the schooner Edward D. rescued the helpless crew, and carried them to Yarmouth. The rescued men are T. G. Lunt, of Salem; T. Lunt, Fred. G. Commice and Harvey Hurd. The captain and Hurd have their feet badly frozen. The crew saved nothing from the wreck.

FATAL FIGHT OVER CHICKENS.

Bloody Encounter Between Mennonites and Americans.

A St. Paul despatch says: A riot occurred yesterday morning near Tripp, Dak., between Russian Mennonites and Americans. A public sale was held at the farm of a Russian named Sink, and an American farmer named Merchant purchased a dozen chickens. When ready to start home he found two chickens missing, and complained to Sink, who told him to take something of equal value. He selected a goose and started for home, but was overtaken by a party of eight Russians, who claimed the goose as their property. A wrangle ensued that attracted others to the scene, and soon a general fight was in progress, in which some twenty men were engaged. Two brothers named Johnston, who were passing, joined in the melee with knives. A Russian named Mayer was stabbed, and he in turn split Charles Johnston's head with a neck yoke, inflicting a fatal injury. The same weapon broke the arm of George Johnston, and knives were used to slash up three other Russians badly, but not fatally. The Americans found the force opposing them too strong and withdrew from the field. The wounded Russians were taken care of by their companions, and nothing could be learned from them owing to their clannish customs. The affair has created intense excitement in the neighborhood.

FIGHT WITH AN EAGLE.

The Thrilling Adventure of a Druggist in Bridgeport, Conn.

A Bridgeport (Conn.) despatch says: Fred. B. Hubbard, a druggist, had a battle with an eagle last night and after a severe struggle captured it. He was walking at the West End when suddenly he was almost knocked down by the huge bird, which lighted on his shoulder and buried its talons in his flesh. He grabbed the bird, which then fastened its great beak in his hand, inflicting a severe wound. After a lively tussle the bird was made to break its hold and was thrown to the ground. In an instant it jumped up and fastened its beak in the fleshy part of Hubbard's leg, just above the knee. Hubbard managed to get a firm grip on the wings of the bird and thus held it a prisoner. He has three wounds, but has the satisfaction of having captured a live eagle.

Ancient Advertising.

It is affirmed that the first newspaper advertisement appeared in 1642, during the civil war in Great Britain.

In Greece it was the public crier who announced sales or bid the people come to the theatre or visit the public baths.

In England the first printed advertisement was gotten up by Caxton, the celebrated printer, who announced the completion of "The Pyes of Salisbury," a book containing a collection of rules for the guidance of priests in the celebration of Easter."

The advertising card is of entirely modern origin, although the Egyptians, Greeks and Romans knew something about advertising. They accomplished the desired results through the medium of posters, as several bills, painted in black and red, were discovered on the walls of the Pompeian dwellings.

The first authentic advertisement was published in the Mercurius Politicus, of 1652. In the year 1657, a weekly newspaper, devoted to the interests of advertisers, made its appearance in London. It was not until the eighteenth century that newspaper advertising became the recognized medium between the manufacturer and the buyer.

Dr. Griffin's True Name.

The Victoria (B C.) Times says: "Col J. H. Mahoney, the San Francisco detective, has been in Los Angeles this week. He declared Griffin's true name to be Griffin la Blanche; that he was born in Cuba some 40 years ago. The detective showed a number of letters and other documents, which he said were La Blanche's private papers. Some of them are written in Greek. They were dug up in the yard in the rear of E. T. Byram's house, on C street, in Los Angeles. Mahoney states they were placed there by La Blanche when he fled from that city. It is thought that such documents dug up light may be thrown on the convict's many peculiar transactions."

Couldn't Stand Everything.

A San Francisco gentleman owns a dog, on whose collar he has attached the following legend: "I will not be responsible for the damage done to people who persist in discussing 'Robert Elsmere' in this dog's hearing. He can't stand everything."—N.Y. Tribune.

Did you ever see a battery take position? It hasn't the thrill of a cavalry charge, nor the grimness of a line of bayonets moving slowly and determinedly on, but there is a peculiar excitement about it that makes old veterans rise in their saddles and cheer.

We have been fighting at the edge of the woods. Every cartridge box has been emptied once or more, and one-fourth of the brigade has melted away in dead and wounded and missing. Not a cheer is heard in the whole brigade. We know that we are being driven foot by foot, and that when we break once more the line will go to pieces and the enemy will pour through the gap.

Here comes help.

Down the crowded highway gallops a battery withdrawn from some other position to save ours. The field fence is scattered while you could count 30, and the guns rush for the hills beyond us. Over dry ditches where a farmer would not drive a wagon, through clumps of bushes, over logs a foot thick, every horse on the gallop, every rider lashing his team and yelling, the sight behind us made us forget the foe in front. The guns jump two feet high as the heavy wheels strike a rock or log, but not a horse slackens his pace, not a cannoneer loses his seat. Six guns, six caissons, 60 horses, 80 men, race for the brow of the hill as if he who should reach it first would be knighted.

A moment ago the battery was a confused mob. We look again and the six guns are in position, the detached horses hurrying away, the ammunition chests open, and along our line runs the command:

"Give them one more volley and fall back to support the guns." We have scarcely obeyed when boom! boom! opens the battery, and jets of fire jump down and scorch the trees under which we fought and despaired.

The shattered old brigade has a chance to breathe for the first time in three hours as we form a line and lie down. What grim, cool fellows those cannoneers are. Every man is a perfect machine. Bullets splash dust in their faces, but they do not wince. Bullets sing over and around; they do not dodge. There goes one to the earth, shot through the head as he sponged his gun. That machinery loses just one belt, misses just one cog in the wheels, and then works away again as before.

Every gun is using short fuse shell. The ground shakes and trembles, the roar shuts out all sound from a line three miles long, and the shells go shrieking into the swamp to cut trees short off, to mow great gaps in the bushes, hunt out and shatter and mangle men until their corpses cannot be recognized as human. You would think a tornado was howling through the forest, followed by billows of fire, and yet men live through it, aye, press forward to capture the battery. We can hear their shouts as they form the rush.

Now the shells are changed for grape and canister, and guns are fired so fast all reports blend into one mighty roar. The shriek of a shell is the wickedest sound in war, but nothing makes the flesh crawl like the demoniacal singing, purring, whistling grape shot and the serpent-like hiss of canister.

Men's legs and heads are torn from bodies and bodies cut in two. A round shot or shell takes two men out of the rank as it crashes through. Grape and canister mow a swath and pile the dead on top of each other.

Through the smoke we see a swarm of men. It is not a battle line, but a mob of men desperate enough to bathe their bayonets in the flame of the guns. The guns leap from the ground almost as they are depressed on the foe, and shrieks and screams and shouts blend into one awful and steady cry. Twenty men out of the battery are down, and the firing is interrupted. The foe accept it as a sign of wavering, and come rushing on. They are not ten feet away when the guns give them the last shot. The discharge picks living men off their feet and throws them into the swamp, a blackened, bloody mass.

Up, now, as the enemy are among the guns. There is a silence of ten seconds, and then the flash and the roar of more than 8,000 muskets and a rush forward with bayonets. For what? Neither on the right nor left, nor in front of us, is a living foe! There are corpses around us that have been struck by three, four and even six bullets, and nowhere on this acre of ground is a wounded man. The wheels of the guns cannot move until the blockade of dead is removed. Men cannot pass from caisson to gun without climbing over windrows of dead. Every gun and wheel is smeared with blood; every foot of grass has its horrible stain.

Historians write of the glory of war. Burial parties saw murder where historians saw glory.—Chicago Tribune.

A Long Courtship.

For thirty-five years John H. Buttrick, of Lowell, has been courting Miss Catharine Teressa McEnry. Mr. Buttrick is the head of a drug firm; he is also in the railroad business, and, what is more to the point, is wealthy, as well as well connected. Miss McEnry is 50, is well educated, and it is said that when Mr. Buttrick commenced paying attention to her that she was beautiful and much sought after by the youth of the town. But after the waste of so much sweetness on the Lowell air, after the coming and going of so many years, after the fleeing of thirty-five summers, with their trysts and their kisses, and the alleged promise of Mr. Buttrick to marry her unfulfilled, she is naturally discouraged, and has sought redress for her wrongs and balm for her wounded heart in the law. She has secured the services of that gallant old warrier, General Benjamin F. Butler, and the demand is for $75,000 damages—a moderate amount to be sure; scarcely more than $2,000 a year for the time that the courtship has been in progress.

Sic Transit. . . .

A few days ago there died at Saint-Etienne an old man named Petroviski, Count of Blanckemberg in the Polish nobility. The aged foreigner was reduced to absolute beggary. He was born in Warsaw in the year 1789, and went through the campaign of Napoleon I., after which he occupied a position as engineer in the district of Lyons.—Figaro.

Very few persons ... that we had living in Windsor a granddaughter of that prominent character in the Revolutionary War, Benedict Arnold. The lady referred to was Mrs. Shipman, widow of the late Stephen Royce Shipman and daughter of Richard Arnold, eldest son of Benedict Arnold of revolutionary fame. She was born in the township of Augusta, near Brockville, Ont. Her birth is registered in her father's family Bible in his own handwriting, "Born the 25th January, 1814, Charlotte Arnold." She was the fourth daughter of a family of six daughters and three sons, all of whom grew to be men and women; but now only two sons and two daughters are living. The deceased, in her younger days, received a very fair education having attended the County School very near her father's residence. For the times this was considered a good school. Afterwards, with an elder sister, she went one year to a convent in Montreal. October 31st, 1837, she was married to Stephen Royce Shipman, and removed to the Township of Ramsey, where her husband was engaged in business at a small village then called Shipman's Mills, named after the father of her husband, but now the flourishing town of Almont. Mr. Shipman disposed of his interest at this place and removed to the County of Hastings, near Belleville, where he erected a grist and saw mill. He resided some seven or eight years there and then disposed of the mills and removed to Kingston and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He died very suddenly on the 9th of Dec., 1847, at his son-in-law's residence, Sarnia, aged 79 years, leaving a widow, three sons and one daughter. After Mr. Shipman's death the widow, with the family, moved to Brockville, where she had two brothers and other connections living. After the marriage of her daughter she removed to Windsor, where she remained a while with her son-in-law and daughter. She then purchased a house and lot and commenced housekeeping. The last two years her health has been failing, but no one supposed her end was so near. A couple of weeks ago, on the advice of her physicians, she was removed to Harper's Hospital, where it was thought the facilities for nursing and medical attendance were more suitable. Notwithstanding the best medical attendance and all that loving friends could do she quietly sank to rest on Thursday last. The Rev. John Grey, pastor of the Windsor Presbyterian Church, which the deceased attended, visited her at the hospital and administered Christian consolation during her illness. The funeral took place on Saturday from her granddaughter's residence, Windsor, to the Protestant cemetery.—Record.

The Miseries of High Life.

Mrs. Westend—Oh, such a time as I do have with nurses! I've discharged three this week for not keeping the children quiet, and it hasn't done a bit of good.

Mrs. Tiptop—I notice the noise from the nursery is terrible. Well, I have the same trouble, and my husband, who is getting deaf, actually refuses to be treated for it. I can't see what sort of creatures these child's nurses can be. They don't seem to have a bit of sense. I actually caught one buying cheap candy with her own money to keep the little angels quiet. Just think of the impudence of the thing—putting cheap candy into the delicate stomachs of my children. Well I said I'd discharge her if she repeated the offense, and what do you suppose she did next? Why, when they began to yell and kick at her for not buying them a locomotive and cars big enough to ride in she actually threatened to have their father whip them, just as if she, a common, ignorant nurse, had a right to keep their father, my husband, at her beck and call. No wonder the children laughed and then yelled louder than ever. Even they could see the effrontery of the thing.

Mrs. Westend—Well, I'd send her flying. Dear me! What a racket! Hark! Ah! I understand it now. That miserable creature who calls herself a nurse is trying to stand little Billy in the corner for something. Isn't it awful. Now, if she hits him I'll just send for the police—I just will. I shan't be contented with a simple discharge. It's high time these creatures were taught a lesson.

Mrs. Tiptop—I think so, too. No wonder the little dears learn to yell and kick and bite when they have such examples set them. They see it's a mere question of physical strength—brute force—of course they do. Why don't these nurses keep the children amused? That's what they are hired to do. Well, I must hurry, for I have an engagement at the intelligence office at this hour. I want if possible to get a nurse to replace the one I have now. Since dear little Bobby kicked her shins black and blue she has hated him so she won't buy any more candy for him, and it almost breaks my heart to hear the poor little fellow cry.

Philosophy Under a Lamp Post.

Not many evenings ago a sedate individual, braced up against a lamp post on Bold street, was heard to murmur softly: "Yes, health is valued only when one gets sick; if there was no poverty in the world, riches would be a drug; it is only when a man is in trouble that he understands the true value of happiness, and we would never realize the grandeur of the electric lights if we had none of these blamed coal oil lamps in the outskirts of the city."

Masonic.

Over $30,000 have been raised toward the new Masonic temple at Grand Rapids.

Masonry knows no bounds. A magnificent new temple for the fraternity has been constructed and dedicated at Kamloops, in the Rocky Mountains. The building is an imposing structure. It is 52x34 feet, and two stories high. The Grand Lodge of British Columbia conducted the dedicatory ceremonies.

Beginning the New Year.

"Come, hubby, you ought to take me to the theatre New Year's Eve, seeing you didn't give me any Christmas present," said a newly married wife to her husband.

"Nonsense; I've only got one ticket, and we don't want to begin the New Year squandering money. We must learn to economize, now we are married," replied the brute.

...coveries Came About.

Valuable discoveries have been made and valuable inventions suggested by the veriest accidents. An alchemist, while seeking to discover a mixture of earths that would make the most durable crucibles, one day found that he had made porcelain. The power of lenses, as applied to the telescope, was discovered by a watchmaker's apprentice. While holding spectacle glasses between his thumb and finger he was startled at the suddenly enlarged appearance of a neighboring church spire. The art of etching upon glass was discovered by a Nuremberg glasscutter. By accident a few drops of aqua fortis fell upon his spectacles. He noticed that the glass became corroded and softened where the acid had touched it. That was hint enough. He drew figures upon glass with varnish, applied the corroding fluid, then cut away the glass around the drawing. When the varnish was removed the figures appeared raised upon a dark ground.

Mezzotinto owed its invention to the simple accident of the gun barrel of a sentry becoming rusted with dew. The swaying to and fro of a chandelier in a cathedral suggested to Galileo the application of the pendulum. The art of lithographing was perfected through suggestions made by accident. A poor musician was curious to know whether music could not be etched upon stone as well as upon copper. After he had prepared his slab his mother asked him to make a memorandum of such clothes as she proposed to send away to be washed. Not having pen, ink and paper convenient, he wrote the list on the stone with the etching preparation, intending to make a copy of it at leisure. A few days later, when about to clean the stone, he wondered what effect aqua fortis would have upon it. He applied the acid, and in a few minutes saw the writing standing out in relief. The next step necessary was simply to ink the stone and take off an impression.

The shop of a Dublin tobacconist by the name of Lundyfoot was destroyed by fire. While he was gazing dolefully into the smoldering ruins he noticed that his poorer neighbors were gathering the snuff from the canisters. He tested the snuff for himself and discovered that the fire had largely improved its pungency and aroma. It was a hint worth profiting by. He secured another shop, built a lot of ovens, subjected the snuff to a heating process, gave the brand a particular name and in a few years became rich through an accident which he at first thought had completely ruined him. The process of whitening sugar was discovered in a curious way. A hen that had gone through a clay puddle went with her muddy feet into a sugar-house. She left her tracks on a pile of sugar. It was noticed that wherever her tracks were the sugar was whitened. Experiments were instituted, and the result was that wet clay came to be used in refining sugar. The origin of blue-tinted paper came about by the mere slip of the hand. The wife of William East, an English paper-maker, accidentally let a blue bag fall into one of the vats of pulp.—London Tidbits.

Cured of a Curious Delusion.

"That is a queer freak," said one of the newspaper men when the woman had departed, "but I know of a case stranger than that. It happened in my own family, and the victim of the hallucination was my uncle. He was a farmer and a wealthy man. When the war broke out he enlisted and fought bravely to the end. He had not been home six months when the strange fancy seized him that there was a small drum secreted in the top of his head and that he would never more have peace. He was sent to a private insane asylum. Except for this peculiar idea he was apparently as sane as you or I, and his conversation on any topic but this was rational. Finally the physicians hit upon a happy idea. They told my uncle that they would perform a surgical operation and take the drum out. So they had a miniature drum made, and one of them kept it in the palm of his hand where the patient could not see it. They then cut the scalp on top of his head until blood came, and the physicians pretended to draw out the drum through the top of his head, stitching the wound after doing so. My uncle was cured the minute he saw the drum.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Bricks for a Pillow.

A correspondent of the Shanghai North China Herald says that to the average Celestial it is a matter of indifference how long he remains in one position. He will write all day like an automaton; he will work from morn to eve without any variation, and apparently without any consciousness of the monotony. The Chinese school children will undergo any amount of confinement, unrelieved by recesses or changes of work, which would drive a Western pupil to the verge of insanity. Ever Chinese infants are said to remain as impassive as "mud gods." To the Chinese exercise appears to be superfluous, as they can sleep anywhere. With a brick for a pillow the "heathen Chinee" can lie down on his bed of stalks or mud brick or rattan and sleep the sleep of the just, with no reference to the rest of creation.

Remarkable Vigor For His Age.

Rev. D. Sutherland, Gabrus, C.B., writes to the Witness: "Malcolm McMillan, of Catalone, C. B., a native of Lochmaddy, North-Uist, Scotland, is 101 years of age; and all his senses are as good as when he was in his teens. A few months ago he cut and sewed a pair of milloloth trousers for himself. Last autumn he mowed away on the same field with his son, his grandson and his great-grandson and his day's work was equal, it is said, to the best of them. He was 40 years of age before he ever saw tea, and 43 before he ever put a tobacco pipe in his mouth. He never lost a tooth, and does not know what headache or toothache is. He is, best of all, a child of God and a Presbyterian, and has not been absent of the house on Sabbath for 20 years only to go to the house of God."

Going Down Hill.

Little Bobby—Don't you want to take me up to the toboggan slide with you some day, Mr. Jinks?

Mr. Jinks—I never go to any toboggan slide, Bobby; never even saw a toboggan.

Bobby (a trifle nonplused)—That's funny; I heard pa say something about your going down hill at a furious rate.

Jan. 17 1889

Forget-Me-Not.

A mother's last good-by,
A dear friend's parting sigh,
A message from on high,
"Forget-me-not."

A love which God hath blest,
A maiden's heart confest,
A soldier's last request,
"Forget-me-not."

A patriot's love of fame,
A sweet, familiar strain,
A poet's last refrain—
"Forget-me-not."

A wish all hearts contain,
A voice from o'er the main,
A echo back again—
"Forget-me-not."

Never More.

Far away from the world her heart throbs are stealing,
Over field, over mountain, over river and rill;
She heeds not the charm of their silent appealing,
She's wrapped in her musings, and it's peace be still.

Where is her lover? and what path does he follow?
Does he ever look back to think of her pain?
Does he ever look back from mountain or hollow?
With a sigh that he never shall meet her again?

Let her dream of him now in the light wind that passes
Over lilac and myrtle, where lingers his shade;
Let her dream of him now in the turn of the grasses,
Where once in his wooing his steps may have strayed.

Ah, proud was the glance that unkindly estranged them,
And secret the torture both hearts had to bear;
Was either to blame that a light word had changed them,
And pride was the mask weeping love had to wear?

Love's chain may be severed and its bloom seem declining,
As steps full of sorrow proceed their own way;
But the links and the bloom will live on repining
Till the hearts of both lovers are wrapped in the clay.

HUGH FARRAR MCDERMOTT.

Bare-Legged Ushers for Mrs. Langtry.

In her forthcoming production of "Macbeth" in New York city, Mrs. Langtry positively refuses to be dictated to by criticism or tradition. One of the novel features about the plan will be introduced in the front of the house. Behind the scenes Mrs. Langtry's will is supreme, but in the auditorium Manager Joseph Reynolds' authority has such weight that the actress has gladly accepted his suggestion that the ushers be clothed in Highland costume. Kilts, plaids, bare legs and claymores are to take the place of the neat little military jackets that they usually wear. Not only the ushers on the main floor, but those in balcony and gallery as well are to don the Scotch undress. Even the man who takes tickets at the door is to wear it, and the colored porter who guards the Broadway entrance is to do the same. These two are inclined to protest against the novelty on account of their innate modesty. They don't like the idea of being stared at.

"I'll go on de roof 'n' shovel snow," said the colored man of all work. "I'll walk de tight-rope across de stage. I'll play eny part dey axes me from de star down tu de super. I'll do enything Misser Reynolds say 'cep'n' prance roun' de front door wid my legs all naked an' bar. 'Tain't right to su'ject er gineiman to undignerty like dat en dese civilizin' times."

He is entitled to sympathy.

"Aren't you afraid that the 'gallery gods' will pinch the legs of the upstair ushers?" Mr. Reynolds was asked.

"Well, we thought of that," he replied, "but have come to the conclusion that there's no danger. You see, Mrs. Langtry never draws a gallery. It is mostly the fashionable people who go to see her. No, we are not afraid of being guyed by the 'gods.'"

"Any other novelties?"

"I can tell you of one. All the tiresome part of the witch scene is to be cut out of the play."

Mr. Reynolds expects that Mrs. Langtry will furnish a pleasant surprise to the public.

The Night Before Christmas.

It seems that Troy lays claim to the honor of having first published to the world that remarkable poem, "The Night Before Christmas." "The first rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church in that city," says a contemporary, "the Rev. David Butler, who resigned in 1834, had a daughter Harriet, who sometimes visited the family of Rev. Benjamin Moore, of New York, an eminent bishop of the Episcopal Church. On one of these visits she looked over the poems of his son, Clement C. Moore, who was a professor in the General Theological Seminary of his Church. She found the Christmas poem, which its author regarded as of no value, and carried it to Troy, where it was published in the Troy Sentinel, edited by Orville L. Holley. It was instantly copied by the press throughout the country, and has made the name of its author a household word in every home where the English language is read."—Rochester Union.

A Paradox.

"My son," said a mild parent, "it grieves me very much to see you keeping the company of worthless young spendthrifts. You should remember, my boy, that a fool and his money are soon parted."

"Yes, father," replied the prodigal, "I know all about that. But don't the fools still seem to have the most money in this world?"—New York Evening Sun.

—Underdone cake in the course of time will batter down any man's stomach.

"Zeb, the hermit fisherman," who lives a lonely life near Stonington, Conn., has amassed a fortune $50,000 from an annual income of from $300 to $500, which he has made from his fishing boat during the past forty years. He started with a capital of $90, which he invested in a dory, and his annual expenses, food and all, have rarely been more than $25.

Over twenty seizures of illicit tobacco have been made by Inland Revenue officers recently in Prescott and Russell counties.

—Young girls of 10 say that if they marry at all they will marry the best man to be found; but when their wedding day comes the "best man" is not the bridegroom.

—"Did you hear about the burglar who was arrested this morning?" "No. What for?" "For breaking into song." "Is that so?" "Yes. He got hrough two bars when some one hit him with a stave."

LADIES' COLUMN.

Household Suggestions.

Dark carpets do not need to be swept oftener than light ones, if you give them a good dusting say twice a week with a flannel cloth tied around an ordinary broom.

When one has been so unfortunate as to get machine-oil stains on white sewing saturate the piece of work in cold water immediately; soak for two hours, dry in the sun, then wash in the usual way.

If you are building, put the hooks in children's bed-room closets low enough to be easily reached by them. It is also a good idea to have a closet so arranged that sleds, rocking-horse and all large play-things can have a place.

Dust has such a sad way of insinuating itself wherever there is a place for it to lodge or work through that housekeepers are almost distracted to find brooms and dusters that will fit in every nook and crevice. A long-handled feather duster, a short-handled feather duster, a toy broom, a whisk broom, a flat bristle brush, a paint brush, and the ordinary cheese-cloth dusters seem to do all the dusting that is required if vigorously wielded.

Latest Fashion Notes.

Fur shoulder capes continue to be extremely popular for street wear. Embroidered and braided bands for cloth and woolen gowns grow in delicacy and elaboration of design.

The costliest wraps reach to the hem of the dress, and are lined throughout with fur or plush. White silk garters, clasped by a snowy daisy, or enamelled orange blossoms, are one of the details of bridal toilettes.

A boa of black fur, worn with a decolette toilette of black lace, forms a striking combination for an evening reception.

Some very rich black cloaks are made of black brocade in round peasant shape, with green plush fronts for their entire length, and green lining in the broad round hood.

Bonnets are chosen to match the cloak, instead of to match each gown. The low capote shapes, the toque and the round hat with projecting brim are the shapes that find most favor.

Sable on bonnets or round hats gives a touch of elegance, and sometimes forms the entire trimming. Fur and embroidery are almost as constantly seen now on bonnets as upon wraps.

In dull tones of red, emitting the fine odor of Russia leather, are walking and riding gloves imported from England. These can be made to order and will fit as the proverbial glove rarely does, delighting ever after by their durability and comfort.

The soft breast-feathers of turkeys, chickens, ducks, pheasants, with their delicate, well harmonized tones of brown, white, green and gray, are used in bands or as an entire covering for round turbans. Almost every shade of silk or velvet in the foundation combines with these soft colors.

Lace scarfs and boas in black and white are valuable accessories of the toilette. Black lace for street wear hides often some defect in a costume, softening the lines about the neck and falling in long, graceful ends nearly to the ground. After fashion has substituted some greater novelty these scarfs, if handsome in the first instance, become indispensable when going out of an evening without a bonnet.

Jet trimmings are more popular than ever.

India cashmere in white and light tints is a favorite cloth.

A pretty boa is made of soft green tinted flat ostrich feathers.

Fur panels on the skirts of street costumes appear to be growing more and more fashionable.

A tasty opera cloak is of white and gold brocade lined with pink plush and adorned with pink marabout bands.

Pale almond colored brocade or apricot brocade, made up in conjunction with golden brown, is a late French fancy.

The tendency is to dress the hair lower—in fact, the styles seem to require some hair on the neck, even when the chignon is high. The latest English and French fashion for younger women is to have the hair braided and arranged low on the neck in "twists" or loops, often tied with ribbons.

Hats, as we have already observed, have round flat brims, and are trimmed en couronne with tips of feathers.

Capotes of velvet or felt are larger than last winter; they have high borders and low crowns, and are much trimmed with feathers.

The chapeau is generally matched to the costume, the same material as the dress being employed for the capote or for the small toque, which is also much the fashion. If the material is a plain one, cloth or cashmere for instance, it is embroidered with beads or braided with small round silk cord of the same color. A bird and a bow of ribbon complete the trimming.

Two colors seem to divide popularity, dark green and navy blue, but the former predominates, and on dit that more of it has been converted into gowns and coats than any two other colors. Sometimes it is braided with black, or made up with black watered silk, trimmed with beaver or Astrakhan, or enlivened with a few touches in red. Some dressmakers call it directoire green, and say it is the same shade that was so fashionable during the early part of the century, while others call it watercress or laurel. Over black skirts, smart, light-fitting jackets of green cloth are worn, edged with a narrow binding of Astrakhan, with large revers of the same. Very large buttons fasten them.

The long Directoire coats, with the large square hip-pockets, cuffs and wide revers, are beginning to appear. They reach the edge of the skirt, all the fullness is clustered at the back, the front is open, and does not meet by at least a quarter of a yard, if not considerably more. This style is also fashionable for indoor wear. In fact, Directoire and Empire are the two styles of the season, and though people are hazy as to which is which, it is generally considered that the short-waisted look given by reason of broad folded waistbands, belongs to the latter. In most costumes, however, a connoisseur would probably see something of both styles, and few strictly correct.

The silks which have been selected for this winter season are of exceptional variety. Armure royal and morie have been blended in all colors, and large brocades in steel and black, green and black and other combinations bid fair to be universally worn. Russian velvet and corded silk is another novelty, and Pompadour chintz patterns on armure grounds and cream and gold. All these have been used for cloaks as well as evening dresses. One of the best Paris models of an opera cloak is a dead leaf brocade, trimmed with cock feathers; and many are made of the new Egyptian angola cloths with printed borders, white and grey, coral and white, beige and white, terra-cotta and white and other mixtures.

Deaf and Dumb Dancers.

The Deaf-Mutes' Union League gave a ball in Lyric Hall last night. A party of about 200 young ladies and young men attended it, and they formed a very happy and joyful company, notwithstanding the fact that nearly every one of them was both deaf and dumb. There was excellent music, and the dancers kept remarkably good time to it, aided somewhat by the vibrations of the orchestra and by watching each other very closely. The young ladies were excellent dancers. There was never a quieter ball given in the city. The sound of the human voice was rarely heard, but the dancers kept up a lively conversation for all that. The Union League is a club of 14 boys and young men who are either pupils at or graduates from the Institute for the Improved Instruction of Deaf-Mutes. At this school the articulate method is taught, but, notwithstanding this, one-half the proceeds of last night's ball will go to the Gallaudet Home for Aged and Infirm Deaf-Mutes at Wappinger's Falls, N.Y., which is named after Dr. Gallaudet, who was the great advocate of the sign system, which is at war with the articulate system.—New York Times.

Saved from an Earthquake.

Inscription on a tombstone in a burying-ground on the island of Jamaica: "Here lieth the body of Lewis Galdy, Esq., who died the 22nd of September, 1739, aged 80 years. He was born at Montpelier, in France, which place he left for his religion, and settled in this island, where, in the great earthquake in the year 1692, he was swallowed up, and by the great providence of God, by a second shock, was thrown out into the sea, where he continued swimming till he was taken up by a boat and miraculously preserved. He afterwards lived in great reputation, and was universally lamented."

Oddities of a Day.

Many workmen in a York (Me.) bleachery spent Christmas with both hands in slings. A new lime used in dye a few days before had so softened the skin of their hands that the blood burst through.

A man in Malton, Nev., tipped a couple of barrels of whiskey into a natural spring which flowed on his premises and invited all the ranchmen for miles around to come and see it. The next day he sold the spring for $10,000 in gold dust and fled the country.

A Physical Impossibility.

Young Charlie Gunther (whose pa rich)—Jack, she just rejected me, and actually think she is laughing in her sleeve at me!

Jack—Oh, she cawn't do that, deah boy. Her dwess is sleeveless, don'tcherknow?

His Choice.

Proud Father (showing off his boy before company)—"My son, which would you rather be, Shakspeare or Edison?"

Little Son (after meditation)—"I'd rather be Edison."

"Yes. Why?"

"Cause he ain't dead."

Sucked Before.

Little darling—That was a white sugar-almond I gave oo, Mr. Squeams. Does oo like it?

Crusty old bachelor (who is trying hard to swallow the dainty in question)—Very much, indeed, thank you.

Little darling—It was pink—once.

The Wrong Proposition.

"Well, my boy, he asked cheerfully at the breakfast table the morning after Cholly had taken the important leap, "how did things go last evening? Did she smile on your proposal?"

"No,' said Cholly, faintly, pushing away a breakfast roll. "She smiled at it."

A Modern Instance.

"Madame, are you a woman-suffragist?"

"No, sir; I haven't time to be."

"Haven't time! Well, if you had the privilege of voting whom would you support?"

"The same man I have supported for ten years."

"And who is that?"

"My husband."

A Hitherto Vacancy.

Miss Marigold—What's the matter, Mr. Pantley?

Mr. P.—I've got a very bad cold in my head.

Miss M.—I'm glad you've got something in it at last.

Regardless of Expense.

Nurse—We ought to have a piece of soft old linen to bind up Master Rupert's bruise.

Young mother (anxiously)—Ought we, Barker? (to under nurse) Jane, go right out and buy three yards of the finest old linen you can get.

It is denied that the Rev. Alexander Fownes Luttrel, who died recently at the age of 96 years, was the oldest Anglican clergyman in England. Archdeacon Philpot is 98 and the Rev. Bartholomew Edwards is 99 years of age.

It is a customary remark that wrinkles come from worrying, but a physician says most of them come from laughing.

—One of the most valuable lessons a man can learn is that the human family can get along very well without him.

—American experts claim that the addition of cotton seed oil to lard improves its quality for pastry cooks and is not an adulteration.

CURRENT TOPICS.

MICAJAH HENLEY, the man who invented roller skates, lives in Richmond, Ind. He was a poor wood-sawyer, and it took nearly his last dollar to pay for its patent, but the craze for skating that spread over the country made him rich.

DON'T swear at things up hill and down dale because your water pipe happens to be frozen, and hotly seek to thaw it out like that angry New York man who used gunpowder with more profusion than prudence. He is having a flat-on-his-back, oh-heavens-don't-it-hurt holiday season.

A WASHINGTON preacher is going on at a great rate about the Presidential inauguration ball which is to occur next March. He says that thousands of people in peacock costumes will hop around the hall. He is mistaken. Dancers haven't hopped for years and years. They all glide nowadays.

THE magnanimity of the male sex has again been shown. Two husbands in Galveston, Texas, discovered the other day that each had married the same girl. Instead of resorting to a court of law to decide the priority of claim, each one offered to resign in favor of the other. We are not told how the matter was settled.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD, author of the now famous novel, "Robert Elsmere," was born June 11th, 1851, on the Island of Tasmania, about 120 miles southeast of Australia. She is the eldest daughter of Thomas Arnold, M.A., of the University of Oxford. Her first book was a story for children, entitled "Milly and Olly." In 1884 "Miss Bretherton" appeared, and the heroine of the book is said to be Mary Anderson, the beautiful actress.

IT is probable, to say the least, remarks the New York Forum, that fully 90 per cent. of the whole body of people spend nearly all that they can earn; of this 90 per cent. a portion may be setting aside a moderate part of the small earnings, become the owners of a house, or become depositors in a savings bank, or insure their lives in a moderate way. Of the remaining 10 per cent. a part save enough to protect themselves against want in their later years, and a very small part may become rich, and then need not work unless they choose.

Odd Items from Foreign Shores.

Bismarck is now said to be "thin and bony."

The flower trade of London is estimated to amount to £5,000 sterling a day.

The cleansing of the marble arch has been finished, and now, to the disgust of the old Londoners, it is as white as though it had been painted.

The character of annual awards of literary prizes by the French Academy may be inferred from the fact that the gold medal was given this year to "Carmen Sylva," Queen of Roumania, for a poem.

The cause of women's rights in France has progressed to the point of the introduction of a bill to grant to trades women paying licenses the right to vote at the elections of judges of the tribunal of commerce.

The Paris Prefect of Police has bought a wooden horse, harnessed, and all candidates for cabmen must show that they know how to harness and unharness him, and pass an examination on whatever other tests the Prefect may propose.

"Why Do I Suffer So with headache and vertigo, doctor? I have a bad cough, too, and dull aches under the shoulder-blades; I'm losing weight, and am bilious all the time." The courteous physician answers: "If you inquire what is the cause of all this mischief, it is a torpid liver. That organ, you are aware, is the largest gland in the body, and its office is to carry off the waste of the system. When it fails to do its proper work, the refuse of the body is re-absorbed and goes circulating round and round in the blood, poisoning, not nourishing, the tissues. But why you continue to suffer in this way I am at a loss to understand, since Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery would give prompt relief, and future immunity from such attacks."

Brother's Present.

Mother—"What are you working at so industriously, my dear?"

Daughter—"I am making a smoking-cap for a present to brother."

"Why, he does not smoke."

"I know he doesn't, but I don't know how to make any men's things except smoking-caps."

Cure Your Catarrh, or Get $500.

For many years the proprietors of Dr Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are thoroughly responsible, financially, as any one can easily ascertain by proper inquiry, have offered, in good faith, through nearly every newspaper in the land, a standing reward of $500 for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy, which is sold by druggists at only 50 cents, is mild, soothing, cleansing, antiseptic and healing.

Ontario Government Appointments.

John Johnstone Anderson Weir, solicitor Galt, has been appointed a notary public; Mr. James Smith, farmer, of Chippewa, has been appointed Sheriff of Welland; Mr. James H. Coyne, barrister, St. Thomas, Registrar of Elgin, and Dr. A. B. Mallory, Registrar of East Northumberland.

—The phonograph will be a failure in one respect. Many wives will not recognize their husband's voices. The familiar alcoholic breath will be missing.

—When a strand of feminine hair gets entangled in a masculine scarf pin it does not require a very heavy step in an adjoining room to make two hearts beat as twenty.

Mme. Hess, of Paris, has refused £5,000 for her hair, which is six feet long.

There is in Sydney, Australia, an ancient spinster of 105. She has smoked for fifty years.

Ladies-in-waiting to the Queen of Italy are declared to be the most beautiful in all Europe.

—The skating season has opened—and the obituary editor fills his inkstand.

MARK TWAIN'S DAUGHTER.

She Kept a Diary Until She Suspected Her Father of a Mean Trick.

Mark Twain, if he is in a mood, will tell the story of his own courtship in a manner worthy of the greatest of living humorists. When he first met the lady who afterward became his wife he was not so distinguished as now; his origin was humble, and for some years of his life had been a pilot on the Mississippi River. The future Mrs. Clemens was a woman of position and fortune; her father was a judge, and doubtless expected "family" and social importance in his son-in-law. Clemens, however, became interested in his daughter, and after a while proposed, but was rejected.

"Well," he said to the lady, "I didn't much believe you'd have me, but I thought I'd try."

After a while he "tried" again with the same result, and then remarked, with his celebrated drawl, "I think a great deal more of you than if you said 'Yes;' but it's hard to bear." A third time he met with better fortune, and then came to the most difficult part of his task, to address the old gentleman.

"Judge," he said to the dignified millionaire, "have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzie and me?"

"What? What?" exclaimed the Judge rather sharply, apparently not understanding the situation, yet doubtlessly getting a glimpse at it from the inquiry.

"Have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzy and me?"

"No, no indeed!" replied the magnate, sternly. "No, sir, I have not."

"Well, look sharp and you will," said the author of "Innocents Abroad;" and that's the way he asked the judicial luminary for his daughter's hand.

Mark has a child who inherits some of her father's brightness. She kept a diary at one time in which she noted the occurrences in the family, and, among other things, the sayings of her parents. On one page she wrote that father sometimes used stronger words when mother wasn't by and he thought "we" didn't hear. Mrs. Clemens found the diary and showed it to her husband, probably thinking the particular page was worth his notice. After this Clemens did and said several things that were intended to attract the child's attention, and found them duly noted afterward. But one day the following entry occurred:

"I don't think I'll put down anything more about father, for I think he does things to have me notice him, and I believe he reads this diary." She was Mark's own child.—New York Mail and Express.

Never Heard of "Davy Crockett's Coon?"

That's queer! Well, it was like this: Col. Crockett was noted for his skill as a marksman. One day he levelled his gun at a racoon in a tree, when the animal, knowing the Colonel's prowess, cried out, "Hello, there! Are you Davy Crockett? If you are, I'll just come down, for I know I'm a gone coon." Just take a dose of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, and see how quickly your biliousness and indigestion will emulate the example of "Davy Crockett's coon," and "climb down." They are specifics for all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels.

A Samaritan.

"Young man," said the conductor, "tobacco chewing is not allowed in the ladies' car."

"I am not chewing tobacco," replied the young man, with some severity; "I am chewing gum."

"Well, for heaven's sake," said the conductor, pulling out from his pocket his box of Old Comfort, "here, take a chew of obacco.

—"How are you getting on in business?" asked a gentleman of a merchant. "I am having a hard time of it. Luck is against me." "How so?" "Didn't you hear how burglars broke open the shop and robbed my rival over the way. Just think of what a lot of free advertising he gets. It's telling on my business."

—The man with a big foot lasts longer than the man with a little foot.

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.

Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.

Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detroit, 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington, 1,316 at Boston, large classes of Columbia Law students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Prin. N.Y. State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from
PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

D C N L 2 89

SALESMEN We wish a few men to sell our goods by sample to the wholesale and retail trade. Largest manufacturers in our line. Enclose 2-cent stamp. Wages $3 per day. Permanent position. No postals answered. Money advanced for wages, advertising, etc. Centennial Manufacturing Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

DOMES
BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

FOR SALE,

A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,

WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR

All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the

TIMES PRINTING CO.
HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION;

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1 50 per annum when not so paid

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, JAN. 10 1889.

TO OUR READERS.

The first week in January is generally a critical period with publishers A large majority of subscriptions expire with the end of each year. Old subscribers, who, for various reasons feel that they are unable to subscribe for a paper, drop it for a time; new subscribers are added, and the subscription list is entirely rearranged. In our case this period has passed with a remarkably small loss of our old friends and a very satisfactory and substantial gain of new ones. The year begins with an enlarged subscription list, and we take this occasion to heartily thank old friends and new for their patronage. To retain this a publisher must furnish an interesting paper, and this we intend to do during the coming year. We have several innovations under consideration, and intend to materialize at least a portion of them. We would like to secure a few more correspondents in several neighborhoods. If those who can, will send samples of their correspondence, we will try and offer an inducement to make them regular contributors.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

Why should not Flesherton have a mechanics' institute? The benefits to be derived by such an institution are acknowledged by all. There are many young men in this village who are at a loss to know how they may most profitably spend their evenings. If a mechanics' institute were formed the problem would be solved. The government, too, have made it a very easy matter to secure this boon for our young people, by volunteering to grant the equivalent for every dollar subscribed by citizens, with an extra subsidy besides. It only requires ten individuals with their fifty cent subscriptions to start the ball rolling Several gentlemen have already expressed to us their full approval of the scheme. The editor of this paper will render assistance in every way possible if some one will only take the matter up. It can be done quite easily. Markdale has her library, and we are willing to state a good reputation that the public-spirited citizens of Flesherton are not behind those of Markdale when it comes to a matter of this kind.

At the Board of Trade dinner in Toronto, Sir John paid both himself and Mr. Mowat a pretty compliment in the following words: "I have a sort of a fatherly interest in the Parliament of Canada, because I sat at its cradle, and my good friend the Premier of Ontario, helped me to rock the cradle. (Loud cheers.) The bantling has grown to a healthy state of maturity. It has come fully to age this year, and I would not be a man if I stated that it has not also shown evidence of having come to years of discretion. But really if you will look back to the events of the last twenty-one years, I think all those who were concerned in laying the basis of Confederation and in carrying out legislation under the constitution which was given to us in 1867—I think you will find all those who acted as legislators or as members of the Government of Canada and its legislatures up to the present date, you will have cause to be satisfied with them."

Some Americans have been playing sharp on English speculators of late. The Americans claim to have invented a new process for refining sugar by electricity, which would revolutionize the whole system. The Englishmen dropped their nickels into the slot to the tune of one million dollars, and then found out that the scheme was bogus. Our spmpathy with the Englishmen is not of a nature to cause an unnatural flow of tears. They place too much confidence in the infallibility of everything American, and when they do ocassionally get nipped it impels us Canadians to stick our thumbs in our sides and roar.

Sir John Macdonald spoke at the Toronto Board of Trade dinner on Friday evening. From reports in the daily papers we discover that there were no "croakers" present—everybody was satisfied with Canada's prosperity. This is passing strange when we remember the startling announcement in American newspapers that Canada was ripe for slaughter! Where are the cowards now who would have given us away? They are slinking into their little holes, one, by one, and very soon will be as extinct as the dodo. Could not Dr. Wilson secure a specimen for the University College museum before they become things of the past.

Municipal Elections.

Monday was a remarkably quiet day in Flesherton. We missed the election. The township clerk sat and sucked his thumbs and ruminated on the immutability of Artemesia electors. Would-be-scrutiners walked around with a dumpish cast of countenance, but the electors themselves looked cheerful, for they had saved the township a considerable sum by dispensing with an election. The citizens of Artemesia township recognize competent men when they see them. Other constituencies waged war among themselves, in the old orthodox style, while we looked calmly on and smiled. The fight in Osprey was warm, but Mr. Gamey once more gained the victory. Returns from surrounding towns and townships give the following results:

OSPREY.

Reeve, Thomas Gamey. Deputy Reeve Daniel K Preston. Councillors—John Spears, Joseph Taylor, and Wm. Monahan.

EUPHRASIA.

Reeve, Gilray; Deputy Reeve, Fawcett. Councillors—Stuart, Patterson and McNight.

PROTON.

Reeve, Roger; Dep Reeve, McMillan. Councillors, Shaw, Black, Corbett.

COLLINGWOOD.

Mayor, Lockerbie. Councillors—H. Evison, G. Henderson, John Duncan, H. Foreman, Thos. Bassett, Frank Telfer, James Guilfoyle, W. A. Hogg, A. McDermid, John Chamberlain.

DURHAM.

Mayor, D. Jackson, jr.; Reeve, N. McIntyre, Councillors—North Ward, L. Elvidge, C. McKinnon, A. D. Mackenzie; East Ward, H. Rose, A. Todd, H. W. Mockler; West Ward, G. Kross, jr., R. Bull and J. Barker.

MEAFORD.

Mayor, Jas. Cleland; Reeve, Agnew; Deputy, McIntosh. Councillors—Carson, Graham, Gibson, Badgerow, Sing, Barber.

OWEN SOUND.

Reeve, J Chisholm; Deputy Reeve, W. MacLean. Councillors—Centre Ward, S. Lloyd, J. Ravon, J. W. Redfern; River Ward, R. Taylor, J. Armstrong, R. Malcolm; Bay Ward, J. E. White, J. Riley, J. M. Davis.

DUNDALK.

Reeve, Hanbury; Councillors—Phillips, Nixon, Cornett and Morrow.

MARKDALE.

Reeve, J. McFarland. Councillors—John Ford Wm, Lucas, Wm. Brown, Angus Plewes. School Board—John Lyons, W. A. Brown, E. Rutledge, Wm. McLoughry, Jas. Mercer, W. Lucas.

An Organ Case.

Division Court is being held in Flesherton to-day, Thursday, when the famous organ case of Connell v. Brander is to be heard. This case has quite an interesting history. Mr. Connell is an organ agent living in Owen Sound. About a year ago he disposed of an organ to Mr. Brander, residing in Priceville. After having made the purchase, Mr. Brander countermanded his order, but in the meantime the organ had arrived at Flesherton Station, where it was destroyed in the late fire. Connell brought suit in the Division court here against Brander for recovery of value but decision was given against him. The case was appealed and came before the Queen's Bench in Toronto, from whence it was referred back to the division court for readjudiction.

Voting on a bylaw in Collingwood to raise $55,000 for waterworks and electric light and a bylaw to raise $20,000 for a new Town Hall took place Monday. The first was carried by a majority of 234, the latter by 186.

Rev. Mr. McKay, of Edinburgh, preached his first sermon in Canada on Sunday last in the Presbyterian Church here.

Mr. John Hales has opened out a flour and feed store next door to the post office. If you need anything in this line interview him.

A letter received from Master Wesley Armstrong gives the information that he has severed his connection with W. F. Doll, Esq., of Winnipeg, and is going into business with Mr. John Aikenhead, at Virden, Man, a town about 200 miles west of Winnipeg.

Bro. Fawcett, of Streetsville, spent several days of the past week in Flesherton. The Streetsville Review could not be recognized now by old subscribers of a year ago. It is away in advance of anything they have ever had there before. The business men appreciate it, too, and rush in their advertisements in a manner that tells emphatically on both sides.

Personal.

Misses Annie and Lizzie Richardson left on Monday to attend the Collegiate Institute at Owen Sound.

Master John Duncan of Toronto was home this week on a visit.

Miss Martha Beatty has gone to Meaford, where she purposes attending school.

Miss Nettie Merrick has gone to Toronto, where she will reside for some time.

Miss E Brown, the obliging post-office assistant, has been off on leave of absence during the past week. She was visiting with her sister, Miss Esther Brown, of Priceville, who has discarded a single life by taking, for better or worse, Mr. Alexander Muir, to be her lawful wedded husband, which interesting ceremony was performed yesterday. We tender congratulations to the happy couple.

R. T. of T.

The following are the officers elected for the term commencing January 1st, 1889: Bro. D. Blair, S. C.; Sist. E. Gordon, V. C.; Bro. J. G. Anderson, P. C.; Jos. Smith, Chap.; Bro Robt. Keefer R. S.; Sist. M.E. Smith, Ass't. R. S.; Bro, A. A. Chesley, F. S.; Wm. Barnhouse, Treas.; Sist. M. E. Ganton, Herald; Bro. Wm. Heard, Guard; J. I. Keefer, Sentinel.

Sunday School Meeting.

At the annual business meeting of Flesherton Methodist Sunday School, held on Thursday evening, Jan. 3, the following officers were appointed for 1889: J. W. Armstrong, Superintendent; M. Richardson, assistant Superintendent; J. W. Armstrong, Treasurer; Frank Sullivan, Secretary; Geo. Smith, assistant Secretary; Wm. Clayton, Wm. Barnhouse, Librarians; Teachers—J. W. Armstrong,—Wright, M. Richardson, W. H. Flesher, Wes. Lattimore, J. Smith, Ed. Richardson, Wm. Strain, Mrs. J. W. Shilton, Miss Christoe, Mrs. Gjerdrum, Miss Bellamy, Miss Lizzie Armstrong, Miss M. Richardson, Mrs. J. Smith, Mrs. M. Richardson, Miss Blakely. Committee—Dr. Christoe, Wm. Strain, W. J. Bellamy. John Breen, Thos. Granger.

Sleepless nights, made miserable by that terrible cough. Shiloh's is the Remedy for you. For sale at the Medical Hall.

General News.

The feeling between the races in Mississippi continues high.

The annual convention of the Dominion Alliance will meet in Temperance Hall, Temperance street, Toronto, on Tuesday and Wednesday, Jan. 22 and 23.

The coroner's jury returned a verdict on Tuesday, declaring Dr. Valentine, Allie Wilkinson and J. O. Wood accessories to the death of the girl Lydia Charlton in Toronto.

The different candidates for municipal honors in the town of Aylmer met on Thursday, and by "head or tail" with a coin elected the mayor and council.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

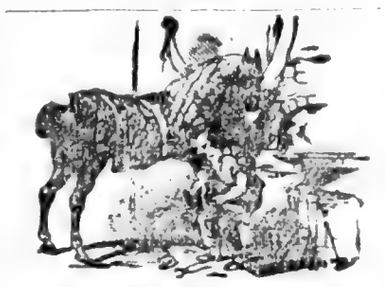
Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 50 to	5 56
Fall Wheat	0 95 to	1 00
Spring Wheat	0 95	1 00
Barley	0 40	0 55
Oats	0 32	0 32
Peas	0 55	0 57
Butter	0 17	0 17
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 25	6 75
Hay per ton	8 00	10 00
Hides	3 50	4 00
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 7	0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 06

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

J. P. OTTEWELL,

VETERINARY SURGEON.
Graduate of Ontario Vet. College,
RESIDENCE ON COLLINGWOOD STREET
Sixth Door East of Presbyterian Church.
FLESHERTON.



D. McTavish,

HORSESHOER AND
GENERAL BLACKSMITH,
Collingwood Street,
FLESHERTON, - ONT.

Manufacturing of Wagons, Sleighs, Buggies, Democrats, etc. Horseshoeing promptly attended to. Special attention given to contracted or tender feet.

Logging and Plow Chains constantly on hand.

TENDERS WANTED.

The school trustees of S. S. No. 5, Flesherton, will receive tenders up to, and including Saturday the 19th inst., for the cleaning, dusting, and lighting of fires for the year 1889. Tenders to be left at Dr. Christoe's office.

Farms to Rent!

IMPROVED and UNIMPROVED

FARMS FOR SALE.

Apply to
J. W. ARMSTRONG
Flesherton Jan. 7th, '89.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SPECULATE,

as west Toronto Junction is booming. Manufactures are flocking in. Graham, Whitby, Real estate Brokers, 972 Queen St. West Toronto have a few more lots on very easy terms at the old prices, which will double in value in one year. Call or write for particulars.

Great Barga ins!

—ON—

VILLAGE and FARM PROPERTY.

S. Damude offers for sale west half of Lot 16, Con. 9, Euphrasia, the Talbot farm 100 acres, nearly all cleared and under cultivation; $2,000, $500 cash, ballance can remain on mortgage at 6 per cent.

Markdale Property.

Dwelling house and shop on Mill St., corner lot, $900.00.

42 acres in the TOWNSHIP of ARTEMESIA Brick house and good barn, adjoining VILLAGE of FLESHERTON, $1,600. For further particulars apply to S. DAMUDE, Flesherton.

OWEN SOUND COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.

RE-OPENS MONDAY, JAN. 7th

The Best Equipped School in the Province

A staff of seven specialists

RECORD, 1888.

ALL the pupils of the Institute who tried the University Examination were successful Four passed the Examinations of the first year, two obtaining honors and one a proficiency scholarship. Four matriculated, three with honors. The candidates from this school at the Departmental Examination received a larger number of Teachers' Certificates than did those of any other school in the Province. Five received First Class; thirty-three, Second Class, and thirty-two, Third Class. At the Art School Examination the Students of the Institute obtained three hundred proficiency certificates the largest number received by the pupils of any one institute. One pupil tried the Primary Examination of the Law Society and succeeded.

For further information apply to
F. W. MERCHANT, Principal. D. R. DOBIE, Sec. of Board.

—It Pays To—

Go to THE BEST

AND THAT IS THE

Northern Business College,

OF OWEN SOUND.

The best and most practical course of study
The best teaching talent.
The best accommodation for students.
The best methods of instruction.
The best results from that instruction after students graduate.

For annual announcements giving particulars regarding the course of study, terms &c., address
C. A. FLEMING, Principal.
Owen Sound, Nov. 1st, 188

NOTICE!

SHINGLES constantly on hand and for sale cheap. Just put in first-class new Chopping Mill—now bring along your grain and get it chopped up in short order.

J. B SLOAN,
Eugenia.

GEO. MITCHELL,

BAKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Bread, Buns, Pies, Cakes, Rolls, Tea Biscuits, &c.

Medical.

DR. CARTER,
M.C.P. & S. ONT.
PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.
FLESHERTON.
Office, Strain's Block. Residence J. G. Russell's.

J. G. Hutton, M.D.C.M.

Member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Ontario.

Enquire at office, one door east of Grieve's Store or Atkinson's Hotel.

Priceville, Nov. 19, 1888

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.
SURGEON DENTIST
Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the R.C.D.S.,

Will visit FLESHERTON, Meighan's Hotel 1st and 2nd of each month. Teeth extracted, inserted on Rubber, in the most styles of the art, and at moderate rates.

Residence, 347 Sherbourne St., Toronto.

J. P. MARSHALL,
L.D.S., DENTIST,
Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.
Flesherton each trip on the day following.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,
Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer,
Office, Strain's Building, Flesherton.
V. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer
Resident Manager.
MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P. McCULLOUGH,
Barrister, Solicitor, &c.
Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,
FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.
DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER in B.R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent for purchased sale of lands. Appraiser for C. L. C. Com and F. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. Issuer of MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.
AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES
On Town or Farm Property,
S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton.

W. J. BELLAMY.
TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.
CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT, &C
DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance effected in first-class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule,
POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any pary of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,
The Tinsmith, - Flesherton
Repairing, Eavestroughing, and in fact everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts.

Christmas 1888.

Flesherton Furniture WAREROOMS.

SPECIAL ATTRACTIONS FOR THE HOLIDAY TRADE.

—A—

Nice Selection

—OF—

Reeds and Rattan goods consisting of Gents', Ladies' and Misses' chairs, work baskets, foot-rests, ottomans, Bassenetts, etc.

See these goods and enquire prices when you are selecting your

CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

We have some very handsome

—AND—

Lowpriced

PARLOR and BEDROOM

SUITES.

Bedsteads, Mattresses and Bed Springs.

CHEAPER THAN EVER.

All Kinds

—OF—

REPAIRING

—AND—

PICTURE FRAMING

PROMPTLY DONE.

All goods carefully packed and delivered a reasonable distance.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND A FULL SUPPLY OF

CASKETS

—AND—

BURIAL CASES, ETC.

A GOOD HEARSE IN CONNECTION

For The Advance.]

Beelzebub and the Editor.

Several years ago I was engaged on the staff of the Hammersmith Vidette. That paper is not running now, and the town of Hammersmith has been incorporated as a city under a different name; therefore you are excusable for your ignorance as to the whereabouts of the place or of the brilliant literary talent that flowed forth in the columns of the Vidette. I say I was engaged on the paper, and it is mainly to rescue my own name from oblivion, and claim the honor due me as one of the literary lights of that sheet that I write this little reminiscense. From a pecuniary point of view my position was not an enviable one. Gentlemen who dropped in on business called me "Bub," but the foreman generally prefaced it with "Beelzy." I did not like the latter title, especially when given the plain, everyday name for old Beelzy, and in fact no one but the foreman dared use it around there.

The editor of the Vidette was a young unmarried man, probably 28 years of age. He was the whole reportorial staff, editor, manager and proprietor condensed into one, and he discharged the onerous duties of his position to my entire satisfaction, with one exception: he wouldn't disburse on pay day.

One afternoon Miss Edith Dobie, a handsome young lady, daughter of our town clerk, called on the editor, to solict missionary aid. She had never before visited our office, although her father was a patron of the paper and half supported it by placing all the town printing and his own (for he was land and insurance agent, bailiff, auctioneer, money-lender, etc., as well as town clerk) in the editor's hands for execution. I was closeted with the proprietor when this vision of loveliness entered, trying to persuade him to disgorge my previous week's salary, which amounted to $2. I had not been successful. This was the period of my service when I first became aware of the editor's susceptibility to any of the finer emotions of the heart. It was a decided blush that mantled his cheeks, and his embarrassment was almost painful. I was quite astounded when he pulled out a wad of money and gushingly tendered Miss Dobie a ten dollar bill. He then handed me my salary and I departed for the press room to scrub rollers.

From what I had seen I decided that the editor must be in love with Miss Dobie, and it was not long after this that my suspicions were verified very unexpectedly. Hurrying into the sanctum one day on an errand from the foreman, a particularly strange sight met my view. The editor was on his knees upon the floor, with hands clasped, while before him on a chair stood the waste basket, which he was apostrophising with an earnestness and determination that left no room for other mundane sights or sounds, much less my entrance. I listened attentively for a few moments. He was ranting away in a sickening manner about, "loving his darling to distraction," and so on. In the midst of one of his maudlin sentences I brought him to his feet with a suddenness that must have come near unjointing his vertebrae by shouting:

"Coal Oil."

"The Devil!" yelled the editor.

"Yes," said I, "the foreman calls me that sometimes, but you, as a gentleman, ought to be ashamed to call a boy names when you know it hurts his feelings. I shall tell pa."

"There, there, Samuel, never mind my boy." I will not do it again. I was just placing some waste papers in the basket; you may take it outside and empty it."

Now, of all the numberless duties devolving upon the office boy, that of emptying the basket is the least onerous. He takes a fiendish delight in conning over discarded contributions from literary fanatics, and offers from quack medicine vendors for advertising contracts at a rate that wouldn't pay for the ink in which they were printed. On this day, however, I found something more to be prized than all the riches which this cornucopia of mine had heretofore produced. It was the following letter, written in the editor's best style:

MY DEAR MISS EDITH,—I fear you may consider me bold in writing to you the words which I am about to pen. At no time in my life have I experienced so much trepidity in performing any duty as the one which I have voluntarily placed upon myself at the present moment, and added to my present difficulties is the fear that you may construe this letter as an evidence of cowardice, when it is only a desire to escape the possibility of hearing your sweet lips form the word "No." I want you for my wife, Edith, and if it is possible for you to be happy with me, delay not in sending a few lines to relieve the tantalizing suspense I have been laboring under for some time. Believe me, darling,

Yours devotedly, etc.,

By a strange coincidence, I also came across another note addressed to Miss Edith Gowan, a young lady who was attending high school and much given to writing love-sick poems for the paper, which seldom appeared. She evidently labored under the idea that the editor had nothing to do but revise and rewrite her manuscript. It was a scather. In it the editor informed Miss Gowan that "she aspired to a position which she could never occupy with any credit to herself," and several other sentences quite as severe. Possibly he concluded it was too severe, and threw it where my eagle eye observed it. As for the first letter, I understood perfectly how the editor had wavered for a long time between the ultimatum of writing and proposing in the othordox way, and how he had at last decided upon the former, and then, not quite satisfied, had proceeded to rehearse his part before the basket, where I disturbed him.

The finding of these letters overwhelmed me with emotions peculiar to good fortune. It tickled me more than the granting of a half holiday. It pleased me more than would a a ticket to the circus or a raise in salary, for I knew there was a mine of fun in them if the claim was properly worked. But I didn't work it properly. What gaurdian fiend of boyhood is it that always causes a boy's innocent jokes to turn out so disastrously for himself and everyone else? Acting upon the innocent desire for a little fun, I forwarded the letters to the respective ladies for whom they were intended, at least I thought I did, but subsequent events proved that the similarity in their names had led to a transposition of the two missives. In other words, Miss Gowan received the love letter and Miss Dobie got the "scather."

On the following day I was holding "copy" for the editor while he read proof of a quarter-sheet bill, when the door was suddenly burst open and the town clerk rushed in with a riding-whip in his hand and a tornado working on his face which immediately belched forth hail-stones of weight sufficient to knock the editor senseless.

"Look here, you vile maligner!" shouted Mr. Dobie, "what do you want by insulting my daughter in the way you have? You think she is not good enough for you, eh! My daughter! And she has been aspiring to the position of your wife, has she!"

"Mr. Dobie, I I"—said the editor.

"Aye, aye, is it, you villainous scoundrel! And what brought you around my premises so often for the past month? Was it the attentions she was paying you, you miserable puppy!

"I—I"—said the editor, faintly.

"Oh, you cowardly sneak, I'll make you sorry for this. I came here to horsewhip you, but that would be too easy, and I have something better! You have been living and prospering on my patronage heretofore, but I'll—"

The sentence was completed as he slammed the door after him and I did not hear all of it.

After his departure the editor staggered to a chair and fell into it. He seemed to require a rest, for his legs shook under him with a genuine ague vibration. I never witnessed such a ghastly, sickly and woebegone expression on any man's face as the experience of the last few moments had cast over his. It equalled in ghostliness that of the Laocoon or the Dying Gladiator, and there was a dazed and glassy expression about the eyes that made me fear of his sanity. I was petrified at thought of the terrible mistake I had made.

And then, before we had recovered from our stupefaction, there came a soft tap at the door and the high school miss stepped in. The editor did not glance up, and seemed not to hear her entry. I could feel my hair rising as the young lady skipped over to his chair and threw her arms about his neck. I moved towards the door when she stooped down and kissed him. That kiss awoke him from his lethargy and placed him on his feet like a flash.

"The devil!" he shouted. Ah, I beg pardon—

"Yes, it was me," I screamed, as I slid out the front door and swiftly but sadly wended my way home.

At the end of two weeks I heard that the editor had a breach of promise suit pending, brought by Miss Gowan. Then I went and explained confidentially to Miss Dobie the said mistake I had made. She laughed and cried in one breath when I explained to her my scheme for undoing the mischief.

The day of the trial arrived and I was in court. So was miss Dobie and her father. Miss Gowan's council produced the letter which had been quoted. It was all the proof they required and they rested their case upon it. The editor had no evidence in rebuttal, and things looked mighty blue for him. At this point I said:

"Mr. Judge, I know something about that letter and I wish to depose."

I was sworn, and stated as clearly as possible the facts that I have here chronicled. I also produced the letter originally intended for Miss Gowan and read it aloud, but before its completion plaintiff and her friends had all left the court-room. The Court was convulsed with laughter. The town clerk and the editor departed arm in arm, and I presume the preliminary draft of an agreement was drawn that day; at all events the Vidette was sold one week afterward, and the vendor took a half interest in the business of the town clerk, which, I presume, must have been a better paying one than the paper, as there was a bridal tour when the wedding came off.

SAM STUBBS.

—NEW—

FALL GOODS!

—AT THE—

Central Store, Priceville.

Having received our Fall Stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have confidence in a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well bought article.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and is a superior thing good and serviceable for Men and Boys wear.

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

still command unapproachable value. Our stock is good Goods and Low Prices. Call and see us.

Central Store, Priceville.
A. McCABE.

PRICEVILLE BAKERY.

A. WATSON!

Desires to inform the public that he can furnish

CAKES AND PIES

To Order.

FIRST CLAS BREAD ALWAYS ON HAND.

I visit Flesherton twice a week—on TUESDAYS and FRIDAYS, with a full supply of goods.

DROP A CARD IF YOU DESIRE ME TO CALL.

WEDDING and FANCY cakes a specially.

A. WATSON,
Priceville.

FLOUR, FLOUR,

STONE FLOUR!

MR. P LOUCKS

Is prepared to do your Gristing on short notice and grinds on the old terms of every twelfth bushel. Seven cents per bag of two bushels for Chopping, done every day. The Little Mill is big in the estimation of the public.

Satisfaction Guaranteed.

P. LOUCKS, Proprietor.

Good stabling for horses.

$85 Solid Gold Watch. Sold for $100, until lately. Best $85 watch in the world. Perfect timekeeper. Warranted. Heavy Solid Gold Hunting Cases. Both ladies' and gents' sizes, with works and cases of equal value. One Person in each locality can secure one free, together with our large and valuable line of Household Samples. These samples, as well as the watch, we send Free, and after you have kept them in your home for 3 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property. Those who write at once can be sure of receiving the Watch and Samples. We pay all express, freight, etc. Address Gibson & Co., Box 413, Portland, Maine.

FREE

FLESHERTON Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Binders,	Grain Drills,
Reapers,	Broad-cut Seeders,
Mowers,	Spring Tooth Harrows,
Rakes,	Iron Harrows,
Wagons	Two-Furrow Gang Plow,
Buggies	Plows,
Sleighs,	Scufflers,
Cutters,	Turnip Drills,
Fanning Mills,	Land Rollers,
Spring Tooth Cultivators.

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT and PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

THE PEOPLES GREATEST INTEREST

Is where can they get their flour, feed, and provisions cheapest in town.

IT IS AT BLACKBURN'S.

All kinds of meal always on hand.

TO THE FARMERS AND PUBLIC GENERALLY:

HOT COFFEE and GOOD LUNCH:

at all hours of the day, ONLY 15 cts. All other lines in stock as usual.

The peoples faithful servant,

G. H. BLACKBURN.

Remember the place—Next door to M. Rich & Co's.

New Hair Dressing Parlor.

Mr. W. J. NELSON, having opened out a new barber shop and hair dressing parlor, in

Moore's Block, Durham St.

is prepared to attend to all work in his line, and would invite patronage.

Hair cutting, shaving, sharpening razors, etc., all done in the highest style of the art.

W. J. NELSON.

THE BEST IS CHEAPEST.

Farmer's Advocate & Home Magazine

Every farmer should read the leading and only independent publication devoted to his business. Thousands say there is none equal to it, and no dollar expended from the farm returns so much good. It treats on all branches connected with the farm, and is highly prized by the ladies and children; it has saved many a farmer from the loss of his farm; it has saved the farmers millions of dollars by checking the introduction and spread of contagious stock diseases; it has increased the receipts from our cereals by millions of dollars. Commended by City and County Councils and Agricultural Societies. Agents wanted. Sample copies free. Price $1 per annum. Address FARMER'S ADVOCATE OFFICE, London, Canada.

SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN ESTABLISHED 1845.

Is the oldest and most popular scientific and mechanical paper published and has the largest circulation of any paper of its class in the world. Fully illustrated. Best class of Wood Engravings. Published weekly. Send for specimen copy. Price $3 a year. Four months' trial, $1. MUNN & CO., PUBLISHERS, 361 Broadway, N. Y.

ARCHITECTS & BUILDERS Edition of Scientific American.

A great success. Each issue contains colored lithographic plates of country and city residences or public buildings. Numerous engravings and full plans and specifications for the use of such as contemplate building. Price $2.50 a year, 25 cts. a copy. MUNN & CO., PUBLISHERS.

PATENTS may be secured by applying to MUNN & Co., who have had over 10 years' experience and have made over 100,000 applications for American and Foreign patents. Send for Handbook. Correspondence strictly confidential.

TRADE MARKS.

In case your mark is not registered in the Patent Office, apply to MUNN & Co., and procure immediate protection. Send for Handbook.

COPYRIGHTS for books, charts, maps, etc., quickly procured. Address

MUNN & CO., Patent Solicitors,
GENERAL OFFICE: 361 BROADWAY, N. Y.

A "Bargain" Lesson.

All supper time had Mr. Tart
His wife's high spirits eyed;
Her air of being extra smart
No good to him implied.

She seemed as bursting to reveal
A secret just immense,
And when he, hurried, left his meal
Her joy became intense.

Then, with a glad, triumphant shout,
And victory on her face,
She gayly brought some bundles out
Of their safe hiding-place.

"Now, husband! see my bargains, here,
She cried in guileless glee;
"I've saved you fifty dollars, dear;
Won't you be proud of me?

"Look at these curtains—all marked down
From dollars twelve to eight;
These blankets, costing ten down-town,
Were six—just feel their weight.

"These vases, almost given away—
This dress, ha f value, too;
These other things—'twas bargain day
John, I can beat a Jew!"

Poor Mr Tart looked blue and grave;
At last he slowly said
"Where you he fifty dollars save
I can't get through my head."

"Why, John how easy! They'd have cost
You double what I paid;
It takes a woman never lost
In bargain time, to trade."

Next night John brought some bundles, too;
The duplicates exact
Of what his wife had purchased through
Her woman's bargain tact.

And, spreading them upon the floor
He bade his treasure (?) say
What they had cost him at a store
That had no bargain day.

Then while she speechless, gazed dismayed,
He, with a wicked laugh,
Showed that the bargains she had made
Cost him—a man—most half.

H. C. Dodge in Detroit Free Press.

MY LADY TONGUE.

By Amelie Rives, Author of "The Quick or the Dead."

"Have you really worn that trinket all this time?" he said, with more of curiosity than any other emotion apparent in his voice.

"Certainly," said Judith stiffly. "You were very good in sending it to me, and I was very rude to you."

She got suddenly to her feet and stood in front of him.

"Cousin Phil," she said in a quick vibrating tone that he had never before heard her use, "I began three letters to you about that, but I was ashamed to send them. I was afraid you would not read them. I was sorry—I—I am sorry," she ended under her breath.

There was a pause, but before he could speak, she had turned back the sleeve of her gray gown from her pretty, blue-veined arm, and had unfastened the dull gold links with their sapphire settings.

"Here," she said, holding it out to him; "I—I ought not to have kept it. I—always meant—to return it to you."

"Did you?" said Boughton, in a somewhat curious voice.

He allowed her to put the bracelet in his hands, and stood turning it about in the glow from the fire which made daylight in the big blue stones.

"Of course you don't expect me to keep it?" he said at last, looking up at her.

"Why? why?" she said, rather blankly.

"Oh, well, because I like to fancy you more consistent than other women, perhaps. You knew it wouldn't be very consistent to tell me that you were sorry for a rudeness in one breath, and then to commit another in the next. Would it, now?"

"I—don't understand," said the Lady Tongue, who seemed all at once to have forfeited her claim to that title.

"Why, you see," Phil went on slowly, "it isn't very civil to return a gift. May I put it on for you?"

She stood perfectly silent for fully a moment. There was no sound save from the softly crackling fire. Then she held out her arm. As he slipped the bracelet back into its place he said, quietly:

"That was a very pretty custom among the Jews, was it not?—the custom of having betrothal bracelets."

"Did they?" said Judith, indistinctly.

"Why, you must have read of it. The lover put on the bracelet and then pushed back his sweetheart's veil for the first time. Your hair is like a veil, Judith."

"Is it?" said Judith.

There was a hammering at her ears, and his voice came to her indistinctly. She felt that he was drawing her nearer and nearer to him by the arm that he still held, then his hand was on her hair pushing it back from her temple and eyes. Then his mouth upon her mouth.

She seemed suddenly to break from a spell. She pushed him from her with might and main, and stood apart, shuddering but erect.

"You—you—think that you have only to command, Sir Oracle," she said in a steady voice. She even smiled a little. Then she took off the bracelet and laid it on the table between them.

"I cannot wear it," she said, very clearly. "And dad will be wanting me now. Good night."

She was gone, and Boughton stood for several minutes with his chin set in his thumb and forefinger, looking down at the pretty blue and gold kickshaw.

It was just three days after this that a rather lively skirmish took place in the Mill-Meadow

It was an encounter between Boughton's men, who were on their way to join General—— at Gordonsville, and a regiment that had lost its way in following.

* * * * *

The popping of rifles went on for some two hours, and then Judith could stand it no longer. She rushed out of the house with her father's field-glass, and stood on the top of a little hill near the ice-house, trying her best to make out how things were going.

She was as white as the fold of the little cambric kerchief crossed over her bosom. There was a horrid weight in her heart, an aching almost past endurance in her throat. She stood there for some moments, but could see nothing for smoke.

All at once she noticed the figure of a man running, in bold relief against the broad snow-fields beyond.

A strange panic got hold of her. What was about to happen? He came nearer and nearer, and she saw first that he had lost his cap, and then that he had no sword. Nearer he came, and nearer. He was a splendid runner, at all events, and what was very strange, he seemed to know the approach to the house quite well. As he came to the great clump of catalpa trees which grew on the hill-side just below the ice-house, he struck out to the left.

Suddenly Judith gave a cry. The field-glass dropped at her feet. She put up her hands to her throat, and again that terrible cry broke from her.

Twilight was setting in, but she had seen his face quite clearly. It was Dick—Dick her brother, her father's only son—Dick, the pride of her heart—her soldier—a Virginian. She stood for an instant, her eyes never moving from the copse into which he had darted, and in that instant she had made up her mind.

She rushed to a log cabin some twenty yards away. Uncle Eden was inside; the poor old fellow had sprained his wrist badly some days ago, and he was sitting alone over the smouldering fire with a corn-cob pipe in his mouth.

A moment later he was following Judith down to the copse.

"Dick!" called the girl softly; "Dick! answer; it is I—Judith."

He came after awhile, sullen and blood-stained. There was a bullet-scratch across one of his soft cheeks, and a lot of blood about him here and there.

"What's the matter?" he said, sharply. "How did you know that I was here? I have been wounded."

"And so have I—and so have I!" said the girl. Then she took his arm into both her hands. "Dick," she whispered, keeping his eyes with a look which haunted him for many a long day, "I saw you running."

"Well?" he said, with an attempt at bravado. "What of that? I expect if you take the trouble to look, you'll see many a poor devil running before the day's over."

"I saw you running," she said again, in that strange whisper.

Then she threw herself on the ground before him and got hold of his cowardly knees.

"Oh! darling," she said, "oh! my darling. Go back—go back—go back. No one will ever know. You can say you came to get a horse. There is Hautboy—take him and go back. Quick—quick!"

He stood there, ghastly white under the red stains on his face, with his sullen brows drawn down.

"I tell you I'm wounded," he said. "I've been shot twice in this arm."

"Twice!" she cried. "If it were twenty times, what matter? Oh! Dick——"

"It's my bridle arm," he muttered.

"Your bridle arm? What! you stand there and tell me that? You—whose father has ridden to hounds many and many a time with his right hand so crippled with gout that he had to wear it in a sling? Oh! we are wasting time so. Come—come on—Eden's here. He will have Hautboy in a minute. Come, Dick! Come, darling Dick!"

Then he turned on her. He wrenched himself free from her hands, and stood scowling down at her.

"I will not!" he said, with shut teeth, as she herself sometimes spoke. "You think it's very grand, don't you, to come and bully a fellow with one arm helpless, to get on a great fiery steed like Hautboy and ride into that devil's mess down yonder? That's the way women are brave! Oh, yes—pushing men forward into all sorts of danger, and then playing the coward under cover of their own petticoats. Yes, I say——"

"Stop!" said the girl. She got to her feet, but looked at him no longer.

"Uncle Eden!" she cried.

He stepped forward, his black face taking on that strange ashen hue which is the synonym of pallor in a negro.

"Come with us," she said, once more speaking to her brother.

"What are you going to do?" he burst out querulously. "If you think you're going to force me into going, I'll be —— first!"

"Oh! coward—coward!" she said with a very mirthless smile. And then again, "Coward!"

It went through his very marrow. But he took no step forward.

"Come," she repeated. "Don't—don't be—afraid!" she smiled again. "I only want you to come to Uncle Eden's cabin, where you will be—safe!" Again the smile.

Then he followed her. Once inside of the cabin, she turned sternly upon him.

"Take off your uniform," she said. "I am going for Hautboy. Uncle Eden will stay with you."

"What—what are you going to do?" he gasped, staring at her.

"I'm going in your place. Don't sneer; I mean it. Have off your uniform by the time I come back."

He did not in the least believe her, but he took off his clothes as she bade him, more out of a sort of sullen curiosity than anything else. He wanted to see how far she would go.

In ten minutes she was back. He handed her the uniform with a sort of laugh, and she took it without a word and went down into the copse, leading Hautboy, who was saddled with a man's saddle. Half way there she turned and called the old negro, who stood the picture of misery just outside the cabin door.

"Uncle Eden," she said. She took his horny hand and held it between her soft palms. "I'm really going. He doesn't believe it, but I'm going. It—it's the only way. My father, Eden. Oh! dad—dad!" Then she went on quietly again. "I want you to get him off if I'm hurt, you know—well—killed. Either way there'll be room for him to start over. If I'm killed, and they bring me back, don't tell any one. Have me buried for—him. If they wonder about me, never mind. The other would kill dad. That's all. Good by, dear Eden."

She put one soft arm about his black neck, drew down his loyal old woolly pate, and kissed him twice. Then she went, and left him sobbing as though his heart would break.

It was a soundless gallop over the new-fallen snow, past so many familiar places and objects. Now came the old mill, now the barn, now the spot where she and Boughton had climbed the straw stacks that other December day. Now the leap over the mill-stream. She noticed that the marsh-mallows seemed abloom again, with their brown cups full of snow.

Suddenly there was a flash to one side. A sabre lying on the snow. There was blood on it. Ah! the one Dick had thrown away, of course. She dismounted and took it into her hand, and got up again. The blood was stiff with the keen air, and did not come off when she grasped the hilt On and on. Nearer and even nearer that harp, incessant sound. She had ridden as often on a man's saddle in her childish days as on any other, and she had a light, beautiful seat in her boy's clothes.

Ah, yes! there they were. How the smoke hung in the air. Some crows actually flew cawing away, as she rode under the dead sycamore tree where they had their nest. Nearer, nearer, nearer. That was what Hautboy's hoofs, as they suddenly struck the frozen road, seemed to say to her.

Then all at once came something close by her ear. The sound of a wasp alighting to sting. Another and another. Then she realized what it was. She was within range of the rifles. A bullet stung Hautboy's ear and he reared a little.

Suddenly he swerved sharply aside. They had nearly ridden over something that lay on the ground. Something huddled, and dark, and small-looking in a gray uniform. A sort of horror got hold on her; she looked back at it again and again, as she rode on. Then came another and yet another.

Then some lying in this way and that, and across one and another, and then, somehow, she was in a whirl of smoke, and of noise, and of leaping blades, and Philip was beside her. And he, too, had lost his cap, and there was a great ugly gash all across his cheek, and he was saying:

"Dick; You? Thank God! thank God! I thought you were killed. Come on—this once will finish 'em," and then she was rushing on with Philip, and on, and on, and on——

And then it was red as though blood had been poured into her eyes, and she could see it. And then golden as though with a great sunset. And then came darkness unutterable, and the noise as of a thousand rivers about, and above, and underneath her.

When Boughton rode up to Carylon, with Dick, as he thought, on the saddle in front of him, old Eden was the first who met him, and in spite of all his agony (for he thought the boy was dead) Philip couldn't help noticing with a dull sort of wonder, how the old man had aged since yesterday.

He shook in every limb, as he followed them upstairs, and then, when Boughton had laid down his burden on the bed in Dick's room, turned and shut the door, and went and fell on his knees besides the bed, and got hold of the coverlet with both hands, panting rather than sobbing, like one who has run a long way.

Boughton stood it as long as he could, walking up and down the room, forgetful of exhaustion in his tremendous excitement, then he came and sat down on the edge of the bed, and put one hand on the old man's shoulder.

"Don't—don't, Eden," he said, unsteadily. "He died so gallantly—poor little chap—I didn't know it was in him," he added, in a hushed voice.

Then cried the old man, lifting up his shaking hands with a certain uncouth majesty:

"Fo' Gord, suh, you must' know—you mus' know. I oyarn stan' tuh heah yuh call huh dat. Oh! my little miss—oh! my honey! Marse Phil, suh, she tole' me not tuh tell, but you mus' know, suh. Hit's right—Hit's right. Oh! Marse Phil, dat ain' Marse Dick, dat's Miss Judiff herse'f herse'f!"

"What?" said Boughton.

His blood stood still in his veins. There was one instant of absolute nonentity for him. And before he could speak again there rushed in and past him a wild figure, and flung itself on the bed, and moaned and wept and called the name of "Judith" many times. And this pale figure had Dick's pale gray eyes, and the eyes of the figure on the bed were closed. Also there was much red of blood in the red-brown curls.

And when at last the poor, repentant craven had swooned for very grief and horror, Boughton pushed him aside with his foot, and calling him "hound," added an ugly word back of his teeth.

But when the women came to dress her again as a maiden, he was kneeling there beside her with his face upon her hand—and they thought that he, too, was dead.

* * * * *

So the days wore away, and it was Christmas eve again, when the doctor, coming from Judith's room, said that for the first time he could tell them to "hope." On Christmas morning, she turned her sweet face with recognition toward the half-curtained window, and said:

"Don't I hear the bells, dad?"

He answered "Yes." It was all that he could say, the dear old colonel. And then she said, "Why, it must be Christmas day?" and this time he could only nod. So she asked him to draw the curtain, and lay very peacefully for a little space, looking out at the saffron glare of the weather glim, behind the network of the tulip trees just outside her window. After awhile she spoke again. Just one word this time.

"Dick?"

Then when he came in, his poor, weak features working piteously, she took him to her soft breast and crooned over him, being too weak for speech. And after many words he whispered:

"Oh! Judith, darling, you have given me something I never had in my life until now."

And she said:

"What, dear boy?"

Whereat, bending his face in her pillow, he sobbed out:

"Courage."

Then she reached for him with her thin, little hand, and here is what she said:

"I am so glad, dear boy. It's the only Christmas present I can give you," and she smiled at him, and kissed all of his face that she could reach for the pillow.

And that evening she asked to see Philip.

He came and took her hand without saying anything, but she could hear the clamor of his heart as he knelt close beside her.

"Phil," she said, "I—I thought you might have a Christmas gift for me? Have you?"

"I would have gotten you a thousand if I had known," he began; but she stopped him.

"Isn't there—the—the bracelet?" she said, not looking at him. "I would like it very much. I don't know whether it would stay on——"

He rose white, even to his lips, and went and fetched it. Then as he took her hand to put it on, he said:

"Judith, you know what this means?"

"Yes," she said, "and I—I have something for you, Phil; not much, but I thought you might like it, you know."

"Anything that you will give me I will appreciate," he said, "if it's only the ribbon that has tied your shoe. Tell me, what is it?"

Then said my Lady Tongue, making a sweet outward gesture with her little, slender arm:

"It is—it is myself."

They were married before he rejoined his regiment, and even the cruel war did not divide them; but Dick was shot at Gettysburg, and they said that no lad in all the South had ever died more bravely.

THE END.

FRENCH WOMEN DEFENDED.

At last a distinguished Frenchman has done himself honor by breaking a lance in defence of French women. In the Fortnightly Review for December the venerable Jules Simon undertakes to combat the false impression resulting from a failure to distinguish between Paris and France. The Parisian woman, he says, is one thing and the French woman another. But he insists that the Parisian woman is misjudged and maligned because the writers for newspapers, the writers of fiction and temporary observers in Paris paint her and describe her as she is in the Bohemia to which they penetrate, and not as she exists in the home life of the great city. The women of France, taken all in all, are as virtuous as the women of any other country, and they are the mainstay of religious influence. Their domestic virtues, their thrift, their business capacity, are beyond all praise. Their greatest weakness is their vanity. The restraint exercised by women upon the national tendency to irreligion is illustrated by an anecdote:

M. Cousin told me once a saying of Louis Philippe. In 1840 there was a quarrel between the Jesuits and the University; it was the old struggle between belief and unbelief, which takes every possible shape according to the spirit of the age, and, according to the period, shows itself in petty persecutions or in massacre. There had been a long discussion in the Cabinet. "Above all," said the King, as he rose to go away, "do not get me into hot water with my good queen." M. Cousin made fun at it; but he was wrong. Almost every Frenchman says as the King said, "Don't get me into hot water with my good queen." For my part I commend them, because I do not want to get into hot water with this "good queen," and I congratulate them, because this influence which they feel prevents them from yielding to the influence of sectaries, which would break up society if allowed to do as it pleased.

M. Simon concludes his paper with the following impressive statement:

The evil from which we are suffering is not a degraded state of morals, a condition which I do not believe exists. It lies in the attempts made on two sides, by the Socialists and the Jacobins to unchristianize France. My opinion is that they will not succeed, and for the last three or four years a powerful reaction has set in against them. But if they did succeed, above all, if they went so far as to take away from our women the support of religion, then, I admit, we should have to bid farewell to morality; not that it is impossible to construct a moral system without the support of a religion, but because this purely philosophical morality is only intelligible to great intellects, and exercises absolutely no influence upon the masses. The evil which we must fight against lies here, in the politics of the present day, it is not in the great mass of the nation, which is religious as well as virtuous.

Death of a Veteran.

The London Times says: "The death is announced of Mr. Jonathan Alexander, of Edinburgh, who was present at the battle of Waterloo. He was born at Edinburgh in 1799, and came of a fighting family, his grandfather having been with Colonel Gardiner at Prestonpans, while his father was an officer in the 26th Cameronian Regiment. Mr. Alexander joined the 52nd Regiment in the end of 1814, and in May, 1815, accompanied the troops from Ostend en route to Brussels and Waterloo. His regiment was in General Picton's division at Quatre Bras. Subsequently volunteering into the 66th, he accompanied that regiment from Portsmouth to St. Helena in October, 1815, and he remained in the island as one of the guard of the fallen Napoleon until his death in 1821. He used to speak of the anxious care with which the deposed emperor was watched and guarded. In 1822 Mr. Alexander formed one of the guard at Holyrood Palace, on the occasion of George IV.'s visit to Scotland, when the Scots Greys were also on duty. He received his discharge in 1838, since which period he had resided in Edinburgh. He had a fund of anecdote respecting the celebrated men whom he had seen, or with whom he had been thrown in contact.

Put His Foot in It.

"Can it be possible she's your daughter," said old Swank, "I declare, madam, I thought she was your sister."

"No, sir!" said madam, tickled beyond control. "She is my daughter, I assure you."

"Well, she certainly looks old enough, madam."

Love's Labor Lost.

"Tommy," said the teacher, sternly, "your writing is wretched; it is nothing but a scrawl."

"Well, what's the use of learning to write at all," asked Tommy, "when they are inventin' writin' machines almost every day?"

Says Oliver Wendell Holmes: "Many years ago, in walking among the graves at Auburn, I came upon a plain, upright white marble slab, which bore an epitaph of only four words, but to my mind they meant more than any of the labored descriptions of the surrounding monuments: 'She was so pleasant.' This was all, and it was enough. That one note revealed the music of a life which I knew and I asked nothing more"

"Holmes says: 'Poverty is a cure for dyspepsia.' Do you believe that?" "I can't say, Bromley. I've never had dyspepsia."

TWO ABSENT-MINDED MEN.

Conversation Heard in a Theatre Between the Acts.

"Now, be sure not to forget," said a lady, playfully shaking her finger at her escort as he arose to stretch his legs between acts and, turning to a lady friend, exclaimed: "He is so absent-minded."

"Does he forget your letters and errands?"

"Oh, no, indeed; he is so absent-minded I never intrust any to him. But he forgets me. Why, only last week he went out between the acts and never returned. I went home alone and found him peacefully smoking his cigar before the open fire, quite oblivious of myself and the theatre. I was very indignant, but when I began with tears in my eyes, 'How could you go off and leave me so?' the whole occurrence seemed to flash upon him. He sprang to his feet declaring he had been worrying all the evening about something he had forgotten, and so overwhelmed me with loving protestations that I couldn't talk to him very seriously."

"How sad! I wonder if all men are so afflicted? My husband is. Why, I remember one day he arose from the dinner table and, feeling a slight uneasiness in his eyes, began operations upon them with a toothpick, nearly destroying his sight."

"How unfortunate!"

"Yes; and one night I asked him to replenish the fuel in the grate, and in a fit of abstraction he brought in a hod of water and poured it upon the fire, scalding himself and bringing ruin to everything."

"O-o-h, how perfectly awful! But I hadn't begun to tell you the worst about my husband. Why, it was only a week after our marriage, while walking down Woodward avenue arm in arm, he so far forgot himself as to imagine he had an extremely burdensome bundle under his arm, and he offered a newsboy a quarter to carry it for him.

"'But war's your bundle, mister?' the little fellow inquired. And, will you believe it, my Benedict deliberately turned me over to the small boy, and I was so mortified—"

Her voice was drowned by the orchestra. —Detroit Press Press.

He Refused to View the Corpse.

Recently Mr. Troutbeck, the coroner for Westminster, was about to hold an inquest at St. James Vestry Hall, Piccadilly, when a gentleman practicing as an accountant in Regent street claimed exemption from serving on the jury on the ground that he was 67 years of age and a little deaf. The coroner having explained that that was not a sufficient excuse, the gentleman said he thought a man of his age should not be subjected to "these little annoyances." The coroner said it was not a little annoyance at all; it was the performance of an important public duty.

At this injunction the gentleman declared that he had never seen a dead body in his life, and that he would not look at one if the coroner swore him in.

The coroner—You must act according to your oath and conscience.

The gentleman—I have no conscience in the matter. I shall not look at the body.

The coroner—You must behave yourself, or I shall order you to leave the court.

The gentleman—I shall be delighted. I am not bound to look upon a thing I have never seen.

The other jurymen were then sworn, the gentleman in question remaining seated.

The coroner—Will you be sworn?

The gentleman—No, I object to be sworn. I have never seen a dead body, and shall not look at one now.

The coroner—Do you refuse to serve?

The gentleman—If you tell me I am compelled to by Act of Parliament, I will be sworn.

The coroner—You are compelled by the Act of Parliament.

This did not satisfy the gentleman, who still retained his seat and refused to be sworn.

The coroner—Do you refuse to kiss the book?

The gentleman—I will if you give me a clean one.

The coroner—Leave the room, sir, at once.

The gentleman then left the court, at the same time warning the coroner's officer to keep his hands off him.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Looking After the House.

"Good-bye, dear," said the wife to her husband as the train stood in the station. She was going to the country to spend a few weeks, and he was to remain behind to look after the house.

"Now don't leave the house alone at night any more than you can help, will you, dear?"

"No, of course not."

"And see that the shutters are lw s fastened."

"Yes."

"And feed the bird."

"To be sure."

"Don't forget to have the butcher leave a little fresh meat each day for Fido."

"I'll see to that."

"Leave the upstairs windows open as much as you can, won't you, dear, but don't let any rain beat in."

"I'll be careful about that."

"Write to me often and tell me how everything is getting on."

"Of course. I must get off, the train is going to start."

"Well, good-bye."

"Good-bye."

Then he went to the house, looked it up, and engaged rooms at a hotel.

A Good Reason.

First Tramp—I wish I was President of this country for jist one day?

Second Tramp—What for?

First Tramp—For the salary, of course. —Terre Haute Express.

Glasgow's Underground Railway.

Glasgow, Scotland, will build a second underground railway 7 miles long, 26 feet wide and 18 to 23 feet below the surface, with the steepest grade at 60 feet a mile, at a cost of about $5,600,000 on which a return of 6 per cent. is expected.

Take Your Choice.

"I am looking for a fashionable overcoat."

"All right, sir. Will you have it too short or too long?"

...at on Isabel.
...say, from day to day,
...cise intent he went;
...nd badinage,
...ure, and not a sign
...notive or design,
...race of sentiment.

Now, Isabel, who liked him well,
Was fain to hasten Lionel
In proper way, to plainly say
Exactly what intent he meant.
For persiflage and badinage
Amuse one, but they give no sign
Of matrimonial design,
If unalloyed with sentiment.

So Lionel, it soon befell,
Observed a change in Isabel,
She turned away from trifles gay.
Her manner, coy but gentle, lent
To persiflage and badinage
A subtle meaning, and a sign
Of something—if 'twere not design—
Decidedly like sentiment.

Thus Isabel contrived so well
That, pleased and flattered, Lionel
Became one day, her willing prey;
For knowing not her bent, he went—
Left persiflage and badinage—
And plumply said to her, "Be mine!"
Since then, 'twere fair to state, in fine,
No lack there is of sentiment.

The Dying Year.

Now the blustering blast is blowing
Through the street,
And 'tis snowing, snowing, snowing,
And the sleet
Is a-slithering through the ways
Where the waggons and the drays
Soon give way to gaudy sleighs,
As is meet

And the boys who go to school
Gayly glide
O'er the slippery, icy cool,
Glassy slide,
Which that valetudinary
Mortal with the step unwary,
And whose nerves are somewhat scary,
Can't abide.

Now the mothers and their daughters
Don the fur
And go shopping—winter's slaughters
Ne'er deter.
From these signs he who is adept
Must one certain fact accept,
That we've reached ye month yclept
Decem-Ber.

Not a Bad Rejoinder.

(Toronto Mail.)

The following was sent by a lawyer to an editor:

I slept in an editor's bed last night,
When no other chanced to be nigh;
How—I thought—as I tumbled the editor's bed
How easily editors lie.

The journalist, equal to the occasion, sent him the following reply:

If the lawyer slept in an editor's bed
When no lawyer chanced to be nigh;
And though he has written, and naively said,
How easily editors lie!
He must then admit, as he lay on that bed,
And slept to his heart's desire,
Whate'er he may say of the editor's bed,
'Twas the lawyer himself was the lier.

Heigh-Ho the Holly.

Sing "heigh-ho, my children, dear,
Sing heigh-ho the holly!"
We will say good-by to the old, old year,
And greet the new with a shout of cheer,
Singing "heigh-ho the holly, the holly,
Here's to the green holly!"

With holly sprigs the pudding crown,
Sing "heigh-ho the holly!"
Roast the big turkey, so juicy and brown,
And load the tables with dainties down,
Singing "heigh-ho the holly, the holly,
Here's to the green holly!"

Oh, hang high the mistletoe,
Sing "heigh-ho the holly!"
With evergreen leaves and berries like snow
Under it let the true lovers go—
Singing "heigh-ho the holly, the holly,
Here's to the green holly!"

Pile the blazing yule logs higher,
Sing "heigh-ho the holly!"
Dance shadow dances before the fire,
Dance little maidens, and never tire
Singing "heigh-ho the holly, the holly,
Here's to the green holly!"

Then fare ye well, you good old year,
Sing "heigh-ho the holly!"
You gave us the smile, you gave us the tear,
But now young eighty-nine draws near,
And we must be ready to welcome him here,
Singing "heigh-ho the holly, the holly,
Here's to the green holly!"

The Garret.

With pensive eyes the little room I view
Where in my youth I weathered it so long;
With a wild mistress, a stanch friend or two,
And a light heart still breaking into song;
Making a mock of life and all its cares,
Rich in glory of my rising sun,
Lightly I vaulted up four pairs of stairs
In the brave days when I was twenty-one.

Yes, 'tis a garret—let him know't who will—
There was my bed—full hard it was and small—
My table there—and I decipher still
Half a lame couplet, charcoaled on the wall.
Ye joys that time hath swept with him away,
Come to mine eyes—ye dreams of love and fun!
For you I pawned my watch, how many a day,
In the brave days when I was twenty-one.

Let us be gone—the place is sad and strange—
How far, far off these happy times appear,
All that is left to life I'd gladly change
For one such month as I have wasted here—
To draw long dreams of beauty, love and power
From fount of hope that never will outrun,
And drink all life's quintessence in an hour,
Give me the days when I was twenty-one.
—Beranger.

Crow's Feet Under the Lily's Eyes.

Those who saw her off the stage during her recent visit here tell me that even Langtry, the lily, is a trifle passee. Age is beginning to tell, and, notwithstanding her wonderfully fine complexion, there are wrinkles forming about her eyes and she is beginning to show a tendency towards embonpoint. Alas, that it should be so! but the hardships and dissipations of a stage life are not conducive to the welfare of physical beauty.—Louisville (Ky.) Post.

Principle Above Interest.

Mrs. Malaise—"Doctor, I beg you will not deceive me about my case. Believe me I am prepared to hear the worst."

Dr. Bismuth—"Well, then, madam, frankly there is nothing the matter with you whatever. You should try some other scheme besides ill-health to make yourself interesting."

The Test of Matrimonial Success.

One who knows says that it is not the proper thing now to exhibit wedding presents except to immediate relatives and intimate friends of the family. This, we believe, is all wrong. If the presents are not exhibited, how is a fellow to know whether the marriage is a success or a failure?

No Surprise to Her.

Miss Beauty—Do you remember that French count who followed me from place to place, and declared he was dying of love for me? Well, his family has put him in a lunatic asylum. Rival belle—I am not surprised. I always did think he was crazy.—New York Weekly.

...ues of London.

The annual banquet of the thieves of London, given the other day by the St. Giles' mission, was a most brilliant affair, says the New York Sun. The Lord Mayor bravely presided, in defiance of the old proverb. To this banquet, rare par excellence, none but thieves fresh from jail are admitted, except, of course, the members of the mission and their friends. The mission has a curious history. It was founded about twelve years ago by a thief nick-named "Fiddler," who abandoned his old profession and took to religion for a living. Since that time it has increased in power and usefulness. Every morning when the doors of the four prisons of London are opened to let loose the individuals who have discharged their debts to society, members of the mission come forward and invite the crooks to breakfast. Out of 18 000 of these worthies set free in 1887, 15,200 accepted the invitation. At the close of the repast a temperance pledge is presented to the guests, which they may sign or not, just as they choose. About one-third of the number sign the pledge, and about one-fourth of that third keep it. The mission furnishes money, tools and clothes to the crooks who display sincere intentions to lead better lives, and it finds employment for them, too. At the banquet in question about 200 guests sat down to table. There were some queer faces among them, and their costumes defied description. The ate in silence—that is to say, without speaking—but the rattle of their knives and forks during the engagement gave noisy evidence of their appetites. Gradually the din subsided, until there were only a few stray rattles left, like the close of a well-sustained infantry fire. Then the speeches began, but the members of the truly silent profession held their tongues. The Lord Mayor's speech was interesting. He said that ten years ago the population of the prisons of London numbered 20,833. It is now reduced to 14,536, and he attributed the reduction to the work of missions like that of St. Giles. When His Lordship left the banquet hall he felt for his watch, and he was happy to find that it was there.

How He Played Lady's Maid.

Mr. Goodman, in the sudden absence of his wife's maid, attempts to help her on with her new winter dress.

He—You just see if I can't help you just as well as that blamed English maid. Confound it, after I've helped you once you'll be wanting me to all the time, see if you don't.

She—Well, put it on carefully now over my head. Look out for my hair; I don't see what possessed me to put it up before I put this thing on, though I couldn't have raised my arms, I suppose, afterward. Look out, there's a hook caught in my hairpin. For heaven's sake, Charles, get it one way or the other, I'm stifling and my hair will all be down. There, now, that top steel is too high and the cushion interferes with it. Suppose you could get the cushion out? Rip it, pull it, anything! Don't you see it's 8 o'clock? Got it out? Can't you do it? Pull it, I tell you! All right. Now see if it looks too flat. Well, hook it then. Yes, you can, too, it's only a patent hook. Snap it! There, now, hold it so I can get my arms into the sleeves—not way up there—do you take me for a contortionist? Oh, I never can get those sleeves on; grab hold of the arm-hole with both hands, Charles, and give it a good pull up onto my shoulder; tell me if it begins to burst; does it? The veins in my hands will burst, I believe—open that window, will you—there now—give me the ends of that belt, will you; don't tell me, Charles, that you've twisted the waist, and I've got to take it off again! Why, how could you have been so stupid? Where were your eyes? No, you can't pull it off that way—pull it off just as you do a glove—there, now, do exert yourself to get it right this time. Open that window a little wider will you? What is the matter—caught something? Well, never mind. Unhook your watch, and let the chain hang on the dress—it won't be likely to fall off, and you musn't tear that lace; well, I'll get you another one if you lose it—do get those sleeves on again; there, now, pass me the belt. Oh, that fool of a dressmaker; she's got this so tight, when I told her I wanted to be comfortable. Open that door, will you, so there will be a draught? Now see if you can't hook this waist up. No—begin at the bottom. Why, don't you see, the hooks and eyes alternate on each side, so as to make it hold? Can't you get it together? Why, pull; I can stand it. Torn your finger nails out? Well, for heaven's sake, Charley, don't notice it now. I've got something I'll put on it after we get home. Can you hook that last hook, up on my left shoulder; and then that one down on my right hip? Now, get a good firm hold of the bottom of my skirt and give it a pull down all round. Now do get out of the way and let me look in the mirror. Heavens! I look like a perfect dump. Tip the mirror up a little more, will you? No, not that way—the other way—and go get me your hand-glass, won't you? Turn the gas up a little higher, and do keep out of my way; I can't see a square inch of my dress. Well, it looks a little better than I thought it did at first. Just give that drapery behind a smooth, will you? and pull that ruching up on my neck. There, now, put both your hands around my waist, and give it a good hard smooth down. There, I guess that will do now. I look very well. But for goodness sake don't ever ask me to let you help me again!"—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

A Bad Memory.

London papers relate a story of a Welsh preacher who started on the cars to fulfil an engagement. When the conductor came for his ticket he had forgotten to bring it, and had also forgotten his money. What was worse he had forgotten where he was going. It was found impossible to suggest to him any station that seemed to be the right one, and he had to telegraph home to have his friends look into his diary and send him word where he was going. Word came and he was started on all right.

Blifkins (thirstily)—So those two fellows got four years each! Soaper (mistily)—What two fellahs? Blifkins—Harrison and Morton, you know. Thanks! lemon in mine.

—The most successful dentist must expect to run against a snag occasionally.

Go to the Heart.

My name is Anthony Hunt. I am a drover and live miles and miles away upon the western prairie. There wasn't a house in sight when I first moved there, my wife and I, and we have not many neighbors, though those we have are good ones. One day about ten years ago I went away from home to sell my first head of cattle—fine creatures as ever I saw. I was to buy some groceries and dry goods before I came back, and above all a doll for my youngster—Dolly. She had never had a store doll of her own, only rag babies her mother had made her.

Dolly could talk nothing else, and went down to the very gate to call after me to get a big one. Nobody but a parent can understand how full my mind was of that toy, and how, when the cattle were sold, the first thing I hurried off to buy was Dolly's doll. I found a large one with eyes that would open and shut when you pulled a wire, and had it wrapped up in paper, and tucked it under my arm, while I had the parcels of calico and delaine and tea and sugar put up. Then, late as it was, I started for home. It might have been more prudent to stay until morning, but I felt anxious to get back, and eager to hear Dolly's praises about her doll.

I was mounted on a steady-going old horse and pretty well loaded. Night set in before I was a mile from town, and settled down as dark as pitch while I was in the middle of the darkest bit of road I know of. I could have felt my way, though, I remembered it so well, and when the storm that had been brewing broke, and pelted the rain in torrents, I was five miles or may be six miles from home.

I rode as fast as I could, but all of a sudden I heard a little cry like a child's voice. I stopped short and listened—I heard it again. I called and it answered me. I couldn't see a thing. All was as dark as pitch. I got down and felt around in the grass—called again, and again was answered. Then I began to wonder. I'm not timid, but I was known to be a drover and to have money about me. It might be a trap to catch me unawares and rob and murder me. I am not superstitious—not very; but how could a real child be out on the prairie in such a night, at such an hour? It might be more than human. The bit of a coward that hides itself in most men showed itself to me then; but once more I heard the cry, and said I:

"If any man's child is hereabouts, Anthony Hunt is not the man to let it die."

I searched again. At last I bethought me of the hollow under the hill and groped that way. Sure enough, I found the dripping little thing that moaned and sobbed as I took it in my arms. I called my horse and the beast came to me, and I mounted and tucked the little soaked thing under my coat as well as I could, promising to take it home to mamma. It seemed so tired, and pretty soon cried itself to sleep on my bosom. It had slept there over an hour when I saw my own windows. There were lights in them, and I supposed my wife had lit them for my sake; but when I got into the doorway I saw something was the matter, and stood still with a dread fear of heart five minutes before I could lift the latch. At last I did it, and saw the room full of neighbors, and my wife amid them weeping.

When she saw me she hid her face.

"Oh, don't tell him," she said, "it will kill him."

"What is it, neighbors?" I cried.

"Nothing now, I hope—what's that you have in your arms?"

"A poor lost child," said I, "I found it on the road. Take it, will you? I've turned faint." And I lifted the sleeping thing and saw the face of my own child, my Dolly.

It was my own darling, and none other, that I had picked up on the drenched road. My little child had wandered out to meet papa and the doll, while the mother was at work, and they were lamenting her as one dead. I thanked Heaven on my knees before them. It is not much of a story, neighbors, but I think of it often in the nights and wonder how I could bear to live now if I had not stopped when I heard the cry for help upon the road, hardly louder than a squirrel's chirrip. That's Dolly yonder, with her mother in the meadow, a girl worth saving—I think (but then I'm her father and partial, maybe), the prettiest and sweetest thing this side of Mississippi.—San Francisco Call.

A Royal Baby's Retinue.

Probably the magnificent state of the royal baby of Spain surpasses that of any other infant of western lands, but the retinue of the Emperor of China shows how they do such things in the east. The list of his attendants was as follows:

Eighty nurses.
Twenty-five fan bearers.
Twenty-five palanquin bearers.
Ten umbrella bearers.
Thirty physicians and surgeons.
Seven cooks.
Twenty-three assistant cooks.
Fifty servants and messengers.
Fifty dressers (to put on and take off imperial clothes).
Seventy-five astrologers.
Sixteen governors.
Sixty priests.

With thirty cooks and thirty doctors it is perhaps a wonder that Kuang Hsu, Emperor of China, has lived to be seventeen years old.—Youth's Companion.

Marriage Revealed by a Bicycle Header.

The marriage on Thanksgiving Day of Miss Sadie O'Neill to Enoch M. Fredericks, of Waukegan, has just been made public. The couple drove out into the country on Thanksgiving Day, ostensibly to spend the day with relatives. At Lake Villa, however, they boarded the cars, and were soon in Wisconsin and married. The matter was kept a secret until the husband took a "header" from a bicycle in Chicago a few days since, and received such injuries that he desired his wife to nurse him. The story was then told.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

—It is considered strange that aristocratic people will consent to live in a commonwealth.

—A domestic war cloud threatens the man who dares to walk loud when the baby's asleep.

—When a young man asks a young lady for her hand, in nine cases out of ten she will refer him to her paw.

...UMMARY.

Mr. Henry Becher, Q.C., London, is very seriously ill.

Mr. Alexander Murray, a prominent business man of Montreal, died of apoplexy on Saturday morning.

Owing to the continued illness of Lieutenant-Governor Angers there will be no New Year's reception in Quebec.

A special meeting of Stratford City Council was held on Saturday afternoon, when the rate of assessment was fixed at eighteen mills.

A 3-year-old child of Mr. L. Arsenault, Metapedia, Que., was fatally scalded a day or two ago by falling into a vessel of boiling water.

Joseph Walworth was killed in a dynamite explosion while working at the construction of the C. P. R. branch at the Don on Saturday.

It cost $1,438.69 to enforce the Scott Act in Lennox and Addington, and the amount received in fines was $3,052.75. The sum to the credit of the Act is $1,614.06.

Four boys went into the woods at Gananoque, and one, Page, in carelessly handling a revolver thought to be empty, discharged it, wounding a lad named McGinty in the region of the bowels. The ball cannot be traced.

Fred. Geary, aged 13 years, was drowned in Moira Lake, near Madoc, on Saturday afternoon while skating with a number of other boys. Chas. Richards went through the ice with Geary, but was rescued by one of his companions, who caught him by the hair and held him up.

Sylvester B. Brown, Salt Lake City, son of Mr. Isaac Brown, Ernesttown, has committed suicide. He was a clever lawyer and in easy circumstances, but he fell into bad health, and fearing consumption and prospective separation from his wife and family, became despondent, and going into the yard shot himself.

Alfred Falardeau, aged about 28 years, fell through the ice on Friday in crossing Matchedash Bay, at Waubaushene, and was drowned. The deceased came to Waubaushene about seven years ago, and is supposed to have relatives at St. Sanveur, Quebec. He was in the employ of the Georgian Bay Consolidated Lumber Company, and was a steady, quiet man and a good workman.

The Montreal Judges on Saturday ordered the liberation of Adeline Trempe from the Good Shepherd Convent, to which she had been committed in 1885 for five years on a charge of vagrancy trumped up by her uncle, who wished to remove the girl from her mother, who was a Protestant. The Court was very severe on the Recorder for his action in illegally depriving the girl of her liberty.

A young blacksmith named Albert Seaton, while endeavoring to effect a crossing of the G. T. R. track at Clarence street, London, on Saturday night, ran against the side of an express engine and received some bad bruises and cuts on his head and face. No bones were broken. He thought he could cross before the engine came up, but was mistaken, and could not stop himself in time to prevent a collision.

The King of Wurtemberg is again in poor health.

It is reported at Suakim that the rebel tribes at Handoub contemplate surrendering to the British.

An escaped Soudanese has offered to bring Gen. Gordon's clothes, sword and papers, which are said to be hidden near Berber.

A manifesto issued by the new revolutionary group in France declares that a commune is the only remedy for Boulangism and Radicalism.

The Queen will, next week, bestow a special honor upon Gen. Grenfell in recognition of his services at Suakim, and, incidentally, it is asserted that the creation of a batch of new peers is imminent.

Advices from Suakim say that Arabic translations of the accounts published in London newspapers prior to December 20th of the plan of operations of the British forces there have been found in the possession of the enemy.

Louis and Joseph Lebourdois, respectively captain and mate of the barque Gylfe, of Quebec, were yesterday at Glasgow sentenced to ten years' penal servitude each for trying to scuttle their vessel and defraud the insurers. The attempt was made while the Gylfe was on a voyage from Quebec for Greenock.

The French Senate yesterday adopted the budget as amended by the Chamber of Deputies. Premier Floquet afterward read a decree closing the session. Mr. Bradlaugh the well-known English Radical, visited the Chamber of Deputies yesterday and conversed for some time with M. Clemenceau and other members.

Mr. Bright's prospects or possibilities of recovery are well described by one of his family as marvellous. Real recovery, unhappily, there can be none. His malady is incurable. But his condition has wonderfully improved. He even sits up, though a week ago he had no desire to rise from his bed. There is hope that his life may be prolonged for some months.

The Liverpool police were anxiously watching yesterday for the arrival of the steamer Lord Gough from Philadelphia believing that Kuhni, the Wisconsin murderer, was on board. Their anxiety was relieved, however, by a despatch from Queenstown, stating that the vessel had arrived at that port, and that the Dane had been arrested there and remanded for hearing. He made no resistance. He had a ticket for Basle, Switzerland, and intended to proceed to that country immediately.

Mrs. Frank Cheesebrough, of Bay City, Mich., was aroused from sleep on Saturday morning by a burglar attempting to chloroform her.

Joe Rather was hanged at Centre, Tex., on Friday for wife murder. He went to the gallows smoking a cigar, and said he was going straight to heaven.

The steamship Bristol, of the Old Colony Line, was burned at Newport, R. I., yesterday, and the Mexico, of the New York and Havana Line, was destroyed at New York.

Another desperate fight occurred last week between the police boat of Baltimore and a fleet of oyster pirates. After 600 shots had been fired five of the rebel craft were captured.

Ira Warford, of St. Elmo, near Chattanooga, and his family, consisting of four persons, were poisoned yesterday by eating head cheese. Warford is in a very precarious condition, and his wife is seriously ill. The children are doing well and will recover.

Last evening flames broke out in Brown row, Everson, Pa., belonging to the H. C. Frick Coke Company, and four houses were destroyed. The fire was caused by the explosion of two kegs of blasting powder. The house in which the explosion occurred was occupied by Poles. They were preparing powder for their work in the mines today, when a spark from a pipe ignited the stuff. There was a terrific explosion and seven of the men were frightfully burned, one of them fatally.

Big John, the famous Indian pilot, intends to run the Lachine rapids on New Year's day if the river continues clear of ice.

Mr. Herbert, the Canadian sculptor, has forwarded from Paris a bronze bust of Sir George Cartier, which is on exhibition in Montreal.

A young man named Humphrey, whose home was at Whitby, a brakesman on the Grand Trunk, was killed at Oshawa yesterday morning.

Counterfeit bills of the Ontario Bank are in circulation in Deseronto and vicinity. As a rule the bills are pretty well worn and pasted up with pieces of paper.

A temperance convention was held at Cataraqui on Thursday, at which it was resolved to energetically oppose the repeal of the Scott Act in Frontenac.

City Solicitor Campbell says Winnipeg will not pay the expenses of calling out the militia in the crossings dispute without resisting the matter to the end.

At the annual meeting of the Clydesdale Horse Association of Canada yesterday, Mr. William Smith, M.P., of Columbus, Ont., was elected President for the year.

Principal Grant says as the Japanese are largely abandoning rice in favor of bread, he can see no reason why the fertile prairies of the Northwest should not largely supply Japan with the wheat she will require for her thirty-eight million of people.

James Dingwall, an employee in Walker & Marlatt's pork house, Aylmer, was struck square in the face on Thursday by a barrel, which fell twenty feet, terribly injuring him, hurting his eyes and breaking his nose, and knocking him senseless for a time.

Peter McMaster, a desperate character, who has for a long time defied the authorities to arrest him, has been made prisoner by Mr. S. Wright, deputy-sheriff of Prescott and Russell. The prisoner attended a sale near Hawkesbury for the purpose of defying arrest, and when seized drew a revolver, but was overpowered and disarmed.

Mr. W. T. Gianque, weighmaster Michigan Central Railway at Montrose, and brother of Andior Gianque, Michigan Central Railway, while riding on an engine yesterday morning, fell off near Montrose Junction, striking his head on a tie, inflicting a terrible gash. He was picked up and conveyed to his home at Suspension Bridge but his recovery is doubtful.

Mr. John Bright's condition has further improved.

The appointment of the Crofters Canadian Commission is announced. The members are the Marquis of Lothian, Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. King and Thomas Skinner. They are empowered to select Highland families for colonization in Canada.

Hon. Cornelia Prittie, sister of Lord Dunalley, was killed yesterday while hunting near Nenagh, County Tipperary. The horse stumbled and she fell from the saddle. Her feet becoming entangled in the stirrups, she was dragged for some distance head downward. She was 38 years of age.

On Thursday evening Stephen Weston, aged 59, residing at 231 Brewster street, Detroit, took by mistake a dose of carbolic acid instead of cough mixture, and fifteen minutes later expired.

A cablegram yesterday announced the death at Pau, France, of the Rev. Jas. Pettigrew Boyce, LL. D., D. D., President of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville. He was 60 years old.

Miles Jobson, a wealthy widower, of Princeton, Ind., who was married on Christmas day, hanged himself on Thursday night. He left a note saying he had broken his promise not to marry again, given to his first wife on her deathbed, and he could not endure the reproaches of his conscience.

The Ideal Pavement.

The ideal pavement for New York, under existing conditions, is the Belgian block, with asphalt filling between the joints. This pavement is now laid on Fifth avenue, and is cleanly and solid if not noiseless. The experiment of a solid pavement of asphalt has been tried with success on Madison avenue for a short distance above Thirty-fourth street, and it is about the only stretch of pavement in the city where people can ride with comfort and talk in a conversational tone of voice.—New York World.

His Marriage a Success.

"Marriage a failure! I should say not!" remarked a Western farmer, whose opinion was desired on one of the great questions of the day. "Why, there's Lucindy gits up in the mornin', milks six cows, gits breakfas', starts four children to skewl, looks arter the other three, feeds the hens, likewise the hogs, likewise some motherless sheep, skims 20 pans o' milk, washes the clothes, gits dinner, et cetery, et cetery. Think I could hire anybody to do it fur what she gits? Not much! Marriage, sir, is a success, sir; a great success!"

In the French Chamber of Deputies yesterday Premier Floquet spoke emphatically in support of secular schools.

—Cincinnati ladies just now have a craze for the divided skirt—"loglets" they are called.

—It doesn't necessarily follow that a seamstress is interested in the sewage question.

J. G. ANDERSON

HAS JUST TO HAND A FIRST CLASS STOCK OF

Saws! Saws!

Cross-Cut Cross-Cut

AND AXES

Of the very best manufacture in America.

"The Forest Beauty"

Is the only Saw made having nve gauges difference between the the teeth and the back, requiring no set for hard wood, and are made from the best double refined siller steel, selected and spring tempered, insuring a

Perfect and Even Temper.

Before buying a Cross-cut Saw be sure and see this Saw, as they have no equal.

A first class stock of

FURS

of the very finest quality at the

LOWEST POSSIBLE PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fur coats and Caps at prices that will astonish you Another line I would particularly call yonr attention to is our

Stock of Boots and Shoes

of every description

AT - PRICES - UNSURPASSED

Any place. Don't fail to come in and see goods and get prices. We do not consider it trouble to show goods, even if you do not intend purchasing.

J. G. Anderson, SPROULE'S BLOCK.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

A Half Hour Among Our Exchanges.

The Creemore Sun omitted publishing last week.

Walkerton high school board has raised the fee of admission from seven to ten dollars per annum.

Ontario contributes three fifths of the total postal revenue of the Dominion.

Extreme suffering is reported among the Norweigan settlers in Western Dakota.

One of Osman Digna's lieutenants has deserted his leader, and states that Emin Bey is a prisoner at Khartoum, where he is well treated.

Hon. Edward Stanley, son of the Govener-General of Canada, was married on Saturday in London to Lady Alice Montague, daughter of the Duke of Manchester.

City Solicitor Biggar, of Toronto, has given notice of application to Parliment for power to compel the removal of teleg graph poles and the placing of all wires under-ground.

At the next meeting of the Grey County Council the matter of regulating the width of wagon tires and making sleighs the uniform width of three feet, nine inches, will be again taken up.

Thornbury Standard: A large she bear was killed near Banks P.O. in this township on Monday last by Donald McDonald. Strange to say the bear was killed with one charge of buck shot, one of the shots going through the heart of the animal. Contrary to all experiences the bear was easily killed.

Shelburne Economist: On Christmas day William Sanderson, living on the townline between Amaranth and East Garafraxa, was brought before justices Park and McDougall charged with committing rape on one Miss Bell of Amaranth. The justices considered the evidence sufficient to warrant them in committing Sanderson for trial, and he was accordingly taken to Orangeville jail the following day. The prisoner is a married man about thirity years of age, and his accuser not more than 14 or 15.

Hanover Post: While in the woods fox hunting on New Year's Day, John O'Neill, of the South Line, Brant, met with a serious accident. He was running through the bush carrying the gun in his hand when it was jerked back by a limb catching the hammer and immediately discharged one barrel. The contents passed through the leg just above the knee. Being a strong, healthy young man it is probable that he will be around again in a short time.

Bruce Herald: Mr. John Lancaster, of North Brant, has been notified by the authorities of the bank of England, that he has fallen heir to an immense fortune, which had been willed to him by a distant relative. It appears the money has been lying in the Bank for some time, awaiting a claimant, as John's whereabouts was not known until recently. He leaves this week, accompanied by his legal adviser, to make good his claim to the boodle. If successful, John can lord it over the best of them.

Monday's Fin ire furnishes the following strange story: The wife of Mr. John Hawkins, residing at 41 Gloucester street, has been suffering for a number of years, and has been treated during that time by several medical men for catarrh of the stomach, consumption, etc., but her sufferings grew more and more excruciating until last week, when the symptoms told unmistakeably that something was biting her internally. Medical aid was summoned and a mixture administered which finally killed and expelled a lizard some eight inches in length and about as big around as the top of one's finger. Latterly Mrs Hawkins' life has been one of great misery and discomfort. She could not lie down to sleep, as in that position the lizard would come up in her throat and bite her. Since the reptile has been removed she has made rapid progress towards recovery. Mr. Hawkins is of the opinion that his wife swallowed the lizard some six years ago, when they lived in the country near Stratford, and were in the habit of drinking spring water.

Croup, whooping cough and Bronchitis immediately removed by Shiloh's Cure. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Shiloh's cough and Consumption Cure is sold by us on a guaranteed. It cures Consumption. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Monthly Fairs.

Orangeville—The second Thursday in each month.
Dundalk—Tuesday before Orangeville.
Flesherton—Monday before Orangeville.
Markdale—Saturday before Orangeville.
Durham—Third Tuesday in each month.
Chatsworth—Monday before Durham.
Holland Center—Saturday before Chatsworth.
Priceville—Monday before Durham.
Hanover—Monday before Durham.

A large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

—AT—

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Fulled Stockings, Overshoes, and Rubbers. Mens' and Boys' Long Boots, At prices to suit the times.

Photos, Photos, Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,
FLESHERTON.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equa

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,
78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London.
and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

HEARD'S

Carriage Works,

FLESHERTON,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specially.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

308 Sewing-Machine FREE

To at once establish trade in all parts, by placing our machines and goods where the people can see them, we will send free to one person in each locality, the very best sewing-machine made in the world, with all the attachments. We will also send free a complete line of our costly and valuable art samples. In return we ask that you show what we send, to those who may call at your home, and after 3 months all shall become your own property. This grand machine is made after the Singer patents, which have run out; before patents run out it sold for $60, with the attachments, and now sells for $50. Best, strongest, most useful machine in the world. All is free. No capital required. Plain, brief instructions given. Those who write to us at once can secure free the best sewing-machine in the world, and the finest line of works of high art ever shown together in America. TRUE & CO., Box 740, Augusta, Maine.

CAUTION.

ALL PERSONS are hereby cautioned against negotiating a note for ten dollars drawn in favor of John Foster, given by one Abraham Scott, dated April 18, and due in six months from date, made payable at South Head Post office, as I have not received value for the same, said note having been lost.

JOHN FOSTER.
Proton Station P.O.

SALESMEN WANTED for the New England Nurseries, established over 30 years. The old reliable nursery. Men with push, energy, good habits, and clean character always succeed. We can give you good pay and steady work. Write for terms to CHASE BROTHERS COMPANY, Nurserymen, Colborne

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 394. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, JAN. 17, 1889. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR

A. Harris Son & Co., BRANTFORD.

The Brantford Light Steel Binder, Brantford Reaper.
Brantford front cut Mower, Brantford rear cut Mower.
THE BEAVER COMBINED SEEDER and DRILL, THE MASON IMPROVED SULKY RAKE, JOHNSTON'S IMPROVED ONE HORSE CULTIVATOR.
LAND ROLLERS, GANG PLOWS, SCUFFLERS, CULTIVATORS, ROOT CUTTERS, GRAIN CRUSHERS, ETC.

FOR SALE BY

THOS. A. BLAKELY,

FLESHERTON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Two Questions.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR,—I desire to ask, through your paper, the numerical strength of the Farmers' Institute for Centre Grey? Will the secretary or president please answer. And at the same time, I would also like to learn the number of taxpayers in Centre Grey. Any person answering the above, will much oblige

THOS. GRAINGER.

Priceville Items.

From our own Correspondent.

The snowstorm has passed over us without doing any serious damage. It blocked the sidewalks in many places, but the amount of traffic at the sleighing has encouraged is making good roads everywhere.

The fair on Monday was poorly attended. prices were good for fat critters, not much demand for anything else.

Detective McDonald, brought some of the roughs to time a few days ago. Taxing the pocket is a grand way to check the ardor of young pugilists.

Our genial and respected friend, Dr. Rixon, who has been in New York for some time, is again in our midst for a few days.

Mr. A. Purdy, who has been doing business here for some time, has gone to the North-West to seek his fortune.

Mr. Herbert Watson, one of our enterprising young bricklayers, has joined the army of benedicts.

Some of the gossips predict a wedding on Durham Road street some day soon.

The annual meeting of the Artemesia Agricultural Society was held in Priceville on the 10th inst., and although the day was rough and stormy there was a fair number of the members present. A statement was made to the meeting that the advisability of doing away with Township socities would be discussed and voted on at the various Farmers' Institutes, when the following motion was put to the meeting and carried unanimously:

Moved by William Ferguson, seconded by James Brodie that this meeting depreciates and strongly disapproves of any legislation that would impair the powers or tend to any doing away with Township societies.

The following are the officers for the present year: R. Oliver, President; A. Stewart, Vice President; J. Brodie, Secretary-Treasurer; R. Black, G. Stewart, T. Ferguson, J. Graham, J. Brodie, D. Harrow, C. McKinnon, D. G. McLean and D. McMullen, Directors; W. Ferguson and M. Riley, Auditors.

Eugenia.

DEAR EDITOR;—Since I last wrote to you there are not many changes and no great events have transpired for the place is as conservative as the opinions of its people. The chief industries at the present are lumbering and preparing fire wood. Considerable timber is being taken out between this and Kimberley. Three lumber firms are engaged in the trade and trees that were in former years rejected, are now considered [illegible] a fact that [illegible] of commerce. The prices too are far in advance of former years. Rock elm, birch and ash bring $40 a thousand, pine from $90 to $115, according to the amount of labor it will take to get it out of the swamps.

On Friday evening the Union Sunday School hold their annual tea-meeting in the Orange Hall. No pains are being spared to make this the entertainment of the season and a magnificent time is expected.

Miss Gaudin, of Owen Sound, is the guest of Mrs. Hiram Bowerman.

Quite a number in the town are on the sick list. Mr. Thomas Crow has been laid up for the past few days with a severe cold.

Mr. Steers, of Markdale, delivered the annual missionary sermon in the Methodist church on Sabbath evening. The Rev. gentleman gave a most eloquent discourse from Acts XVI. 30-31

Markdale.

Our Reeve has obtained a second baptism in his functional office. Much as we regard him a close contest would have done him no harm.

The recent elections for our little burg have developed the fact that merit counts for nothing in a municipal contest, especially when a candidate don't subscribe to the creed and receive the credentials of the rigid righteous. The late municipal contest for our village was conducted upon strictly clerical lines, with the result that the most popular man (Mr. Davis) has been thrown out.

Glenelg has passed through an ordeal which I hope it may never again experience. The past and present Reeve, has filled the civic chair with marked ability and fidelity; but, a few there were who supposed that gentleman had a will of his own, and could stubborn political bias to the rule of personal virtue, exercised the principles laid down in the Covenant of a British Freeman—THOUGHT for himself; and for this crime he must be slaughtered. It is to be regretted that the municipal platform is to be made a political Kaleidoscope.

General News.

Sir John McDonald was 74 years of age Friday,

Dr. Montague has been formally nominated by the Haldimand Conservatives.

A large vien of coal of good quality has been discovered near Deloraine, Manitoba.

The Whithy postoffice was invaded by burglars early Friday morning and about $500 in money and stamps stolen.

Rev. T. W. Jeffrey was presented with an illuminated address and a check for $1,000 by the citizens of Toronto on Tuesday night, as a mark of their trust in him as a man and a minister.

Dr. Junker, the German explorer, feels certain of Stanley's safety.

Afghanistan advices say that an attempt was made by a Sepoy to shoot the Ameer.

The obstructions placed in the way of the Red River road at the crossing of the C. P. R. southwestern branch have been removed.

A scheme is afoot in Montreal to have the present postoffice turned into quarters for the Board of Trade and the Corn Exchange and have a more commodious postoffice built.

The breach of promise case. Ross v Robertson, in which the ptaintiff sued or $5,000, was settled out of court Friday for $1,350. The parties belong to [illegible] Sound.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Skating on the rink Thursday and Saturday nights.

Township council meets on Monday next.

Mr. Climo, late merchant in Flesherton, was up last week on legal business.

Miss Damude left on Monday for Toronto, to attend Prof. Torrington's College of music.

All kinds of winter wear in Boots and Shoes at very low prices at Richardson & Co's.

We had a very pleasant call from Major Rorke, M. P. P. for East Grey, on Saturday.

Messrs. Petch & Mitchell have commenced business in Blakely & McConnell's old stand, as butchers, etc. Call on them for your meats.

M. Richardson & Co. have begun to close out Winter Dry Goods and Clothing this week—The best bargains will be had by applying early.

The organ case which was to have been heard at Division Court here last Thursday has been again postponed upon payment of $10 costs by plaintiff.

M. Richardson & Co. sell more crosscut saws than any other dealer in this part of Ontario. If you query why—call and see them.

See J. G. Anderson's mammoth advertisement in this issue. But then you cannot help seeing it, nor can you resist buying where such wonderful bargains are offered.

Mr. Frank Sullivan is in the agency business with Bradley, Garretson & Co. of Brampton. Hs is selling two exellent works—"The Beautiful, the Wonderful and the Wise," and "The Path of Wealth." Frank is a young man whom we would delight to see succeed.

Mantles and Millinery at startling prices to clear winter stock at Richardson & Co's.

The Flesherton school board met on Saturday and appointed their secretary treasurer in the person of Dr. Christoe. It is the intention to fit up the school grounds by terracing the front as soon as the weather will admit.

Overcoats, Overcoats at Richardson & Co's., on easy terms and greatly reduced prices.

Miss Damude, who is at present attending Prof. Torrington's College of music, in Toronto, will return home after completing her course, with the view to giving musical instruction to those who may desire it.

First Break in prices of Winter Goods at M. Richardson & Co.'s Reduction in Winter Dress Goods, short lengths at any price.

Now is the time to speculate as west Toronto Junction is booming Manufacturers are flocking in. Graham & Whitby, Real Estate Brokers, 972 Queen St. West Toronto, have a few more lots on very easy terms at the old prices, which will double in value in one year. Call or write for particulars.

Social.

On Wednesday evening of last week we had the pleasure of attending an Orange Social held at Kells' corners, Artemesia. The program consisted of recitations, speeches and music by several members of our Flesherton Band. Considering the severe weather a respectable gathering was present and apparently enjoyed themselves. After the entertainment the Flesherton contingent was invited to Mr. Thos. Kells' residence, where Mrs. Kells had prepared luncheon for them. Mr. Kells has a highly interesting and entertaining family, the soul of generosity, and after two hours of social enjoyment the Flesherton people returned home feeling that they had been amply repaid for venturing out.

Mr. Wm. Thompson, wife and daughter, of Dobbington, are visiting at Mr. Wm. Barnhouse's.

Croup, whooping cough and Bronchitis immediately relieved by Shiloh's Cure. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Entertainments and Sales.

Owing to inclement weather the credit auction sale of Mr. James Rehill, near McIntyre, has been postponed until Monday, Jan. 21. Remember the date.

On Jan. 25 an extensive credit sale will be held on lot 6, con. 5, Euphrasia, near Kimberley, the property of Mr. Thos. Carruthers. A large quantity of stock and farm implements will be offered, including a reaper. W. J. Shepherdson, auctioneer.

On Friday evening, Jan. 18, a Sunday School entertainment will be held at Eugenia. For particulras see bills.

A credit auction sale will be held in Feversham on Thursday, Jan. 24, the property of Mr. Edward Horton. Farm stock and implements. J. Speers & Co., auctioneers.

The members of Fountain Council, No. 140, R. T. of T., intend holding an open Temperance meeting in the Town Hall on the 5th prox., when a lengthy programme will be rendered consisting of speeches by several Rev. gentlemen, recitations, songs, addresses, etc., by the best local talent. All are cordially invited to attend.

Sleepless nights, made miserable by that terrible cough. Shiloh's is the Remedy for you. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Settled Down Again.

J. B. Spurr, our late lamented friend of the Dundalk Herald, has once more pitched his tent, this time in the village of Creemore. He took possession of the Creemore Advertiser last week, and that paper will now shine with an added Spurr of light. Welcome.

Will you suffer with Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint? Shiloh's Vitalizer is guaranteed to cure you. For sale at the Medical Hall.

District Lodge.

At the annual Orange District lodge, held in Flesherton on Wednesday of last week. the following officers were elected: Wm. Wright, District Master; S. Sheardown, Dep District Master; Thos. Kells, Chaplain; James Brodie, Recording Secrtary; John Boland, Financial Secretary; W. Sharp, Treasurer; E. Brodie, Lecturer; H. McLaughry, Director of Ceremonies.

Catarrh cured, health and sweet breath secured, by Shiloh's Catarrh Remedy. Price 50 cents. Nasal Injector free. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Royal Black Knights of Ireland.

County Grand Black Chapter of Grey, met in Markdale Orange Hall, Jan. 9th, 1889, when the following officers were elected:—Sir Kt., James Brodie, Co. Grand Treceptor; Sir Kt., Thomas Gilray, Deputy Co. Grand Treceptor; Sir Kt., Wm. McClelland, Co. Grand Chaplain; Sir Kt., Rob. Clemmist, Deputy Co. Grand Chaplain; Sir Kt., Thos. Elliott, Co. Grand Registrar; Sir Kt., A. R. Dodds, Deputy Co. Grand Registrar; Sir Kt, Jas. Elliott, Co. Grand Treasurer; Sir Kt., Wm. Bradley, Deputy Co. Grand Treasurer; Sir Kt., Jos. Gibson, Co. Grand Lecturer; Sir Kt., Jas. Bryan, Deputy Co. Grand Lecturer; Sir Kt., Wm. Madill, Co. Grand St Bearer; Sir Kt., John McFadden, Deputy Co. Grand St. Bearer; Sir Kt., Thos. Abbott, Co. Grand Censor; Sir Kt., George Rutherford, Deputy Co. Grand Censor; Sir Kt., James Erskin, Co. Grand Pursuviant; Sir Kt., Johnson Little, Deputy Co. Grand Pursuviant; Sir Kt., Thos. Hanbury, 1st Co. Grand Committee; Sir Kt., James McMahan, 2nd Co. Grand Committee; Sir Kt., A. R. Parks, 3rd Co. Grand Committee; Sir Kt. Carson Price, 4th Co. Grand Committee; Sir Kt. James Mills, 5th Co. Grand Committee; Sir Kt., Thos. McLelland, 6th Co. Grand Committee; Sir Kt., Charles Little, 7th Co. Grand Committee. Next meeting to be in Owen Sound on the fourth Tuesday in January, 1890, at 2 o'clock P. M.

That hacking cough can be so quickly cured by Shiloh's Cure. We guarantee it. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Scriptural Riddle for the Children.

A holy man, in lonely mood,
Far from his home, in want of food,
Was cared for by a servant rare,
With unwrought clothes, no beard, no hair.
No arms, no legs, has this servant had,
Nor power of speech, but yet was glad
To [illegible] this man [illegible] day
All he needed, nor wished for pay.
Now tell me children, if you can,
What was the servant, who the man?

Winnipeg, [illegible]

The first child answering correctly will receive a handsome present. Address this office

Are you going to Mrs. J's. Social?

Mr. Jas. Beecroft, we are sorry to learn, is quite ill. The doctors pronounce his ailment as catarrh of the stomach.

Shiloh's cough and Consumption Cure is sold by us on a guarantee. It cures Consumption. For sale at the Medical Hall.

If letter postage is shortly reduced to 2 cents, we intend writing personal letters to about a half dozen gentlemen who owe for this paper two and three years. We hope though, that they will not wait for the reduction.

A parlor social will be held at the Methodist parsonage, under the auspices of the Ladies Aid society on Friday evening, Jan. 25. Admission 15 cents, children 10 cents.

For lame back, side or chest, use Shiloh's Porous Plaster. Price 25 cents. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Died.

WOODRUFF.—In Maxwell on Jan 15, John Woodruff, only son of Widow Woodruff, aged [illegible] years.

Born.

BLAKELY.—At Inistioge, on Wednesday [illegible] the wife of Joseph Blakely [illegible] son

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness. Noises in the head. How they may be cured at your home. Post free 3d. Address Dr. NICHOLSON, John Street, Montreal

SACRIFICE SALE!

TILL FEB. 1st, 1889.

16⅔ PER CENT. off all sales of WATCHES and CLOCKS! or ONE SIXTH off marked price.

20 per cent. off RINGS, CHAINS, SILVERWARE, MUSICAL GOODS disto.

25 per cent off genera[illegible]nes in JEWELRY, SPEC[illegible]TC.

Markdale is the onl[illegible]re in this section where y[illegible]n get CLOSE COMPETI[illegible]N CES.

It will pay you to drive [illegible]s you can find a large sto[illegible]ose from at cut fi[illegible]

CALL THIS [illegible]H!

If you never ha[illegible]
—AND

Test This S[illegible]ent!

that I have a ve[illegible]k at Bed Rock [illegible]s!

Discounts conside[illegible]o re-pairing receiv[illegible] attenti[illegible]

W. J[illegible]N,

JEWELER and O[illegible]

MARKDA[illegible]

I Resign.

I used to think my character
Was spotless as the snow;
I used to think 'twas stainless
As a hawthorn bush in blow.
But the stories that they're telling
You hardly could believe
They say that I'm a horse thief
Since they put me up for reeve.

Before the nomination
I was fit to lead in prayer,
But since that sad occasion
I've been frequent made aware
That I served a term in prison
From the court of last assize,
For bolting with the coppers from
A helpless dead man's eyes.

They say that missing goods are oft
Upon my person found;
That the neighbors lock the hen house
When they see me coming 'round;
That I never yet was sober
For an hour in all my life,
And that I'm too familiar
With another party's wife.

So I decline to run for reeve,
I rather would be free;
Chopping cordwood in the swamp
Is good enough for me.
The country will be losers,
And the voters all will grieve
When they learn that I've refused the job
And will not run for reeve.

—The Khan, Beverly.

When Love Was Young.

O, he was young and she was fair,
Rose wreathed was all her shimmering hair.
She at him such sly glances threw
O'er her great fan, what could he do
But kiss her?

For straight above her saucy head
Gleamed mistletoe and holly red.
'Twas Christmas time; they'd but just met,
He knew 'twas wrong, dear boy, and yet
He kissed her!

Her satin gown, I much suspect,
Had big puffed sleeves and square cut neck.
Her twinkling feet and silk shod were,
Why, if you just but looked at her,
You'd want to kiss her!

Her eyes were like twin violets,
And she, the worst of sad coquettes,
Looked boldly up and shyly down.
Was there a man in all the town
That would not kiss her?

Her lips were red as cherries are;
She was the sweetest girl by far
That trod the stately minuet
They danced that night. A monk'd forget
His prayers and kiss her!

I've heard her tell that in those days
Young love would laugh at our prim ways.
You think it shocking? Why—ha! ha!
'Twas grandmamma and grandpapa!
Let's go and kiss them!

Longfellow in Westminster.

Child! when you pace with hushed delight
The cloistered aisles across the sea,
Whose ashes old of monk and knight
Renew the legends heavenly-bright
That charmed you from your mother's knee;

And steal along the abbey's nave
With war's superbest trophies set,
To some torn minstrel's narrow grave,
Who more unto his century gave
Than Tudor or Plantagenet;

Scorn not the carven names against
When England strews memorial flowers,
But circled by her precious dust,
Salute, athrill with pride and trust
Your own dear poet, child of ours!

—From the Longfellow Remembrance Book.

For and About Women.

The average yearly income of the working women of Boston is $260.70, and her average expenses are reckoned at $261.30.

A contemporary says: "We have no use for a bustle. It should be sent to the rear."

Ladies who possess diamonds have them arranged into small coronets or half diadems.

Maria Pia, Queen of Portugal, is said to not only have a clearly defined moustache, but to be actually proud of it.

Fans are chiefly of white feathers, with mounting of colored mother-of-pearl, or else they are of painted crape or gauze, with lace border.

The Philadelphia statistics show that there is not a trade or profession pursued in that city which is not more or less followed by women.

A Kansas schoolma'am has introduced a new feature in her school. When one of the girls misses a word, the boy who spells it gets permission to kiss her. The boys are improving rapidly.

The redingote is the favorite style for walking-dress, while the jacket-bodice is preferred for indoor wear. We have been shown this week very elegant models in both styles.

The jacket-bodice remains in great favor. It is made perfectly tight-fitting, making the waist long, a little in the shape of a pear. It comes a little beyond the waist, peaked or rounded in front, forming a few plaits in the middle of the back, or else cut out into two or three small tabs.

Although coiffures are less voluminous than they were, the hair is still piled up on the top of the head, while a few light curls fall over the forehead. None but young girls wear the catogan, plaited or twisted, and tied in a bow in the neck. By way of ornament, a light aigrette of feathers or flowers, springing from the daintiest possible puff of tulle, is the style preferred.

The British Columbia Climate.

Eastern people have not yet become aware of the pleasant climate that is to be found in the Pacific province throughout almost the entire twelve months. When they do, a pilgrimage to British Columbia to escape the fierce heats of summer and the cold blasts of winter will be an annual affair with many of those who now seek hot and dusty southern California or the enervating and malarial climate of Florida. —Vancouver, B.C., News-Advertiser.

His New Leaf.

Very Rude Boy (to party who has slipped and fallen his length on the sidewalk) What! drunk again? I say, ole chap, yer beginnin' the new year wid a vengeance!

During December in St. Thomas there were 8 days when it rained, 11 days when it snowed, 36 days' frost. During December, '87, rain 5 and snow 11 days.

The biggest mail contract held in Canada is that undertaken by the B. C. Express Company, who make one trip a week from Ashcroft station, on the C. P. R., to Barkerville, in the Cariboo district, a distance of 79 miles, for $18,500 a year.

Young Laird to newly appointed footman—"Well, Donald, how do you like trousers?" Donald, heretofore a ghillie who had never worn anything but a kilt—"Aweel, sir, to tell you the truth, I fin' them very uncomfortable, especially about the sleeves!"

BAD MANNERS OF HUSBANDS.

Mothers to Blame for Not Instructing Boys to be Polite.

A friend was spending the day with me the other day, and while she was here our pastor called. After he left the friend said: "Did you ever notice with what respect Mr. Conrad speaks of his wife and how courteously he treats her at all times?" I nodded assent and my friend went on: "I suppose my husband is as good a man as ever lived, but his mother did not train him to be courteous to ladies. His sisters were his slaves, and thereby he is spoiled as a husband. I wish I could train several hundred boys to be husbands for the next generation. Do you suppose they'd consider it their prerogative to drive the girls out of the easiest chair, take the sunniest corner of the room, the best place by the light, throw books, papers or slippers down for some one to put away, and grow up with the idea that a wife must be the valet and the rest of the household stand respectfully by to obey orders? You smile, but this is anything but a subject to laugh over.

"I really believe husbands never think how their unkind ways hurt. They don't realize the difference to us—for instance, in their manner when they come to dinner. All day the wife has been alone with the children and servants, and is more hungry for a kind word from her husband then an epicurean feast. He comes in just as the dinner bell rings. 'For a wonder dinner is once ready on time,' the husband says. Couldn't he have saved the heart stab by saying: 'That's a pleasant sound to a hungry fellow,' and what hinders him from adding, what would be milk and honey to a weary soul all the rest of the day—nay, all the rest of her life—'You are a good wife, Cornelia?,' And if dinner is not quite ready why need he say, 'Of course not; never is?' In working mottoes for the home why hasn't some one taken Wesley's remark: 'I'd as soon swear as fret,' instead of hanging up 'I Need Thee Every Hour?'

"When I think I have a hard time I just think of the women who have no servants, but who themselves care for the children, wash, iron, cook, mend, churn, milk, carry wood and water, all for less than an Irish servant girl's wages. Of course men appreciate their wives, of course they do, but they keep their polite manners and courteous ways for—other men's wives. One time James thanked me for saving him room beside me at a concert, and then sort of apologized for being polite by saying he thought it was my sister Mary."—Atalanta Constitution.

Scrap-Bag of Women's Chat.

The choir girls of New York are grieving because they are being supplanted by boys.

Easy crying widows, says a misanthrope, take new husbands soonest; there's nothing like wet weather for transplanting.

Forty-five ladies of Utica, N.Y., have signed an agreement not to let a man crowd past them between the acts at a theatre.

A woman can never bring herself to see herself as others see her. Each believes herself to be a distinct type of beauty. As there are many degrees of beauty, possibly they are right.—American Hebrew.

A London paper says the art of the goldsmith is disappearing, owing to the cheapness of diamonds. The value of jewellery now depends upon the precious stones it contains, rather than upon the beauty of workmanship.

A Michigan woman practiced with a revolver until she could hit a suspender-button at eight paces. Then there came a burglar into the house early one morning, and she sent a bullet pinging through her husband's left ear.

A Port Huron (Mich.) woman who was engaged in a lawsuit was required to give security for costs in the sum of $50. Stripping off her $50 plush cloak she threw it down, saying to the judge: "Take that!" The functionary was glad to have the case go over to the next term.

An editor out West put a love-letter he had written into the copy-box, and his editorial upon the proper observance of marital duties he sent to his love. The letter appeared in his paper, and he is chasing his compositors all over the country with a tomahawk in each hand.

"The young ladies of to-day," says a veteran observer, "are all dressed in the most perfect copy of the dresses worn by Josephine, Hortense and the beautiful Pauline, the Princess Borghese. The fashions have come back is exactly eighty-eight years. For it was in 1800 that this shortwaisted dress with little puffed sleeves was most marked."

A lady has been arrested in Atlanta, Ga., for wanting the inside of the sidewalk. She not only wants it, but she gets it whenever she goes out to walk. One man who refused to yield to her demand had his whiskers pulled and his hat knocked off, and countless scores of men have been pushed into the ditch. The lady says she will have the inside track if she has to fight for it until she dies.

A committee of Berlin ladies recently presented the Empress Victoria Augusta with a white silk apron on which the names of the Empress' five young sons were worked. The Empress, in acknowledging the gift, said that she was honored by the present, for an apron was always the symbol of the true German housewife. And then, putting the apron on, she said very simply: "My husband desires me always to wear an apron; he says it looks more homely.'

A Costa Rican Earthquake.

San Jose de Costa Rica was the scene on the night of December 29th and the morning of December 30th of a series of earthquake shocks of great severity. The shocks are believed to have originated in the volcano of Poaz, six leagues distance from the town. At Alajuela eight persons were killed and many were injured. The churches and principal buildings in the city suffered considerable damage. The inhabitants are encamped in the squares and parks. No further shocks having occurred, the alarm is subsiding.

Poe first thought of "The Bells" when walking the streets of Baltimore on a winter night. He rang the bell of a lawyer's house—a stranger to him—walked into the gentleman's library, shut himself up and the next morning presented the lawyer with a copy of his celebrated poem.

SAVING THE SIGHT.

How a Veteran Alabama Journalist Says He Preserved His Eyes.

The editor of the Huntsville Democrat, who has passed his three score years without the use of eye-glasses, and can still, with his natural eyes, read fine print, wishes to give other people nearing the sere and yellow leaf the benefit of his ocular experience. Therefore, he tells them that in 1865 he found his eyesight failing, indicated by dark specks flittering over the page and a hazy appearance of the letters when he was reading. Remembering to have heard his mother say that ex-President John Quincy Adams (who lived to about 80 years) had preserved his eyesight and read without glasses by pressing the outer and inner corners of his eyes together, the editor tried the experiment. After retiring to his bed at night, he has, ever since the autumn of 1865, before going to sleep, pressed gently together the outer and inner corner of each eye between the thumb and forefinger of the hand corresponding to the right and left eye, applying equal simultaneous pressure to both eyes. Or using but one hand, he has put the middle finger on his forehead above his nose, and pressed together the corners of one between the thumb and the forefinger, and the corners of the other eye between the third and fourth fingers, striving to give equal pressure to both eyes. The philosophy of the experiment is explained in this way—As the people pass the middle age, there is said to be (and we believe it) a tendency of the balls of the eye to lose their convexity—in common parlance, to flatten. The habitual pressure of the outer and inner corners of the eyes together prevents flattening, and thereby preserves the original normal convexity of the eyes, and thereby the original power of seeing. Near-sighted persons are exceptions to the rule. Their near-sightedness (as we understand) is caused by too great convexity of the eye. Oftentimes, as they advance in years, their eyes flatten—that is, lose their original convexity, and become more nearly like the good eyes of young people, and they can see better without glasses and lay them aside.

Whether our philosophical explanation is right or wrong, this one thing we know, that, whereas we, over seventeen years ago, were losing our original power of seeing, now, by the manipulation of our eyes as above explained, we can see clearly without the use of glasses, and can read small print almost, if not quite, as well as in our youth, while men and women many years our juniors, some of them our near blood relatives, who have not resorted to our mode of preserving the eyesight, are compelled to use glasses. Believing it our duty to mankind to do them all the good we can, we overcome our native modesty about writing of ourselves by the consideration that we may benefit others by relating our own experience.

The reason why both eyes should be subjected to the equal simultaneous pressure is that, to see clearly, both eyes should behold objects at the same local distance, and this cannot be if the two eyes have not the same convexity. If the two eyes should see objects at different distances, the objects would present different images on the two retinæ of the eyes and produce a confusion of images, and, of course, impair distinct vision. Instances occur of persons who have a natural infirmity of the eyes with different foci—one eye seeing at one focal distance, the other eye seeing at another focal distance. In such cases oculists provide eye-glasses of different foci, so accommodated as to correct the natural defect and make both eyes see alike.—Huntsville (Ala.) Democrat.

Cannon-Balls for the Cure of Constipation.

It is a very self-evident proposition in physics that a cannon-ball as ordinarily propelled, will, upon its abdominal impact, produce a movement of the bowels. Such a movement, however, says the N.Y. Medical Record, is attended with the serious personal inconvenience of producing a large hole in an important portion of the economy. It is not in this way, it need hardly be said, that Dr. H. Sahli, of Berne (Correspondens-Blatt fur Schweizer Aerzte) proposes to utilize the cannon-ball in therapeutics. He advises that it be simply rolled about upon the abdomen for five or ten minutes daily, in order to relieve habitual constipation. The weight of the ball should be from three to five pounds. In cold weather it can be covered with chamois, or kept warm by the stove. Better still, according to Dr. Sahli, is the plan of having the patient take it to bed with him at night, and thus letting the missile of war warm itself ingloriously in the arms of the victim of colprostasis. The best time to use the cannon-ball is in the morning, after waking. It is then to be made part of the morning toilet; the patient lying on his back in bed rolls his ferric bedfellow systematically over the abdomen. The direction is not of so much importance, as that of systematically treating every part of the abdominal wall. Abdominal massage is acknowledged to be a useful measure in torpidity of the bowels, and Dr. Sahli assures his readers that by his method he has been able to cure nearly all of his cases without the aid of medication. Of course, proper attention should be paid to diet and hygiene. When universal peace comes, the orator can speak not only of turning swords into ploughshares, but also of cannon-balls into aperients; while of Dr. Sahli it may be written: "Peace hath its victories, no less renowned than war."

It was the Cat.

There was great excitement in the Omaha depot the other day. A noise like the crying of a child was traced to a closed trunk, and when the bystanders put their ears closer they were sure that something was wrong. "My God!" cried one, "give me a handspike or something. There is a child inside and it will smother." No handspike was at hand, and the people began to pull keys out of their pockets, and at last the lock clicked. The cover was raised and inside were discovered an old maltese cat and five new-born kittens.

The Retort Courteous.

Mr. and Mrs. Jason were engaged in their usual evening debate. Said he, for a clincher, "Well, there's no use arguing with a woman or a jackass."

"I wish I had known that at the start and saved my breath," said she.—Terre Haute Express.

PATTI'S BEAUTY.

The Secret of Preserving the Complexion—The Human Passions.

Patti is fast becoming a rival of the famous Ninon de l'Enclos, who preserved her beauty to such an extent up to her 60th year that the grandsons of the men who loved her in her youth adored her with as much fervor as their ancestors had done in their days. Patti is, to say the very least, a long way from "sweet and 20," more like "fair and 40," without the third qualification, yet people who saw her the other day in Paris could see no visible change, no mark of the last 10 or 15 years upon her. She was still as slim and rounded, still without a gray hair in her head, or a wrinkle upon her. There had not come under her chin that small break in the contour of the throat which is the first knell of dead youthfulness. Her hair lay in rich, plentiful black locks about a brow where not one line was to be seen. Her eyes were clear and bright as a child's, her cheeks smoth and pink, her teeth snowy and faultless and the delicate lines of her figure just exactly what they were a score of years back. Some impulsive woman seized her and demanded to be told the secret of her eternal youth and this is what Patti revealed to her. She said: "When I am at home I go to bed early—10.30. I rise early, that is, early for singers, which means 10 30. So you see when I am not singing I sleep nearly 12 hours in the 24. Plenty of sleep, that is the secret of beauty and freshness. I don't sleep until 10, of course, but I make it a point not to get up at once when I wake, but to take a glass of hot water and a lemon and read my letters before getting out of bed. It's a mistake to jump up right away after waking. I bathe in tepid water and then sponge off with a cold sponge. On singing days I take a light and early dinner at 3 and only a biscuit and a cup of hot bouillon after the performance. No great quantity of food and plenty of sleep, that's the way to keep one's complexion and figure intact. I rarely touch wine, a liquor glass full of whiskey after luncheon or dinner, sometimes a glass of champagne. Nothing more."

But the real and main secret of Patti's perennial youth, and the one she did not dwell upon, is the fact that she has never given way to any emotions. She has avoided all feelings of every sort, as far as possible, hate, love, everything that might make a line on her fair face.—New York World.

Better Declare a Truce.

The city editor of a leading newspaper sends out a reporter, we will assume, by way of illustration, to a politician with instructions to inquire as to whether or not he has been appointed to some lucrative position. The politician, with a great air of innocence and modesty, at first disclaims the rumor as a mistake. In the end, ten chances to one, and this time with an air off offended dignity, he will deny it indignantly and in toto as an invention of those "lying newspapers." The reporter has no alternative left but to write up what the politician says and in a week or so the appointment is officially announced, and the politician smiles at his acumen in keeping the other fellows off until his hooks were fixed.

Again, there is a rumor of a wedding, and the reporter goes forth on his mission, to be met with a prompt denial of it and an ill-tempered protest against the "lying newspapers." He contradicts the rumor on authority, and before the contradiction is cold, lo! an announcement of the wedding is sent in for publication.

A business man makes an important transaction of some kind, more or less interesting to the public, and the reporter "gets on to it" and goes for denial or confirmation. He usually gets a denial in the form of an assertion that no such sale is contemplated, and the report is duly printed. In a day or two the transaction is announced as consummated.

In the church a scandal arises and the truth is sought for publication. The truth is not found until it has been almost smothered by falsehoods. Now, after these instances, to put it plainly, who is the liar?

In the mass of news from many sources that has to be hurriedly collected and collated for a great newspaper, some that is incorrect will almost of necessity find its way now and then into its columns. In really reputable and carefully conducted journals this seldom happens intentionally.

So, among the millions of people who fill the multifarious positions of life, some even of those rated as honorable and reliable will occasionally lapse into untruth, or something so near untruth as not to be distinguishable from it, in their dealings with the press.

It were, therefore, well to declare truce between the press and the public on these points.—Washington Post.

Dr. Brydon's Escape Recalled.

One of the most terrible, as it is also one of the most thrilling, tales that history has to tell is recalled by the announcement in the Scottish papers of Miss Edith Brydon's marriage in Inverness Cathedral. The lady's father was the famous Dr. Brydon of the Afghan massacre of January, 1842—the one survivor who, wounded and faint and weary, after a most perilous ride, reached Jellalabad to tell Gen. Sale the piteous story of what had taken place in the Khyber Pass. They were 16,000—or, counting women and children, 26,000—who set out from Cabul on that ill-starred journey, and he was the only man who had escaped. Between the dark crags of Jugdullak the murderous Afghans had their fill of blood. The death trap ran with the gore of soldiers, camp followers, women and children alike. Dr. Brydon alone escaped.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Immodest Thought.

The London papers are wondering if it is the American girls' pink faces that charm foreign admirers. We should say that the girls' greenbacks attract more than their pink faces.—Alta California

One of the hotels for winter visitors in Southern California has a "spacious ladies billiard parlor."

Hronek, the Chicago Anarchist, convicted of conspiring to assassinate with dynamite Inspector Bonfield and Judges Gary and Grinnell, was refused a new trial yesterday, and sentenced to twelve years in the penitentiary. A stay of sixty days was granted to allow the filing of a bill of exceptions.

A BAD HABIT.

Biting the Nails Has Often Serious Effect on the Throat.

"A novel incident resulting from a habit of very common prevalence among nervous people was brought to my notice recently," said a leading physician of Philadelphia to a New York Mail and Express reporter the other day. "A young lady presented herself at my office and complained of a constant irritation in her throat. Two weeks previously she had been taken with a very severe attack of sore throat, which was treated by the family physician. Under his care, she said, the inflammation quickly subsided, but there still remained a sensation of irritation. Examination revealed a small fleshy-looking object about the size of a kernel of wheat adherent to the tissues posterior to the left tonsil by the one end. The other parts of the throat were normal. The little mass could not be detached by a cotton covered probe, but by the use of forceps it was easily removed, and, on examination, proved to be a piece of finger nail, which had become embedded in a cheesy deposit. A broken piece of the nail was also removed from under the mucous membrane at the same spot with a sharp-pointed probe.

"The lady then confessed to the habit of biting her finger nails, and moreover could remember that a day or two previous to her throat trouble a piece of nail she had bitten off had become lost in her mouth, but, after it had caused a few coughing, she had forgotten all about it until reminded by the discovery."

A Conjurer's Wonderful Trick.

I saw a remarkable conjuring trick performed by a Parsee on a voyage from London to Calcutta. He was a small native owner travelling for pleasure, and had taken up conjuring for an amusement. I asked for a rupee; we all inspected it; it was a genuine rupee. Then he gave it to a gentleman to hold and asked him to think of a country in Europe.

After a moment's pause the gentleman who held the coin said that he had thought of a country.

"Then open your hand," said the conjurer. "See what you have got and tell me if it is a coin of the country you thought of."

It was a five-franc piece and our friend had thought of France. He was going to hand the coin to the Parsee, but the latter said:

"No; pass it to another sahib." As it happened to be the nearest the five-franc piece was handed to me. I looked closely at it. Then, shutting my hands, I thought of America. When I opened it I found a Mexican dollar. This I handed to the gentleman on my right, who in turn thought of Russia, and on opening his hand found a Russian silver piece in place of the Mexican dollar. The juggler performed several other tricks during the voyage, but they were of a commonplace kind, and in no way comparable to the coin trick which I have never seen rivalled.—San Francisco Examiner.

Odd Items of All Sorts.

Old boots and shoes, steamed to a pulp, are now converted into the soft, strong, ornamental leather so popular for bookbinding.

Quick-firing Armstrong guns, 36 and 40 pounders, discharging ten and eleven shots a minute, have been finally adopted by the British army.

A dentist of Paris, after chloroforming a patient, with the supposed intention of extracting a tooth, robbed the unconscious sufferer of $1,000 in money and decamped.

It has been computed that the force required to drive the tenpenny nail contained in a full keg would draw a wagon loaded with a ton of coal 52 miles.

From recent archæological discoveries it appears that the Romans, at the height of their civilization and splendor, had a system of street lighting. No trace of anything of the kind has been discovered in Greece.

There was recently discovered in Central Africa a village of houses built along a street and having gabled roofs. The inhabitants, who are of superior intelligence, keep good order in the village and sleep in beds raised above the ground.

Dead Letter Office Curiosities.

The officials of the dead letter branch of the Dominion Post-office Department have many a good laugh at the curious articles which reach the department in dead letters or parcels in the course of the year: Bar drums, a door mat, cateye, boots as well as books, lottery tickets and herbs, moccasins and insurance policies, a glass eye, any number of railway and steamboat passes, socks and prayer beads, wigs and suspenders, pawn tickets and trusses, certificates of all the secret societies in creation, cheques, bonds, bills of exchange, diplomas, debentures, spectacles and a thousand other articles, varied enough to allow of the starting up of a curiosity shop in the department.

His Occupation.

Many a loving young bridegroom may deserve the epithet which illumines the following anecdote, but, as a general thing, no one discovers the fact in so short a time after marriage.

The niece of a deaf old gentleman, "way down in Maine," married one of the best musical critics of the west. On their bridal tour the husband was for the first time presented to this relative, who asked another niece in a loud whisper:

"What does he do?"

"He's a musical critic," was the loud reply.

"Waal," said the uncle, gazing at the young man, "no accountin' for tastes; but why did she marry him, if he's a mis'rable critter?"—Musical Review.

Business Is Business.

American Millionaire (year 1988)—What are the prices of admission?

Doorkeeper (United States Capitol)—Seats in the Senate are $500,000, but I can give you a seat in the House for $100,000. Thanks. Hand this ticket to the usher. Keep the coupon in your hat to avoid mistakes.—Puck

The Wilkesbarre News Dealer accuses "officials higher up in authority than the members of the force" of gathering to drink wine with Mother Hubbard dresses. We wouldn't have thought it.

THE FARMERS' CORNER.

Winter Work That No Farmer Should Neglect.

When the season is mild, and the ground in a condition to permit of ploughing, the work that can be done this month should not be delayed. The difficulty with many farmers is that they do not take advantage of the opportunities in winter of getting as much outdoor work done before spring as may be possible. The corn land should be ploughed now, if it can be done, for in this latitude there are often weeks of open weather some seasons that causes the frost to leave the ground. By ploughing such ground the frost kills the cut-worms and reduces the clods. The hauling of the manure is also work that may be done, but to save labor in the spring it should be spread evenly on the ground as fast as hauled out. Manure that is coarse and in a rough condition should be retained in the barn yard.

DECOMPOSING THE MANURE.

It is important that the manure heap be handled once or twice during the winter. Only the fine, decomposed manure should be hauled out. The coarse material should be made into another heap, well packed and saturated with urine, in order to get the manure fine before spring. Unless the heap is given care too much heat may be generated and the materials injured by "fire-fanging," with a loss of ammonia. This is prevented by turning the contents of the heap over occasionally. The objection may be that the handling of large quantities of manure is laborious, which is true, but it pays to bestow the labor. To haul out on to the fields a mass of coarse rubbish, consisting of cornstalks and straw that have undergone no change is to haul that from which no benefit can be derived for a long time. Before any kind of manure can be available to plants it must decompose and become soluble in water. This process will be quick or slow, according to its preparation in the heap before it reaches the fields.

TRIMMING AND PRUNING.

The grape vines should be trimmed in cold weather. If the work is deferred until spring the vines will "bleed" (lose sap) and be weakened. The raspberries, blackberries and all small fruits can be trimmed in winter and the old wood cut away. The strawberries can be manured and the asparagus beds looked after, it being the earliest of the vegetables. The manure for hot-beds must be saved, and it will save time to cut away all the surplus branches of the orchard trees.

VARIOUS OTHER TOPICS.

For manuring very poor soil the American Agriculturist recommends buckwheat as the best crop, turning under two crops a year.

If a good account of expenses and sales are kept there will always be a balance in favor of sheep breeding; not so much as a specialty; but as an assistant to other farm animals and crops.

If cream is not well stirred you will find at the bottom of the can more or less clabber and whey. This, in churning, may cause the white specks in butter some complain of; but, whether it does or not, the cream is all the better for being thoroughly and frequently stirred.

If dairymen would continue to successfully meet the close competition which is sure to confront them and have a profit left they must always be ready with the best cow and the cheapest food to supply the best article of milk possible for the end for which it is to be used.

A correspondent of the Ohio Farmer ascribes the immunity of the swine-pens from cholera to the liberal use he makes of wood ashes. He does not think the ashes a cure or positive preventive, but his neighbors' swine suffered severely from cholera, while his pens were entirely free from the disease.

At the meeting of the Western New York Horticultural Society salt has been recommended for mildew. We see it stated that Jean Sisley, the famous rose grower of Lyons, France, applies six pounds of salt dissolved in 100 quarts of water to destroy mildew and other low forms of plant life, without injury to roses.

Sunflower seed is coming to the fore as an article of commercial value. As an admixture to chicken food its merits are indisputable. Veterinarians use it in a medicinal way in the treatment of horses. Its growth is considered of use in the prevention of malaria, and the extraction of a valuable oil from it is a looked-for result.

Of all the nutrients fat has considerably the highest heat, muscular power and fat producing power. As a heat producer it has about two and one-fifth times the potency of the carbhydrates, pound for pound; and as a fat former the comparison, if exact figures could be obtained, would probably show not very much less in its favor.

Let me conclude by saying that I have found ensilage equally valuable for sheep, cattle and horses. I feed it to all my stock from December 1st till into March. For sheep and mares with sucking colts I think it is peculiarly good, but I was never so pleased with winter feeding of all my stock as during last winter while feeding ensilage. —A. J. Cook.

Dairy cows should be fed twice only a day. The dairy cow needs rest as well as food. She will eat more slowly, masticate more and digest her food better if she gets two meals at regular intervals. The meals should be full ones. A quiet and contented habit should be cultivated in the cows. Such habits are conducive to a greater production.

A correspondent of the Country Gentleman recommends aconite, in doses of three-fourths of an ounce of the tincture, as a specific for milk fever. The first dose is the quantity named above; the second, given six hours later, was half as much as the first, and the third, half as much as the second. She was then well enough to eat a little hay, and in three or four days was turned out with the other cows cured.

Almost Incredible.

Jones—Strong minded girl, that daughter of Brown's.

Smith—Is she? I never thought so.

Jones—You can bet she is. She refused to elope with the coachman yesterday.

Smith—Heavens, what will power!

TELEGRAPHIC SUMMARY.

Sir David Macpherson arrived at Monte Carlo last week, and is now proceeding to San Remo, where he will probably reside for two months.

There is a quantity of counterfeit bills in circulation in Montreal.

Deputy Postmaster Conway, of Windsor, will be married next week. The bride is a resident of Toronto.

The floods in Italy are extending to Basti, and have done much damage. In one house which collapsed twelve persons were killed.

At a mayoralty meeting in Windsor last night Mr. Sol White, one of the candidates, said he was both loyal and in favor of political union.

Secretary of State Chapleau has begun to undergo treatment at the hands of his Paris physician, who entertains the strongest hopes of his full recovery.

The inquest into the death of George Saxsmith, through the explosion in the ammonia works at Toronto on Christmas Day, was resumed last night, but was further adjourned.

Dr. George Smith died at Stratford at 6 o'clock last evening. He was for many years a prominent physician and much esteemed. He was brother of the late Chief Justice Smith, of Manitoba.

Most of the Republican journals describe the manifesto issued by Gen. Boulanger to the electors of the Department of the Seine as a tissue of calumny and brag, and say it is not worthy of discussion.

A Washington special says the Navy Department has received a despatch from Rear-Admiral Luce stating that yellow fever had broken out on the Yantic, and that she had left Jamaica for New York on that account.

William Forbes, a single man, 20 years of age, employed by the Brush Electric Light Company at Detroit for a year past as a lamp trimmer, while at work fixing the electric light in Walker's drug store, corner of Woodward avenue and Selby street, yesterday morning, received a shock of electricity and fell to the floor from his ladder. He died in seven minutes. He did not speak after falling. A coroner was called and an investigation is under way.

Mr. Archibald McKillop, sen., proprietor of the large saw mills at West Lorne, had a narrow escape from instant death on Thursday afternoon. He was in the lumber woods watching his men felling a tree, which lodged in falling, when a large limb flew backwards to the ground, just touching Mr. McKillop on the point of the shoulder. Medical attendance was at once summoned, and in a few days he will be around again. A couple of inches nearer the tree and he would never have known what had happened him.

A serious accident occurred to one of the men engaged on the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway at London, about 1.30 yesterday afternoon. He was employed driving piles on the low river land near Oxford street bridge. The men were engaged in erecting a new pile driver, and when the apparatus was nearly up it toppled over, and the men had all to run for their lives. A carpenter named Fleming, of South street, however, was not able to get out of the way in time, and the heavy timber crushed him to the ground, fearfully injuring him. One of his arms and one of his legs were broken, his spine was badly injured, and his chest crushed in. It is doubtful if he can recover. He was taken to his home on South street in the ambulance.

Flattie Healey, aged 15, daughter of Mrs. Healey, of St. Thomas, was reprimanded by her mother yesterday morning and accused of being out at night. The girl got into a fearful passion, went across the street to a drug store and purchased a large package of Paris green, when she took a dose large enough to kill two or three persons. Dr. Smith, the surgeon of the Young Men's Christian Association hospital, happened to be present, and at once applied the stomach pump. The girl was given into the hands of Chief Fewings and taken to the lockup, where she stated she would poison herself the first opportunity she had. She was brought before the Police Magistrate and remanded until next Friday. It appears that a young man came on Thursday night and took her out, ostensibly to a party, but they did not return until 4 next morning. The girl is unusually pretty and attractive-looking.

Blenheim was lighted by electricity on Saturday night.

Mr. C. H. Tupper will speak at the Club Cartier banquet in Montreal to-night.

Kingston people enjoyed a steamer excursion to Cape Vincent on Saturday.

E. P. Leacock, ex-M. P. P., is out as a Conservative candidate for the Commons in Provencher, Man.

Henry Border, of Fourteen Island Lake, killed a huge bear on Thursday. He encountered it with an axe.

Dr. Jones, Enterprise, has been convicted a second time of practising medicine contrary to law, and fined $50 and costs.

Two weeks ago a youth named John McGinty, of Gananoque, was shot accidentally by a companion. The wound has ended fatally.

Hon. A. Mackenzie has secured rooms at the Grand Union, Ottawa, where Mr. and Mrs. Mackenzie will stay during the sitting of Parliament.

A farmer named Leck, residing in Valcartier, Que., was kicked to death by a horse while endeavoring to take the animal out of his stall.

Mr. Justice Casault has been appointed Administrator of the Province of Quebec, in consequence of the illness of Lieut.-Governor Angers.

The Ontario Government have offered $100 for the arrest of Alex. McDuff, charged with complicity in the Holton murder, near Windsor.

William Viant, aged 19 years, has been committed to Picton jail for criminally assaulting a 12-year-old girl, Jennie Thompson, an orphan living at Consecon.

Mrs. Allan McGie, a well-known lady in Ottawa, feeling faint on Friday morning, lay down on a sofa and expired almost immediately from disease of the heart.

Ald. John Heney, of Ottawa, has been made a Knight of the Holy Sepulchre by the Pope for his efforts in the cause of temperance. To be honored for such a cause is a real reason for honest pride.

Saturday morning Chief of Police Rozel, of Peterboro', received a telegram from Mrs. Thos. Young, Campbellford, instructing him to arrest Thos. Young, her husband, with a family, who was eloping with the cook of Blute's Hotel, of which Young was hostler, but the runaway couple arrived in town by one line and took train by another for Toronto before the police were aware of their elopement.

The congregation of St. Andrew's Church, one of the wealthiest and most fashionable in Ottawa, have decided to make all seats in the church free on Sunday evenings. Last evening the new order of things began, when Rev. Mr. Herridge preached to a large congregation.

On Saturday afternoon William Patrick Devlin, 30 years old, undertook to put a belt on a drum in Morrison's mill, which is about a mile from Fredericton, N. B. His left arm became caught and he was dragged between the belt and the drum. The arm was pulled out of the socket and every particle of clothing torn from his body. The flesh was torn on the arm and his body badly bruised. William Godsee, who went to his assistance, was struck by Devlin's boots and knocked senseless. When he recovered he stopped the engine. Devlin died at a late hour on Saturday night, after having borne his terrible suffering with great heroism. He leaves a wife and one child.

Seven skaters were drowned in the Ludwig Canal at Nuremberg yesterday.

On Saturday Mr. Gladstone visited Pompeii on a vessel lent by the municipal authorities of Naples.

The King of the Netherlands is dying. His chronic malady is worse. He takes nourishment with difficulty.

The Glasgow Unionists are preparing to give a grand entertainment to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and wife on the occasion of his visit to that city on February 11th and 12th.

At a banquet at Grau last night Cardinal Simoe, Primate of Hungary, offered a toast in honor of the Pope. In a violent speech he denounced Italy's treatment of the Pope as infamous.

During a heavy storm accompanied by a high wind, which prevailed in Southern Hungary yesterday, a railway train was blown from the track near Fiume. Three passengers were killed and many injured.

At Ballymitty Solicitor Moran was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and Mr. Finucane and others to one month each for conspiring to prevent the taking of farms from which tenants had been evicted.

The emigrants from England in 1888 numbered 280,068, slightly less than in the previous year. The decrease of emigrants to the United States was 5,565, and to Australia 2,961, but to Canada there was an increase of 3,080.

So many Berliners on Saturday went to the Opera House to see a dress rehearsal of a play relating to the first Hohenzollern elector of Bradenburg that the authorities directed a change in the plot, on the ground that it reflected on the Royal family.

This is Mr. Ruskin's sixth attack of what is guardedly described as mental disturbance. These attacks grow more frequent and the symptoms more menacing The present illness is reported less serious than the last, but causes his friends great anxiety.

Excitement was caused in the court at Naas on Saturday by Solicitor Hurley, counsel for the prisoners on trial, shouting that Judge Fitzgerald's conduct on the bench was a scandal. Hurley was sentenced to seven days' imprisonment for contempt of court.

A report is current that Sir Baden Powell will shortly proceed to Washington and Ottawa as special English plenipotentiary on the Fisheries question. Such an appointment is quite improbable. The rumor is only one of many similar puffs promoted by Powell's friends.

It is asserted that the British Government will defray expenses of witnesses on both sides who are summoned before the Parnell Commission, strictly limiting these expenses, however, to fares to London and return to their respective homes, and the legitimate outlay for meals and lodgings while there.

The German Landtag is convened for the 14th inst. A measure will be presented increasing the King's civil list by 3,000,000 marks, this sum being additional to the amount requested from the Reichstag. The semi-official papers argue that the allowance should be more; that according to the feeling in Berlin it ought to be double the amount asked.

Further evictions were made on Saturday on the Olphert estates, at Falcarragh, county Donegal. At one house only was resistance made, but after a fight, which lasted fifteen minutes, the defenders yielded. The last house visited by the evictors was found to be so strongly fortified that the Magistrate decided not to attempt its capture on Saturday. The attack was therefore postponed until Monday.

Osman Digna's first lieutenant has deserted his leader and has arrived at Suakim. He reports that the rebels are enraged with Osman Digna for seizing their effects and their wives, he giving as his reason for such a course that the rebels chewed tobacco, which is contrary to the precepts laid down by the Mahdi. He also reports that 2,000 dervishes at Handoub are squabbling with Osman Digna concerning the evacuation of the place, a majority of the dervishes being desirous of retiring from the town. The deserter declares that Emin Bey has been captured, and that he is a prisoner at Khartoum, where he is well treated by his captors.

A big storm is raging at Long Branch, N.J. The streets of Seabright are inundated and the people are compelled to use row boats.

Rev. F. Israel, pastor of the First Unitarian Church at Salem, Mass., committed suicide in his church on Saturday evening by cutting his throat.

The Governor of New York has commuted to imprisonment for life Adolph Reich, convicted in the county of New York of the crime of murder in the first degree, and now under sentence of death.

William Mann, an artist, shot and killed his niece, Mrs. Carrie Jones, and committed suicide on Saturday in an uptown tenement, at New York. The woman had been living with Mann as his wife for several years.

Robert Gregg, of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., on Saturday, while practising shooting at a target nailed against the side of an old shanty, after firing a number of shots, heard a groan from the interior of the building. Investigation proved he had shot and killed a tramp, who is known there only as "Pat." The coroner's jury exonerated Gregg of any intention to shoot the man.

On Friday Mr. Brooks, a prominent young merchant of McDowell's Mills, went to Fayettesville, Tenn., secured his marriage license and started home. On Saturday morning his dead body was found lying on the roadside with a bullet hole through his head. When he left town he was accompanied by a man named Smith, who was a bitter rival of his for the hand of the young lady Brooks was to marry. There is considerable excitement over the affair.

B. S. Stapleton has been doing a wholesale business in the sale of Louisiana lottery tickets in a very bold way at Cleveland for some time past. It is estimated that his sales have averaged 96 000 a month, and he is said to have sold 8,000 tickets in a single week for the big December drawing. He was arrested Saturday in company with one of his clerks. Police in citizens' dress managed to buy tickets at his place. The business has been conducted in connection with a cigar store.

A double stage robbery occurred near Cloverdale, Cal., on Saturday night. The down stage from Mendocino City was stopped near Philo about 11 o'clock by a masked highwayman, who demanded the treasure-box, and holding a revolver in one hand took the box from the driver with the other. He thanked the driver and ordered him to drive on. He then remarked, "Good night, gentlemen." The stage had only gone a few yards when it met the up stage, and the driver remarked that he had been robbed also.

An Obliging Sor of a Fellow.

Stranger (furiously, striding up to fine looking man in hotel lobby)—See here, your name s Raike, isn't it? Well, I understand you're making love to my wife—my wife, sir!

Raike (calmly)—Ah! what name, sir?

Stranger (still more furious)—Smith, sir, Smith!

Raike takes out note book with index, turns to "S,' and runs his eye over the list, and says, inquiringly—First name, please?

Smith—William J. William J. Smith, sir.

Raike (looks over names again)—Ah, yes, here it is. Well, what do you want me to do?

Smith—I want you to stop making love to her, sir.

Raike—Ah! (takes pencil, runs it through the name William J. Smith, then lights cigarette, bows politely and walks off).—St. Louis Humorist.

But He Didn't.

It was the night before the wedding, and he was bidding her good night, and softly whispered: "To-morrow eve, my darling, we begin our journey as bride and bridegroom, pilgrims of life together: hand in hand will we journey a down life's rugged road. We shall want to set out with a glorious equipment of faith and hope and courage, that neither of us may faint and fall by the wayside before the journey is ended; will we not, darling?"

"I—I—oh, yes, to be sure; only I really am so worried about the train of my dress. It didn't hang one bit nice to-day when I tried the dress on, and I'd die with mortification if it hung so at the wedding to-morrow. Go on with what you were saying, dear."

An Accommodating Author.

"Your story, Mr. Winterkill," said the magazine editor to the rising young author, "suits me very well. I observe in it some trivial faults, however. For instance, you describe the heroine's canary as drinking water by 'lapping it up eagerly with her tongue.' Isn't that a peculiar way for a canary to drink water?"

"Your criticism surprises me," said Mr. Winterkill in a pained voice. "Still, if you think your readers would prefer it perhaps it would be better to let the canary drink its water with a teaspoon."

Lessons in Economy.

Paterfamilias—"See here! what does this mean? The parlor clock is stopped. Mr. Nicefellow was here last night as usual, wasn't he?"

Daughter—"Yes, pa, and I told him what you said about the cost of coal and gas in the parlor every night, and we began to wonder how we could economize for you, and finally Mr. Nicefellow decided that we could at least stop the clock and save wear and tear on the works, you know."

Curiosities of the Phonograph.

"I listened yesterday to my own voice in a phonograph," remarked the snake editor this morning, "and I would not have recognized it as mine if I had not known. People do not know what their voices sound like until they hear them in that wonderful machine."

"In that case," replied the horse editor, "it would be a good idea to make a lot of our public singers sample their own music. It might cause them to quit."

A Contest Between Singers.

The coldest sort of a competition is that to come off among the young women of the Bath (Eng.) Philharmonic Society. They will sing behind a curtain, so that they cannot be seen, and the judges will have to vote on the number of the singer. Each will sing one sacred song and an English ballad.

MISS STIRLING, the Salvationist and latest "Prisoner of Chillon," after an imprisonment of fifty-nine days, has been released on bail, pending the hearing of her appeal against the sentence of imprisonment for 100 days. Miss Stirling's only offence against the law was exercising the rights of a female teacher and preacher. Her case has awakened much sympathy beyond Salvationist circles.

Though nearly a million Lebel rifles have been turned out in France, the Government workshops are still turning out 3,000 a day more.

BESIEGED BY WILD HOGS.

The Terrible All-night Experience of a Boy in the Mountains.

Up here in the sombre, rugged Shawangunks hoop-pole cutting is becoming quite an industry. Chase Van Wagonen, who lives here, tramps seven miles daily to his "hoop ranch," which is situated in a gloomy, desolate locality known as Pollymazotte, just west of the famous Dark Hole. Several times during the past week Van Wagonen has been obliged to go dinnerless, owing to the depredations of quadrupeds who roam about in vast numbers and comparatively unmolested. A day or two ago Van Wagonen took his son, the eldest of several children, with him for company and to watch his dinner. Young Joshua and his father reached their destination soon after daybreak, and, while the elder began his daily task, "Josh" busied himself in kindling a roaring fire, around which he built a wall of stones.

At noon a hearty dinner was eaten. Van Wagonen returned to his work, and Joshua, after replenishing the fire, armed himself with his father's trusty rifle and started out in search of adventure and small game. The sturdy little chap had tramped about three miles, when he heard an ugly grunt and saw at the same time a wild boar that had been taking a siesta on a pile of sunny leaves. There was an oak tree near by, and "Josh's" legs did good service in climbing to a place of safety among its branches. In his haste he had dropped the rifle, and when he glanced downward the boy's heart turned sick with fear. All about were sheltered nests of leaves, which he knew well would be occupied at night by scores of wild hogs. The boar was still on watch, and unless he should relax his vigils all escape was shut off.

Scream after scream and pitiful cries for help met with no response, and before an hour passed the hogs began gathering, and night closed in dark and cold. The wind cut like a razor, and little "Josh" was obliged to rub his already peeled legs against the tree bark to keep them from freezing. All through that long, dreary night the boy kicked and moved about on his high perch to keep the blood from congealing in his veins; but toward morning his strength gave out, and when rescued by his father and a band of Shawangunk Mountain hunters the child was lifted from a terribly perilous position in which he had fallen while asleep. One foot dangled within three feet of the boar's reach. The child was carried home more dead than alive, and for several hours he lay in a perilous condition. The boy says it was light when he fell asleep, so that he must have just fallen when rescued. The wild boar and three other hogs were shot by the hunters. —Upper Stony Kill (N.Y.) corr. New York Times.

Asphalt Pavements Kill Trees.

In connection with the re-paving of Brooklyn streets, which has become a subject of pressing concern through the recent outgiving of the Mayor, an interesting point has been made concerning the effect of asphalt pavements on trees. Experience shows that in streets where such pavements have been laid the trees do not flourish, if indeed they do not speedily wither. The reason is not far to seek. It is apparent on a moment's thought that it is almost impossible for water to penetrate to the roots of the trees beneath such an impervious covering, and hence their decline is inevitable. No plans are now in view for increasing the asphalt pavements in Brooklyn, but this matter is worth keeping in mind against the possibility that the question may be raised at some time in the future. Asphalt pavements have certain undoubted advantages, along with equally undoubted disadvantages. The drawback mentioned here is doubtless seldom taken into account. —New York Tribune.

All in a Half Century.

The unification of Italy.
The annexation of Texas.
The French revolution of 1848.
The discovery of photography.
The laying of the ocean cable.
The discovery of the telephone.
The emancipation of Russian serfs.
The discovery of the electric telegraph.
The overthrow of the Pope's temporal power.
The establishment of ocean steam navigation.
The extension of Russian power into Central Asia.
The great Franco-German war and the unification of Germany.
The great civil war and the abolition of slavery in the United States.
The rise and fall of Napoleon III., and establishment of the French Republic.
The discovery of the source of the Nile and Niger, and the exploration of interior Africa.

Neither has Anything to Spare.

Nephew (who recently married a handsome but penniless girl, to his rich but stingy uncle)—"Well, my dear uncle, how goes everything at your house?"

Uncle—"Oh, thanks, we have everything we need. How do you get on with your bride?"

Nephew—"Thanks, also; we need everything we have."

Christmas Not Over.

Frost—Well, it's all over. Snow—What's all over? Frost—Christmas. I say it only comes once a year and it's all over until next time. Snow—Not by a jugful. The bills are not in yet for half the stuff my wife bought and charged to me.

Number Two.

Before the first baby is four months old its photograph must be taken, and copies sent by its doting parents to relatives and dear friends. The second baby, although it may be as beautiful as a poet's dream, is a mighty lucky youngster if it gets its photograph taken before it is four years old.—Drake's Magazine.

In the Dressing-Room.

"Polly, you remind me of the mirror you are looking into."

"Why so?"

"Because you are a good lookin-g-lass."

The entire matter in regard to Modjeska and Edwin Booth is very simple: Booth offered to give Modjeska the position of leading lady in his company. She wanted to star. So did Booth. Some other lady will play "leads" with Booth next season.

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1.50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:

THURSDAY, JAN. 17 1889.

It is an almost decided thing that we are to have a two-cent letter postage at no very distant date. This has become a necessity. Extensive users of Her Majesty's mails along the border have formed the bad habit of shipping their letters in bulk to the other side and posting them there for distribution throughout Canada, thereby saving a cent on each. This with a few other incentives, has caused the Government to think seriously about making our letter tariff uniform with that of the United States. They cant think too seriously about it.

The municipal elections went on quietly in the city of Toronto this year, and yet there was one strong, swift and sure under current that swamped a number of would-be aldermen. The Toronto World is at enmity with unionism. It is a "journalistic blackleg." Out of seven candidates for aldermanic honors who placed their election cards in the World, one only was successful. Two school trustees were also knocked out for the same cause. The World has a hard fight before it, and is now standing with its back to the wall, fighting everything and everybody. When this wall (which is of pasteboard) gives way the effluvia rising from Melinda street will keep Toronto's medical health officer busy for six months.

On Friday last we had the pleasure of a little chat with D. Creighton, M. P. P., manager of the Empire, who was on his way to Owen Sound for the purpose of attending the North Grey Conservative Association. Mr. Creighton looked happy and self-satisfied, and well he may. The Empire, he says, has made a wonderful stride during the past year. Its advertising patronage and subscription list is swiftly on the increase. The Empire's sporting editor, Mr. H. J. P. Good, who has been visiting England for the benefit of his health, has just returned. The staff of the paper is very much the same as it was on its inception—the best in Canada. The paper is also the best in Canada, and Mr. Creighton may well feel proud of his bouncing baby.

Entrance Examinations.

The result of the late high school entrance examinations came to hand on Thursday evening last, by way of our popular public school inspector, Mr. N. W. Campbell, of Durham. There is a little matter in connection with this which requires explanation from some quarter. In the first place the time consumed in arriving at the result has been more than a week longer than that of the counties around us. That, of course, may be explained by the fact of there being only one high school board, making their duties somewhat large. But we fancy that the publishing of the results in one paper in the county previous to any publication elsewhere cannot so easily be explained away. It is an injustice to the papers; it is an injustice to the pupils of the county that it should not be published simultaneously in all the papers, and we want an explanation. Here are the results, as obligingly furnished us by Mr. Campbell:

FLESHERTON—43 CANDIDATES.

Sarah Cunningham 381, Ellen Dulan 445, Jennie Hale 389, Lena Large 412, Agnes Meagher, 436, Maggie McAsey 377, Maggie McCallum 472, Amelia McFarland 377, Gertie McLeod 365, Maud Robertson 404, Hattie Shore 417, Katie E. Summers 468, Mary Symes 424, Jenny Treadgold 479, Thomas D. Atkinson 427, John W. Ford 365, Thomas Leggett 386, Lachlan McLean 402, George Smith, 382, David Symes 403, Fredus Thurston, 412.

DUNDALK—14 CANDIDATES.

Lizzie Carr 489, Jennie Lamon 531, Annie McLellan 386, John Maxwell 467.

THORNBURY—65 CANADIAN.

Maggie Clugstone 448, Sarah Dales 398, Maud Donahue 436, Annie Green 396, Jessie Guthrie 454, Bertha Hamilton 369, Florence Howe 398, Carrie Hurlburt 377, Ethel Keyes 373, Annie Lambert 402, Maggie McGillivray 517, Emmor McGuire 433, Barbara Mckenzie 372, Sarah Anna Lea 480, Gertie Rorke 378, Madge H. Soul 480, Minnie Taylor 441, Harold Carnahan 380, Richard Dales 429, Rob't. Greer 473, Wm. Howe 593, Clement Keys 494, Allen Latomell 405, Arthur Latomell, 484, J. H. Marsh 437, John A. Mitchell 370, Walter J. Moore 396, T. W. Tyson 413.

NEUSTADT—17 CANDIDATES.

Winnie McEdward 396, Ida Schwadt 427, Geo. Elbelt 489, Martin Foster 438, Nathaniel Hallman 401, John Hammer 399.

A Terrific Storm

On Wednesday night of last week a terrible wind storm drove over western Pennsylvania, part of New York State, and the southern portion of Canada. A despatch from Niagara says.

One of the most disastrous storms known for years swept over Niagara Falls and vicinity Wednesday night, dealing out destruction on every hand. The storm commenced about 5 p.m., gradually increasing in force until midnight, when it reached the height of its fury and became a veritable hurricane. The excitement was intense next morning when it became known that the upper (foot) suspension bridge, nearly opposite the Clifton house, had been blown into the river. The story at first was not credited, but upon investigation it was found to be only too true. At about 3 a.m. J. Barthaw, bridge tender, who was on duty, fancied he heard a strange creaking sound above the storm, but he thought nothing of it, taking it for granted that possibly one of the guy wires had snapped. In a few minutes, however, he took up his lantern and walked outside the office to see if the storm was abating any. As soon as Barthaw stepped outside of the door the wind jerked the lantern out of his hand like a flash, leaving him in the darkness. The lantern was re lighted, and peering through the storm of snow and spray the gate tender was almost parlyzed find to that the bridge was gone from one end to the other, leaving nothing but the cables and steel towers which are uninjured. The loss will amount to about $100,000. The bridge was first built in 1867, and was opened to the public in 1869. It was then only single track. A year ago last September the work of replacing the single roadway by a double track was commenced, and was completed in September last at a cost of over $75,000.

The Southampton Pioneer has suspended publication.

The Orangeville Post takes a holiday for a week. It made a couple of hundred out of its Christmas daily. Its enterprise is to be commended.

Tremendous interest is being taken in the approaching Carnival in Montreal. The Governor General is to inaugurate the festivities and give the entire week's programme his patronage. State Governors, Lieut-Governors and prominent people from all parts of the world are to view the spectacle. Letters are pouring in to the Committee from Europe and the United States enquiring for particulars. The committee are making extraordinary preparations for a magnificent Carnival. Those who cannot go to Montreal for a week of wonderous merriment will, we hear find the events in all their marvelous beauty reproduced in the Carnival Number of the Montreal Star, which it is said will be a perfectly stunning number.

Dundalk Herald: The family of Mr. McKee on the gravel road near Corbetton has been sorely afflicted. Mr. and Mrs. McKee, with three children, were all down with the typhus fever. The neighbors, it appears were so afraid, of the disease that the afflicted family were left entirely alone. A man came and milked the cows, leaving the milk on the doorstep from whence it was taken by one of the inmates. It was reported that a certain party was offered a dollar to wash a few necessary articles but refused. If all is true that is repored, the sick family have been shamefully neglected. To let such suffering exist without extending a helping hand is not only unchristian, but savors of cruelty.

There are several cases of diphtheria in Stayner.

Markdale Standard: On Tuesday last while running a straw cutter by horse power, Wm. John Bell, son of Mr. James Bell, Bell's Lake, had his right arm drawn into the cogs, mangling the arm from the wrist nearly to the shoulder, and chewing the clothing into shreds. Very little flesh was left on the bone. Dr. McBride was sent for and dressed the torn and bleeding arm and will endeavor to save it from amputation.

Autumn.

Ye glorious maples why those blushes
Upon thy golden leaves?
The sweet south wind brings soft reply;
Ever the maples, ere they die,
Put on their scarlet robes—then slow
But leaf by leaf we see them go.

O maples stay thee, I am drinking
Thy matchless glory in!
The flowers may fade, may die away,
But thou so bright, so cheering, stay!
Thou art as sunshine to my heart,
And when so welcome why depart?

Yonder the red leaves sob and tremble
And softly answer me:
"We go the wind hath wooed us long
With tender voice and sweet love-song:
Farewell! perchance in Autumn's reign
Thou'lt view us glory robed again!"

"Farewell to thee, my lovely idol!
I weep to see thee go,
Farewell, all golden-edged and bright,
All crimson tinged, thou lovely sight
Farewell to thee! but still again
I'll view thee, love, in autumn's reign!"

Owen Sound, 1888. EDITH B. VANDUSEN.

A report comes from Chicago that the police officials most prominent in capturing the anarchists will be placed under serious charges at an early day.

NEW ADVERTISEMETNS.

Ayer's Almanac--1889--Bound Volume.

A Perpetual Calendar.

The book, in twenty one languages, should be a valuable addition to any library. It will be useful

1. To persons who may desire to refer to dates, the phases of the moon, the times of sunrise and sunset &c., throught the year 1886, and for occasional reference throughout many years following. The tables are adapted to various parts of the world

2. To astronomical students, for its reliable information as to eclipses and the movements of the principal planets.

3. To students of comparative philology Follow the name of Ayer's Cherry Pectorial, or Ayer's sarsaparilla, for example, through the different pamphlets here brought together.

4. To those who are interested in the latest improvements in printing. Read the introductory chapter.

5. To such as would know what to do in cases of accident See the Book of Emergencies and Ayer's Handy Book at the end of the volume.

6. To students of history. See the events noticed on the calender pages throughout the book and observe how this information is made locally valuable; as, for instance, in Almanac No. 8 intended for India, and see last cover page of that Almanac for a curious table of the Holidays of India Hindu, Mohammedan, Parsi, &c.

7. To students of religious customs. See the many saints' days and Church festivals noticed in the Almanacs hereto, intended for Catholic countries Portuguese, Spanish, &c.

8. To persons curious in regard to the customs of foreign countries See the numerous tables in the Portuguese Almanac (No. 16) and the Days' Names Dagnes namn at foot of the Swedish Calenders (No. 25, for example.

9. To the lovers of a little quiet fun. See humorous items at foot of the calendar pages. If you don't find anything sufficiently funny in English, try the Welsh or Bohemian.

10. To the sick and afflicted of various classes. The book is full of good advice. By its help, you may 'take no medicine in twenty one languages,' and the remedies it recommends are safe to use the best of their kind, Ayer's Standard Family Medicines.

11. To the recipient of this volume the book should be especially valuable, because it is unique It cannot be duplicated and the edition is exhausted.

12. Well, the above specifications are enough. We dont want to make this book seem so valuable that you will put it in a glass case never to be opened.

WANTED!

Elm stave bolts. Cash paid.
S. DAMUDE, Flesherton.

Farm to Rent.

Lots 22 and 24, 2nd R., S. D. R., about half a mile west of Flesherton Station, containing 100 acres, 75 cleared. Apply to ADAM MUIR.

Farm for Sale.

Being west half lot 31, Con 8, Artemesia, containing 50 acres. There are on the premises a good log house, good frame out buildings, and a young orchard. It is well watered, well fenced and in a fair state of cultivation. There are about 25 acres cleared and the balance in hardwood and timber. For further particulars apply to the proprietor.

NEIL MACKAY,
On the Premises. Eugenia, P. O.

GO TO

BLACKBURN'S

FOR

FLOUR, FEED, AND

PROVISIONS.

A large stock always on hand. Dealer in

FRESH and CURED MEATS, NEW LARD, BOLOGNA, ETC.

BUY YOUR BEEF

—AT—

BLACKBURN'S

The applications of the Manitoba Railway Committee for liberty to effect crossings of the C. P. R. lines at portage la Prairie and Morris came up again before the Railway Committee at Ottawa Thursday, and after some argument by opposing counsel were further postponed till the 25th inst.

On Tuesday a sneak thief got away with $7000 from the Hull branch of the Ville Marie Bank.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 50 to	5 50
Fall Wheat	0 95 to	1 00
Spring Wheat	0 95	1 00
Barley	0 40	0 55
Oats	0 32	0 32
Peas	0 55	0 57
Butter	0 17	0 17
Eggs, fresh	0 18	0 18
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 25	6 75
Hay per ton	8 00	10 00
Hides	3 50	4 00
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 7	0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 06

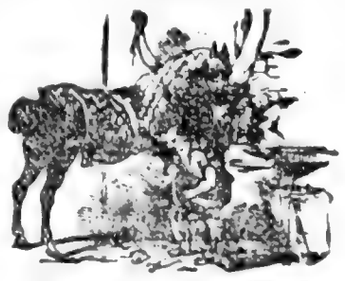
J. P. OTTEWELL,

VETERINARY SURGEON.

Graduate of Ontario Vet. College,

RESIDENCE ON COLLINGWOOD STREET
Sixth Door East of Presbyterian Church.

FLESHERTON.



D. McTavish,

HORSESHOER AND

GENERAL BLACKSMITH,

Collingwood Street,

FLESHERTON, - ONT.

Manufacturing of Wagons, Sleighs, Buggies' Democrats, etc. Horseshoeing promptly attended to. Special attention given to contracted or tender feet

Logging and Plow Chains constantly on hand.

TENDERS WANTED.

The school trustees of S. S. No. 5, Flesherton, will receive tenders up to, and including Saturday the 19th inst., for the cleaning, dusting, and lighting of fires for the year 1889. Tenders to be left at Dr Christie's office.

Farms to Rent!

IMPROVED and UNIMPROVED

FARMS FOR SALE.

Apply to

J. W. ARMSTRONG.

Flesherton, Jan. 7th, '89

NOW IS THE TIME TO SPECULATE,

as west Toronto Junction is booming. Manufactures are flocking in & Wrahan Whitby, Real estate Brokers, 972 Queen St. West Toronto, have a few more lots on very easy terms at the old prices, which will double in value in one year. Call or write for particulars.

Great Bargains!

—ON—

VILLAGE and FARM PROPERTY.

S. Damude offers for sale west half of lot 16, Con. 9, Euphrasia, the Talbot farm 100 acres, nearly all cleared and under cultivation; $2,000, $500 cash, ballance can remain on mortgage at 6 per cent.

Markdale Property.

Dwelling house and shop on Mill St., corner lot, $300.00

42 acres in the TOWNSHIP of ARTEMESIA Brick house and good barn, adjoining VILLAGE of FLESHERTON, $1,600. For further particulars apply to S. DAMUDE, Flesherton.

It Pays To

AND THAT IS THE Northern

Business College,

OF OWEN SOUND.

The best and most practical course of study
The best teaching talent.
The best accommodation for students.
The best methods of instruction.
The best results from that instruction after students graduate.

For annual announcements giving particulars regarding the course of study, terms &c., address

C. A. FLEMING, PRINCIPAL.

Owen Sound, Nov. 1st, 188

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts, 2nd door North of Richardson & Co's.

Medical.

DR. CARTER,

M.C.P. & S., ONT.

PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.

FLESHERTON.

Office, Strain's block. Residence, J. G. Russel's

J. G. Hutton, M.D.C.M.

Member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Ontario.

Enquire at office, one door east of Grier's store or Atkinson's Hotel.

Priceville, Nov 19, 1888.

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.

SURGEON DENTIST

Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the R.C.D.S.,

Will visit FLESHERTON, (Mapleton's Hotel) 1 and 2 of each month. Teeth extracted, inserted and filled in the highest styles of the art, and at moderate rates.

HEAD OFFICE, 761 YONGE ST., TORONTO.

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST,

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.

Flesherton each trip on the day following.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office,—Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.

A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER in B. R., Conveyancer, &c. Agent for purchased sale of lands. Appraiser for C. L. C. Com and F. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. ISSUER OF MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Town or Farm Property,

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton.

W. J. BELLAMY,

TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT, &c.

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance effected in first-class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton in B. R., Licensed Conveyancer, Appraiser and Commissioner, Real Estate and Insurance Lender. Mortgages, Leases and Wills made out. Deeds, Valuations made on short notice. Auction Sales attended to in any part of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections made with promptness and despatch. Agent for the Dominion Company Liverpool. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Glasgow, London or British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will do well before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sy[illegible]an,

The Tinsmith, Flesherton

Repairing, Eavetroughing and everything in the business executed promptly and at reasonable rates. Satisfaction guaranteed every time or money refunded.

Try The Ad[illegible] one year for $1 or six months or 50 cts

FLESHERTON

FURNITURE

WAREROOMS

J. E. M-O-O-R-E.

A NEW DEPARTURE!

In which we are able to give our customers

Large Reductions!

on all goods Our stock is very complete, consisting of Parlor Suites, in plush and hair cloth. Bedroom Suites In Walnut and Mahogany, and Stained Woods, and Very cheap for CASH.

IN

CHAIRS

we have an immense assortment of every description imaginable,

TABLES

from $1.50 to the handsome

EXTENSION DINING TABLES!

LOUNGES

SOFAS

AND

EASY CHAIRS!

In a variety of styles at low prices. In fact, if you want anything in

Furniture,
Sewing Machines,
Instruments, or
Picture Frames,

Call and see us as we intend to sell

CHEAP FOR CASH!

1 PER CENT. ON ALL SALES.

Undertaking as usual.

ALL KINDS OF SEWING MACHINES REPAIRED AT SHOP BY COMPETENT MACHINIST.

J. E. Moore.

Farmers's Institute.

Center Grey Farmers' Institute opened its annual session in the roller rink, Markdale, on Friday last at 10.30 a.m. The only business during the forenoon was the election of officers for the ensuing year as follows.

Thos. Kells. President.
D. R. Ellis, Vice President.
J. I. Graham, Sec.-Treas.

DIRECTORS.

Artemesia—J. Boland, Jas. Brodie.
Collingwood—T. B. White, D. J. Hunter.
Euphrasia—Geo. Richardson, D. R. Preston.
Holland—E. W. Moore, Wm. Norton.
Sullivan—William Pringle, John Sparrow.
Thornbury—Walter Grierson.
Markdale—Wm. Douglass.

AUDITORS.

G. F. Marsh, Jos. Manary.

Delegates to Central Farmers' Institute President and Vice President.

At the afternoon meeting, which was attended by about 200, a large array of speaking talent appeared on the platform. First and foremost was Prof. Shaw of the Ontario Agricultural College, Mr. Simpson Rennie, a brother of Wm. Rennie, the Toronto seedsman. Mr. Rennie runs the gold medal farm about 18 miles north-east from Toronto. He is considered to be one of the most successful scientific farmers in the country. Then came Dr. Sproule, M. P., Major Rorke, M. P. P., T. B. White of Collingwood township, and a number of the directors.

Mr. Kells opened the meeting by stating the objects of Farmers' Institutes.

The order paper contained two items of paramount importance, one upon the advisability of doing away with township agricultural societies, and the other with reference to our present system of road work. The former matter was taken up first and brought forth a lengthy discussion. A resolution from the Artemesia township Agricultural society was read, deprecating the doing away with township shows After a warm discussion there were three motions put to the meeting.

It was moved by Mr. T. B. White, seconded by Jas. Brodie, that township shows be allowed to remain as they are Moved in amendment by Mr. George Stewart, seconded by Wm. Burnett, that the Government grant to the county remain with the riding shows Moved by Dr. Sproule, seconded by D. R. Ellis, that no township show be allowed in a township where a riding show is held, and that the money given to such township show be added to the riding show.

The voting resulted in fourteen votes for Mr. White's motion, and eleven each for Mr. Stewart's and Dr. Sproule's.

Prof. Shaw was then introduced by the President and read a paper on Stocking a Farm. The professor thinks that farmers in Ontario will have to pay more attention to stock raising, as he claims that they cannot compete with Northwest grain raisers. He dealt with the best kinds of stock, naming three kinds of animals as most suitable for this country. For dairying purposes he would raise Holsteins and Ayrshires. He considered that as milk producers one Holstein was worth two or three Jerseys.

Mr. Rennie then gave a paper on "Killing Canadian thistles." Prof. Shaw, in introducing Mr. Rennie, remarked that a couple of years go he had gone over Mr. Rennie's whole farm in a search after thistles, and he believed that the discovery of two or three little sickly things were the whole fruits of his search, and he considered Mr. Rennie a competent authority on the subject. This was Mr. Rennie's plan condensed: It is not wise to allow them to get up too high. Do not allow them to blossom. A thistle is composed of starch, just like a potato and he considered that if it was allowed to grow too high the root was strong enough to live over until the following year. When the thistles had grown two or three inches, plow light with a wide-sheared plow. He didn't approve of summer fallowing, but if you do summer fallow use a wide sheared cultivator. Never plow deep to kill thistles, but do it well. The great secret was thoroughness. Around stumps and large stones use a hoe. Do this four or five times while the weather is warm, and no thistles will grow the following year. Another plan was to put in roots and use scuffler often and well. Mr. Rennie was listened to with great attention.

Dr. Sproule, M. P., then delivered an eloquent address. He outlined the work done by Government in advancing the farmers' interest, by the formation of these institutes, the experimental farm at Ottawa and the Ontario Agricultural College. He spoke of the great change undergone in scientific farming since the advent of great railways and facilities for carrying, and wound up by advising the growing of more corn by Ontario farmers. The Dr had himself become interested in ensilage, having built a silo, and he exhibited to the curious a fine sample of his silage. This is something not much understood in this country, but is bound to attract more attention hereafter.

A young gentleman named Marsh, of Claksburg, then read a paper on the Ontario Agricultural College, which closed the afternoon meeting.

In the evening a large assembledge was present. Mr. Rennie and Prof. Shaw each read a paper. Major Rorke spoke on the state of agriculture in Grey. The Markdale brass band played at intervals during the evening. It was 11 o'clock when the assemblage dispersed.

AT FLESHERTON.

On Saturday at 10.30 a. m., the meeting was continued in the town hall here. It was opened with a paper by Prof. Shaw on "Better methods of cultivation." He dealt with the various soils and their drainage, describing the proper manner of doing this. In retentive subsoil the drain pipes should be laid closer than in porous. In retentive clay subsoil, such as is found in this section, drains should be two rods apart and three feet deep. Tile drains were the only profitable ones for farmers to use. The average cost would be from 18 to 21 cents per rod in clay and from 15 to 18 in loose soil, two and a half inch pipe were about the proper thing. In answer to Mr. D. R. Ellis the professor said that in heavy clay soil the greatest trouble was met in getting a seed bed, owing to difficulty of pulverization. He said there were many things which a farmer required that had not yet been invented, and a proper instrument for this one purpose was one of the things required, although a certain kind of rotary harrow now made answered the purpose very well.

In the afternoon Mr. Rennie read a very interesting paper on "Rotation of crops. The question of doing away with township agricultural societies was again taken up. Several gentlemen spoke upon the matter pro and con. Dr. Christoe spoke of the great difficulty experienced by riding shows, and our own in particular. He held that smallness of prizes was the main failing. Some legislation should be made whereby the prize money could be enlarged without affecting the township fair. He did not believe in doing away with the latter. Every show fair should stand upon its own bottom.

The motions of the former day were then again put. There was some disorder in the putting of these motions, but it was decided by a large majority that it was better to do away with the township show in any township where a riding show was held. However, this is ultra vires of the Farmers' Institute, and the township show will probably remain with us some years years.

Another important matter was then taken up, namely the doing away with statute labor and substituting a tax of 50 cents per day in lieu thereof. An interesting discussion ensued, but those present decided that it was better to let statute labor remain in status quo, otherwise as it has been.

Questions and answers were then once more the order of the day. The following information in raising corn was elicted from Professor Shaw: The omission of providing fodder for cattle during the dry summer weather was a great mistake. Vetches and oats and peas and oats were recommended, but corn was good, although a little latter. Almost any soil was good for corn, but it must be well pulverized if clayey. A sandy loam was best, clay loam good and black loam fairly rich. Buy seed in spring, and test it before planting. Ordinary tillage only was required. After the corn had grown a couple of inches harrow without fear with a very light harrow. He named three kinds sweet southern, horse tooth and common yellow—the former containing more saccharine matter, and therefore considered the best, although a trifle dearer. The Professor laid great stress upon close cultivation. Cut just as the ears were beginning to glaze. One acre was considered sufficient to keep an animal seven months in silage. He then read a paper on "Water running away," which in our opinion was the best of the series, inasmuch as the moral was applicable to all classes. He likened the waste of opportunity to an immense unused water-power; the water ran away and benefitted not humanity. Such was the industrial farm, and agricultural literature, which farmers did not attend to as they should.

Mr. H. Masson, M. P., for North Grey, then gave an interesting speech, which we are sorry we have not space to mention more fully.

At the evening session papers were read by T. B. White, on "What a farmer ought to know;" Prof. Foster, on "Beautifying our country homes;" Mr. Rennie, on, "the importance of farmers being united in this country;" and another paper by Mr. White on "Rural education." The band gave several grand selections in their usual inimitable style, and the proceedings were brought to a close about 10 o'clock.

This ended, as Mr. Rennie informed us, one of the most successful institute meetings held this season. He had attended twelve, and with one exception (Nasagewaya) this was the best.

A pleasant feature of the evening meeting was the presence of a large number of ladies.

Mr. Rennie remarked privately upon the extremely intelligent looking faces before him at the Flesherton meeting. Put that in your pipes and smoke it ye farmers of Artemesia.

Our report must of necessity be somewhat superficial, as, had we reported in full the speeches it would have required two papers to hold it. Some of the papers given were highly worthy of reproduction.

Messrs Shaw and Rennie went to Owen Sound on the evening train, where the N. G. Institute met on Monday.

SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN
ESTABLISHED 1845.
Is the oldest and most popular scientific and mechanical paper published and has the largest circulation of any paper of its class in the world. Fully illustrated. Best class of Wood Engravings. Published weekly. Send for specimen copy. Price $3 a year. Four months' trial, $1. MUNN & CO., PUBLISHERS, 361 Broadway, N.Y.

ARCHITECTS & BUILDERS Edition of Scientific American.
A great success. Each issue contains colored lithographic plates of country and city residences or public buildings. Numerous engravings and full plans and specifications for the use of such as contemplate building. Price $2.50 a year, 25 cts. a copy. MUNN & CO., PUBLISHERS.

PATENTS may be secured by applying to MUNN & CO., who have had over 40 years' experience and have made over 100,000 applications for American and Foreign patents. Send for Handbook. Correspondence strictly confidential.

TRADE MARKS.
In case your mark is not registered in the Patent Office, apply to MUNN & Co., and procure immediate protection. Send for Handbook.
COPYRIGHTS for books, charts, maps, etc., quickly procured. Address
MUNN & CO., Patent Solicitors.
GENERAL OFFICE: 361 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE BEST IS CHEAPEST.
Farmer's Advocate & Home Magazine
Every farmer should read the leading and only independent publication devoted to his business. Thousands say there is none equal to it, and no dollar ex; ended from the farm returns so much good. It treats on all branches connected with the farm, and is highly prized by the ladies and children; it has saved many a farmer from the loss of his farm; it has saved the farmers millions of dollars by checking the introduction and spread of contagious stock diseases; it has increased the receipts from our cereals by millions of dollars. Commended by City and County Councils and Agricultural Societies. Agents wanted. Sample copies free. Price $1 per annum. Address FARMER'S ADVOCATE OFFICE, London, Canada.

—NEW

FALL GOODS!

AT THE

Central Store,

Priceville.

Having received our Fall Stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have confidence in a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well bought article.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and comprises something good and serviceable for Men and Boys, of sort

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

still continue unapproachable. Our motto being good Goods and Low Prices. Come and see us.

Central Store, Priceville.
A. McCABE.

$03 Sewing-Machine FREE
To at once establish trade in all parts, by placing one machine and goods where the people can see them, we will send free to one person in each locality, the very best sewing-machine made in the world, with all the attachments. We will also send free a complete line of our costly and valuable art samples. In return we ask that you show what we send, to those who may call at your home, and after 2 months all shall become your own property. This grand machine is made after the Singer patents, which have run out, before patents run out it sold for $03, with the attachments, and now sells for $30. Best, strongest, most useful machine in the world. All is free. No capital required. Plain, brief instructions given. Those who write to us at once can secure free the best sewing-machine in the world, and the finest line of works of high art ever shown together in America. TRUE & CO., Box 740, Augusta, Maine.

FLESHERTON
Implement
Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continued support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Binders,	Grain Drills,
Reapers,	Broad-cut Seeders,
Mowers,	Spring Tooth Harrows,
Rakes,	Iron Harrows,
Wagons,	Two-Furrow Gang Plow,
Buggies	Plows,
Sleighs,	Scufflers,
Cutters,	Turnip Drills,
Fanning Mills,	Land Rollers.
Spring Tooth Cultivators.

This Year's
MYRTLE
CUT and PLUG
SMOKING TOBACCO
FINER THAN EVER.
See
T & B
in bronze on
EACH PLUG and PACKAGE

New Hair Dressing Parlor.

Mr. W. J. NELSON, having opened a new barber shop and hair dressing parlor in Moore's Block, Durham St. is prepared to attend to all work in his line and would invite patronage.
Hair cutting, shaving, sharpening razors, etc., all done in the highest style of the art.
W. J. NELSON.

FLOUR, FLOUR,
STONE
FLOUR!

MR. P. LOUCKS
Is prepared to do your Gristing on [illegible] and grinds on the old terms of [illegible] bushel. Seven cents per bag of two [illegible] Chopping done every day. The Little Mill big in the estimation of the public Satisfaction Guaranteed.
P. LOUCKS [illegible]
Good stabling for horses.

PRICEVILLE
BAKERY

A. WATSON!

Desires to inform the public that he can furnish at [illegible]

CAKES AND [illegible]IES
To Order

FIRST CLASS BREAD ON HAND.

I visit Flesherton twice a week TUESDAYS and FRIDAYS with full supply of Goods.

DROP A CARD IF YOU DESIRE ME TO CALL

WEDDING and FANCY cakes [illegible]
A. WATSON, [illegible]ville.

NOTICE!

SHINGLES constantly on hand for sale cheap. Just put in first-class Chopping Mill—now bring along your grain to get it chopped up in short order.
J. [illegible]DAN.

"TRUE AS STEEL."

The History of the Tunbridge Wells Murder.

A London cable says: The details of the crime for which the two boys were hanged at Tunbridge Wells are as follows: On July 20th a workman at the Baltic saw mills, Tunbridge Wells, whose name was Lawrence, was at home with his wife and two children, when he was called out by some voice unknown to the family. The wife, as if some instinct warned her of danger, doubted the message which she heard delivered to her husband to induce him to come out, and she afterwards sent one of the children after her husband. The boy found the two conversing, but unhappily his father sent him back on some errand to the house. No more was heard of Lawrence's mysterious messenger, but Lawrence himself was found dying from a pistol shot, and he never rallied to tell what had happened. His assassination became known as the Tunbridge Wells mystery. Two months afterwards a lad asked a boy to deliver to the Tunbridge Wells Advertiser a letter. The epistle was a boastful representation that the writer was Lawrence's murderer. The most striking passage was the following:

> Lawrence was very talkative when he was out of doors, little thinking of the death he had so shortly got to die. The last word he spoke when in my company was when he caught sight of the pistol sticking out of my pocket. He said, "What do you carry them sort of things about with you for?" My answer was, "To shoot down dogs and curs like you." "What," said he, "would you shoot a ——" Bang! and once more Tunbridge Wells was startled by another mystery, which is never likely to be found out.

There was no feature in this letter that betrayed right feeling, except one sentence designed to exonerate a man on whom some suspicion had wrongfully fallen. The letter was signed "Another Whitechapel Murderer," and it was open to any one to conclude that the document was but a silly effusion due to the unhealthy excitement caused by events in the east end of London. It only attained its full and unmistakable significance by the act of confession. A moulder named Gower, 18 years of age, and his friend, Charles Dobell, a plumber of 19, attended Salvation Army meetings, and were apparently much moved by what they heard there. The moulder visited the captain, and made the startling confession that he and his friend, who was "true as steel," were the authors of the Tunbridge Wells mystery. Lawrence had been denounced by Gower to Dobell as a master's man who had further been the means of getting him fined because he kept the time at the sawmills, and had to mark Gower late. The friend "true as steel" and Gower himself drew lots who should kill Lawrence. The lot fell on Dobell, who, playing the friend "true as steel" all through, calmly executed the diabolical purpose. These accusations could only have one result. The police were called in. The steel-true comrade, after a brief hesitation, confirmed his friend's story. The revolver was found. A boy identified Dobell as the writer of the letter to the Tunbridge Wells Advertiser. In a word, the Tunbridge Wells mystery was cleared up by that other mystery—the working of the human mind.

COUNTY DONEGAL EVICTIONS.

Another Encounter Between Tenants and Police.

A Dublin cable says: The eviction of tenants on the Olphert estates, at Falcarragh, County Donegal, was continued yesterday. The evictors went to the house of a tenant named Doogan, but found the place defended by a score of men, armed with rifles, who had entrenched themselves behind the loopholed walls. The priests who accompanied the evictors entreated the defenders to leave the house, but the men refused to pay any attention to them. The Riot Act was then read, and the soldiers were about to fire on the house when the Magistrate stopped them, and notified the party in the house that he would give them an hour in which to reflect upon the course they would pursue. After reflecting for an hour the defenders announced that they would not use their rifles. The bailiffs and police then attacked the house, and after a desperate struggle were repulsed. Finally the priests persuaded the men to surrender. A police inspector was badly wounded. A dozen bailiffs and policemen were injured. One of the defenders had his jaw fractured and another was buried beneath a barricade, which was broken down by the evictors, and sustained severe injuries.

Poor Campanini's Collapse.

A New York correspondent writes: Most of the members of the collapsed Campanini Concert Company have got back to New York from the west, and very glad they are to get back, even with empty pockets. When the company started on the road, a month ago, the fiasco that has come was predicted. The idea underlying the venture was that Campanini's name would carry the company anywhere. But it has not been a name to conjure with for a long time. It lost its power when Campanini lost his voice. Possibly this failure, in view of the many others before it, will have some effect in opening the eyes of purveyors of "classical" music or "intellectual" music, to the fact that the American people don't care for that kind of music and won't support it. The great majority of them don't regard it as music at all. They would rather hear a good song any day than the finest "aria" ever composed. Look at the success of Patrick Gilmore and the failure of Theodore Thomas.

Attacked by a Rooster.

Eva, the 2½-year-old daughter of Mr. Jas. Sanford, of the M.C.R., who resides near the overhead bridge, was attacked and severely hurt by a rooster on Sunday morning. She was playing outside the house when Mrs. Sanford, who was within, heard screaming. Going into the yard, she found the child lying on the ground and the bird pecking savagely at her face. Mrs. Sanford drove him off, took the child into the house and sent for Dr. Corlis. It was found that several wounds had been inflicted by the beak of the bird, which had also apparently struck her in the face with its wings, as both her eyes were blackened. Fortunately, the sight was not injured.—Ridgetown Standard.

The Mississippi steamer Paris C. Brown was sunk by striking a snag, and eight lives were lost.

LICKED BY SAMOA.

Mataafa's Men Defeat a Party of German Troops.

An Auckland, New Zealand, despatch says: Advices from Samoa say that the German man-of-war Olga lost 20 men killed and 30 wounded out of a party of 120 men sent to assist Tamasese against Mataafa. The Germans were compelled to retreat to their boats. The commanders of the British and American men-of-war received an intimation of the German intentions, but they remained inactive.

A Berlin despatch says: Official advices from Apia confirm yesterday's announcement of an encounter between Mataafa's followers and the Germans. On Dec. 18th the German gunboat Adler, with the German Consul on board, proceeded to Lanly, Mataafa's chief position, with the intention of negotiating for the disarming of the insurgents in consequence of the destruction of German property and insults to German sailors. A party of men was landed, and while on their way to the Vailele plantation they were suddenly attacked by a party of rebels, led by an American named Klein. The Olga, Adler and Eber landed more men, who succeeded in repelling the natives and destroying some of their villages. Lieut. Sieger and 15 men were killed, and Lieuts. Spengler and Burchard and 36 men were wounded. The latter are doing well. Other accounts state that the Germans retired to Vailele and held it against the greatest odds until reinforced. Mataafa's loss was 10 killed and 30 wounded. The Germans bombarded Vailele, Letoga, Lanly, Mataafaga and Matafas. Mataafa now holds a strongly entrenched position near Apia, where great excitement prevails. The European women and children have been placed on board the man-of-war. Business is at a standstill, expecting further German action. Mataafa has obtained a supply of ammunition. He declares himself ready to appear before the commanders of the British and American men-of-war

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SON

Married to the Daughter of the Duke of Manchester.

A London cable says: The most important social event of the season was the marriage Saturday of the Hon. Edward George Villiers Stanley, of the Grenadier Guards, son of the Governor-General of Canada, Lord Stanley of Preston, and Lady Alice Maud Olivia Montagu, youngest daughter of the Duke of Manchester. The ceremony was performed in the Guards' chapel by the Rev. Lord William Cecil, son of the Marquis of Salisbury and cousin of the bridegroom. The eight bridesmaids were the Ladies Alexandra, Mary and Theodosia Acheson, daughters of the Earl of Gosford; Lady Mary Hamilton, and Ladies Alice and Mary Montagu, daughters of Lord Mandeville; Lady Edith Villiers, and Hon. Romala Russell, sister of Lord Amphill. The Hon. Richard Somerset was groomsman. Among the guests were the Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince Albert Victor, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke and Princess Victoria of Teck. After the reception the bride and groom left for Halwood, the Kentish seat of the Earl of Derby, where they will pass the honeymoon. The presents numbered over 300, including an Indian shawl from the Queen, a gold bracelet from Empress Frederick, a diamond brooch from the Prince and Princess of Wales, and a silver lamp from Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales. The bridegroom will not only succeed to his father's barony but to the Earldom of Derby, to which his father is heir presumptive.

THE DEAD ALIVE.

Is Mrs. Harrington Dead or Merely in a Trance?

A Cleveland (O.) despatch says: Mrs. Mary Harrington, wife of a vessel captain, was taken to St. Alexis Hospital last week suffering from dropsy. On Sunday she died, or at least was pronounced dead by the attending physicians. An undertaker was called and prepared the remains for burial. On New Year's Day he returned with the hearse and was about to place the body in the coffin, when he was astounded to observe evidences of life in the supposed corpse. The cheeks were flushed, the hands had become soft and pliable and what appeared to be perspiration covered the brow. One of the staff physicians made a hasty examination and concluded that the body was lifeless, although he could not account for its condition. The body was removed to Capt. Harrington's house and further tests were made to-day, but without avail, although there are as yet no signs of decomposition or even death beyond total suspension of the circulatory and respiratory organs. Capt. Harrington believes that his wife is still alive, and states that some years ago she lay in a trance for eighty-nine hours and was then thought to be dead.

DRUNK, AGED FOUR.

Little Nellie Reynolds, of New York, Dies of Alcoholism.

A New York despatch says: Probably the most youthful case of death from alcoholism ever heard of was reported at the coroner's office in New York to-day. It was that of 4-year-old Nellie Reynolds. The coroner will make an investigation. The attending physicians, Drs. Bache and Moffett, speak in the severest terms of the criminal negligence of permitting so young a child to drink so large a quantity of whiskey. The child was unconscious from 9 o'clock Tuesday morning until 7 o'clock yesterday, when she died. The physician was not sent for until 8 o'clock on Wednesday evening, too late to be of service in restoring consciousness. Dr. Bache said there had been New Year festivities at the house. Drinking became general, and one at the party admitted having given the child two tablespoonfuls of whiskey in a tumbler. The child staggered and reeled around for several minutes, then became unconscious, was put to bed and never again recovered. The parents are said to be hard drinkers.

The Chinese formerly beat small-pox patients with bamboo sticks, but owing to the rapid advance made in medical science in that benighted empire in the last few days, the patient is now required to beat a drum. Nations grow wise as they come in contact with each other.

STOLEN LOVE AND KISSES.

A Famous Domestic Law Suit to Come Before the Courts.

$10,000 DAMAGES ASKED FOR.

(Toronto World.)

Mackie vs. Abell, known to lawyers as a crim. con. case, stands twenty-first on the list of actions to be heard before Mr. Justice Rose at the present sittings of the Civil Assizes. The parties to the suit are William Mackie, who is described as a merchant, and Henry Abell, the record says being an implement manufacturer, both of Toronto. The plaintiff, Mackie, is well known in the business portions of the city. At one time he was manager of the Woodbridge branch of the wholesale liquor business of the ill-starred firm of William Kyle & Co. The defendant is a brother of the proprietor of one of the largest agricultural implement factories in the Province, situate on Queen street west.

Like many other troubles which are dragged before the courts, there is a woman in this case. In this case it is Henrietta Hay Elizabeth Mackie (nee Phillips), and the suit is brought against Mr. Abell to recover $10,000 for the alleged alienation of her affections from the lawful object thereof, Wm. Mackie. Being so close to the head of the list it is probable that the case will come on to-morrow and those in the secrets of the evidence look for spicy developments.

WHAT THE STATEMENT OF CLAIM SAYS.

The World yesterday read over the statement of claim filed by the plaintiff. It is divided into about 50 paragraphs, and covers a period of time from 1882 to 1888. No. 1 clause complains of improper conduct on the part of defendant in walking with Mrs. Mackie in the village of Woodbridge in the absence of her husband, this offence recurring frequently in the last six or seven years. Clause 2 contains the allegation that the defendant drove with Mrs. Mackie during the same period and in the same locality, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff. Then there is improper conduct alleged to have taken place on the occasion of a certain holiday trip to Muskoka and in divers other places.

Prominent among the hotels at which the pair put up, according to plaintiff, are the Walker House and Rossin House, Toronto; Power's Hotel, Rochester; Oxford Music Hall, London; Queen's Hotel, Owen Sound, and in various other places on various other occasions in Toronto. One of the counts against Mr. Abell is the advancing of a sum of $50 to Mrs. Mackie without the consent of Mr. Mackie, and many other minor offences too numerous to mention. In all the document is a very formidable one, and not at all a pleasant one to have read over in court.

TALES OF STOLEN LOVE.

In addition to the allegations two letters alleged to be from the defendant to Mrs. Mackie have been filed as exhibits, and they are quite unique. The first one, which bears no date, is as follows:

SATURDAY NIGHT, 8 p. m.

MY OWN PRECIOUS LOVE,—I left you with a heavy heart on Friday night. Could not make up my mind why Charlie has taken such a fancy to want to be with you so much and so often now, when only a short time ago he had no desire to come and see you at all, and to call so late, and when he ought to be at his drawing. These and many other thoughts passed through my mind as I went home with a sorrowful heart that night. I was sorry afterwards that I did not order him home as soon as he came in. I certainly should have done so if M. had not been there, and then the idea of his remaining after we left. I received your dear letter to-day, your promises of devotion to cheer me up. I was beginning to think my Henri was getting tired of me but did not want to tell me so. You know I love you with my whole heart; always have loved you and always will love you, and you alone, so long as you are true and good. Yes, a terrible, miserable feeling to have any doubt about it, which I must confess I have had lately and could not quiet my mind. My darling, you will pardon my plain speaking, but 'tis the depth of my love for you that compels me to speak my mind to you. Never a day of my life passes but I think of you; you are my constant companion in my mind. You will doubtless know by the newspapers that we had a snow blockade on the way up. I only reached here on Thursday noon. Had no Mr. S. as fellow passenger this trip, but we had a Mr and Mrs. Allen, Yankees, going to San Francisco. She was rather comical. There were only five of us in the cars. Had a very nice car all the way. Will write M. with particulars. You are right, my pet, the money is a worry and a trouble to the mind. If you can arrange for M. to pay the interest and you pay yours on the principal, I think this will be much better, as you will be reducing it all the time and then it will be a nice thing to have it paid, for my very heart goes out to you. While I am writing this at just this particular time, I am usually with my love basking in the sunshine of her dear presence. I feel completely lost without you, but when hope comes in and bids me look forward to the time when I shall see you again. I shall make a big effort to leave here next Saturday night. In that case I ought to arrive in Toronto on Tuesday, but it is a little uncertain at present. I had two invitations out to-night, but concluded that I would stay at my hotel and write to my own darling love. I know you will be expecting a letter. I send you a paper marked by this mail. Now, my darling, with all my heart believe me, yours truly,

HARRY.

TENDER ON THE LAMB.

If the foregoing is spoony, what can be said of letter No. 2, which follows? If anything is calculated to make a man feel cheap it is an exposition of his moony-spoony letters written during his courting days. But what about letters written to another man's wife. Here is the epistle:

SUNDAY NIGHT, March 17th, 1888.

MY OWN PRECIOUS LOVE,—Absent in body, but with you in spirit I have been all day. I went to Holy Trinity Church this morning. Bishop ——— preached from the text, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of Christ." I went to dinner to-day to a Mr. Watson's, our agent. All the afternoon I was thinking of you and wishing to be with you again to-night. Had to go to church alone. I wanted my Henri with me. You precious love, how I miss you! Went to All Saints' to-night; text, "Come unto Me all ye that labor and I will give you rest." A very good sermon. Did my Henri go to church twice to-day? Is my loved one thinking of me now, or has she retired for the night? Has she been good all the week? These and many other thoughts run through my head. No tongue can tell how I love you, you precious pet. I am doubtful about leaving this week, but shall try hard for I want to be with you on Easter Sunday. Yes, my darling, I am longing to be with you to have a sweet kiss from your lips and hear your loving voice welcoming me back. You are truly the light of my life. When I think of you as my true and good Henri it makes my heart rejoice, but when the reverse thoughts came it grieved me to my very soul. Be good, my darling, be good for I love you truly with my whole heart, and am completely lost when away from you. I ca not spare a bit of your love for anybody else. Now, my dear, I will say good-night, and may God bless you and keep you, precious gem. I still hope to get off on Saturday. If so will likely see you Tuesday or Wednesday next. That thought cheers me up, now I must go. Accept my fondest and best love, and with all good wishes, always believe me to be your own faithful and true

HARRY.

Give my dear Jenny a kiss from John, her own faithful love. Au revoir, my own precious love.

OTHER FEATURES OF THE CASE.

The above finish the love letters, but Mr. Mackie has filed others of an entirely different character. They are from Mrs. Mackie to her husband. The first upbraids him for entering into the suit against "Mr. Henry," as she calls defendant, the second asserts that he has no right to continue it, having been fully aware of the friendship existing between "Mr. Henry" and herself, asserts that it is a scheme to extort more money from that individual, and winds up with a threat that should the husband press the business to an issue she will show him up in his true colors. The others are merely demands for money.

The statement of defence is a general denial of the allegations.

THE FAITH CURE.

Methodist Ministers Denounce the So-Called "Christian Science."

A Minneapolis despatch says: Before a gathering of the Methodist ministers to-day Rev. Jas. Door read a paper on "Christian Science." He declared flatly against the entire idea as a delusion and a snare, and said it was neither "Christian" nor "science," and that in denying the personality of God and the existence of sin it became infidel in its tendencies. He did not deny the influence of mind over matter, but ridiculed the places where, by the payment of $5, any one may become a full-fledged physician of the new school, without knowledge of anatomy or materia medica. He cited many cases where such people have died from negligence under Christian science treatment, and quoted one of the prayers of an alleged science healer that was enough to bring the whole idea into ridicule. He also gave a history of the craze from its inception, and pronounced it a prodigious fraud. Other ministers present took a similar view of it.

TERRIBLE SUFFERINGS.

Farmers in Dakota Without Clothes and Starving.

A Fargo, Dak., despatch says: A letter from Rev. C. W. Riches, Park River, Dakota, conveys the first authentic information of the extreme sufferings and privation among the Norwegian settlers in Western Walsh county. Men with the relief party report that they found about seventy families in about as destitute circumstances as it is possible for human beings to be and still exist. Many were found with barely enough clothing to cover their nakedness, and that of the thinnest material. Shoes were almost unknown. These farmers have lived on their little capital until nothing remained. Most of them have been living on a kind of porridge made by cooking frozen green wheat and oats, stuff not fit to feed a hog. One family had not seen any flour for six weeks. The people have been dividing with each other their potatoes until now they are gone too.

The Bride Chosen for China's Emperor.

A Washington despatch says: The Department of State has been informed by the Minister of the United States at Pekin of the following edict of the Empress Dowager, published in the Pekin Gazette of Friday, Nov. 9th, 1888:

"The Emperor having reverently succeeded to his exalted inheritance, and increasing day by day in maturity, it is becoming that he should select a virtuous consort to assist in the administration of the affairs of the palace, to control the Emperor's official household and to encourage the Emperor himself in upright conduct. Let, therefore, Yeh-ho-na-la, a daughter of Deputy Lieutenant-General Knei Hsiang, whom we have selected for her dignified and virtuous character, become the Emperor's consort."

A further edict of the same date reads:

"Let Ta-ta-la, age 15 years, a daughter of Chang Hsii, formerly a vice-president of a board, become the secondary consort of the first rank; and let Ta-ta-la, age 13, also daughter of Chang Hsii, formerly vice-president of a board, become imperial concubine of the second rank. Respect this."

The Emperor has been reigning about fourteen years, and is now 18 years of age.

Latest Scottish Notes.

The custodiers of the National Monument at Stirling have appointed a committee to oppose any attempt by Dumbarton to regain possession of the Wallace sword.

Mr. John Wilson, of Hillhead, a well-known Glasgow iron tube manufacturer, is the Gladstonian candidate for the Govan Division, vacant by the death of Sir William Pearce.

Mr. John S. Kennedy, of New York, has raised an action against Sir A. D. Stewart to compel him to implement the sale of Grantully estate, in Perthshire, or pay £5,000 damages.

The bronze medal of the Royal Humane Society was on December 19th awarded to the Marquis of Breadalbane for his gallant rescue of Duncan McLean, wood forester, from drowning in the Tay.

Rev. John Robertson, of Stonehaven, in his latest printed sermon, says: "In God's prescription I see written 'brimstone' as well as 'syrup,' and woe be the pulpit that plays false in the making up. God is not that popular india-rubber affair man can spit on and live."

Mr. William Black has among the curios at his house at Brighton a tray purchased at the sale of Kingsburgh House, Isle of Skye, in 1826 by the late General Campbell, of Lochneil, and said to have been used by Flora Macdonald at the time Prince Charles Edward was sheltered by the Macnonalds on his escape from the Hebrides.

The Wife's Deference.

If a wife respects her husband she is ready and willing to adapt her daily life according to his wishes. She looks up to him for advice and guidance, as knowing more of the world and its ways than she does herself. It is woman's nature to reverence the one she loves and submit herself to the wishes of her husband; but it is not done as a slave in bonds, but as a free offering of affection.—Once a Week.

A steamer with a train of barges passed Newburgh, N.Y., yesterday, on her way down the Hudson, an almost unprecedented thing at this time of the year.

MASONIC.

How the Second Lady Was Admitted Into the Fraternity.

The new Masonic Hall in Preston was consecrated and dedicated on Thursday evening last. The new lodge-room is upstairs in Mr. Klotz's building and is very handsomely fitted up. The services on Thursday evening were conducted by ex-Grand Master Klotz, a large number of visiting brethren being present from Galt, Hespeler and Guelph.

The ladies are always interested in matters affecting or pertaining to their sex. Here is an account of how the second lady Mason was made, from the London Freemason: "Helene, Countess Hadik Barkoczy, born in 1833, was the sole heiress of Count Johann Barkoczy, and being the last of her race, was permitted by the Hungarian courts to take the place of a son. She succeeded her father on his death in 1871 in the extensive Majorat of Barkoczy. In 1860 she married Count Bela Hadik, aide-de-camp to the unfortunate Emperor Maximilian of Mexico. With her inheritance she came into possession of an extensive Masonic library. She was a highly educated lady and made Masonic literature her earnest study; and, having mastered the statements concerning every degree in Freemasonry, an ardent admiration for the Masonic "Idea" was aroused in her. She was well acquainted with a few Freemasons, through whom she endeavored to gain admittance into the craft. Her desire was granted, and she was, in 1875, duly initiated in the Lodge Egyenloseg, in Unghvar, holding a constitution from the Grand Orient of Hungary. On learning this glaring violation of the statutes, which only allow the admission of men into the Order, the Grand Orient of Hungary instituted proceedings against the guilty brethren, i. e., against the Deputy Master of the Lodge, Bro. Geza Mocsary, who conducted the initiation, for "breach of the Masonic vow, unjustifiedly conferring Masonic degrees, doing that which degrades a Freemason and Freemasonry, and for knowingly violating the statutes," and against the Bro. Orator, the Bro. Junior Warden and the Secretary of the Lodge, for the same offences, with the exception of the Third, and against the other brethren of the Lodge of the Third, Second and First degrees, for the last-named offence. The judgment of the Council was given at their meeting on the 5th of January, 1876. All the accused were found guilty. The Council condemned the Deputy Master to the loss of all his Masonic rights, and expulsion from the Order forever, the officers to have their names struck off from the lists, and the other members of the lodge to be suspended for a space of twelve, six and three months respectively. But still the question remained whether the duly initiated Countess Helene Hadik Barkoczy could and ought to be looked upon as a regular Freemason, free to claim all the rights of a member of the Fraternity. On this point the Grand Orient of Hungary decided in their meeting of the 10th of March, 1876, as follows: 1. The Grand Orient declare the admission of the Countess Hadik Barkoczy to be contrary to the laws, and therefore null and void, forbid her admittance into any lodge of jurisdiction, under penalty of erasion of the lodge from the rolls, and request all Grand Lodges to do the same. 2. The Countess is requested to return the invalid certificates which she holds within ten days, in default of which measures will be taken to immediately confiscate whenever produced at any of the lodges. The proceeding of the Hungarian Lodge in initiating a woman was universally condemned, but the question whether an initiation once effected could be undone became a subject of much controversy at the time.

A Brave Sea Captain's Timidity.

A short time ago a young Pittsburger who happened to be in New York encountered the captain of a Cunarder with whom he was acquainted. The captain possesses literally world-wide fame, and a braver or better seaman does not breathe. He had been often invited to visit this city before—for he has not only friends of travel, but at least one school-mate here—and the young Pittsburger begged him to accompany him on his return home. But the old sea dog thanked him kindly, but added: "Nothing could induce me to trust myself to a railway train over the Allegheny Mountains. No, sir! it's too much of a risk for me to trust my bones on such a journey." And yet if you should chance to cross the Atlantic in that old captain's ship in the wildest weather of the year, when the winds are contrary, the waves mountain high, and fog wrapping the great steamer in a dozen extra dangers, I'll wager you'd find him at the moments of greatest peril, cool, calm and courageous. He cares not for the dangers of the sea; he knows them all—but the dangers of the land he wots not of and they are terrible to him.—Pittsburg Despatch.

Never Tried the Old One.

Wife—What book are you reading, dear? You seem greatly absorbed in it.

Husband—It is Mrs. Ward's "Robert Elsmere," and it is certainly the most interesting book I've read in a long time.

"What does it treat of?"

"Well, love and marriage; but what I like best is the glimpses it gives of a new religion. That's what the world wants, a new religion."

Wife (slyly)—John, did you ever try the old religion?

Music in His Soul.

"Then you think you really appreciate orchestral music, Mr. Fitzroy?" she said, in a quizzical sort of way. "Well—er—yes. That is, I think I do. Once in a while, you know, the instruments seem to be all out of tune and wander a little, but when the man hits the base drum solid all is clear to me."

He was Suspicious.

Old Man (at the head of the stairs at 2.30 a. m.)—"Susie, what time is it?"

Susie (with a second look at Reginald who loosens his grip)—"A few minutes past ten, papa."

Old Man—"Don't forget to start the lock again when you go to bed."

Philadelphia has 847 000 people and 179,000 houses, while New York, with 1,200,000 inhabitants, is said to have but 92,000 houses.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Latest Fashion Gossip.

A gown worn by Mrs. Cleveland in her "Cabinet call" the other day was of stone-blue Henrietta cloth, with trimmings of the same shade in striped moire. A short imported jacket of fawn color was beaded in clusters with short amber pendants. The hat was a soft fawn-color Gainsborough, trimmed with a large bow of ribbon and shaded ostrich tips.

For a wach-chain pendant nothing is newer than a small gold riding-whip, the lash of which is drawn into a curved shape, forming a glove-buttoner.

Mme. Recamier and her friends used to damp their robes that they might fall more closely to their shapes; but perhaps rheumatism was not then, as now, the fashionable complaint of the day, and the atmosphere of Paris was possibly drier than that of London.

Directoire coats, giving as they do so much scope to the imagination, and affording so good an opportunity of displaying rare stuffs to the best advantage, will be more worn than ever; but women who are wise will keep the long, gold-braided waistcoat as light as possible, and the coat itself as dark as may be.

The close-fitting jackets, the fronts fur-lined and turned back with a rolled collar over white waistcoats stiff with gold or silver embroidery, are quite the smartest things of the season; but already they are becoming vulgarized, and only extreme costliness of fur and material will make them acceptable to the few.

Ingenious ladies are using summer jackets of light cloth for house wear. These jackets are without lining, and are exceptionally pretty, useful and becoming. Draped vests of crepe de chine or surah may be added, and also fancy revers and cuffs, according to taste. A very wide, strong belt should be set inside of the jacket, and so arranged as to fit the figure quite closely, otherwise their fastenings might show on the outside of the garment.

A few young women fasten their feather boas to wide hats, that in their turn are held in place by the full lace veil. Still, it is a question just how the hat is kept from following the boa down the back of the neck.

With the Cook.

New Plan for Cooking Mush.—A correspondent sends the following improved plan for cooking mush, on which he thinks he should be paid a royalty: See that the fire is well made; then take a one-gallon iron pot, fill it half full of water, with one tablespoonful of salt; let the water come to a sharp boil; then stir in two pounds of sifted meal, and as soon as it thickens put on the lid and put the pot in the oven and bake for thirty minutes; take out the pot every ten minutes and stir up the mush. This plan cooks the rankness out of the meal.

A Rich Baked Apple Pudding.—Stew some apples with sugar to taste, a few currants, some chopped up almonds, a little mixed peel cut fine, and a pinch of ground cinnamon. Make a crust as for an ordinary pudding, grease the pudding basin, and sprinkle it with brown sugar and cinnamon; line it with some of the paste, put some of the fruit at the bottom, then a layer of paste, another of fruit, and so on till the basin is full, finishing off with the paste; sprinkle the top with sugar and cinnamon and bake it. It will turn out of the basin when baked. A simpler method is to peel and cut the apples in small pieces, and lay them on the paste with the other ingredients and the addition of a little water.

A Dutch Apple Pie.—Stew five or six apples with one-half pound of sugar, a few currants and raisins, a little mixed peel cut up, a few chopped up almonds, and a pinch of powdered cinnamon. Make some puff paste, line a pie-dish with some of it, put in the stewed apples (when cold), cover with the paste, and bake in a very brisk oven.

Open Apple Tart.—Stew some apples till quite soft; take out any hard pieces, beat them to a pulp, and to one-half pound of pulp allow six ounces of sugar, five eggs and the grated rind of a lemon. Heat all these well together, then add gradually five ounces of melted butter. Line a dish with puff paste, pour in the mixture and bake it at once.

Apple Cream.—Peel and core six large apples, boil them in a little water, with two ounces of raisins and the grated rind of a lemon, till quite soft; when cold add a glass of sherry. Lay the mixture in a pie dish, beat up the whites of three eggs with sugar to stiff froth, spread it over the apples and bake in a slow oven.

Oysters Broiled with Pork.—Double a piece of wire into the shape of a hairpin; string it with, first, an oyster and then a slice of pork, and so on, till it is filled; fasten the ends to a wooden handle and broil before the fire. Season highly with pepper and serve the pork with the oysters if it is liked.

Aspic Jelly.—A jelly may be made of the bones of the turkey and chicken used in boned turkey by covering them with water and boiling them slowly till the liquor is reduced to a gelatine mass. This will require some time, and the jelly must be covered with caramel to give the beautiful amber-colored aspic used by French cooks. It is easier to make a jelly with brown beef stock and gelatine.

Potato Gems.—A good way to make potato gems is to work one cup of cold mashed potato smooth into one cupful of sweet milk. Stir in one cupful of corn-meal, or enough to make a batter which will drop easily from a spoon, with a pinch of salt, and add one well-beaten egg. Beat briskly three or four minutes, then put into well-buttered gem-pans and bake twenty minutes to half an hour with a steady but not too hot fire.

Washington Omelet.—One cup milk, six eggs, tablespoonful butter, salt and pepper, one teacupful bread crumbs. Let the milk come to a boil, pour it over the crumbs, and let it stand a few minutes. Break open the egg and stir all well mixed; add the bread and milk and season. Melt the butter on a hot skillet, pour on the omelet and let it cook slowly; cut in squares, turn, fry a delicate brown and serve immediately.

Baked Indian Pudding.—One quart sweet milk, one ounce butter, four well-beaten eggs, one teacupful corn meal, quarter of a pound of sugar, half a cup of molasses. Scald the milk and stir in meal while boiling; let stand till lukewarm; stir well together. Bake one and a half hours; serve with or without sauce. Half a pound of raisins may be added if desired.

CREMATION IN BUFFALO.

An Unusual Service at the Incineration of a Young Woman's Remains.

A beautiful service took place at the local crematorium on Wednesday last. Miss Genevieve Goddard, the charming and accomplished daughter of F. B. Goddard, of New York, died a few days ago, after a lingering and painful illness, and her body was brought to Buffalo on New Year's Day. No undertaker or clergyman was spoken to, and, aside from the gray-haired father and his elder son, only two or three friends from this city were present. Among these was Col. E. A. Rockwood. The younger son had been threatened with fever, and was unable to be at the chapel. The father said yesterday that he had employed no undertaker because he could not bear to have any hands but his touch the virgin clay. He read a chapter from the Bible, made a prayer and followed it with the Episcopal service for the dead. After this they covered their loved one with flowers, and the attendant pushed her inanimate form into the fiery retort, where in an hour it was converted to ashes by the flames. The father yesterday expressed himself as perfectly satisfied with this way of disposing of the dead, and said that he had much rather give the bodies of his loved ones to the clouds than to the worms; that the fire was much more poetical to him than the festering grave, for he could see his daughter's face in every sunset. He thought cremation the coming mode of disposing of the dead, and said that all that was needed to bring it into general use was to surround it with the prayers and tears and flowers that have always surrounded interment.—Courier.

A Woman Firebug in Man's Dress.

For several weeks past lumber yards in Cleveland have suffered from incendiarism. Woods, Jenks & Co., one of the largest dealers in the city, have been particularly unfortunate, their yards having been set on fire several times. The first fire entailed a loss of $2,000, the second over $150,000, and there have been one or two less serious conflagrations since then. New Year's night, while two of the watchmen were making the rounds of the yards, they discovered a fire smouldering near one of the lumber piles. It was easily extinguished. A search was instituted, and, in a pile of straw near at hand, they found what appeared to be a little old man. The stranger was jerked out of his hiding place, when the watchmen were astounded to learn that they had caught a woman. She was dressed in man's clothing with a fur cap on her head. At the police station she gave the name of Mrs. Mary Bente, her age as 49 years, and declared that she was in the yard for the purpose of looking after a little garden patch she had on the edge of the yard. She wore men's clothing to protect her from insult. She was held and arraigned in police court to answer to the charge of arson. It seems that some time ago the firm of Woods, Jenks & Co. enlarged its yard and took up land on which this woman had planted some vegetables. They promised to pay her, but did not, so she says she was tired of asking them. In revenge for this summary eviction she has destroyed property valued at nearly $200,000. She presented a remarkable appearance in court, in her rough man's suit and heavy fur cap almost enveloping a dry and weezened face.

The Shortest Way.

Teacher—How is Pompeii pronounced?
First Boy—Pompey I.
Teacher—Next!
Second Boy—Pompey—ai—ai.
Teacher—Next!
Third Boy.—Pompee.
Teacher—Next!
Fourth Boy—(with ineffable scorn)—I don't pronounce it. I just say "Herculaneum."

Transportation Easy.

Theatrical hotel proprietor (fuming)—"Well, sir, did you seize the wardrobe of the Fairy Queen Burlesque, as I directed?"
Constable—"Yes, sir. Got it all!"
"Where is it?"
"In my pocket."

A Familiar Man.

Familiar Fellow (tapping a dignified old gentleman on the shoulder)—Ain't my face familiar to you?
Old Gentleman (brushing him off)—It's not alone your face that's familiar. You are altogether the most familiar man I ever saw!

A Deplorable Mistake.

Nothing is more thoroughly mistaken than the idea that a woman fulfils her duty by doing an amount of work that is far beyond her strength. She not only does not fulfil her duty but she most singularly fails in it; and the failure is truly deplorable.

Christmas Cigars.

Jinks—"Whew! What vile cigars these are! How did you come to buy them?"
Winks—"Didn't buy 'em—Christmas present."

Divination.

Tom—Can you——
Dick—No, I can't, Tom; I'm dead broke myself.

A doughnut received by Josiah Tillotson, of Vermont, in his Christmas stocking sixty-five years ago, is now on exhibition in a town in that State. Josiah has reached a ripe old age, and attributes his longevity to the fact that he didn't eat the doughnut he found in his stocking.

Sam Jones says that the reason he does not settle down to a congregation of 2,000 or more, and a salary of $5,000, is that he can travel and preach to hundreds of thousands and earn $25,000 a year.

Last night Armstrong McCormack was knocked down by highwaymen on Union street, Kingston, and his clothes rifled. Two men stole upon him in the dark and one felled him with a slung shot, rendering him unconscious. He recovered consciousness while the men had him down and he wrestled with them. They escaped arrest and got nothing.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A famous Boston wit says that the prospects appear to be that protectionists will not much longer allow the tide to come in unless a tariff can be collected off it.

It does not pay to borrow money in order to purchase more land. It is an old truth that "an acre of land has no limit to its productive capacity." The true farmer prefers a small farm well tilled. The manure that is spread on two acres will give better results if applied to one acre, while the cost of tillage will be less. No farmer can afford to buy more land until he has brought up that already in his possession to the highest degree of fertility.

The dress worn at Windsor by the Empress Frederick, which is the dress of a German widow, is very picturesque, though simple and severe. The gown, which is a long, plain one, and covered entirely by crape, is only relieved by two long bands of white lawn, which go down from the neck of the gown in front to the feet. The widow's cap is black, and worn in a stiff point, which comes down low on the forehead, and to which is fastened a long black veil, falling almost to the feet behind. The three Princesses wear the same deep veil and cap, without the white bands, which are the distinctive widow's dress.

Secret experiments with the new explosive proceed successfully in England. Experts are convinced that the explosive can destroy forts like the French forts D'Arret on the frontier within a few hours. The power of the explosive will revolutionize the whole fortress system, making useless great closed fort works and necessitating moveable defensive works enclosed in ironclad bulwarks. Recent fort work changes in France and Russia indicate that both those nations have obtained knowledge of the explosive. Warsaw despatches state that the system of General Toleditler will be completely abandoned and that orders have already been issued to stop the works at Kowal and to form instead a triangular system, including Kowal, Liteuski and Bialystock, connected by strategic railways.

A new stirrup, which provides an absolute guarantee against being dragged, has recently been patented by P. G. Shadbolt. There is nothing peculiar in the appearance of these stirrups at first sight, but closer observation shows that the strap ring is fitted into a spring clip, which opens only laterally, and consequently is kept securely closed so long as the stirrup is perpendicular. But in the event of the rider being thrown, the strain on the stirrup, should the rider's foot remain in it, would at once release it from the strap, and so lessen the danger. This simple appliance seems to offer a ready means of safeguard in riding a horse that is at all likely to throw one.

The observations made in New York seem to leave no doubt that the bustle has indeed come to stay. Mrs. Cleveland's opposition will be fruitless, as well as that of Mrs. Langtry, Miss Mary Anderson, Miss Ada Rehan, Miss Fanny Davenport, Mrs. James Brown Potter and other theatrical stars, the classic outlines of whose figures can now be seen in all their beauty. A good deal seems to depend on figures and on age in this matter. Careful observation has shown that the young girl wears the biggest bustle, and that as age grows the size of the bustle, tournure, dress-improver, or whatever the thing may be called, decreases. Full-figured women of middle age are those who can most successfully appear quite bustleless, the natural fulness of their forms making any such artificial protuberance unnecessary. A thin woman without a bustle becomes unpleasantly conspicuous, and for this reason it is believed that the slender and the lanky will fight for the fashion long after others may be ready to give it up. Just at present, however, there seems to be no danger of that.

Too Particular.

"I went in to bathe," said a Yankee "but before I was long in the water I saw a huge double-jawed shark making rapidly towards me. What was to be done? When he was within a yard of me I faced round, dived under the shark, and, taking a knife from my pocket, ripped the monster up." "But did you bathe with your clothes on?' asked an astonished listener, "Well," answered the story-teller reproachfully, "well, I do think you needn't be so very particular."

"Out of the Frying Pan."

Husband (with a sigh of relief)—New Year's at last! Thank Heaven! No more presents to buy, no more bills to pay. No more "father, buy me this," or "father, buy me that;" no more "John, dear, can you let me have some money, there's lots to buy?" It is over. A few more days and I should have been bankrupt. But the crisis has passed, the night has gone, the morn is breaking, the—Wife (entering the room)—John, dear, the coal bin is empty.

Remedy for Pneumonia.

Dr. Joseph Eichberg, of Cincinnati communicates to the Medical Record details of a remarkable recovery which he witnessed in a London Hospital, in a desperate case of pneumonia, under the extraordinary practice of opening the windows by the bed for five minutes every hour—in January—and sponging the chest, arms and face every hour, together with free stimulation, etc. Since that experience he had tried the same plan in desperate cases with entire success.

The Other String to the Bow.

Mrs. Smallsalary—I don't see how we are going to keep the children warm this winter, Alfred?
Mr. Smallsalary—Well, I suppose we can afford a fire part of the time, and part of the time we can take turns in spanking them.—Burlington Free Press.

The fact that the redskins in Dakota are trying to sell the blankets given them by the Government is construed to mean that this is to be an open winter.

Herr Nowak is the name of an operatic conductor. We wonder what he would do if he were stranded and had to get to the next town.

A WOMAN'S BRAVERY.

How a Montreal Servant Girl Combatted Two Sneak Thieves—Her Great Presence of Mind.

A Montreal telegram says: The residence of Mr. C. C. Snowden, at 190 Manse street, was the scene this morning of a remarkable exhibition of feminine bravery and the discomfiture of two burly sneak thieves at the hands of an old woman scarcely able to walk. A servant attached to Mr. Snowden's household, at 11 o'clock this morning noticed two men walking about the rear yard and acting in a very suspicious manner. She started into the kitchen to ask them what they wanted, but they had got there before her and, going on into the dining-room, were busily engaged packing up the silverware and other valuables within their reach when the servant screamed, locked the kitchen door, putting the key into her pocket, and ran up stairs to arouse the housekeeper, who is a woman within the shady side of 50. One of the thieves sought a hiding place in the servant's bed, where he hid under the quilts. The other vainly attempted to break open the door. The old housekeeper, aroused by the servant's screams, armed herself with a six-chambered revolver and sallied toward the noise. She first roused the man under the quilts, who, in answer to her question as to what he was doing there, hit her full in the face with a shovel. Nearly dazed by the blow she levelled her revolver and fired, the ball striking the thief in one of the hips. He fell and she turned her attention to the thief in the kitchen. The man she had shot got there as soon as she did, and the combined efforts of the men burst the door. They rushed into the yard, but not before the housekeeper had fired again, this time striking the man in the rump and extracting from him a yell which so startled the aged markswoman that she dropped the pistol, saying: "Oh! L——, heavens, I have killed him." But she hadn't; for before she could regain her composure and fire again the man who hadn't been hit assisted the man who had been hit over the fence and followed him. Of course the woman couldn't climb a fence, but she kept blazing away at the boards until her ammunition was gone and then she fainted. Neighbors, who had been aroused by the noise of the shots, then went to the assistance of the brave housekeeper and the servant, who can to-night command twice the wages they have heretofore been getting. The thieves, who took nothing with them but the two bullets, escaped capture, but the police have a good description of them and expect to capture them before morning.

Royalties and Rules.

As a steady tonic for the amity between Germany and Italy, Kaiser William has ordered each regimental band to play at least once a week the march of the Bersaglieri and the Italian infantry march.

The Princess of Wales preserves her good looks in a most astonishing way, considering her age. She will be 44 years old on the 1st of next December, but in the shaded light of an opera box, or when arrayed in full court dress (a toilet which she wears with infinite grace), she does not look a day over 30.

General Boulanger's one idol in life is said to be his mother. She was with him in 1859 during the ten months in which he was in danger from a wound received at Solferino, and which has never entirely healed. He spends every Sunday afternoon and evening with her, and if away always sends her a telegram.

"Like sunshine in a shady place,"
The poet called a woman's face
That gladdened all who saw its beauty.
A face, no doubt, that beamed with health,
That blessing which is more than wealth,
And lightens every daily duty.
O how can woman, whose hard life
With many a wearing pain is rife,
Escape the grasp of such affliction,
And be a power to bless and cheer?
The answer comes both swift and clear—
Take Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the only medicine for woman's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, of satisfaction being given in every case, or money refunded. See guarantee printed on bottle-wrapper.

Genius, but no Experience.

"Americans have a genius for such things" (reporting bull-fights), "but they lack experience," says the Dallas News, and then continues: "It was a Yank who said 'The bull roared like thunder, I ran like lightning and split my trousers as if the heavens and earth had come together as I jumped the fence.'"

An English Medical Authority

affirms that the best regimen for preserving health may be summed up in the maxim, "keep the head cool, the feet warm and the bowels active." There is a world of wisdom in the observation. Obstinate constipation, or costiveness, is an exciting cause of other diseases; and, with many persons of sedentary habits or occupations, this inaction of the bowels is a sort of constant annoyance, producing piles, prolapse of the rectum, fistula and various dyspeptic symptoms. All these are warded off, and health is maintained, by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets.

A Novel Pianist.

The latest prodigy at the piano, says the London Court Journal, is reported to be quadrumanous—a monkey to wit, that executes morceaux brilliantly with all four hands at once, while he gracefully turns over the leaves of the music with the tip of his prehensile tail. It is not stated whether or not the music has been especially written for him a quatre mains; perhaps he simply duplicates what has been written for ordinary two-handed performers of the Rubenstein order. The achievements of this wonderful ape surely make a new and most important epoch in the arrangement of orchestras.

Mme. Patti-Nicolini says learning "Romeo and Juliet" in French, after being accustomed to it in Italian, was harder than learning two entirely new parts.

Brandon Thomas, well known in this city as having played here with Rosina Vokes, and who is now acting in Terry's "Sweet Lavender," is going to be married next Saturday to Miss Levisen, the handsome heiress of a rich diamond merchant.

The Shoe Fitted.

Pretty Girl—Yes, I like that young minister; but I really do think he might have a little more judgment. I know I'm not very wicked, but he imagines I'm going straight to perdition.
Friend—Oh, you must be mistaken.
"No, I'm not. There are lots worse sinners in the congregation than I am, and yet no matter what woikedness he preaches against he always looks right straight at me."

He was Married.

The car jolts violently, and the stout lady is thrown into Mr. Fuddle's lap.
Stout lady (blushing)—Excuse me, sir, but the car—
Mr. Fuddle (sadly)—Don't mention it, ma'am! Don't mention it. I'm used to being sat on by women.

Don't disgust everybody by hawking, blowing and spitting, but use Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy and be cured.

Chickens Come Home to Roost.

Lady of the House—"Who are you, sir?" Tramp—"I'm the dude you flirted with at the seaside in August."—Chicago Globe.

ITCHING PILES.

Symptoms—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. Swayne's Ointment stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. Swayne's Ointment can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

Near the Goal.

Edith—"Is your sister engaged yet?"
Maud—"No; but she's got a situation as typewriter."

Interested in the Result.

"I threw myself at her feet," moaned a disconsolate youth.
"Did you hit them?" inquired a cold-hearted, unsympathetic listener.

Miss Wheelock, of Milwaukee, supports herself by teaching the game of whist. She has 193 pupils and expects soon to double that number by opening classes in Chicago.

People will be glad to learn that M. De Lesseps is "still optimistic." A man has to be optimistic when he has a houseful of babies, even if his hair be white.

Patrick Burke was injured in Mr. John G. Frost's furniture factory at Belleville yesterday morning; how seriously is not yet known. He was engaged sawing a board when a piece struck him in the abdomen. He was picked up for dead, but finally rallied. It is feared that he is injured internally.

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.
Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.
Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detroit, 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington, 1,216 at Boston, large classes of Columbia students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by Richard Proctor, the scientist, Hons. W. W. Astor, Judah P. Benjamin, Judge Gibson, Dr. Brown, E. H. Cook, Prin. N.Y. State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus post free from
PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

DUNL. 3 89

SALESMEN We wish a few men to sell our goods by sample to the wholesale and retail trade. Largest manufacturers in our line. Enclose 2-cent stamp. Wages $3 per day. Permanent position. No postals answered. Money advanced for wages, advertising, etc. Centennial Manufacturing Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

MERCHANTS, BUTCHERS AND TRADERS generally
We want a good man in your locality to pick up
CALF SKINS
for us. Cash Furnished on satisfactory guaranty Address, C. S. Page, Hyde Park, Vermont, U. S

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Ride line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement
"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."
And the Review says:
"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in a specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."
Query: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

DUNN'S
BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

FOR SALE,
A Northey 12-Horse Power Boiler and Killey Automatic Cut-off 15-Horse Power Engine,
WITH BUCKEYE GOVERNOR
All in best of order. Can be seen at the office of the
TIMES PRINTING CO
HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

THE GRANDEST CHANCE

Y-E-T.

J. G. Anderson

WILL OFFER GOODS

FOR THE NEXT 30 DAYS

COMMENCING JAN. 20,

AT

Prices Never yet Heard of!

I do not intend that goods shall lie on my shelves from one season to the other. So, in order to make room for SPRING GOODS which will be along next month. The prices of everything will be SLAUGHTERED.

I have also added largely to my stock some very

CHOICE SELECTIONS

—FROM A—

BANKRUPT STOCK!

Which will be sold at far below wholesale prices. Don't fail to come early that you may have a good choice. Note a few of the prices:

A nice Tweed Effect Dress Goods, worth 13c a yard now 12 yards for $1.

A heavy wide Melton Dress Goods, worth 15c, for 10c a yard. Other lines in proportion.

Great Drives in Tweeds!

A number of beautiful suiting tweeds, worth $1.10 per yard, now 65 cts.

A 75 ct. tweed for 50 cts. a yard

DON'T fail to see these goods soon. We cannot keep them long at these prices. All other lines of dry goods reduced in proportion. Remember this clearing sale will ONLY LAST FOR 30 DAYS!

——Just have a look through our——

BOOT and SHOE DEPARTMENT

We have not space to enumerate the bargains you will be able to get in this line. BE SURE YOU GET A SAMPLE OF OUR TEA, 4 lbs. FOR $1.

J. G. ANDERSON.

A large Assortment

OF

Men's Women's and Children's

BOOTS

AND SHOES for WINTER WEAR.

—AT—

W. CLAYTON'S

Felt Boots, Gum Rubbers, Fulled Stockings, Overshoes, and Rubbers. Mens' and Boys' Long Boots, At prices to suit the times.

Photos,

Photos,

Photos.

We are now turning out work far superior in style and finish to any ever produced in Flesherton.

COPYING and ENLARGING at MODERATE RATES.

PICTURE FRAMING

done in all its branches. A good stock of FRAMES and MOULDINGS kept constantly on hand. Will also introduce the new BROMIDE PORTRAIT, a picture that is giving entire satisfaction wherever introduced. SAMPLES can be seen at my Gallery where all particulars as to Price, Style &c., can be ascertained.

MRS. BULMER,

FLESHERTON.

HEATH FOR ALL

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS

Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the

Liver, Stomach, Kidn'ys, and Bowels.

They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages. For Children and the aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT

an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equa

For SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS

Glandular Swellings, and all Skin Diseases it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment,

78, New Oxford Street (late 533, Oxford Street), London.

and are sold at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each Box or Pot, and may be had of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World.

☞ Purchasers should look to the Label on the Pots and Boxes. If the address is not 533, Oxford Street, London, they are spurious.

HEARD'S

Carriage Works,

FLESHERTON,

—— MANUFACTURERS OF ——

Buggies, Spring Wagons, Lumber Wagons and Iron Harrows. Painting, Trimming and Repairing promptly attended to. Horse-Shoeing a Specialty.

Flesherton Carriage Works.

FREE

$85 Solid Gold Watch. Sold for $100, until lately. Best $50 watch in the world. Perfect timekeeper. Warranted. Heavy Solid Gold Hunting Cases. Both ladies' and gents' sizes, with works and cases of equal value. One Person in each locality can secure one free, together with our large and valuable line of Household Samples. These samples, as well as the watch, we send Free, and after you have kept them in your home for 3 months and shown them to those who may have called, they become your own property. Those who write at once can be sure of receiving the Watch and Samples. We pay all express, freight, etc. Address Stinson & Co., Box 413, Portland, Maine.

FREE

SALESMEN WANTED

CAUTION.

ALL PERSONS are hereby cautioned against negotiating a note for ten dollars drawn in favor of John Foster, given by one Abraham Scott, dated April 18, and due in six months from date, made payable at Heath Head Post-office, as I have not received value for the same, said note having been lost.

JOHN FOSTER,
Proton Station P.O.

Monthly Fairs.

Orangeville—The second Thursday in each month.

Flesherton.

FLESHERTON ADVANCE.

"TRUTH BEFORE FAVOR."—"PRINCIPLES, NOT MEN."

VOL. VIII., NO. 395. FLESHERTON, ONT., THURSDAY, JAN. 24, 1889. W. H. THURSTON, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.

BARGAINS

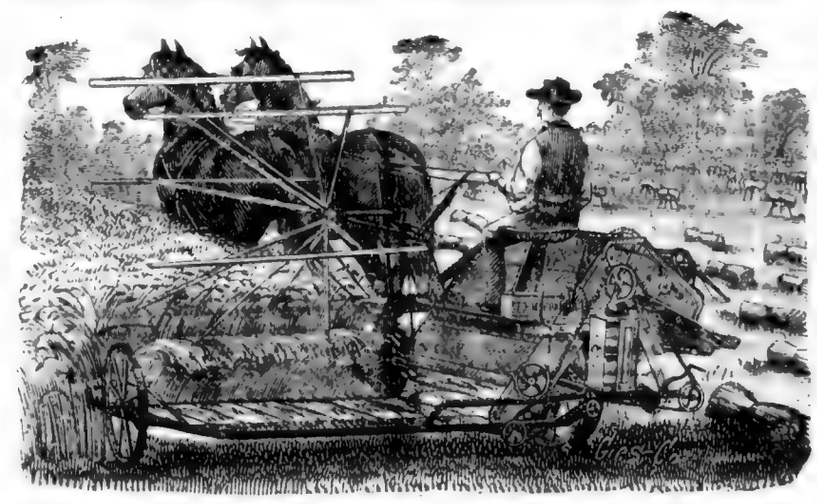
Genuine Bargains!

Watches, Clocks, Jewelry, Fancy Goods, Silverware of the finest quality, Razors, Knives, etc.

At Russell's Noted Jewelery Store
FLESHERTON.

FOR THE NEXT 60 DAYS as the goods must be sold they will be cleared out at wholesale prices. Come at once and get the choice. A beautiful stock to select from. No reasonable offer refused. If you need a watch now is your time. If you need a cruit or pickle stand or anything in silverware, it is being sold at less than half price. Fancy flush goods, toilet sets, etc., almost given away. DO NOT FAIL TO CALL AT ONCE AND SECURE SOME OF THESE TERRIBLE BARGAINS. ALL SALES and WORK POSITIVELY CASH AT

Rusell's Noted Jewelry Store FLESHERTON



A. Harris Son & Co., BRANTFORD.

The Brantford Light Steel Binder, Brantford Reaper, Brantford front cut Mower, Brantford rear cut Mower,
THE BEAVER COMBINED SEEDER and DRILL, THE MASON IMPROVED SULKY RAKE, JOHNSTON'S IMPROVED ONE HORSE CULTIVATOR.
LAND ROLLERS, GANG PLOWS, SCUFFLERS, CULTIVATORS, ROOT CUTTERS, GRAIN CRUSHERS, ETC.

FOR SALE BY

THOS. A. BLAKELY,
FLESHERTON.

Station Items

Gleaned by our own Reporter.

Business of late has not been as brisk on account of the recent thaw, yet with the advance of one cent on oats over that of Markdale there has been a fine trade done in that line. Now sir with another first class man on the market who would deal exclusively in grain, it is safe to say we would have a market here second to none in Grey. And it would be much better for all concerned.

Mr. Johnston Little, our blacksmith, while in the act of shoeing a span of horses received a kick from one of them which was thought would have proved serious, but glad to state will soon be able to resume work again.

Mr. Ramsey and family have returned to this place, and intend to remain with us. Times, he says, are much better here than in older townships. Shake hands Ramsey.

Mrs. R. Cook has been confined to the house through sickness for the past four or five weeks, and her recovery is but slow. We hope she will soon be restored to her wonted cheerfulness.

Mr. Gordon McMullen, of Tilsonburg, brother to Mrs. R. Cook, is paying his relatives in this section of country a visit.

Mrs. Thos. Cook, of Glenelg, is at present staying with her son, Mr. R. Cook, for a few days. She looks hale and hearty.

Our good natured and portly night operator, Mr. Harrington, seems to be somewhat jubilant that leap year has come and gone without being captured by some of the fair sex. I would just remind friend Harrington that there have been night operators wooed and won.

Some dastardly mean scoundrel tied a tin pail to the tail of a cow owned by Mrs. Hogg, and then put the dogs on her which resulted in the death of the cow. Mrs. Hogg felt it very keenly as it was a valuable cow and a special favorite of hers. The party are suspected and are likely to be prosecuted. They would be rightly served if they had a few years in prison and a small touch of the cat-o'-nine-tails and that's where the laugh would come in.

Our esteemed and popular hotel keeper, Mr. McGinnis, is doing a live trade in his line of business. At times it would remind you of a bee-hive. It might be well to adopt the bee-hive for a sign with the following inscription.

In this hive we are all alive:
Good liquor makes us funny,
As you pass by come in and try
The flavor of our honey.

NED.

Are you made miserable by indigestion, constipation, dizziness, loss of appetite, yellow skin? Shiloh's Vitalizer is a positive cure. For Sale at the Medical Hall.

One day last week Mr. Henry Reid of Egremont, sold to Mr. E Murphy, buyer in Holstein, seven spring pigs, six of which were dropped on March 20th and the seventh a month later, which weighed an average of 278 lbs. Of the March pigs the heaviest weighed 309 lbs. and the lighest 257. The total weight of the seven pigs after deducting 36 lbs. shrinkage, was 1851 which at 6½c. per lb. netted Mr. Reid the goodly sum of $120.31.

The Local News.

What is Happening in Our Own Vicinity.

Were you at Mrs. J's. social?

Mr. Herbert Strain, of Minot, Dak., visited Flesherton last week.

Board by the week, day or meal, apply to Mrs. Jas. Kester, Sydenham St., Flesherton.

LUMBER WANTED; 10,000 ft. Basswood, 10,000 ft. Hemlock, 5,000 ft Soft-Elm. For particulars call at Legate's carriage shop, Flesherton.

Bro. Spurr's salute to the people of Creemore appeared last week, and had a strictly business air about it.

The next pressing want of Flesherton business men is a telephone to the station. It is surprising that this has not been accomplished before.

Shiloh's catarrh remedy---a positive cure for catarrh, diptheria and canker-mouth. For sale at the Medical Hall.

A credit auction sale of farm stock and implements will be held on lot 13, con. 12, Osprey, on Wednesday, Feb 6, the property of Mr. John Tyson.

For dyspepsia and liver complaint you have a printed guarantee on every bottle of Shiloh's vitalizer. It never fails to cure. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Remember the parlor social on Friday evening in the Methodist parsonage. There will be a musical program. Tea served at 8 p.m. Fee 15 cents, children 10 cents.

Lieutenant Fields furnished a good sheet of ice on the rink Saturday evening and a large number of young people took advantage of it to while away a couple of hours on runners.

Read This.—We have decided to make a grand offer to new subscribers. For $1.50 we will send you the ADVANCE and Weekly Empire until the end of 1889. This of course, applies to new subscribers alone and remains good for two weeks.

MEALS.—Oat meal, corn meal, cracked wheat, and rolled oats at bottom prices. R. Trimble.

They had a lively time out at Lady Bank on Friday last. A movement was on foot for removing this postoffice into the hands of a new postmaster. A meeting was called, and after an exceedingly stormy discussion it was decided that the office had better remain where it is.

A Newton correspondent of the West Durham News says this of an old Flesherton Boy: Mr. Fred Leitch, Superintendent S.S, has left for college. Mr. Leitch has occupied the pulpit both in Newtonville, Shiloh and Kendal, with great acceptance. We wish you every success Fred.

Why will you cough when Shiloh's cure will give immediate relief. Price 10 cts., 50 cts., and $1. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Auction Sale.

Auction sale of valuable household furniture, etc., at Russell's, Flesherton, on Monday, Feb. 11, 1889, cattle fair day. See bills.

Lightning Express.

Mr. P. Munshaw is agent for the Dominion Express Company in Flesherton. Office at Munshaw's hotel. Articles left in his care will receive the same despatch in future which they have in the past.

Carnival.

The first skating carnival for this season takes place at the rink, Priceville, to-morrow (Friday) evening. A large number of prizes are offered. Good music. Admission 15 and 10 cents. Open at 7 p m. For description of prizes see bills.

FIRE!—Any quantity of coal oil, selling away down low. R. Trimble.

Coal oil for sale at F. G. Karstedt's.

County Council met in Owen Sound on Tuesday.

Immense bargains on now at Russell's Jewelry store, Flesherton. Do not miss them.

We have received an answer to Mr. Grainger's query of last week, but too late to appear in this issue.

JUST RECEIVED—A large stock of axes and cross-cut saws, which I am offering very low. R. Trimble.

Every person interested in the formation of a Mechanics' Institute should be at the meeting on Monday evening next.

FELTS.—Any quantity men's pure gum buckled rubbers and felt socks and boots at lowest figures. R. Trimble.

Mr. Wm. Edgar, general pasenger agent Grand Trunk railway, sends us a neat G. T. R. calendar and program of winter carnival at Montreal. Thanks.

J. W. Armstrong, Esq., has been confined to the house for some days with a very severe cold, but is now recovering. M. Richardson, Esq., has also been confined to the house from a similiar cause.

The terrible reductions in watches, clocks, jewelry, silverware, spectacles, razors, knives, etc., are drawing crowds to Russell's, Flesherton. If you wish to secure some of the great bargains come at once.

Rev. Mr. Shilton preached a telling sermon on Sunday evening last from the following text: "If it be possible, as much as lieth within you, live at peace with all men." The sermon was a vigorous one, straight from the shoulder, such an one as could scarcely be delivered without leaving some distinct marks in spots where it struck.

The Sunday School anniversary held at Eugenia on Friday evening last was an immense success, over thirty dollars being taken at the door. A full report was looked for from our Eugenia cor., but it did not come to hand, probably owing to the fact that he felt somewhat languid after the exciting social stimulants and "flow of soul" indulged in.

Now is the time to speculate as west Toronto Junction is booming Manufacturers are flocking in. Graham & Whitby, Real Estate Brokers, 972 Queen St West Toronto, have a few more lots on very easy terms at the old prices, which will double in value in one year. Call or write for particulars.

Appointments.

As will be seen by our council report, that body on Monday last appointed H. Cairns, Esq., to the deputy reeveship, and reappointed Mr. McLoughrey to the assessorship of Artemesia for 1889.

Declined.

Rev. Mr. Mills, who received the call to the Presbyterian congregations of Flesherton and Markdale, has been obliged to decline on account of being sent by the Presbytery to a foreign field of labor. This leaves the two congregations in somewhat of a quandary, as it will be some time now before a regular minister can be obtained.

Put on Your Grease.

The days are lengthening quite perceptibly. Of course every one has noticed this phenomenon. It occurs once every year, as regular as your newspaper subscription falls due. This season, the tax collector and newspapers are all periodical, but in one respect the newspaper differs from the two former. It is not bound by any immutable law of nature to visit you from week to week and year to year if its wheels are not greased with a one dollar bill. Have you put on your dollar's worth of grease, reader? The label is the spot where friction first appears.

Osprey Appointments.

At the meeting of Osprey Council, held on Monday, the following officers were appointed. Thos. Scott, Esq., was given the clerkship, duties to commence after next meeting of council; Samuel Taylor got the assessorship, and Wm. McGirr and Geo. Allister auditors. The new clerk is a brother of Dr. Scott, Maxwell.

The Act of a Villain.

Some rascally individual tied a tin pail to the tail of a cow belonging to Mrs. Hogg, of Flesherton station the other day, and then set a dog upon her. This act resulted in the cow's death. Our station reporter voices our own sentiments when he remarks that the perpetrator of this crime should be treated to a dose of the cat-o.-nine-tails.

Shiloh's cure will immediately relieve croup, hooping cough and bronchitis. For sale at the Medical Hall.

An Old Resident Gone.

Mrs Catharine Whitten, wife of Mr. Andrew Whitten, aged 70 years, died in Flesherton on Monday, Jan. 7th. Death resulted from a severe attack of bronchitis, from which deceased had been suffering for some time. The funeral took place on Wednesday following, and was largely attended. Mrs. Whitten was mother of our fellow citizen John, Robert and Edward Whitten, and was one of the oldest residents of Artemesia, having lived on the back line, east, near Markdale, for the past thirty years, until about two years ago when the family removed to this village. Her death was calm and a happy release from a life of toil, and an entry into joyful rest.

DEAFNESS CURED.—A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness, Noises in the head, How they may be cured at your home. Post free 3d.—Address Dr. NICHOLSON, 30, St. John Street, Montreal.

SACRIFICE SALE!

TILL FEB. 1st. 1889.

10½ PER CENT, off all sales of WATCHES and CLOCKS! or ONE SIXTH off marked price.

20 per cent, off RINGS, CHAINS, SILVERWARE, MUSICAL GOODS ditto.

25 per cent off general lines in

JEWELRY, SPEX, ETC.

Markdale is the only place in this section where you can get

CLOSE COMPETITION PRICES.

It will pay you to drive here, as you can find a large stock to choose from at cut figures.

CALL THIS MONTH!

If you never have before,
—AND—

Test This Statement!

that I have a very fine stock at

Bed Rock Prices!

Discounts considered. Fine repairing receives general attention.

W. BROTHEN

JEWELER and OPTICIAN,
MARKDALE, ONT.

Best Roller Flour Less Than $5 per barrel at J. HALES'

DEATH'S HARVEST.

Terrible Results from Last Week's Tornado.

SOME HEARTRENDING CALAMITIES.

A Large Silk Mill Blown Down in Reading, Pa.

The Collapse of the Bridge at the Niagara Falls.

THE LATEST PARTICULARS.

A silk mill, in which 250 girls were employed, blew down just before the hour for quitting work. About the same time there was an explosion and fire in the same neighborhood, by which eight men were burned to death.

Suddenness that was Appalling.

The fleecy clouds gave way to the ominous signs of a coming storm. Dark, heavy banks of clouds marshalled themselves toward the front, and a gloom seemed to have settled over the city. There was a stillness as of a coming danger. Suddenly the wind whistled, roared and tore in mad confusion. The storm clouds grew heavier still, and louder roared the winds. In the western sky the storm was seen approaching with a thundering noise. The swath it cut was narrow, but its effect was terrible. Persons residing along the track of the storm say that they saw the first signs of danger in a funnel-shaped maelstrom which seemed to gather up everything within its reach and cast it right and left. Out in the country, houses and barns were unroofed, farm outbuildings overturned, crops rooted up and destruction spread in every direction. The track of this destructive element was not more than 200 feet wide, and it is lucky that it only touched the suburbs of the city. It came from the west, but passed along the northern border of Reading. First it touched the Mt. Penn stove works. Here the corner of the building was struck and a portion of the roof was cut off as nicely as if done with a pair of scissors. Then the storm cloud scurried across some fields, took off a portion of the roof of J. H. Sternbergh's rolling mill, and a number of dwellings were unroofed as nicely as if their tin roofs were paper. The storm then hurried across the property of the Reading Railroad Company and crossed the railroad. Here a passenger car was standing. This was overturned as neatly as if it was a toy, and its splinters scattered in every direction. Meanwhile, the Rain Poured Down in Torrents.

The atmosphere became heavy and oppressive, and it was almost as dark as night. Directly alongside the tracks of the Reading Railroad was situated the paint shop of the Reading Railroad Company. It was a one-story building about 60 by 150 feet in size. Here about thirty men were employed in painting passenger cars. There were eight or nine of these cars in the building. They had been built at the company's shops in this city at a cost of $6,000 each. The building was struck square in the middle, and the bricks scattered like feathers. The cars were turned topsy-turvy, while the men were buried under the debris. Some of the bricks were carried a square away. The chamber of each of the passenger cars was already filled with gas as they were ready to be taken out on the road in a few days. These exploded with terrific force, causing the people all over the city to run out of their houses, thinking that it was an earthquake. There was a considerable quantity of gasoline in the building, and this added fuel to the flames which shot heavenward with the roar of musketry. Some twenty of the men had a chance to crawl out of the debris, but four of their companions were enveloped in the embrace of the flames. Their cries were heard for a moment, then the voices were hushed forever. They were roasted to death, and the fire from the nine passenger cars lit up the heavens for miles around. In the meantime the fire department was called out, but its services were unavailing. The building and cars were consumed in fifteen minutes, and nothing was left but the smoking ruins, under which lay four human beings burned to a crisp. Their names are: John Kohler, Albert Landberger, Sheridan Jones and George Schaeffer. It was rumored that several others had been killed, but these are the only ones who it is known have lost their lives. Aaron Dewalt, another employee in the paint shop, had his arm broken, and George Knobb was injured internally, no doubt fatally. The loss to the railroad company is fully $75,000. While this was all going on the storm was travelling forward at the rate of about 100 miles an hour, unroofing houses and doing other damage.

An Awful Crash.

Directly in the storm's path, at the corner of Twelfth and Marian streets stood the Reading silk mill, one of the industries of the city, and in which were about 175 happy girls working. The building was a huge structure, most substantially built, four stories in height, and had a basement besides. It occupied an entire block of ground. The size of the building itself was nearly 300 feet in length and about 150 feet wide. It was surmounted by a massive tower, fully 100 feet from the ground. The funnel-shaped storm cloud struck the building directly in the centre on its broadest side, which faced the west. It fell to pieces as if composed of so many building blocks. Nearly 200 human beings went down in the awful wreck. Human tongue can never tell the terrible scenes of that hour. The walls gave way, the floors fell down, one on top of the other, and carried their great mass of human beings to the bottom. The bricks were piled up in the greatest confusion, while amid the hurricane and whistling, rushing roaring wind, terrific cries for succor were sent up to heaven. It was a moment that tried men's souls; and almost simultaneously with the fall of the building came the awful cries for relief. Girls with blackened faces, bruised and broken limbs, their clothing tattered and torn, dragged themselves from the ruins. So probably seventy-five to one hundred escaped or were dragged out by their friends. These, of course, worked on the upper floors and were thrown near the top of the debris. At some places the bricks were piled twenty feet deep, and underneath are lying to-night human bodies by the score. About 250 girls and young women are usually employed in the mill, but at 4 o'clock about eighty were relieved from duty for the day. They returned to their homes before the storm came. The most reliable estimate of to-night places the number in the building when it went down in the neighborhood of 175, and, as before stated, 100 of these were rescued by friends or dragged themselves out immediately after the accident. The alarm for relief was immediately sent out, and in a short time thousands of citizens arrived to take out the dead and dying.

The Scene Was a Harrowing One, and beggars description. The mill is situated near the foot of Mt. Penn, a high mountain overlooking the city. When the people arrived everything was enveloped in darkness. Then huge bonfires were built which cast a dismal glare on the surrounding scene. The fire companies left the burning paint shop and assisted in the rescue of the dead and dying. The entire police force was called out, the ambulance and relief corps and a thousand people were in among the debris, carrying out bricks, pulling away timbers and assisting wherever they could, all at the same time, but their work was slow compared with the demand for the rescue of the victims of the disaster. Here a young woman was taken out, bruised and suffering from cuts. One body taken out had its head cut off. Others were in various postures, the living all suffering from the most terrible wounds and some almost scared to death. The Associated Press representative entered what was once the basement of the building, and groping his way through the debris noticed five bodies of young girls lying close together. He tried to pull them out, but they were pinned down and it was impossible to get them out. They were dead and beyond all human aid. Up to half-past 10 o'clock to-night probably the bodies of a dozen dead have been taken out, while the greater portion of the remainder were still under the ruins.

The Work of Rescue

will be pushed all night, but it may be far into to-morrow before all the bodies are taken out. The rescuers still have the greatest hopes that some of those inside are still living, and there is every reason for saying that in this the persons who believe that way are right. All is chaos and confusion around the mill. The managers are missing, and the correct number of the dead is mere guesswork. It may not be over forty, and then again at this hour there is a likelihood that it will reach sixty or even eighty. The silk mill was built about four years ago, and together with the machinery is a total wreck. This means a loss of over $100 000.

Story of a Survivor.

Augustus F. Roscup, residing at No. 638 North Tenth street, was the foreman of the first and second floors of the silk mill. His statement is as follows: "It was about twenty minutes past 5 when I went to the second story to turn on the electric lights. After I had done this I stood looking about the room for about ten minutes. Suddenly I heard a loud rushing noise, which I thought was a cyclone. The building then shook. I was standing in the southern end of the room, and before I could look out of the window I felt the building sink. Quick as lightning the portion of the room I was in went down. The girls rushed about me crying and screaming and calling for help. They did not realize what was taking place. It seemed to me as if the centre of the building was struck first. I cannot describe the scene. It was awful. I could not do anything and could not think of what I should do. Our end of the building went down first and while the floor was sinking it seemed to me as if the girls in the other part of the room were on the top of a hill, that was the way that it impressed me. While we were going down I saw the other portion of the floor fall. In two minutes all was over. The screaming of the girls was heartrending. I was knocked down under heavy timbers and held fast by my foot. I could move every other part of my body excepting my leg. I wanted to reach down with my knife and cut the shoe off my foot. In this way I loosened and managed to arise. Amid the screams of the girls and falling beams and bricks I succeeded in escaping.

HOW SOME GIRLS ESCAPED.

I got out of the ruins on the eastern side of the building, but how, I do not know. I called to the girls as loudly as I could. They were all terribly excited, and I never witnessed anything so awful in all my life. Many of them heard me and worked themselves towards me. At some places it seemed as if the floor was closed as a solid mass, and the girls would creep around this, crawl over the machines and creep on their hands and knees until they got to the opening where I was. The machines saved many from being crushed to death and left a space between the floor and debris to crawl out.

I believe that fully one hundred persons escaped with me. I remember seeing them run across the commons in different directions to their homes, terrified naturally. Some ran away a short distance and then returned to the ruins. The entire building was down. The girls came back to look for their brothers and sisters or friends. We could hear the moans and shrieks of those imprisoned in the ruins. The rain was pouring down and all around was dark. I was badly bruised and hurt about the body, head and limbs and went home after I saw I could do nothing. Between 250 and 300 operatives were in the building. About 4 o'clock I allowed sixteen girls to go home. All the floors were in operation. The report that one hundred went home at 4 o'clock is not true.

A Niagara Falls despatch says: Dr. J.M. Hodge, of Niagara Falls, was the last man to cross the bridge before it fell. He crossed from the American side to see a patient about 10 o'clock and returned about midnight. His story of his return is singularly thrilling. He says: The lights were out, and the worst gale I ever experienced was howling through the chasm. I had not advanced far beyond the Canadian tower before I realized from the nature of the swaying that something was wrong; but I was exceedingly anxious to reach home and so kept on. As I neared the centre the swinging of the bridge from side to side became something terrific, and to add to the horror of the situation there was likewise a heavy motion like the rising and falling of a ship in the waves, as though the cables above were elastic. Sometimes the bridge would seem to tip up, as though one side was raised by the wind while the other side hung from the suspenders, and whenever this occurred I dropped on my hands and knees for fear that I should be thrown over. The rest of the time I clung to the railing as though it were the only straw between me and certain death, and worked my way along a few steps at a time, whenever there would come a slight lull in the gale. In several places this railing was bent inward, and I was in constant fear of reaching some break. To add to the discomfort and difficulties of the trip, great volumes of spray from the Falls, mingled with snow and sleet, were dashed at intervals into my face, blinding me and drenching my clothing. At one point a gust of wind more powerful than the rest seemed to come swelling up from the water, and getting under my overcoat literally tore it open. Had I not been holding on to the railing with both hands I believe that garment would have been carried away. Mingling with the whistling of the wind through the wires when near the centre of the bridge I heard a sound like the flapping of a broken cable against the railing, and I believe that it was here that the bridge first began to give way. When I finally reached the American tower, being half an hour after I began the trip across, I was wet to the skin, almost blinded, and breathless. Nothing would tempt me to go through the ordeal again.

The bridge was built 21 years ago, and was a single-drive wooden structure with wooden towers built out of heavy timbers. Three years ago the wooden towers were replaced by those of steel and iron by the Buffalo Bridge Co. without any interruption to traffic. The first of last March the work of replacing the wooden body of the bridge for one of steel and iron and also widening the drive so that two carriages could pass on the bridge was commenced and completed about midsummer without interruption to traffic. There were put in also two heavy cables. The work was done by the Buffalo Bridge Company, under the careful eye of Engineer McNulty, of New York. The loss will amount to $200,000.

The bridge commenced to give way on the Canadian side. Tender Barthan first noticed it and sent after bridgetender P. Flynn to go over the river by railway and Suspension Bridge to notify them on the American side. In a few minutes the whole structure was in the river. So fierce was the storm no crash could be heard.

The bridge was owned by a company. Mr. Harrington was superintendent, Chas. Smyth, of Clinton, N. Y., is President.

No one was known to be on the bridge at the time of the accident. Peter Breker crossed it about midnight. It was swinging so heavily then he had to hang on to the side in order to get over.

Signs of the effect of the storm can be seen everywhere. The water in the river rose thirty feet, floating the Maid of the Mist, where the owners have her dry-docked fifty feet away from the dock in order that the ice could not in any way harm the little craft. It was with the utmost exertions on the part of Mr. Lablonde and others that she was prevented from breaking her moorings and going through the Whirlpool Rapids. The docks and houses connected with the Maid of the Mist Company were swept away. The loss to the company will amount to $1,000.

The promenade and photo gallery at Brundages, at the Whirlpool Rapids Park, on the Canadian side, fell to the force of the water. The loss is $1,500.

The viewing stand and buildings of the Woodford elevator, on the American side, also gave way.

The whirlpool is covered with wreckage and driftwood. The drill shed was unroofed, trees by the dozens fell before the force of the wind in Wesley Park as so many straws. The fence around the athletic grounds is demolished. Portions of it were carried a quarter of a mile away. Not much damage was done in the free park, other than some of the gravel roads and walks were washed away and the wooden doors and windows of the elevator under the Falls were blown away.

WICKED SALLIE McGEE.

She Could Cry to Order and Weep Loudest of the Mourners.

A Philadelphia despatch says: The tender years of Sallie McGee yesterday saved her from a felon's cell. Judge Hare refused to sentence the girl, who had been convicted of stealing at funerals, as an appeal for mercy had been made in her behalf. This girl was in the habit of attending funerals and joining in the great weeping over the departed. When the opportunity offered she carried off whatever she could lay her hands on.

Preferred Death to Dishonor.

An Ottawa despatch says: A French-Canadian named Phillias Bourgard committed suicide at Moreau's Hotel on Friday night. He was a tailor belonging to Vercheres, Que., but had come to Ottawa and obtained work. He retired to his room on Friday night about 10 o'clock, having previously handed the bartender two letters to be posted, one being addressed to his father. Shortly after going to his room two shots, following each other in rapid succession, were heard. On rushing into his room it was found that the unfortunate man had blown out his brains. The coroner took possession of the letters which deceased had left to be posted. That addressed to his father was to the effect that the writer intended to take his life, as owing to deception he had been inveigled into a marriage with a disreputable woman in Montreal. An inquest was held on Saturday and a verdict of suicide was returned. The case bears some resemblance to that of the commercial traveller who married Polly Bredin.

A Panama despatch says: On November 21st an earthquake almost totally destroyed the town of Quanere, but despite the widespread destruction no loss of life occurred.

A HEROIC REPORTER.

Gallant Rescue of Six Babies From a Burning Building.

A Philadelphia despatch says: The handsome houses of Robert McWade, city editor of the Public Ledger (who was in Hamilton during the time of the Phipps extradition trial), and J. H. Tighe, on Lancaster avenue, at Wayne Station, were entirely destroyed by fire last night. The total loss is about $20,000. Nine small children narrowly escaped being burned in their beds. Mrs. Jones, a sister-in-law of Mr. Tighe, was driven crazy by the excitement and had to be taken out of the house by force. When the fire broke out Mr. McWade had just finished supper and was sitting in the parlor with his wife and several nearly grown children, after the little ones had been put to bed. His first thought was of his children, and he darted upstairs and succeeded in getting them all out of doors safely. Then he and several neighbors formed a bucket brigade, but the flames gained steadily on them, fanned by the northwest wind. The houses of Mr. McWade and Mr. Tighe adjoin. The flames soon spread to the property next door. There is but one fire company in Wayne. It owns no engine, but has a line of hose. The company responded, but they could do nothing to save the buildings. Some one shouted that there was a woman at one of the windows of Mr. Tighe's house. Mr. McWade ran upstairs through flame and smoke and found Mrs. Jones with a babe in her arms standing in the centre of a third-story room. He told her to go down stairs, but she refused to go. Then he tried to persuade her, but she said she would not move. She was perfectly calm. Her mind had given way. Mr. McWade seized her by the arms and dragged her out of the room by force. He managed, but with great difficulty, to get her down the stairs, and she and the baby were taken out safely.

When this was done Mr. McWade heard screams in Mr. Tighe's house. He ran in again, and in a second-story room found two little children lying in bed with the flames darting all around them. He picked them up, and with an infant tucked under each arm sprang down-stairs, and barely managed to reach the door through the clouds of thick smoke. The flames were extinguished at 10 o clock. Mr. McWade loses about $16 000. He had a library valued at $5,000, which it had taken him several years to collect, and none of it was saved. He had no insurance on the house or its contents. Mr. Tighe's loss is about $3,500. The house did not belong to him. His effects were partly insured in the New England Mutual Company.

Mr. McWade's little children, who were taken from their beds, were almost naked. They were tenderly carried through the terble rainstorm to the houses of the neighbors, where they were cared for. The ladies had no time to save their clothing. They were scantily dressed, and were cared for by their friends who live close by.

THE KING'S BODY GUARD.

Revolution at Uganda—King Deposed—Christians Murdered—Mohammedanism on Top.

A Zanzibar despatch says: Advices have been received from the interior that in October last Mwanga, King of Uganda, plotted to destroy his entire body guard, his intention being to abandon them on an island in Lake Nyanza, where they would starve to death. The guards, who had been forewarned of the king's intention, refused to enter the canoes which were to convey them to the island, but returned to the capital and made an attack on Mwanga's palace. The king fled to escape the fury of the guards, and his brother Kewewa was enthroned in his stead. Kewewa appointed Christians to the principal offices. This enraged the Arabs, who murdered many of the Christian officials and replaced them with Mohammedans. The Arabs burned the English and French mission stations, and killed many of the converts to Christianity. The mission boat Eleanor, in which some of the persons who had been converted by the French missionaries were fleeing, was struck by a hippopotamus and sunk, five of the converts being drowned. Many letters from Emin Bey and Henry M. Stanley were destroyed by the burning of the missionary stations. The missionaries have reached Usamboix in safety. The Msalala depot is safe. Mwanga is a prisoner at Magu. He has appealed to the English missionaries for assistance. The Arabs have written to Missionary McKay, exulting in their triumph, and prophesying the extinction of all the mission stations in Central Africa in revenge for England's anti-slavery policy. They have proclaimed Uganda a Mohammedan kingdom.

The Father of Twenty-one Children.

A Montreal despatch says: Louis Lesage, superintendent of the waterworks, died at Verdun this morning. He was born in 1827. His parents educated him for the priesthood, and he succeeded in passing the first examination for holy orders, but withdrew and decided to follow civil engineering. In 1851 his designs were accepted for the Court House, St. Peter's Church on Visitation street, the St. Pelagie Convent, etc. He obtained the assistant commissionership of public works, and was appointed to survey the proposed railway to River du Loup. He was engaged on harbor improvements as engineer and in 1853 was made assistant engineer in the office of Mr. Keefer on the first Montreal Waterworks. In 1856 he was appointed to the position which he retained until his death. For deeds of bravery he was awarded a diploma and medal of La Societe des Chevaliers Sauveteurs des Alpes Maritimes. He was the father of 21 children. His funeral will take place on Friday morning.

Two young men named Frechette and Carpenter, of Louisville, Que., recently fought over a young lady, and Carpenter was so seriously injured that his life is in danger.

At Louisville yesterday Judge Jackson of the Federal Circuit Court, overthrew a decision of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. He held that the commission could only arbitrate differences and had no right or power to enforce its decisions.

DASHED TO PIECES.

Vessel Lost With all the Crew Except the Captain—His Heroic Son.

A Halifax, N. S., despatch says: Newfoundland advices give the following particulars of the loss of the brigantine Atalaya and all of her crew except one, Capt. Thos. Brown being the only survivor. The Atalaya left Rouen on the 27th of Oct., bound for Philadelphia. She had on board a cargo of empty kerosene oil casks. From the time she left France the weather was extremely rough. On the night of the 27th of December a heavy gale was blowing from the southeast, accompanied by a heavy sea and thick fog. The captain had not got an observation for some days and did not exactly know his whereabouts; but he thought he was considerably south of Newfoundland.

At 1.20 on the morning of the 28th the ship struck. On hearing the shock, the captain, who was below, rushed on deck, the rest of the watch soon following. Through the mist it could be perceived that the vessel had struck some twenty feet from the shore, and the outline of a high cliff could be seen through the darkness.

As was afterwards ascertained, the place where the vessel struck was Bear's Cove, about two miles south of Renews. The water was about three and a half fathoms deep. The sea was running very high, and the captain gave orders to get the small boat ready, but concluded not to leave the ship in the dark and fog unless the ship gave evidence of going to pieces.

The captain gave orders that a line be put on shore and made fast, by which, if the ship broke up, the lives of the crew might be saved. The boat was launched for this purpose, and into her got the first mate and one of the crew. As they were putting off from the ship two others of the crew jumped into the boat, upsetting her and casting all into the sea, instantly drowning them. Of the four men in the boat, the mate was a white man, the three others were negroes. If they had remained on board the vessel all might have been saved. There were only four men now on board, the captain, the second mate, his son (a young man of 18), and two negroes. One of these was below sick, the other had also been complaining for some time past, and was practically of no use in any emergency.

After the upsetting of the boat young Brown volunteered to swim ashore with the line, and in spite of his father's remonstrances jumped into the water. It was the brave act of a brave man, but the young lad's efforts to reach the land were unavailing, and he was pulled back to the vessel. At 5 o'clock the ship went to pieces. The two negroes went down with her, but Captain Brown and his son jumped into the water.

The young man had a cork fender, the father a large plank. The latter heard the voice of the boy cheering him on for some time, but a heavy sea rolled between them. The father was cast upon the shore, and the manly voice of the boy was hushed forever. It is thought that he must have struck against some of the casks floating about, and received injuries which rendered him incapable of swimming.

The captain reached the shore with his clothing nearly torn from his body. He did not know where he was, but perceiving a narrow path he followed it. In a short time he reached the house of a man named Condy, who took him in and gave him shelter for the night. He was in a very exhausted condition and was incapable of coming to St. Johns for some days. Capt. Brown is a Swede by birth, but is a naturalized American citizen, having been in that country for many years. He sailed out of Philadelphia, and is about 50 years old. "My boy's last words were," he said, 'Come on, pop, we'll soon reach the land.' My brave boy, if it had not been for the cowardice of the negro crew you would be alive and with me to-day."

Latest from the Far West.

A New Westminster despatch says: W. H. Jones was hanged in this city at 8 o'clock this morning. Jones was convicted at the November Assizes of the murder of J. Durant, a Frenchman, who he thought was too intimate with an Indian woman who had been living with him. During a drunken spree a quarrel ensued, ending in Jones shooting Durant, from the effects of which he died a few hours afterward. Jones died penitent, declaring his willingness to die, but claiming he was drunk at the time the crime was committed.

Track-laying on the Portage extension was resumed to-day. The Government are doing the work themselves without the aid of the contractors.

The first annual meeting of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange was held this afternoon. President D. H. McMillan delivered the opening address. The exchange has now a cash balance of $1,100 in its favor and a membership of over one hundred. Mr. S. Spink was elected President for the ensuing year.

McMahon, the would-be suicide at Broadview, is improving.

The C. P. R. removed the obstruction placed over the Red River Valley Road at Pembina crossing to day, and "Fort Whyte" is now deserted.

T. A. Greenway, brother of the Premier, and D. J. Wright, of Crystal City, narrowly escaped death by asphyxiation at that place. They were rescued just in time to save their lives.

News has been received from New Orleans of the accidental death by drowning of J. S. Inkster, a young man formerly of this city.

A Novel Race.

Bees can fly with remarkable speed. A pigeon fancier in Westphalia bet that a dozen bees, liberated three miles from their hive would reach it in better time than a dozen pigeons would reach their cot from the same distance. The first bee beat the first pigeon by a quarter of a minute, and three other bees reached the goal before the second pigeon.

Ensilage.

"Ensilage" is any kind of green food preserved for the use of cattle during the winter. A pit called "silo" is the means employed to keep green fodder over winter. It is a method of "canning" forage, so to speak, similar to the canning of fruits.

Milton's Infirmity.

Teacher—"Did not the author of 'Paradise Lost' suffer from a terrible infirmity?"

Pupil—Yes, sir; he was a poet.—Figaro.

GO SELL YOUR STOMACH.

Dyspeptics May Now Dispose of Their Own Worst Enemy.

The extirpation of the stomach, an organ hitherto regarded as vital, has been accomplished in the case of a patient named Marietta Holly, of Washington, who came here some time ago for hospital treatment. She was an inveterate chewer of gum, but whether that had anything to do with her malady has not been determined. Her first symptom was loss of appetite, and food hat she ate against her will was frequently ejected. She lost flesh and strength rapidly, and when she was admitted to the hospital she weighed only 70 pounds, and was entirely helpless. The disease had affected her mind, and she labored under the delusion that she was wealthy, and talked incessantly while awake about her money, and what she intended to do with it. The nature of her malady was hard to determine to a certainty. It was known to be located in the stomach, and it was thought to be a tumor, but whether a cancerous form or not could not be foretold. The stomach was slightly swollen and there was another protuberance above it, for which no explanation could be given. The woman was starving to death, and it was only her splendid physical organization that had kept her alive at all. The patient's consent, in her mental condition, could not be obtained for an operation, and Dr. Jacobus took the responsibility upon himself, and did for her what in his opinion was best. For this he has been condemned by certain surgeons, who are built on the narrow-gauge plan. The patient was put under the influence of ether after careful preparation had been made for an emergency. An incision was made above the navel, about six inches in length. The abdominal wall was hardly thicker than paper, and so tender that it tore under the slightest pressure. This faulty tissue did not promise well for the success of the operation, and in order to remove the strain the incision was extended several inches. A portion of the intestines was taken out and wrapped in hot flannel. They were very small and very transparent, and the network of arteries was beautifully shown when held in the light, a very rare sight indeed. The surgeon finally found the stomach and drew it forward through the opening in the abdomen. It was very dark in color and had the appearance of parchment. It was dry and hard and cancerous, and without a single element of a healthy stomach. The surgeon made a careful examination of the adhesions and found that the pancreas were not extensively involved. He freed the stomach from them, and was then able to get a good view of it. Instead of there being trouble only in the pyloric region, as had been supposed, here was presented a case in which the whole organ was involved. It was an unpleasant position for a surgeon to be in. To go ahead was dangerous, and to stop, after the stomach had been so much irritated, was fully as liable to prove disastrous. Dr. Jacobus has plenty of nerve, and he only hesitated a moment before deciding to go on. In making up his mind he was influenced by an experiment which he had about a month ago tried upon a dog. At that time he removed the entire stomach, and the dog still lives without manifesting any inconvenience from the operation which cost him the loss of this useful organ. The dog was healthy, and the question that presented itself was whether such an operation could be performed upon a weak human being with a diseased organ. Dr. Jacobus thought that it would make no difference and that there was as good a chance for one as for the other. In either case the chance was hardly one in a hundred. After a ligature had been tied around the duodenum and œsophagus, they were cut with blunt scissors as near to the stomach as possible, care being taken to go beyond the diseased tissue, and the stomach was removed. The hemorrhage was not troublesome. The arteries were all enlarged and the stomach would have bled frightfully if it had been cut. After the abdominal space had been thoroughly cleaned a union was made by drawing the pyloric together. It required great ingenuity to unite them, as the canals were of different thickness and did not fit well together. The other swelling was found to be a fluid pouch in the œsophagus, and as it was not of a malignant character it was left untouched. The abdominal wound had just been closed when Dr. Jacobus was called a murderer, as before related. Dr. Jacobus did not prove a murderer. In fact he saved a life. The patient remained unconscious for several days, and then rallied. Her body was rubbed with oil and food was given her, per rectum, and she gained strength rapidly. At the end of two weeks she was given food through the mouth without any bad effect. Digestion went on in a perfectly natural manner, and from this it would seem that the stomach has been thought to play a more important part in digestion than it really does.

The patient will be kept at the hospital for several months, so that the history of the case can be carefully noted.—New York Graphic.

Worthy of General Imitation.

The following notice is hanging in several bar-rooms in Ottawa. It will be welcomed by the law-abiding:

NOTICE TO PATRONS.—At a meeting of the Licensed Hotelkeepers' Association, of Ottawa, which was held on the 18th December, 1888, it was resolved, "That the members of this association will in future comply with the law regarding the sale of liquors from Saturday night at seven o'clock until Monday morning at six o'clock." We, the undersigned members of the above association, have agreed to strictly comply with the above resolution, and request our patrons to govern themselves accordingly.

Then follow the signatures of 68 of the most prominent members of the association

Uses of Prison Walls.

Missionary (in a prison)—"My poor friend, I suppose you regard these walls with hatred, but——"

Prisoner—"Regard them with hatred? No, indeed, I regard them with gratitude. They are my protection. I am in for bigamy, and both wives are furious."

The English cruiser Scout sailed from Malta for Suakim yesterday.

The Berlin Post yesterday withdrew the allegation of forgery made against Sir Robert Morier.

Mr. Parnell has delegated Mr. Maurice Healy, M. P., to collect in Munster all available evidence bearing on the investigation of the special commission.

THE GREAT TUNNEL.

Progress of the New Underground Passage Between Canada and the States.

The work on the tunnel on the Canadian side, says the Sarnia Canadian, is now being pushed with energy. The working force employed now numbers 135 men, and two trains of cars are employed in removing the material, which is being hauled eastward and used in filling up the low places along the track. Temporary tracks are laid down into the excavation, and the earth, having been first loosened either by a team and plough or by the pick, is shovelled directly into the cars. The excavation is 220 feet square on the surface, and the sides will have a slope of one foot to three. The first tier of six feet in depth has been completed and ground was broken on Monday on the second tier. As the "hopper" is to be sixty-five feet deep, it is not likely that the diggers will be at the bottom much before the 1st of May.

On the Michigan side the force, which had been only sixty strong, was increased to 125 on the first of January. The earth is moved by teams, of which twenty-five are employed, and it is an interesting sight to see the men load the waggons. The teamster will drive slowly between the two rows of shovellers, and when he reaches the end his waggon is filled. When the tunnel proper is fairly under way the men will work by electric light, and the work will be carried on day and night.

It is expected that the work on each side will come together under the river about 700 feet from the Canadian shore. The approach to the shaft on the American side is only 300 feet, but on the Canadian side nearly one mile. The reason for this is that from the American side there will be a drop of 90 feet to the mile, and the up grade will all be on land on the Canadian side. The approaches will not be tunneled until the tunnel under the river is completed. When completed the tunnel will consist of 2,300 feet on the American side, 2,200 feet under the river, and 4,000 feet on the Canadian side.

The Pretty Girls of Ireland.

The Irish ladies are perhaps the prettiest in the wide world. Their features, it is true, are less regular than those of English women, but they triumph over them with their soft, creamy complexions, their large, appealing grey-blue eyes and long lashes, and a sort of indefinable charm and demure coquetry, yet thoroughly modest manners. "Every third Irish woman," wrote the Queen in her diary when last visiting the country, "is beautiful, and some of them remarkably so. Their hair and eyes are simply lovely." Apart from personal charms, it is impossible not to admire the gentle grace and dignity of the wives and daughters of the Emerald Isle. Go where you will, I defy you to find an Irish woman who is otherwise than naturally distinguished—the very barmaids being superior in bearing and speech to many duchesses. The list of beauties is a long one, and looking back we can recall histories of the extraordinary loveliness of the three Miss Gunnings, who, when they came up to London, had actually to be escorted in Hyde Park by a guard of soldiers sent by the order of the Secretary of State, so overwhelmingly was the crowd pressing upon them. Then there was Lady Denny, Lady Cahir, Lady Clare and many others, to say nothing of the present young Duchess of Leinster, one of the most attractive women of this or any other day.

A Special Inducement.

Friend (to very sick youth)—"Charley, you must brace up and get well. I have some glorious news for you."

Sick youth (feebly)—"What is it?"

Friend—"Your Aunt Minerva told me personally that if you'd only try and get well she would leave you every dollar she's got in the world."

Sick youth (with more strengh)—"Is that so, Fred? Did you ask her how much she is worth?"

Another Postponement.

Dumley—There comes Brown up the street. I owe that man a grudge, and I propose to pay him with interest.

Robinson—Going to pay him now, Dumley?

Dumley—No, not now. Let's turn down this way.

Our Slippery Streets.

Gallant Old Gentleman (rushing to her assistance)—"I'm afraid, ma'am, you've had a fall—I hope——"

Short-tempered Old Lady (snappishly)—"Why, you don't s'ppose I'd sit down here, you old stup——!"

He helps her up, and makes off hastily.—Punch.

Ahead of the Doctor.

Surgeon—You'll have to be bled, my man. Patient (faintly)—Been. Landlord was here half an hour ago.

A VICTIM OF THE ALMANAC.

O patent medicine almanac!
I was a towering giant,
With a wealth of health and a vim of limb,
To ills and pills defiant!
But now I have the phthisic,
And take every kind of physic,
Have a touch of sharp bronchitis,
And a raging tonsilitis,
And I feel thy awful twinges, cerebro-spinal meningitis.

O patent medicine almanac!
I read thy fearful pages
With tears and fears and groans and moans
And shakes and aches of ages!
And now I have the vertigo,
And tumbling in the dirt I go;
Have a general blood corruption,
Loss of vigor, lack of gumption,
And I feel that I am travelling down the last stage of consumption.

—The tobacco men, at least, have turned over a new leaf.

The quarantine has been raised on all the houses where smallpox has recently existed in Buffalo.

—The craze for gold and silver handles for canes and umbrellas is beginning to lessen.

—You can often determine the value of a man's character from the character of his enemies.

—House and visiting gowns are slightly trained this season, but the ball-room dress is as unmanageable as ever.

—Blinks was taken into custody for being full. Next morning he was taken out and fined. He went in to custody and he came out to buss toddy.

A CURIOUS DISCOVERY.

A Bayonet Found in the Heart of a Tree at Lundy's Lane.

Another reminder of the battle of Lundy's Lane, which was fought in the year 1814, has just come to light in the shape of a bayonet, which was discovered in the heart of an old apple tree. The bayonet is almost intact, and is in the possession of Mr. J. A. Orchard, who is collecting trophies in connection with this battle for the purpose of placing them in the monument when such is erected on the battle grounds. The apple tree was upwards of 100 years old, and was planted by one Pier, whose biography some members of the historical association are endeavoring to discover. The property is now in possession of Mr. Spence, who had the tree cut down a short time since, along with others which were getting old. On the 1st of January this year this remarkable tree was being cut up for firewood, when the bayonet was found in the centre or heart. The tree has been an excellent bearer, and was two feet two inches in diameter. A great many of the older residents regretted to see these trees cut down, but, as the land upon which they stand is valuable, the owner expects to reap greater profits out of it by utilizing it in some other manner. This find is undoubtedly one of the most curious that has yet been discovered, as the bayonet has evidently been in the tree for nearly seventy-five years.

Temperance Notes.

Ex-Chief Justice Noah Davis says: "Of all the causes of crime intemperance stands out the unapproachable chief."

The Supreme Court upholds the law prohibiting the sale of liquors within one mile of the Soldiers' Home at Grand Rapids, Mich.

No liquors are sold on the vestibule train of the Pennsylvania Railroad, or upon the limited express on the New York Central Road.

The brain of the chronic drunkard, says Dr. Forbes Winslow, becomes surcharged with alcohol; and often, on examination after death, if you apply a light to the fluid in the ventricles of the brain, it ignites into a flame. You can actually distil alcohol from the brain of drunkards.

Drinking baffles us, confounds us, shames us, and mocks us at every point. It outwits alike the teacher, the man of business, the patriot and the legislator. Every other institution flounders in hopeless difficulties, but the public house (grog-shop) holds its triumphant course. The administrators of public and private charity are told that alms and oblations go with rates, dues and pensions, to the all-absorbing bar of the public-house. Under the accumulating influence of alcohol, the honest man turns knave, the respectable man suddenly loses principle and self-respect, the wise man is utterly foolish, the rigidly moral man takes a plunge into libertinism. Let us do something toward staying the huge mischief which, one way or another, confounds us all, and may—for we cannot be sure—crush and ruin us all.—London Times.

RUM'S VICTIM.

"You have indeed fallen low," was the sad remark of Justice Solon B. Smith at the Tombs, New York city, to an aged man, who showed every indication of a tramp.

"For God's sake, forgive me, Sol.," pleaded the man. "Liquor has been my curse. For ten years I have been its slave. But from this day forth I will be a changed man. I will quit drinking and make a solemn vow that not another drop of that poison will pass my lips again."

"It has now such a strong hold upon you that you couldn't stop it if you tried ever so hard" remarked the judge. "And, besides, where could you go? You have no home; your wife won't recognize you any more, and your friends pass by with horror and disgust."

"Well, what of that?" said the prisoner "I can live on forty millions, can't I? What need I care for them?"

"Forty millions? Why, you haven't got forty cents," said Justice Smith.

"I tell you, Sol, I have it."

"How did you come possessed of it?"

"Why, I've earned it, to be sure. Where else do you think?"

"Drinking has somewhat overbalanced your mind, and I'll change the complaint against you into insanity," said the court. "You will be treated better in an asylum than in the workhouse. Officer, remove him."

"Please, judge, will you let another officer take him?" said Court Officer Maurice Finn, whose eyes were filled with tears.

"Why can't you?" said the justice in a tone of surprise.

"He was my general in the war, your honor," said Finn, "and he was so kind to me that I don't like to repay him in this way, though I know it is done for his good. He treated the men who fought under him as he would his brothers. It is sad for me, sir, to see my old dear commander in such a position as this, and I and others will see that he is properly cared for at the asylum."

The man was none other than Brigadier-General Thomas W. Eagan, who fought in the battle of Gettysburg under General Meade, and was a participant of almost every battle at that time. At the close of the war he was made an internal revenue officer.

Scented the Battle.

First Stranger (in street car)—"I see you in these cars quite regularly, but seldom at this hour."

Second Stranger—"No; this is an extra trip. My wife wished me to go to a store and match some trimmings for her."

"Ah! Glad I met you. Here's my card. I am a divorce lawyer."—New York Weekly

—"Cohabs" is the new western slang name for Mormons.

H. G. Crobaugh, a defaulter in $3,000 fled from Cleveland to Canada yesterday.

Lord Dufferin arrived in Rome yesterday. He was received by King Humbert in the most cordial manner.

Prince Henry of Battenberg has been appointed Governor of the Isle of Wight, vice Viscount Eversley deceased.

Rev. Dr. Andrew M. Beveridge died yesterday at Troy. He was one of the oldest and best known clergymen in the Presbytery of Troy.

A BRILLIANT SCENE.

The Stanley-Montagu Wedding at the Guards' Chapel, London, a Great Society Event—The Dresses Worn.

Edmund Yates, in his cable letter, thus describes the Stanley-Montagu wedding: The Guards' Chapel, with its marble and mosaics, lends itself admirably to great ecclesiastical ceremonials, and the dense fog which hovered over Piccadilly mercifully spared Bird Cage Walk from its clutches on Saturday afternoon, when the marriage of Eddie Stanley and Lady Alice Montagu brought more royalties together than had been seen at any social function for some time. The soldiers of Mr. Stanley's company lined the aisles. The Prince of Wales had something agreeable to say to everybody. The Princess of Wales, in brocade furs, listened smilingly to the Marchesa De Santurce's respectful invitation to her daughter's marriage. The Prince of Wales' daughters looked wonderfully well in gray coats, trimmed with fur. The Duchess of Teck brought her daughter in a drab dress, which can hardly be described as becoming. Prince George and Prince "Eddy" appeared to be in equally good spirits. Beauty was admirably represented by Lady Randolph Churchill, wrapped in a long gray cloak, edged with fur; by Lady De Grey, in brown; by Lady Forbes, Lady Clarendon, the Duchess of Hamilton, and Mrs. Arthur Sasson. The resonant voice of the bridegroom almost drowned the weaker tones of Lord William Cecil. It was difficult to believe that the tiny bridesmaids in caps were the grandchildren of the evergreen Duchess, who never looked better than she did on Saturday. Lord Hartington was among the spectators; Lord William Neville and Miss Louise Murieta looked on with the keenest interest; Sir William and Lady Harcourt were observable in the crowd near the door. It was nearly dusk when everybody reached Great Stanhope to take tea and inspect the Derby tiara, the Hamilton necklace of diamonds, pearls and emeralds; the Revelstoke brooch, an ornament of diamonds and moonstone, which was the gift of the Prince of Wales. The wedding gifts were bewildering in magnificence. It was very late when Mr. and Lady Alice Stanley set out on their way to Holwood, which Lord Derby had placed at the disposal of his heir during the honeymoon.

An Insurance Mania.

The case of the unusual amount of insurance carried by the late A. D. Kean, of Orillia, who succumbed to fatal injuries by being run over by a train, seems like a case of insurance mania. The amount he carried is found to be $43,000, and this amount for a young man 28 years of age is surprising. So far as can be learned at the time of his death these were the policies issued to him:

Canada Life	$5,000
Federal Life, of Hamilton	5,000
North American	3,000
The Sun, of Montreal	5,000
Manufacturers' Accident (with $5,000 reinsured with the Mutual Accident, of Manchester)	10,000
Travellers' Accident	5,000
Can Accident	8,000
A.O.U.W.	2,000
Total	$43,000

The annual premiums on these policies was over $500.

Sociability Promoters.

Mrs. Greatman (reading)—"A social observer criticises what he calls the 'stupid silence' of most Americans when dining in hotels and restaurants. 'It looks,' he says, 'as though every one had been quarreling. Instead of a cheery, quick interchange of opinion, men and women sit solemn and sorrowful at the table, as though they were in a school.' For this reason he thinks that the general use of light table wines would be a good thing, as it would 'promote sociability.' What do you think of that idea?"

Mr. Greatman—"Well, light wines might be o' some use, but I just tell you for makin' men feel as if every stranger was a long-lost brother there is nothin' equal to forty-rod campaign whiskey."

She Sent Saws Instead of Flowers.

Miss Kate Fretwell was arrested to-day on a charge of being the young lady who furnished fourteen prisoners in the county jail with two dozen saws to cut their way out yesterday morning. At the hearing it was proved beyond all question that the accused had purchased the saws at two different hardware stores. She was also identified by the jailer as a frequent visitor at the jail. She was committed to jail in default of a heavy bond.—Chattanooga despatch in Atlanta Constitution.

Live Men.

Some men seem never to grow old. Always active in thought, always ready to adopt new ideas, they are never chargeable with fogyism. Satisfied yet ever dissatisfied, settled yet ever unsettled, they always enjoy the best of what is and are the first to find the best of what will be.—Philadelphia n quirer.

Lucky Stage Drivers.

Baron F. de Rothschild presented to every driver and conductor on the Hammersmith and Bayswater omnibuses a brace of pheasants each as a Christmas box. Each driver decorated his whip with the Baron's colors, the conductors displaying them at the back of their omnibuses.

The Old Familiar Faces.

Funnyman—How do you like my jokes?

Friend—First rate. I like to renew my acquaintance with old friends.

Governor Ames, of Massachusetts, recommended the extension of female suffrage in that State.

The New York Court has refused to give Mme. Desbars, the medium, the custody of her children.

J. K. O'Neil, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., dropped dead in the Ringland Hotel, Oswego, after drinking a glass of mineral water. He has relatives in Kingston.

Dr. J. H. Nyer, of Hazleton, Pa., shot and killed his wife yesterday morning, and then committed suicide. Every circumstance points to a mutual understanding between the two.

DOUGLAS SLADEN, the Australian poet has been elected a life honorary corresponding member of the Scottish Society of Literature. The society has conferred this title on only five other men—Whittier, Holmes, Mark Twain, Jules Verne and Max O'Rell.

ONLY A DIFFERENCE OF BIRTH.

Professor Hosmer's Comparison of an English King and an American President.

"By a rough estimate 110,000,000 people in the world call English their mother-tongue, in institutions, blood and language, for the most part, derived from the German woods," says Professor Hosmer, in his life of Sir Henry Vane. "Until 100 years ago the English-speaking race was confined within one nationality. Then, in consequence of a bad colonial policy, a split took place, so that to-day the world has two English-speaking divisions of about equal strength, the British Empire and the United States of America.

"The President of the United States has, under the constitution, the powers of an English King of the eighteenth century—of George III., in fact. The only differences lie here, that the President is elected instead of being born, to wield them for a short term of years instead of for life."

"Like sunshine in a shady place,"
The poet called a woman's face
That gladdened all who saw its beauty.
A face, no doubt, that beamed with health,
That blessing which is more than wealth,
And lightens every daily duty.
O how can woman, who-e hard life
With many a wearing pain is rife,
Escape the grasp of such affliction,
And be a power to bless and cheer?
The answer comes both swift and clear—
Take Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the only medicine for woman's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, of satisfaction being given in every case, or money refunded. See guarantee printed on bottle-wrapper.

He Was a Regular Customer.

"Who is that?" bawled the druggist from an upstair window, having been awakened by a violent pulling at his night bell.

"I want 10 cents' worth of paregoric," replied a voice below.

"I want you to understand that I don't open my store at night for 10 cents' worth of paregoric, except for a customer."

"But I'm a customer."

"I don't seem to know you."

"Gracious goodness! I'm in your store three or four times a week to look at your directory."

An English Medical Authority

affirms that the best regimen for preserving health may be summed up in the maxim, "keep the head cool, the feet warm and the bowels active." There is a world of wisdom in the observation. Obstinate constipation, or costiveness, is an exciting cause of other diseases; and, with many persons of sedentary habits or occupations, this inaction of the bowels is a sort of constant annoyance, producing piles, prolapse of the rectum, fistula and various dyspeptic symptoms. All these are warded off, and health is maintained, by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets.

Sure About the Dollars.

Husband (handing over a bill)—"Look at that for a New Year's reminder."

Wife (reading the sum total)—"One hundred dollars and fifty-five cents. But what are you doing?"

Husband (desperately going through all his pockets) "I'm trying to see if I have the 55 cents."

Don't disgust everybody by hawking, blowing and spitting, but use Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy and be cured.

Comes High.

"Charley Smitherson is a nice young man, don't you think?" said one young lady to another.

"Yes; but I don't like his collars."

"Why not?"

"He always looks as if he had fallen into one and couldn't get out."

THE Empress of Russia was more fond of her Danish home than any other of her sisters and brothers, and when she was about to leave it for Russia she wrote on the window pane of one of her favorite rooms at Fredensborg, "Mit elskede Fredensborg, farwell" (My beloved Fredensborg, farewell.)

The following passage occurs in a notice recently posted on the Court house door by a constable of Wicomico County, Md.—"I have sessed and took into execution, a'cordin to law and iniquity, the following aforesaid property."

Probably the richest newsboy in the West is Moses Jacobs, who sells papers on the streets of Des Moines, Ia. He is 18 years old, and has sold newspapers for the last fourteen years, during which time he has acquired $4,000 worth real estate from his savings.

MARVELOUS
MEMORY
DISCOVERY.

Wholly unlike artificial systems.
Cure of mind wandering.
Any book learned in one reading.

Classes of 1,087 at Baltimore, 1,005 at Detroit 1,500 at Philadelphia, 1,113 at Washington 1,216 at Boston, large classes of Columbia Law students, at Yale, Wellesley, Oberlin, University of Penn., Michigan University, Chautauqua, etc. etc. Endorsed by RICHARD PROCTOR, the Scientist, Hons. W. W. ASTOR, JUDAH P. BENJAMIN Judge GIBSON, Dr. BROWN, E. H. COOK, Prin. N.Y State Normal College, etc. Taught by correspondence. Prospectus POST FREE from
PROF. LOISETTE, 237 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

D U N L, 4 89.

SALESMEN We wish a few men to sell our goods by sample to the wholesale and retail trade. Largest manufacturers in our line. Enclose 2-cent stamp Wages $3 per day. Permanent position. No postals answered. Money advanced for wages advertising, etc. Centennial Manufacturing Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

DUNN'S
BAKING POWDER
THE COOK'S BEST FRIEND

THE ADVANCE.

Is published

Every Thursday,

FROM THE OFFICE,

Sydenham Street, - - Flesherton, Ont.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

$1 per annum when paid strictly in advance
$1 50 per annum when not so paid.

W. H. THURSTON,
Editor and Proprietor.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, JAN. 24 1889.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

We are happy to be able to state that things look very bright for the formation of a Mechanics' Institute in Flesherton. Several gentlemen of influence have announced their intention of giving it their heartiest support, and a public meeting is called for next Monday evening in the Town Hall at 7.30 for the purpose of discussing the matter, appointment of a committee, etc. Let us go into this thing with enthusiasm and secure a library for the intellectual improvement of our young and old.

CLOSER CONNECTION.

It is high time now that Flesherton station and this village obtained closer business connection. The time is gone when a feeling of rivalry should exist with either party. The welfare of each is bound up in that of the other, and, like the Siamese twins, we should pull together. The two villages are bound to exist and grow. It is essential to each village's welfare that its neighbor should exist and expand, and anything that will advance the interests of one should be advocated by the other without harboring any of those petty jealousies which have heretofore been a baneful drag upon development. The time is now opportune to cast all these aside and pull together for a mutual advancement. As a preliminary step in this direction let us have telephonic connection between the two places. It may be secured at small expense, and would be a great boon to the business men. It might not even be necessary to build an independent line if a right to use the company's posts at a nominal rental could be secured. In that event the preliminary cost of placing the service would be small indeed. Will some of our enterprising business men think the matter over?

The Storm of '92. A Grandfather's tale told in 1942. The Sheppard Publishing Co., Toronto. Price 25 cents.

This is, as its title indicates, a story of the future. The writer, Mr. W. H. C. Lawrence, is a healthy believer in confederation, and tells the story of a great Canadian war with the United States, fought in 1892, and brought about by the "American hatred of England," with the fishery question introduced as a casus belli. This war demonstrated, according to Mr. Lawrence's reasoning, the advisability of Canada entering a confederacy with the Mother Country. The story is written in an entertaining style and though altogether hypothetical is still within the realm of possibilities, but not of probabilities. Mr Lawrence apparently believes with ourselves, that if Canada ever has to undergo the terror of a war with the United States, it must come in the near future. We are developing a nation here that will shortly outnumber the United States. We have all the material now to build up that nation. They of the south understand this and desire to amalgamate our possibilities with theirs, "peaceably," they say, "if we can: forcibly if we must." It is such individuals as Wiman, et al, who are continually dangling before American eyes our Canada as a rich bait that will bear the responsibility of a future difficulty. It is to be fervently hoped that Mr. Lawrence's prophecy may remain but a fairy tale, and yet its groundwork of facts will make it an interesting study within the next few years. It is written, as it were, at the "cross roads," and it remains to be seen which way the finger board of time will direct us.

A little shuffle has been made in the Ontario cabinet, Hon. Mr. Pardee retiring on account of ill health, and Col. J. M. Gibson, of Hamilton, receiving the appointment of Provincial Secretary. Mr. Gibson's appointment appears to give general satisfaction.

Annual Meeting of East Grey Agricultural Society.

The members of the above society met in the Town Hall here on Wednesday last.

The old board of directors held their closing meeting previous to the members' meeting to wind up the business for the season of 1888, consisting of a few protests from decisions of judges, and violations of the rules of the society. These having been disposed of, the President, T. Kells, Esq., addressed the members on the advancement made in agriculture in the 14 years he has been president of this society, and on the importance of keeping these agricultural institutions well supported. His address was well received, coming from one of long experience. We regret we have not space to give it in full. At the close he announced he would not accept office longer.

The annual meeting was then organized with the retiring president in the chair. After reading of minutes, the treasurer presented the financial statement for 1888, showing a very successful year financially for the society, showing receipt of $1,296 33, expenditure $1,256 75 leaving a balance on hand of $39,58 against a deficit last year of $45,82, and a reduction of debt on the property of the society to the amount of $143,40. This is a good showing for this year. The report was received.

Election of officers resulted as follows, viz:

President G. Stewart, sr.
1st Vice President R. J. Sproule.
2nd Vice President J. Clinton.
Directors S. Damude, G. W. Hawke, R. Ruthvan, S. Stokes, D. Thompson, Dr. Sproule, M. P., J. McArdle, C. W. Bellamy, J. O'Brien.
Auditors J. Brodie, W. J. Bellamy.
S. Damude re elected Sec.-Treasurer.

At a meeting of the Board it was decided to hold a spring show. The date and prize list to be fixed and prepared by a committee then appointed for that purpose.

One important resolution was passed in regard to the Legislative grant. It was the opinion of the Board that the division of that grant to Township Societies had the effect of destroying its usefulness as originally intended, being destributed in such small amounts that it lost its effect as had been intended by the originator. A delegate will be sent to the meeting of the central Farmers' Institute at its next meeting to ask its influence to have this matter properly brought before the Legislature.

Artemesia Council.

The members of council for the present year met in the town hall on Monday for transaction of business. After making the required declaration, our new council waded into business in a regularly professional style. There was nothing green looking about them— they have been there before.

Bylaw No 447, appointing Wm, McLoughrey as assessor, was read and passed. Bylaw No. 448, appointing Geo. Buskin, Wm. Ferguson and John J. Fields to act in conjunction with the reeve and clerk, as a board of health; and Bylaw No. 449, appointing R. J. Sproule and Jas. Brodie auditors for 1889, were also passed

Mr. Henry Cairns was appointed to the position of deputy reeve.

A petition was read from Wm. Hogg with reference to opening up a road in the 8th con, Artemesia, which was allowed to stand over for a month.

An application was read from Sylvester Martin for refund of public taxes, as he was a seperate school supporter. Two letters were also read from the Minister of Education, refering to the above matter.

The Reeve and Deputy Reeve Cairns were appointed a committee to inquire into the sufficiency of the treasurer's security.

The following accounts were passed, after which council adjourned; John Hazard, extra services as collector, $5; Wm. Hooper, repairing culvert on 20 side road, 50 cents; W. H. Thurston, printing, $11.25, and the monthly indigent allowance.

LOCAL NEWS CONTINUED.

SALT.—Another car load fresh salt, all new barrels and full weight. R. Trimble.

Square Timber,

A gentleman from Feversham informs us that a large amount of square timber is being taken out in that neighborhood this winter. It will all be shipped at this station. He also told us of a funny little squabble between two rival companies one day last week. Men representing Mr. Holmes had felled and half squared one stick of timber when Mr. McIntyre, the rival woodsman, came along, claimed the stick and finished squaring it. The dispute waxed warm, as there were fifteen or twenty men in it, when the brilliant idea occurred to some one to measure the claim. This was done, when it was found that the tree really did stand some few feet on Mr. McIntyre's property.

SPECIAL SALE.—In order to clear out winter goods I will give extremely low figures on all lines for the next thirty days. R. Trimble.

The Enigma.

A large number of correct answers have been received to our Scriptural enigma of last week. Miss Violet Hinds, of Flesherton, succeeded in getting her answer in ahead of all comers—Thursday afternoon—thereby securing a copy of the London Graphic Christmas number. We thank the little folks for their interest, and are sorry we could not give each one a prize. Following is the best written and fullest description which was sent in; but it came too late:

DEAR SIR,—The Scripture Riddle is found in first Kings and seventeenth chapter. The holy man was Elijah the Tishbite who lived in Gilead and God sent him to hide himself by the brook Cherith, and God sent ravens to feed him with bread and flesh every morning and evening.

ALLIE MOORE,
Aged 12 years. Flesherton.

FISH.- A small consignment of No. 1 split herring at lowest cash figures. R. Trimble.

Address and Presentation.

On Monday evening last, although there was very unfavorable weather several members of Wm. Rutledge's class assembled at the residence of Mr. Wm. Trimble to present him with a small token of respect for his long and faithful services, viz. 27 years continuous, with but a very few exceptions, as leader of this class. The following address was read and presentation made of a beautiful Bible, with inscription and a small purse, after which the old gentleman made a few touching remarks. The matter was altogether a surprise to him, and therefore the reply was the instantaneous outburst of his heart. After a cup of coffee, etc., a pleasant evening was spent. Following is a copy of the address:

To our Leader, William Rutledge.

DEAR LEADER: Your announcement on Sabbath morning last, that your increasing age and other disabilities, with other apparently unavoidable circumstances, prevent your further acting in the capacity of leader, was unexpected. It teaches us that however faithful in services, or loveable as Christians, time makes its marks, and moves us onward, whether we would or not, to the bourne from which no traveller returns.

Your long, faithful and self denying services to our class—the pioneer class in this reign of Methodism—compels us in some slight manner to show you our appreciation. If but small, it will serve as a remembrance wherever your lot may be cast, so that to the end of your journey you will not forget us.

We present you therefore with this Bible, the book we know you esteem the most, and this purse. We wish it were more. But this will be taken for the deed.

We trust that God's providence may so direct and keep you in your advanced age, that at last you will declare with the apostle, "I have fought a good fight; I have kept the faith; I have finished my course, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

Signed on behalf of the class.

Mrs. C. W. TREADGOLD
Mrs. JOHN DINWOODIE.
Mrs. W. W. TRIMBLE

The Rev. Geo. H. Thayer, of Burbon, Ind., says: "Both myself and my wife owe our lives to Shiloh's Consumption Cure. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Swinton Park.

The Presbyterians of Swinton Park held a very successful tea-meeting on Thursday evening of last week. Proceeds amounted to $50.30. Music was furnished by the Dromore choir, under the leadership of Mr. Ramage.

Priceville is agitating the formation of a brass band.

Died.

WHITTEN—In Flesherton, on Jan. 7th, Mrs. Catharine Whitten, aged 70 years.

A nasal injector free with each bottle of Shiloh's catarrh remedy. Price 50 ct. For sale at the Medical Hall.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. James Lamont met with an accident a short time ago which might have proved fatal. It appears he was in the act of putting down hay off a scaffold to feed the cattle, when one of the boards on which he was standing broke, and he fell down to the floor hurting his back. I understand he is recovering fast.

Victor Watson, son of Adam Watson, miller, met with a severe accident a few days ago, by receiving a severe kick from a horse. He was severely frightened and considerably hurt, but I am pleased to learn that he is recovering as fast as could be expected under the circumstances.

Mr. John McNulty went away on a visit to Holland about three weeks ago, and not returning as soon as expected his mother became uneasy and telegraphed after him. The telegram had the desired effect as he returned as soon as possible after receiving the message, with a passenger along with him in the cutter, who was in urgent enquiry, was found to be his go too in nfo. John treated the ladies and gentlemen well after settling down. He invited the majority of the young people in the neighborhood to his house last Friday night to dance and enjoy themselves as best they could, which they did in good order, keeping good time to the excellent music of H. McDonald on the violin. We all join in wishing him and his wife a very happy life.

Weddings seem to be the order of the day without regard to the unfavorable weather. One wedding party passed through here recently consisting of nine cutters. The happy pair this time were Miss Catharine Macher, of Swinton Park, and Mr. Paul Murphy, of Dundalk. They have our best wishes.

Miss Minnie Frook, of Grant, is up on a visit to her uncle, Josiah Frook, Fraton.

Mrs. Alex Ferguson, of Dakota, who was visiting friends here, has returned home.

Miss Susan Ferris of Holland, is visiting friends here. Look out for another wedding.

Mr. John and T. Ferguson are the crack wood cutters in this settlement. They cut eight cord of wood in one day for Arch Ferguson.

THE MARKETS.

FLESHERTON.

Carefully Corrected Each Week.

Flour	$5 00 to	5 00
Fall Wheat	0 90 to	1 00
Spring Wheat	0 95	1 06
Barley	0 40	0 56
Oats	0 31	0 31
Peas	0 55	0 55
Butter	0 15	0 16
Eggs, fresh	0 17	0 17
Potatoes bush	0 25	0 25
Pork	6 00	6 00
Hay per ton	8 00	10 00
Hides	3 50	4 00
Sheepskins	0 50	1 00
Geese	0 05	0 05
Turkeys	0 7	0 08
Chickens per pair	0 25	0 30
Ducks per lb	0 06	0 06

NEW ADVERTSEMETNS.

Farm for Sale or Rent.

Lot No. 32, 7th con., Artemesia, containing 100 acres, 65 acres cleared and under cultivation. Would sell on reasonable terms. Possession given March 1. Address,

JAMES KESTER,
Flesherton, P.O.

J. P. OTTEWELL,

VETERINARY SURGEON.

Graduate of Ontario Vet. College,
RESIDENCE ON COLLINGWOOD STREET
Sixth Door East of Presbyterian Church,
FLESHERTON.

Farm for Sale.

Being west half lot 34, Con. 8, Artemesia, containing 50 acres. There are on the premises a good log house, good frame out buildings, and a young bearing orchard. It is well watered, well fenced and in a fair state of cultivation. There are about 25 acres cleared and the balance in hardwood and cedar. For further particulars apply to the proprietor.

MRS. JANE MAGEE,
On the Premises, Eugenia, P. O

GO TO

BLACKBURN'S

—FOR

FLOUR, FEED, AND

PROVISIONS.

A large stock always on hand. Dealer in

FRESH and CURED MEATS, NEW LARD, BOLOGNA, ETC.

BUY YOUR BEEF

AT

BLACKBURN'S

GEO. MITCHELL,

BANKER,

FLESHERTON.

DRAUGHTS BOUGHT AND SOLD.

Special Attention paid to the collection of Notes and Accounts, 2nd door North of Richardson & Co's.

Medical.

DR. CARTER,
M.C.P. & S., ONT.
PHYSICIAN, SURGEON, &c.
FLESHERTON.

Office, Strain's block. Residence, J. G. Russell's

J. G. Hutton, M.D.C.M.

Member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Ontario.

Enquire at office, one door east of Grieve's store or Atkinson's Hotel.

Priceville, Nov 19, 1888.

Dentistry.

DENTISTRY.

Thomas Henderson, L.D.S.

SURGEON DENTIST

Gold Medalist and Honor Graduate of the R.C.D.S.,

Will visit FLESHERTON, Monday on the 1st and 3rd of each month. Teeth extracted, decayed and filled in the highest styles of the art, and at moderate rates.

HEAD OFFICE, 761 YONGE ST., TORONTO.

J. P. MARSHALL,

L. D. S., DENTIST.

Visits Markdale the 1st and 3rd Wednesday of each month.

Flesherton each trip on the day following.

Legal.

J. W. FROST, L.L.B.,

Barrister, Solicitor, Conveyancer.

Office,—Strain's Building, FLESHERTON.
A. A. CHESLEY, Solicitor and Conveyancer, Resident Manager.

MR. FROST will be found at the Office on Thursdays as heretofore.

P. McCULLOUGH,

Barrister, Solicitor, &c.

Office, over McFarland's Store, Markdale. Money to Loan.

Business Cards.

John W. Armstrong,

FLESHERTON, Co. GREY.

DIVISION COURT CLERK, COMMISSIONER, &c., Conveyancer, &c. Agent for purchased sale of lands. Appraiser for C. L. C. Co. and F. P. B. & S. Society. Money to Loan on the most reasonable terms. ISSUER OF MARRIAGE LICENSES. NOTARY PUBLIC.

MONEY TO LOAN.

AT LOWEST CURRENT RATES

On Town or Farm Property,

S. DAMUDE,
Flesherton.

W. J. BELLAMY,

TWP. CLERK ARTEMESIA.

CONVEYANCER, COMMISSIONER, INSURANCE AGT, &C

DEEDS, MORTGAGES, LEASES, &c., prepared and properly executed. Insurance affected in first-class companies. Money to lend at lowest rates.

R. J. Sproule,

POSTMASTER, Flesherton, Commissioner in B. R., Licensed Auctioneer, Conveyancer, Appraiser and Money Lender. Real Estate and Insurance Agent. Deeds, Mortgages, Leases and Wills drawn up and Valuations made on shortest notice. Auction Sales attended to in any pary of the County. Money to loan at lowest rates of interest. Collections attended to with promptness and despatch. Charges low. Agent for the Dominion Steamship Company. Cheap tickets from Flesherton to Liverpool, Glasgow, London or any of the British Ports. Parties intending to visit England, Scotland or Ireland, will please ask rates before purchasing their tickets elsewhere.

James Sullivan,

The Tinsmith, - Flesherton

Repairing, Eavetroughing, and in fact everything in the business will receive my prompt and careful attention at reasonable prices.

Try The Advance one year for $1 or six months for 50 cts

FLESHERTON

FURNITURE

WAREROOMS

J. E. M-O-O-R-E.

A NEW DEPARTURE!

In which we are able to give our customers

Large Reductions!

on all goods Our stock is very complete, consisting of

Parlor Suites, in plush and hair cloth, Bedroom Suites in Walnut and Mahogany, and Stained Woods, and we have an immense assortment of every description imaginable,

IN

CHAIRS

TABLES

from $1.50 to the handsome

EXTENSION DINING TABLES!

LOUNGES

SOFAS

AND

EASY CHAIRS!

In a variety of styles at low prices. In fact, if you want anything in

Furniture,
Sewing Machines,
Instruments, or
Picture Frames,

Call and see us as we intend to sell

CHEAP FOR CASH!

1 PER CENT. ON ALL SALES.

Undertaking as usual.

ALL KINDS OF SEWING MACHINES REPAIRED AT SHOP BY COMPETENT MACHINIST.

J. E. Moore.

For Merrie England.

BY M. RICHARDSON.

And soon the bulwark of the north'
Grey Stirling with her towers and town,
Upon their fleet career looked down.

The rock rises precipitously from a level plain on the south side, 340 feet, and slopes gradually down to the north. On this slope, at the foot of which is the railway station, the town is built, and as the shades of evening were gathering, we climbed its steep streets and soon found ourselves hungry and tired, comfortably seated at supper in Murray Place.

The ancient burgh of Sterling is one of the most picturesquely situated of Scottish towns. As a post of defence the rock on which it is built was made available at a very early period and was probably occupied by the Scots before the first Roman invasion. As far back as eighteen hundred years ago it formed one of the chain of fortresses built by Julius Agricola between the Clyde and the Forth.

In the morning I went to have a stroll alone before breakfast and kept ascending, hoping thus to reach the Castle. I found myself at length in a cemetery of unrivalled beauty situated higher than any part of the town, yet in a kind of valley on one side of the castle. A flight of steps from it gives access to the Esplanade and Castle. This valley in the heyday of Sterling's glory was the site of jousts and tournaments and other war-like diversions, and a spot known as the Ladies Rock is so called from having been the point from whence the Queen and her dames viewed the sports. I was surprised to hear a familiar voice from this point call me to come and see the battle field of Bannockburn. It was my Toronto friend Mr. B— who had got here before me and to whom an old citizen was pointing out the places of interest in the grand panorama spread before us.

Immediately in front on the level plain below us, Randolph the nephew of Bruce, with a body of five hundred chosen spearmen, defeated Sir Robert Clifford's eight hundred chosen horsemen in a desperate conflict fought the day before the battle of Bannockburn, thus intercepting communication between Edward's Army and the Castle. The Cemetery contains many interesting monuments, the most striking being a marble sculptured group in memory of Margaret M. Lacklan and Margaret Wilson who suffered martyrdom at Wigton 1685 by being bound to stakes fixed in the sand where the tide of the Solway Firth overflows twice a day. A younger sister of the latter, only thirteen years old, was condemned to the same death but her father purchased her life for one hundred pounds.

After breakfast we all came again to this lovely spot and thence to the Castle. At its gate we were taken in charge by a pensioner who acted as guide. Passing through the quadrangle we saw a portion of the garrison drilling, others who were cleaning guns and accoutrements all young, some mere boys, learning here the grim business of war. The buildings included in the castle are the Parliament House, the Palace, the Chapel Royal besides the barracks, batteries, magazines and prisons. From the ramparts we had a very extensive view of the surrounding country, and the endless charm of this wonderful scene will not soon be effaced from our memories. Our guide, a garrulous old pensioner, pointed out to us no less than nine battle fields dating from the time of Kenneth II. down to inglorious Sheriff Moir. In the immediate foreground, just outside the walls, is a grassy hill called the Heading Mound, and on the summit a stone called the Beheading Stone. This relic of a barbarous age bears traces of the bloody work for which it was used, and on this spot many of the nobles of Scotland were beheaded.

Our guide was a crusty old fellow who had seen much active service, and when pointing out and describing the scenes of former conflict, handled his stick as if he were an active participant in the fight, reminding us of Goldsmith's description of the "broken soldier" who

Wept o'er his wounds or tales of sorow done,
Shouldered his crutch and showed how fields were won.

He rattled away his historic legends, but if we interrupted him to ask a question he invariably lost the thread of his story and temper at the same time. We had paid for his services and could not resist the temptation to pay him with queries and take the worth of his fees in fun. In the upper square we were shown the Douglas room where James II. assasinated the Earl of Douglas in 1452. It contains many interesting relics and curiosities, a communion table used by John Knox, bearing date 1500, and Knox's chair, both clumsy looking affairs. We saw also a lot of ancient arms, Lochaber axes and pikes, gathered from battle grounds.

The old castle was the birth place of James II. and of James V. Queen Mary was crowned here, an infant, and was secretly married here to Lord Darnley. It has been the scene of many a royal fete, and around its grey walls has often rolled the tide of war—often besieged and sometimes almost battered down. We saw the evidences of destruction made by Cromwell's cannon directed by general Monk's army. From its prison to the Beheading Mound many a man has taken his last walk and his last look on earth and sky, then yielded his life for no greater crime than loyalty to his party, his King or his country. We saw many other objects of interest in Stirling, and left it with regrets. On our way to Edinburg we passed Falkirk and Linlithgow, and approaching Auld Reekie we saw the immense piers of the cantilever bridge which is being built over the Forth, the largest in the world. Our train drew up at Waverley station in the heart of the Scottish capital, Edinburgh.

To be continued.

General News.

The cigarmakers employed in forty New York factories struck Friday against a reduction of $2 a thousand.

The new election for Hamilton, consequent on Hon. J. M. Gibson's acceptance of the Provincial Secretaryship, has been fixed for February 7th.

An explosion took place in the Hyde colliery, near Manchester, Eng., Friday, by which 25 men were killed. One hundred miners are still entombed.

A deformed newsboy of St. Louis, named Wm. Kean, died a week ago, and a search of his effects revealed a fortune of $23,000 in cash and bonds. He was 36 years old.

Hon. T. B. Pardee has retired from the Ontario Cabinet owing to ill-health, and Hon. A. S. Hardy succeeds him as Commissioner of Crown Lands. Mr. J. M. Gibson, the member of Hamilton, takes the place of Hon. Mr. Hardy as Provincial Secretary.

At the Toronto Civil Adresses, on Jan. 10th, an action for seduction was brought by David Prior of Newmarket, on behalf of his daughter, Jeannette, against Ellsworth Charles Lloyd, a Salvation Army captain in Owen Sound. The girl was under 20 years. A verdict for $2000.00 was given for the plaintiff.

The tariff question has been discussed for almost nine months by the United States Congress.

The 1,200 students of Cornell University have been vaccinated. Some of the athletes united under the operation.

Rumors are current that the dervishes are massing at Khartum for an [illegible] Dongola, and the Mahdi intends to invade Egypt.

Two young lady officers of the Salvation Army at Welland narrowly escaped being burned to death in a fire at the barracks on Saturday night.

Judgment was given on Saturday by Mr. Justice Ferguson, supporting the contention of the Dominion Government in the case of the Attorney General of Ontario v. Fraser.

It is reported that a tin mine has been discovered in Salisbury.

Ten men were killed at Spottsville, Ky., by the falling [illegible] of a church.

Smallpox is spreading [illegible] a serious extent in Monroe and other interior counties of Michigan.

Three hundred houses were destroyed in the Sarabal Valley, Asia Minor, Monday by an earthquake.

The Bismark correspondent of the St. Paul Pioneer Press represents Dakota as being practically bankrupt.

R. S. White, M.P. for Cardwell, was examined by commission in Montreal Monday in connection with the election trial.

Dundalk Herald: On Monday last Geo. Wellwood was returning home after delivering a load of wood in the village. When near the post-office, Alex. Irwin drove up and tried to pass him. In doing this Wellwood's sleigh slewed, striking one of Irwin's horses on the legs, and knocking the animal over into Wellwood's sleigh, where Mrs. Wellwood was sitting. We believe she was considerably bruised, and her clothes much torn before things were straightened up, Dundalk Herald: On Thursday last, the eight-year old son of Mr. John Conners, hotel keeper, by some means or other possessed himself of a revolver belonging to his father, and began to play with it in one of the hotel rooms. He was showing how it worked to two of his younger brothers, when he succeeded in discharging the contents of one chamber into his leg. The ball entered the calf of the leg. Drs. McWilliams and Griffin were called in and found some difficulty in probing for the bullet. After some time they succeeded in extracting the ball from the middle. The little fellow suffered much in consequence, but is doing well.

Farm to Rent.

Lots 22 and 23, 3rd R., N. D. R., about half a mile west of Flesherton Station, containing 100 acres, 75 cleared. Apply to ADAM MUIR.

Farms to Rent!

IMPROVED and UNIMPROVED

FARMS FOR SALE.

Apply to

J. W. ARMSTRONG.

Flesherton, Jan. 7th, '89.

Great Bargains!

—ON—

VILLAGE and FARM PROPERTY.

S. Damude offers for sale west half of lot 16, Con. 9, Euphrasia, the Talbot farm—100 acres, nearly all cleared and under cultivation; $2,000, $500 cash, ballance can remain on mortgage at 6 per cent.

Markdale Property.

Dwelling house and shop on Mill St., corner lot $300.00.

42 acres in the TOWNSHIP of ARTEMESIA Brick house and good barn, adjoining VILLAGE of FLESHERTON, $1,600. For further particulars apply to S. DAMUDE, Flesherton.

—It Pays To—

GO TO THE BEST

AND THAT IS THE

Northern Business College,

OF OWEN SOUND.

The best and most practical course of study
The best teaching staff.
The best accommodation for students.
The best methods of instruction
The best results from instruction after students graduate

For annual announcements giving particulars regarding the course of study, terms &c., address

C. A. FLEMING, PRINCIPAL.

Owen Sound, Nov. 1st, '88

D. McTavish,

HORSESHOER AND

GENERAL BLACKSMITH,

Collingwood Street,

FLESHERTON, - ONT.

Logging and Plow Chains constantly on hand.

NEW

FALL GOODS!

AT

Central Store,

Priceville.

Having received our Fall stock of Dry Goods we are in a position to offer the best value in the trade. Our stock is very complete, and having been selected with great care we have confidence in a quick discerning public that they can appreciate a well bought article.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Our new stock has arrived and comprises something good and serviceable for Men and Boys, in fact

BOOTS THAT R BOOTS!

for every member of the household. Our

Teas, Sugars and General Groceries

still continue unapproachable. Our motto being good Goods and Low Prices. Come and see us.

Central Store, Priceville.

A. McCABE.

$98 Sewing-Machine FREE

To at once establish trade in all parts, by placing our machines and goods where the people can see them, we will send free to one person in each locality, the very best sewing-machine made in the world, with all the attachments. We will also send free a complete line of our costly and valuable art samples. In return we ask that you show what we send, to those who may call at your home, and after 3 months all shall become your own property. This grand machine is made after the Singer patents, which have run out; before patents run out it sold for $93, with the attachments, and now sells for $50. Best, strongest, most useful machine in the world. All is free. No capital required. Plain, brief instructions given. Those who write to us at once can secure free the best sewing-machine in the world, and the finest line of works of high art ever shown together in America.

TRUE & CO., Box 740, Augusta, Maine.

FLESHERTON

Implement Agency!

J. G. CARSON

Takes this opportunity to thank his many customers for their hearty patronage during the past 8 years and to ask their continned support in his new premises on R. Trimble's corner, opposite Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton. The following is a list of the Implements I handle, all the manufacture of that famous and reliable old firm, Messrs. PATTERSON BROS., Woodstock, Ont.:

Binders,
Reapers,
Mowers,
Rakes,
Wagons
Buggies
Sleighs,
Cutters,
Fanning Mills,
Spring Tooth Cultivators.
Grain Drills,
Broad-cut Seeders.
Spring Tooth Harrows,
Iron Harrows,
Two-Furrow Gang Plow,
Plows.
Scufflers.
Turnip Drills,
Land Rollers.

This Year's

MYRTLE

CUT and PLUG

SMOKING TOBACCO

FINER THAN EVER.

See

T & B

in bronze on EACH PLUG and PACKGAE

New Hair Dressing Parlor.

Mr. W. J. NELSON, having opened out a new barber shop and hair dressing parlor in

Moore's Block, Durham St.

is prepared to attend to all work in his line, and would invite patronage.

Hair cutting, shaving, sharpening, &c., &c., all done in the highest style of the art.

W. J. NELSON.

FLOUR, FLOUR,

STONE

FLOUR!

ME. P. LOUCKS

Is prepared to do your Gristing on short notice and grinds on the old terms of every twenty bushels. Seven cents per bag of two bushels for Chopping, done every day. The Little Mill is big in the estimation of the public.

Satisfaction Guaranteed.

P. LOUCKS, Proprietor

Good stabling for horses.

PRICEVILLE

BAKERY.

A. WATSON!

Desires to inform the public that he can furnish

CAKES AND PIES

To Order.

FIRST CLASS BREAD ALWAYS ON HAND.

I visit Flesherton twice a week—on TUESDAYS and FRIDAYS, with a full supply of goods.

DROP A CARD IF YOU DESIRE ME TO CALL.

WEDDING and FANCY cakes a specialty

A. WATSON,
Priceville.

WANTED!

Elm stave bolts. Cash paid.
S. DAMUDE, Flesherton.

They Come.

Ye wilds, wrapped in primeval sleep,
They come, who'll break your dreaming,
Your forests fall, your harvests reap,
And build their cities teeming;
They come, the God born heroes come!
No herald voice before them,
No shrieking fife nor whirring drum,
No flag of battle o'er them.

Ye forests, ye have waited long,
Sounds savage in you breaking,
To catch the note of Freedom's song,
Man's better hopes awaking.
They come, whom God himself has owned,
Called out from court and prison,
In His eternal plan enthroned,
His glory on them risen.

Ye rivers, ye have wantoned wild,
Unchecked by wheel or spindle,
Upon your bosom nature's child,
Before your star to dwindle.
They come, your forces to enchain,
And give your currents guiding,
As grandly downward to the main
Past thrifty towns they're gliding.

Ye mines of silver, iron and gold,
Within earth's vaults secreted;
Ye heaps of hoarded wealth untold,
No mortal eyes have greeted
They come whose toil shall fret you out,
And in their furnace blast you,
Shall shape you with creative shout,
Shall mould you, mint you, cast you.

Ye wintry waters, where no bark,
Her storm-torn sail unfurling,
Has anchored in your bosom dark,
The ice her beak impearling—
They come, whose symbol round the earth
Shall tell all tribes the story
That man must stand in native worth,
Not in transmitted glory.
—Dr. J. E. Rankin in Christian Register.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

BOOK ONE—CHAPTER I.

THE "SACRA FAMES."

Preaching down a daughter's heart was not a difficult task to a mother like Mrs. Clanricarde. Circumstances compelled her conduct and character strengthened her resolve; and when conditions and feelings are in accord, there we have that triple wall of brass which no human power can break down.

We will enumerate the conditions and circumstances which made the mother preach down her daughter's heart. These were an unbusinesslike husband, who never realized a security but he lost, never moved an investment but he lessened it, yet who, believing in his commercial "flair," was always dabbling in the stock and share market, for the benefit of every one but himself; the love of luxury and the enforced privations of genteel penury; the pride of ambition and the consciousness of gradual social decline; the irritation, coupled with contempt, natural to a clever woman keenly alive to the mistakes of her partner, yet powerless to prevent and doomed only to suffer; the mother's natural desire that her daughter's rare gift of supreme beauty should be utilized as her dowry, and should be the means of placing her beyond the reach of that grim wolf so closely investing her own homestead. All these created that "auri sacra fames" which made Mrs. Clanricarde as hard as iron, as cold as ice, and as cruel as death in the matter of Estelle's present love and potential marriage. It made her as one stone-deaf to the alternate hymns and threnodies of love poured forth by Charlie Osborne—as handsome as a Greek god, and as penniless as a church mouse. It made her as one stone-blind to Estelle's tears and sighs and loss of appetite and slightly faded bloom—save that this last, indeed, aroused in her a certain secret anger, which was the sworn foe of pity. For this depreciation of her capital was as heinous an offence in Estelle, according to the mother's way of looking at things, as were Mr. Clanricarde's speculations in the House, whereby a thousand became five hundred, and percentage was the "peau de chagrin" which every touch made smaller. In this momentous question of her marriage Mrs. Clanricarde assumed to know better than her daughter; and perhaps she was not far wrong in her assumption. Charlie Osborne had everything that a romantic girl adores, but that a far-seeing mother despises as the foundation of the home and family; and with Mrs. Clanricarde the mother's outlook overlapped the daughter's romance.

It made no difference in the ordering of things that no eligible parti was at hand to take up the silver thread, which she was resolved Charlie Osborne should not hold. The few moneyless curates, the one scantily endowed vicar, and the one rosy-gilled doctor, who made up the bachelordom of Kingshouse, were not a whit more desirable than this impecunious Eudemon, and not half so taking. And Caleb Stagg, the only son and heir of old Miles Stagg, the wealthy owner of Redhill and a former coal-miner, was impossible—at least to Estelle, if Mrs. Clanricarde would have shut her eyes and swallowed the gilded sausage whole. But the chapter of accidents has a long coda; and the chapter of accidents in the life-story of a lovely girl of twenty has only just begun.

"It is of no use, Estelle," Mrs. Clanricarde would say, with her high-pitched tone and petulant French intonation—"It is of no use to cry and make a miserable face. If you marry Charlie Osborne you will marry into misery; and I would rather see you dead than go through what I have done."

"If only you would believe in his future, and let us wait!" pleaded Estelle, tears in her large soft eyes, which were like big brown moths lying within a white sea-shell.

"His future! What of it? Child! how fatally touched you are with these stupid English notions!" said Mrs. Clanricarde, warmly. "What is this young man's future?"

"Fame," said Estelle; "and fame is always fortune."

"Fame from what? A picture hung by the Royal Academy?—a drama accepted by a theatrical manager?—a poem published by an enterprising publisher?—and none of the three strong enough for that success which includes a banker's book! That is the future of your handsome Joconde, who aims at eagles and does not bring down even sparrows. And out of these, where, I ask you, is the pot au feu?"

"You misjudge him, mother; you do not give him credit for what he is or has," said Estelle, doing battle for her beloved with gentle persistency rather than over spirit. "He can be great in anything he undertakes. He is great already; only the world has not yet recognized his genius, as it will later, as it must."

"My dear Estelle, you speak like an ignorant child as you are. Real genius is concentrated, and does not go squandering itself all abroad on everything alike," returned Mrs. Clanricarde, sensibly enough. "A universal genius is a fated failure, and never rises beyond mediocrity. He is always close on to, but never actually touches, excellence or success. He is always just the line short. The golden water which is to fill a dry trench must run through a broad pipe in one flow, and not filter through a dozen little pinholes like a watering-pot. And we want our dry trench filled, Estelle; your poor miserable father has taken care of that!"

Mrs. Clanricarde never lost an opportunity of impressing on Estelle the contemptible delinquencies of her father. To the jealous French mother, the daughter ought to belong to her exclusively, and she did not approve of divided sympathies. Besides, that patriotism which means opposition to the present condition of things counted for something in her jealousy; and the French woman born and bred and never sincerely naturalized, for all that she was as English in speech and manner as any one else, did her best to prevent her daughter from becoming too Britannic in her ideas. She had already imbibed that fatal poison of belief in love and romance which ruined half the English girls and shamed the common-sense of half the mothers; and Mrs. Clanricarde's one great desire was to root out these pernicious weeds from Estelle's mind, and plant in their stead wise views of social life and a just estimate of the creature comforts to be got by money.

"Girls are so silly," she used to say, curling her thin mobile lips into that expressive line of illimitable contempt which only such lips can take. "As if love can pay the rent, or kisses feed the children!—as if the husband matters one jot so long as he has money and knows how to use it!—as if I would not rather have married a veritable gnome than this wretched creature of mine with his six feet of folly and his barber's block of vanity!"

It did not mend matters that Mr. Clanricarde was secretly on his daughter's side in this matter of her young love, seeing that for peace's sake he was compelled to be openly on his wife's. Taking his own disastrous way as he did in the manipulation of his funds, he made a point of following her lead in all else; and while he was ruining her fortunes and alienating her affections by refusing to listen to her advice, he made himself so supple, sweet, and tender in the home that, although she despised and disliked him heartily enough, she had no more power to find cause against him outside opposition for its own sake only than she would have had to crush an India-rubber ball. His prompt acquiescence in her repudiation of Charlie Osborne as a husband for Estelle almost made her waver in her own decision. If George could see good reasons why it should not be, the chances were those reasons were bad, and the other side might have something to say for itself.

Despite the opposition and the vigilance of Mrs. Clanricarde, the lovers met in secret as well as openly in society; for it would have been impossible to keep Estelle shut up in the house, or to demand the social ostracism of Charlie Osborne. And as people with gardens will give tennis parties and strawberry feasts, the Clanricardes were forced to go to them with the rest, and take the consequences accruing. The alternative of leaving Kingshouse was also an impossibility. The domestic money market was too tight, and these last investments had restricted it yet more. Hence, the matter was one of those problems which even the most skilful diplomatist among matrons finds it hard to solve, and in the game of chess between love and prudence for the possession of the fair Estelle no one could as yet foresee which would be the winner.

And indeed she was fair—taking the word as beauty, not color. Somewhat above the middle height, straight as a palm-tree but supple and slender as a willow branch, graceful as a fawn and almost as shy, she was one of those women to whom poets write sonnets and musicians dedicate nocturnes; one of the women who make brave men braver still, and weak ones yet more self-indulgent. In her character the two main streams of womanly feeling ran side by side the gentlest and most captivating reliance on those who were her superiors by age, sex, or condition; and the power of self-sacrifice for love. With these would be the maternal instinct when the time and occasion should come. She was woman—pure womanly throughout. Body, heart, and mind were essentially feminine—feminine with all the strength and all the weakness of her sex and type. Weak to the strong and strong only for love, her love was of the kind which justifies itself and redeems its own excess—wholehearted, passionate, unselfish, and pure as flame is pure. Pliant before a firm will, quivering beneath a brutal hand, she yet had that kind of courage which could brave the world, the law, and the commandments should things so fall out, and he who needed her, and whom she loved, be on the outside of virtuous convention. Submissive as another Lucy Ashton to authority, she had that power of revolt for the sake of another which belongs to certain kind of gentle and tenacious nature—that power which not even the mother who bore her suspected, and which would be shown only when called forth by circumstances.

Meanwhile, as things were, she was to all appearance just a shy, gentle-mannered, pretty English girl with a foreign name and face; tightly held by her mother; neglected by her father; secretly worshipped by the one scantily endowed vicar and the two impecunious curates; frankly admired by the rosy-gilled doctor; and frantically adored by Charlie Osborne, who saw in her his tenth Muse, his Egeria, his good angel, and the one absolute necessity of his life. And, save that she met her handsome adorer in secret and let him say things which would have made her mother furious had she heard them—more furious still had she heard the girl's replies—she obeyed that mother in all things; especially in the one grand essential of not marrying a man who could not keep even a servant not to speak of a wife, and whose sole possessions were beauty, love, poetry, art, that delicacy of mind which belongs to the artistic temperament, and a constitution which, as yet free from disease, was decidedly fragile and on the line of something worse. Just so much grace of common-sense had this young man, and no more—he did not urge Estelle to run away with him and begin life and house-keeping on that one hundred a year which was all his fixed income. Of course in the future he would be a rich man, because a famous one. That was as certain as the rising of to-morrow's sun to him as well as to Estelle. Pending that certainty, however, he was forced to hold his hand and hope for the best. No one else was to the fore at Kingshouse—Caleb Stagg being impossible; and with this negative comfort he and she must be content.

Kingshouse was not a rich field for the adventures of life or the vagaries of fortune. The scenery was beautiful in a quiet, sleepy, rural way; the old-fashioned country town was quaint and stagnant, the society was restricted, and the income-tax collector did not cover much ground. Save Annie Aspline, whose mother had been a successfully married cook, not a girl had two-pence-halfpenny for dower-money; and, save Caleb Stagg, whose father had been a miner, not a man had more. Charlie Osborne, the son of the late vicar, stood a head and shoulders above them all for personal charms; and the bachelordom of the district so sparsely represented on the tennis-ground did not touch him in all that makes a young man desirable and dangerous. So that Mrs. Clanricarde, while she repudiated the handsome genius, sent back to his native place because his constitution could not bear the exhaustion and bad air of London, had no other string to her slack bow. And if the love that could be had was undeniably supperless, the love that was wanted was as undeniably bodiless.

So matters stood in the pretty village town of Kingshouse when this story opens and the serious play was about to begin.

CHAPTER II.

THE CYMON OF KINGSHOUSE.

Nothing, to the high-nosed, blue-blooded gentry of Kingshouse seemed so contrary to the providential ordering of things—as men have ruled that ordering should be—as that the heir par excellence of the district should be a man like Caleb Stagg, the heiress a girl like Annie Aspline; though, indeed, in this latter case, the girl was well enough, taken by herself. It was the mother who was the stumbling-block—yet not a stumbling-block of a formidable kind. With Caleb, on the contrary, the disabilities went all the way, like a rope coiled round him; crushing the social vitality out of his elsewise vigorous condition, and reducing what should have been beauty of circumstance to a mere shapeless mass of inert uselessness.

As good as the proverbial gold in his essential nature, and with a really fine, if limited, tract of intelligence, young Caleb was as heavy as lead in his bearing, and as dull as so much pudding-stone in his conversation. He had inherited his physique, but not her blunted intellect from his mother. She had transmitted herself to Caleb; and like mother, like son, in all things save the absolute quality of the brain. For Caleb was as heavy built and as round-limbed as she; with the same light gray eyes, coarse sandy hair, fresh red and white complexion, small snubby nose, and large, full, fleshy, unpoetic lips. And what kind of social credentials can be got out of such an inventory?

To add to this heavy handicap of nature, the strong character and close grip of old Stagg had wrought on both wife and child the usual effect of will and domination over comparative flaccidity. It had crushed out of them all such initiative, all such spirit, as might have been developed, at least in Caleb, had he been under a more elastic rule and allowed a freer seaboard.

A man of character and shrewd intelligence, but utterly untaught, Miles Stagg was what the country people were wont to call a queer fish and a rough customer, or, perhaps, a regular rowdy when he got drunk—which was oftener than should have been, but not so often as might have been expected. As a set-off, however, he had that comprehensive quality known as a good heart—that is, if he broke a man's head, he gave him a golden plaster wherewith to mend it. And to be free with his fist and open with his hand seemed to the former miner as fair a division of things as a reasonable man could expect.

